The king was bent on a war at any rate, whilſt the ſtates uſed all poſſible endeavours to avoid it. Nevertheleſs, not judging it proper to treat with Downing, who behaved to them with great haughtineſs, they ſaid in anſwer to his memorial, that they would ſend an embaſſador to the king. Accordingly, they diſpatched Van Goch, who had his firſt audience of the king the 25th of June. As he was ſpeaking, at this audience, of the trade of Africa and the Weſt Indies, the king interrupted him, and ſaid, it was not to be ſuffered, that the Dutch Weſt India company ſhould pretend, by means of three or four ſhips, and a few forts on the coaſt of Guinea, to exclude other nations from that commerce. The embaſſador anſwered, the difficulties about that affair were terminated by the laſt treaty, and it ought to be examined, whether the Dutch had acted contrary to it. Afterwards, the ſtates being informed of the hoſtilities committed by Holms at Cape Verde, and in Guinea, their embaſſador complained to the king, who anſwered, he had not the leaſt knowledge thereof. Some days after, the embaſſador preſented a large memorial on that ſubject, with a freſh complaint, that the king had forbid the importation of Dutch commodities into England. The king gave the ſame anſwer as before, to the firſt article of the memorial, that he had no knowledge of what was acting by Holms; and to the ſecond, that the prohibition of commodities was upon the account of the plague then reigning in Holland. It appeared afterwards, that the king pretended, the affair of Cape Verde and Guinea did not concern him, but was a private difference between the Engliſh and Dutch companies, and therefore it had not been neceſſary to inform him of it. But it will hardly be conceived, that the duke of Yoak, as governor of the royal African company, ſhould ſend a fleet of twenty one men of war to Guinea without the king's knowledge.

While Downing at the Hague and Van Goch at London, fruitleſly preſented memorials upon memorials, the king was diligently equipping his fleet. As he wanted money [g], he borrowed one hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London, who willingly lent him that ſum, in the belief that he intended only the good of the Engliſh trade, by the deſtruction of that of Holland. The eſtates, on their ſide, prepared for their defence, but not with the ſame vigour that their enemies were preparing to attack them. Their deſign was to gain time, in hopes, their fleets of merchantmen would return before the declaration of war; and the king's intention was to intercept thoſe fleets before the publiſhing of any declaration.

The king diſcovered his deſign in a manner not to be miſtaken. For ſending his fleets to ſea, under the command of the duke of York, as high admiral [h], the fleet met, in November, with the Dutch Bourdeaux fleet, homeward bound, laden with wine and brandy, and took one hundred and thirty ſhips, which were brought into England, and condemned for lawful prizes, though no war had yet been proclaimed. It is needleſs to reflect on the king's conduct, or on the judgment of the Engliſh admiralty. Every unprejudiced perſon will eaſily believe, that the law of nations was never more unjuſtly, or more manifeſtly violated. In vain do ſome hiſtorians endeavour to palliate this action with two reaſons, which diſcover by their weakneſs, how much they themſelves were perſuaded of the reality of the injuſtice. The firſt is, that about the ſame time, Ruyter diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their factories at Cape Verde, and on the coaſt of Guinea. But, firſt, they take no notice, that theſe factories were mere uſurpations of the Engliſh, who had the ſame year diſpoſſeſſed the Dutch of them. Secondly, Ruyter did not recover the forts of Cape Verde, and on the coaſt of Guinea, till the following year 1665. For it muſt be conſidered, that Holms committed his hoſtilities at Cape Verde, in the months of Auguſt and September, and afterwards ſailed to the coaſt of Guinea, where he ſeized ſeveral forts. This news muſt therefore be brought to Holland, the ſtates muſt ſend to Ruyter in the Mediterranean to repaſs the ſtreights, and ſail to Cape Verde; and laſtly, Ruyter muſt execute his orders, and the news of his expedition be carried to England. Now, if all this cannot be effected within the ſpace of ſix weeks, how is it poſſible to juſtify the taking of the Bourdeaux fleet in November, on account of Ruyter's expedition to Cape Verde and Guinea, three months after? The ſecond reaſon is, that the war was not the project of the king, but the voice of the people and parliament; as if, even on this ſuppoſition, the people and parliament were leſs obliged than the king to obſerve the law of nations. But this was not the only fault of that nature committed by Charles II. through a deſire of money.

Mean time, the king of France apprehending he ſhould at laſt be involved in the war by aſſiſting the ſtates, purſuant to the treaty of 1662, believed it incumbent upon him to uſe ſome endeavours to prevent it, and to that end offered his mediation to the two parties. The ſtates willingly accepted it, but it was rejected by Charles, who ſaid, he would enter into no negotiation till he had received entire ſatisfaction on his demands. He had now ſent ſir Richard Fanſhaw to Spain, and the lord Holles to France, to endeavour to engage theſe two crowns in a war with the Dutch. But he ſucceeded neither at Paris nor Madrid. Nevertheleſs, he perſiſted in his reſolution, to make war, though he had no other reaſon to alledge for it than the pretended depredations committed by the Dutch upon the Engliſh, the particulars of which were never known to this day.

When it is conſidered, with what animoſity this war was undertaken and purſued, not only by the king, the duke of York, and the miniſtry, but even by the parliament, one can hardly help thinking, that they who excited this animoſity, had ſome other ſecret end than that of ſupporting trade. But hitherto, conjectures only have been offered on this ſubject. Some ſay, the war ought to be aſcribed to the duke of York's ambition, who was impatient to diſtinguiſh himſelf, by commanding, as lord high admiral, the king his brother's fleet. Others believe, the king finding his coffers empty, notwithſtanding all the money given him by the parliament and that raiſed by the ſale of Dunkirk, engaged by his intrigues the parliament to propoſe this war to him, to have a pretence of demanding extraordinary ſupplies which ſhould not be all expended in the war. There are others who believe, the king, the parliament, the city of London, found this war abſolutely neceſſary to humble the maritime power of the Dutch, who aimed to engroſs the whole commerce of Europe, as they had already done that of the Indies: that though the cauſes of the war were never fully made known, every one underſtood, it was a war occaſioned by the jealouſy of trade. Laſtly, there are who ſuſpect, that the project to introduce popery into England being now formed, the execution of it was only ſuſpended till the Dutch were rendered unable to ſuccour the Engliſh proteſtants, ſince it was only from them that they could receive aſſiſtance. I ſhall not take upon me to determine what were the ſecret motives of this war, which certainly was undertaken on very ſlight grounds, as will hereafter more fully appear[i].

The parliament meeting the 24th of November, after two prorogations, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes upon the preſent affair, namely, the war with the ſtates general. He ſaid, that upon the ſtock of his own credit he had ſet out a fleet, not inferior to any England had ever ſeen, and which had coſt him eight hundred thouſand pounds. All this tended to demand of the commons a proportionable ſupply. He then added.

" ——I know not whether it will be worth my pains to endeavour to remove a vile jealouſy which ſome ill men ſcatter abroad, and which I am ſure will never ſink into the breaſt of any man who is worthy to ſit upon your benches: that when you have given me a noble and proportionable ſupply for the ſupport of the war, I may be induced by ſome evil counſellors (for they will be thought to think very reſpectfully of my own perſon) to make a ſudden peace, and get all that money for my own private occaſions. I am ſure you all think it an unworthy jealouſy, and not to deſerve an anſwer. I would not be thought to have ſo brutiſh an inclination to love war for war's ſake. God knows, I deſire no bleſſing in the world ſo much, as that I may live to ſee a firm peace between all chriſtian princes and ſtates. But let me tell you, and you may be confident of it, that when I am compelled to enter into a war, for the protection, honour, and benefit of my ſubjects, I will, God willing, not make a peace, but upon the obtaining and ſecuring thoſe ends for which the war is entered into: and when that can be done, no good man will be ſorry for the determination of it."——

It will be ſeen hereafter, how the king diſcharged his promiſe in this ſpeech. After he had done, he farther declared to them, that he did intend the lord chancellor ſhould have made " a narrative concerning the treaty and manner of proceeding with the Dutch;" but the chancellor being laid up with the gout[k], he had ordered the narrative to be put into writing, which was delivered to both houſes.

It will be eaſily imagined, the narrative contained only what ſhould inflame the parliament. But the hiſtorians have not been pleaſed to relate the contents, perhaps for want of knowing them. Be this as it will, the king found the parliament ſo well diſpoſed in his favour, that the two houſes, by ſix lords and twelve commoners, ſent their thanks to the city of London for their loan to the king. A few days after, the commons voted the king a ſupply of two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, towards the maintainance of a war ſo neceſſary to the ſtate; and in leſs than three weeks, ways and means were found for raiſing that ſum in three years, after which both houſes adjourned to the 12th of January.

Immediately after, the king publiſhed a declaration, by which general repriſals were granted againſt the ſhips, goods, and ſubjects of the ſtates general, and the court of admiralty ordered to condemn them as prizes according to the courſe of admiralty and law of nations. This declaration was founded upon the grievous damages and inſults done to the Engliſh, but without ſpecifying one article.

When the Bourdeaux fleet had been ſeized and condemned, the Engliſh took all the Dutch ſhips they met, though the war was not yet proclaimed. But it was much worſe ſince the declaration for general repriſals had been publiſhed.

When the ſtates were informed of the hoſtilities committed by Holms at Cape Verde and in Guinea, they ſent an expreſs to Ruyter, to order him to repaſs the ſtreights, and ſail towards theſe coaſts, to recover what the Dutch Weſt India company had loſt. Ruyter executed this order with great vigour, and retook moſt of the forts ſeized by the Engliſh. He likewiſe took ſeveral of their ſhips. This news reached London the beginning of February, and furniſhed the king with a new pretence for the declaration of war, which was publiſhed in a few days.

[1664-5.] The parliament meeting the 12th of January, the houſe of commons proceeded immediately to the money bill, as the moſt preſſing affair. The bill being ready, the king came to the houſe to give his aſſent, after which, war was formally declared againſt the ſtates general. The declaration was founded upon the numberleſs injuries and unſpeakable damages, the Engliſh had ſuffered from the Dutch, without being able to obtain the leaſt reparation. The king added, that the ſhips belonging to the Dutch were not detained by him, till he found that Ruyter was ordered not only to abandon the conſortſhip againſt the Algerines, to which he had been invited by the ſtates, but alſo to uſe all acts of depredation againſt his ſubjects in Africa. He therefore declared to all the world, that the Dutch were the aggreſſors, and ought in juſtice to be ſo looked upon by all men.

What is very aſtoniſhing in this declaration is, that the king did not even take care to preſerve appearances, as if his ſubjects and all Europe had been void of common ſenſe, or it was not known that the fleet from Bourdeaux had been intercepted in November, before Ruyter had reached Guinea. He pretended, that all the world muſt be ignorant, becauſe he himſelf feigned not to know, that Holms had begun hoſtilities at Cape Verde and in Guinea in Auguſt and September. In ſhort, he would have all the world believe, on his bare word, that the Engliſh had ſuffered grievous damages, without his vouchſafing to ſpecify one ſingle injury. This declaration was approved of by twenty-two privy counſellors only, the earls of Southampton and Clarendon having been either unable, or unwilling to be preſent when it was reſolved. It was dated the 22d of February, but was not publiſhed till the 2d of March.

The king having notice that ſome bills were ready for the royal aſſent, came to the parliament the 2d of March, and after paſſing the bills, which were of no great importance, he prorogued the parliament to the 21ſt of June. Afterwards, he continued the prorogation to the 1ſt of Auguſt, and then to the 9th of October.

In this ſeſſion the clergy voluntarily reſigned their right of taxing themſelves in convocation, and from this time have been taxed in common with the people in parliament. This has made convocations leſs neceſſary to the king, and conſequently leſs conſiderable in themſelves[l].

[1665.] The war being declared, the duke of York, in the end of March, repaired to the fleet which he was to command conſiſting of one hundred and ſeven men of war, and fourteen fire ſhips. But as the fleet was not yet ready, he could not ſail till May.

Some time ſince, the ſtates, perceiving a war unavoidable, had preſſed the king of France to declare againſt England, purſuant to the treaty of 1662, but had not yet prevailed. Charles on his ſide ſolicited him to abandon the ſtates, and allured him with very tempting advantages. So, Lewis was not a little embarraſſed. He was deſirous to keep fair with the king of England, whom, he foreſaw, he might want; and, on the other hand, if he abandoned the ſtates, there was danger of their being overcome, and of penſionary

[i] Burnet ſays, he was very poſitively aſſured by ſtateſmen of both ſides, that the French ſet this war on in a very artificial manner; for while they encouraged us to inſiſt on ſome extravagant demands, they at the ſame time preſſed the Dutch not to yield to them; and as they put them in hopes that if a rupture ſhould follow, they would aſſiſt them according to their alliance, ſo they aſſured us, that they would do us no hurt.—There was no viſible cauſe of war.——France and popery were the true ſprings of theſe counſels. It was the intereſt of the king of France, that the ſtates ſhould be in no condition to make a vigorous reſiſtance, when he ſhould be ready, either to invade them, or fall into Flanders.——The French did thus ſet on the war between the Engliſh and Dutch, hoping that our fleets ſhould mutually weaken one another ſo much, that the naval force of France, which was increaſing very conſiderably, ſhould be near an equality to them, when they ſhould be ſhattered by a war. The ſtates was likewiſe the greateſt ſtrength of the proteſtant intereſt, and were therefore to be humbled. p. 198, 199.

[k] It is very probable, as Echard obſerves, that his diſtemper was more political than real; for he was utterly againſt this war, as was alſo the earl of Southampton. Tom. 3. p. 125.

[l] It being found, by experience, that their whole ſubſidies were inconſiderable, and yet unequally heavy on the clergy, it was reſolved on, hereafter, to tax the church benefices, as temporal eſtates were taxed; which proved indeed a lighter burden, but was not ſo honourable as when it was given by themſelves. Yet intereſt prevailing above the point of honour, they acquieſced in it. So the convocations being no more neceſſary to the crown, this made that there was leſs regard had to them afterward. They were often diſcontinued and prorogued; and when they met, it was only for form. Burnet. p. 197.——The cuſtom of the clergy's taxing themſelves was broken during the late troubles. For then the clergy, either out of voluntary compliance, affectation of popularity, or becauſe they wanted proxies, to repreſent their body, had their benefices taxed with the laity. This the court found, after the reſtoration, to be an eaſier thing, than to have two bodies of men to pleaſe. And therefore intended to deprive the clergy of that right, if they had not voluntarily relinquiſhed it.

De Wit losing all his credit. This could not happen, without a change of the government, the re-establishment of the young prince of Orange, and the king of England's being in effect master in Holland. It was through the sole influence of the pensionary that the states were attached to the interests of France, and consequently his fall could not but be extremely prejudicial to that kingdom. The course therefore which Lewis took on this occasion, was to gain time, one while by cavilling at the terms of the treaty of 1662, another while, by giving hopes to the states of his declaring against England, and lastly, by a splendid embassy to London, with the duke of Verneuil at the head of it, to mediate a peace between England and Holland. In order to know his situation, let us hear what he says himself in a letter to count d'Estrades his embassador at the Hague, dated the 19th of December 1664.——"However, I own, I am a little embarrassed, considering, if I literally execute the treaty of 1662, I shall very much prejudice my principal interest, and this, in favour of a nation, which not only will never be serviceable to me, but which I shall find opposite in the only case where I should want them, and then, the assistance I shall have given them, will turn against me. Besides this, I lose England, which is upon the point of concluding a strict alliance with Spain, in case I reject her offers, and these offers, for I may trust you with the secret, are a carte blanche in every thing I can desire for the Netherlands, without one inch of land expected for England. Besides the king of England himself suggests to me, how to avoid with honour assisting the Dutch. He pretends, they are the aggressors: that he has a right to the forts, they have seized in Guinea: that they first armed: that they have made a national quarrel for a private dispute between two companies, which they should have been suffered to decide: that they committed the first act of violence in ill treating one of his ships laden with masts from Sweden. That however, I am only engaged for what passes in Europe, that it is visible all the differences, except that of Guinea, are easy to be adjusted. That it is not reasonable, their capricious obstinacy to maintain a country for which I am not engaged, should kindle a war in these parts, because as I am not obliged for the principal, I cannot be so for the accessions and dependencies. I omit how I was served by the states at Munster, &c. What I now write must be a secret."

I cannot forbear making some remarks on this letter.

First it shews, the king of France did not excite the war between England and Holland, as most of the English historians pretend.

Secondly, if Charles had really intended the welfare of his kingdom in undertaking this war, he would not have offered the king of France a carte blanche for the Netherlands, in order to accomplish the destruction of Holland. This was a thing directly contrary to the interests of England, and very different from the satisfaction demanded for the injuries, his subjects might have received from the Dutch.

Thirdly, in what Charles alledged to Lewis, there appears no proof, that the Dutch were the aggressors, nor any thing of the pretended damages of eight hundred thousand pounds: but that the principal point in dispute was the propriety of some forts on the coast of Guinea, which, according to him, was an affair between the two companies, and that the rest was easy to be adjusted.

Fourthly, Charles supposes the states to have made it a national quarrel, by sending Ruyter to Guinea; but that he had not concerned himself with the affair, because Lawson had been sent with twenty-one sail, in the name of the duke of York, and the royal African company.

Lastly, the states had no reason to expect much assistance from France, unless the chance of war should render it necessary for them, or the king of France find some considerable advantage in espousing their quarrel.

It was therefore to gain time that the embassy was sent to London, because Lewis pretended, that as long as there was any hope of an accommodation, he was not obliged to declare against England. Now whilst his embassadors were at London, he could say, that the hope of a reconciliation was not entirely desperate. He managed so artfully, that he kept them there till the end of the year 1665, declared not against England till January 1666, and his declaration was of little service to the states.

The duke of York sailed with the English fleet in May, and before the Dutch could be ready, alarmed the coasts of Holland. He continued a fortnight near the Texel, to prevent the fleet of Holland from joining that of Zealand, in which he could not fail of success. In the mean time, he took several Dutch homeward bound ships, who had not been informed of the war. However, as the war was not made only to hinder this junction, the duke at last sailed away with design to meet Ruyter, who was returning to Holland by order of the states. But finding, his provisions were consumed upon an uncertain expectation, he retired with his fleet to Harwich, contenting himself with sending some frigates to cruise in the channel, and bring him intelligence of the enemy[m].

Mean while, the Holland and Zealand squadrons joined and formed a fleet of one hundred and twenty-one men of war, besides fire ships, under the command of Obdam de Wassenaer. He had under him Cortenaer vice admiral of the Maese, Evertzen vice admiral of Zealand, and Cornelius Tromp son of the famous Martin Tromp. The rear admirals and captains were very far from answering to their superiors in capacity, more care having been taken to fill these posts with the relations and friends of those, whom the pensionary wanted to preserve his credit, than with experienced officers. So, except fifteen or sixteen captains, the rest were unexperienced. This is a misfortune to which republics are more liable than monarchies. Though De Wit managed the affairs as he pleased, he had for enemies all the party of the house of Orange, who were spies upon his conduct, and misrepresented all his proceedings, in order to ruin him. The pensionary was not ignorant of it, and therefore believed, the only way to secure himself, and preserve his authority, was to hazard a sea engagement. Success would disarm the malice of his enemies, and the loss of a battle would of course oblige the French to execute the treaty of 1662, and silence the complaints and murmurs of the Orange party, who industriously published, that Lewis only amused the states. Agreeably to this resolution, which the pensionary caused the states to approve, an order was sent to Obdam, to go in quest of the enemy. He obeyed, and came in sight of them the 1st of June, not far from Harwich. But the wind being southerly, and the next morning south-west, he retired to the mouth of the Maese. He acquainted the states by an express, with the reason of his retreat, and that he did not think proper to attack the English while they had the advantage of the wind. But he received still more positive orders to fight, let the wind be as it would, on peril of answering it with his head. After so express an order, there being no way to recede, he weighed anchor at break of day, and within an hour discovered the English fleet divided into three squadrons. The first under the red flag, was commanded by the duke of York, assisted by Penn and Lawson. The second being the white squadron, was conducted by prince Rupert, assisted by Minnes and Sampson. The third which was the blue squadron, was commanded by the earl of Sandwich, who had with him Cuttings, and sir George Ascough.

I shall not pretend to describe this engagement, fought the 3d of June, for which I own myself unqualified. I shall therefore only say, the Dutch fleet was overthrown, chiefly by the ill conduct of several captains who were wanting in their duty; by the death of Obdam, who with his ship and all his men were blown up; by the loss of Cortenaer who was killed upon the deck after hoisting the admiral flag, and by many other causes which are scarce intelligible but to those who are versed in sea affairs. The Dutch lost nineteen ships burnt and sunk, with about six thousand men[n]. On the English side, the loss was only of four ships, and about fifteen hundred men, among whom were Charles Berkley earl of Falmouth, admiral Sampson, James Ley earl of Marlborough, and vice admiral Lawson, who died shortly after of his wounds[o]. The remains of the Dutch fleet retired to the Maese or the Texel, and were pursued all the next day being Sunday, though, according to some, the duke of York did not in the pursuit, discover the same ardour he had shewn in the battle. See what Dr. Burnet bishop of Salisbury says of it in his posthumous history of his own times.

That famous historian says, "After the fight, a council

[m] By the duke's retiring from the coast of Holland, the enemy took the advantage of intercepting the English Hamburgh fleet. Echard, tom. 7. p. 134.

[n] Our historians say, that we lost but one ship; and that the English took eighteen Dutch men of war, and sunk and fired about fourteen more. They also took two thousand sixty-three prisoners, whereof sixteen were captains. See Burchett, p. 398. Echard, tom. 3. p. 134.

[o] And likewise the lord Muskerry, and Mr. Boyle, the earl of Burlington's second son, these two, with the lord Falmouth, were killed with the same cannon ball, just by the duke of York, and so near him, that he was sprinkled with their blood and brains. The earl of Portland was likewise killed. Burchett, p. 398.

of war was called to concert the method of action when they ſhould come up with them. In that council, Penn, who commanded under the duke, happened to ſay, that they muſt prepare for hotter work in the next engagement. He knew well the courage of the Dutch was never ſo high as when they were deſperate. The earl of Montague, who was then a volunteer, and one of the duke's court, ſaid to me, it was very viſible that made an impreſſion: and all the duke's domeſtics ſaid, he had got honour enough: why ſhould he venture a ſecond time? The ducheſs had alſo given a ſtrict charge to all the duke's ſervants to do all they could to hinder him to engage too far. When matters were ſettled, they went to ſleep; and the duke ordered a call to be given him when they ſhould get up to the Dutch fleet. It is not known what paſſed between the duke and Brounker, who was of his bedchamber, and was then in waiting; but he came to Penn as from the duke, and ſaid, the duke ordered the ſail to be ſlackened. Penn was ſtruck with the order, but did not go to argue the matter with the duke himſelf, as he ought to have done, but obeyed it. When the duke had ſlept, he upon his waking went out upon the quarter deck, and ſeemed amazed to ſee the ſails ſlackened, and that thereby all hope of overtaking the Dutch was loſt. He queſtioned Penn upon it. Penn put it on Brounker, who ſaid nothing. The duke denied he had given any ſuch order. But he neither puniſhed Brounker for carrying it, nor Penn for obeying it. He indeed put Brounker out of his ſervice, and it was ſaid, that he durſt do no more, becauſe he was ſo much in the king's favour and in the miſtreſs's. Penn was more in his favour after that than ever before, which he continued to his ſon after him, though a quaker. And it was thought, that all that favour was to oblige him to keep the ſecret. Lord Montague did believe, that the duke was ſtruck, ſeeing the earl of Falmouth, the king's favourite, and two other perſons of quality killed very near him, and that he had no mind to engage again, and that Penn was privately with him. If Brounker was ſo much in fault as he ſeemed to be, it was thought the duke, in the paſſion that this muſt have raiſed in him, would have proceeded to greater extremities, and not have acted with ſo much phlegm."

The duke of York ſeeing, it was in vain to continue the purſuit, retired to the coaſts of England, and repaired to Whitehall to receive the acclamations of the court and city of London. The king appointed a day of thankſgiving throughout the kingdom for the victory, and ſeveral medals were ſtruck in honour of the victorious duke of York, who was now in a very agreeable ſituation [p]. For beſides that he was lord high admiral, governor of the cinque ports, and of Portſmouth, and had the benefit of the poſt office, and the wine licences, all which enabled him to keep a ſplendid court, he had ſtill a much more conſiderable advantage. He begun to be conſidered as heir to the crown, the king his brother having no children by his queen. This attached many to him, and particularly the papiſts, who knew his religion, though he yet concealed it as well as the king.

Shortly after, the queen-mother having reſolved to paſs the reſidue of her days in France, the king and the duke of York attended her in the Catherine yatch to the Nore, and there took their laſt leave of her. It is very likely, ſhe was not pleaſed with having ſo ſmall a ſhare in the public affairs, having been uſed to the contrary in the reign of the king her huſband.

However glorious this firſt ſea fight of the duke of York might be, the king and council did not think it proper he ſhould venture his perſon in a ſecond engagement. Therefore the command of the fleet was given to Edward Montague, earl of Sandwich [q], who uſed his utmoſt endeavours to prepare it for the ſea as ſoon as poſſible, in order to prevent that of the ſtates, which was repairing with all poſſible diligence. Beſides, the ſtates, having appointed Ruyter to ſucceed Obdam, ordered him to return immediately with the fleet, conſiſting of ſeventeen men of war. The diligence uſed by the ſtates to repair their fleet, was not ſo much to be revenged of the Engliſh, as to ſecure their merchantmen homeward bound from Smyrna and the Eaſt Indies. The Engliſh, on their ſide, were leſs deſirous to fight than to ſeize the riches which thoſe fleets were bringing to Holland.

It happened, in the mean time, that the Dutch Smyrna fleet, and ſeveral Eaſt India ſhips not daring to enter the Channel, retired to the port of Berghen in Norway, waiting for Ruyter to convoy them to Holland. Mean while, the king of Denmark, diſcourſing one day with ſir Gilbert Talbot, the Engliſh envoy, made great complaints of the Dutch, who, he ſaid had drawn the Swediſh war on him, that he might be forced to have recourſe to them for ſupplies of money and ſhips, and deliver to them the cuſtoms of Norway and the Sound for their ſecurity. Upon this the envoy told him, he had now a good opportunity of being revenged, by the ſeizure of their ſhips at Berghen, worth many millions. But the king anſwering, he wanted ſtrength to execute ſuch a deſign, the envoy told him, he doubted not but the king of England would lend him his ſhips, provided he was aſſured of equally partaking of the ſpoil; to which the king of Denmark conſented. The king of England was pleaſed with Talbot's project, and ſent orders to the earl of Sandwich to ſail immediately and ſeize the Dutch ſhips at Berghen. The admiral readily obeyed, though he had received no intimation of the agreement between the two kings.

To effect this deſign, it was abſolutely neceſſary to inform the viceroy of Norway, and the governor of Berghen of it, that they might favour it, in feigning to protect the Dutch ſhips, the king of Denmark being unwilling to appear openly. Nor was it leſs neceſſary to acquaint the earl of Sandwich with it, to prepare him againſt the noiſe and complaints of the governor of Berghen, on account of the attempt and violence of the Engliſh. But ſeveral accidents ruined this affair. The governor of Berghen, who was to receive orders from the viceroy of Norway, was not informed ſoon enough. On the other hand, Talbot's expreſs, ſent from Copenhagen to the Engliſh fleet, was taken by the Dutch. In fine, the earl of Sandwich hearing Ruyter was ſhortly expected, and being deſirous to perform the deed before his arrival, detached the ſquadron commanded by ſir Thomas Tyddeman, who attacked the Dutch with great reſolution. But they had now time to put themſelves in a poſture of defence. On the other hand, the governor of Berghen, who had not yet received any particular directions how to behave, ſeeing this open hoſtility, and obſerving that the ſhot from the Engliſh damaged the town, fired upon them from the citadel. In a word, this ſquadron was almoſt entirely ruined, and obliged to return to the fleet. The next day, the 4th of Auguſt, orders came to the governor of Berghen, but it was too late. It appeared, the king was not pleaſed with the earl of Sandwich's conduct, ſince, inſtead of continuing him in the command of the fleet, he ſent him embaſſador to the court of Spain.

Mean while, Ruyter arriving in Holland with many Engliſh prizes, took the oath to the ſtates as vice-admiral general, after which he took the command of the fleet conſiſting of ninety three ſhips well equipped. But though he bore the title of admiral, three commiſſioners attended him, namely, De Wit the penſionary, Huygens, and Borreel, who had properly the command. The grand deſign of theſe commiſſioners was to meet the India fleet, which was to ſail round Ireland, to avoid entering into the channel. But the wind was ſo contrary, that the fleet would not have got ſoon enough out of the Texel, if the penſionary, who underſtood ſea affairs very well, had not by ſounding it himſelf all over very carefully, found more ways to get out by different winds, than was thought formerly practicable [r]. So the fleet at laſt ſailed out, and appeared before Berghen, where the commiſſioners gave their orders for convoying the merchant men which were in that port. But it was not in their power to prevent a ſtorm, which diſperſed them, and threw twenty of them into the hands of the Engliſh [s]. This ſtorm obliged Ruyter and the commiſſioners to return to Holland, with their fleet very much damaged.

In the mean time, the plague raged dreadfully in London, where it firſt appeared about the middle of May. It is ſaid, that in leſs than a year, it ſwept away, in that ſingle city, above a hundred thouſand perſons [t]. The king at firſt retired to Hampton Court, but afterwards, to be farther from London, reſided at Saliſbury.

There

It appears, that this year, the republicans had projected an inſurrection, and were even encouraged by emiſſaries from the ſtates general, who would have been glad to employ the king at home in domeſtic troubles. But this was a bare project, which ſerved only to furniſh the enemies of the nonconformiſts with an opportunity to magnify the danger with which the kingdom was threatened from the enemies of the church in general, and to include, in that number, the preſbyterians, though they were not concerned in the republican projects.

It was not only againſt England that the ſtates general had to defend themſelves. Charles had raiſed them another enemy who had no leſs embarraſſed them. This was the famous Bernard Van Ghalen, biſhop of Munſter, who, upon very ſlight pretences, entered the province of Overyſſel at the head of an army paid by the Engliſh. He made himſelf maſter of a great many ſmall places, and then attempted to ſurpriſe Groningen, but was repulſed. At laſt, before the end of the campaign, the king of France, and the dukes of Lunenburgh having ſent a powerful aſſiſtance to the ſtates, the biſhop was forced to relinquiſh his great projects, and think of a peace, eſpecially as the money promiſed by the king of England was not regularly paid.

The parliament, which had been prorogued to the 19th of October, met on the day appointed, but at Oxford, on account of the plague which ſtill raged in London, whereas it did not much infeſt other parts of the kingdom. In his ſpeech to both houſes, the king told them, the ſupply of two millions five hundred thouſand pounds granted him for carrying on the war, was already ſpent. He inſiſted particularly on the great ſums paid to the biſhop of Munſter, for making a diverſion in the bowels of his enemies country, though it appears in ſir William Temple's letters, that theſe ſums were never well paid.

After the king had done ſpeaking, the chancellor, by his order, enlarged upon the ſame ſubject, to ſignify to the commons, that they could not diſpenſe with putting the king in a condition to proſecute a war ſo glorious and neceſſary. Then, he ſpoke of the deſign formed by the republicans, for the ſubverſion of the government. But, in aggravating with great warmth and eloquence the efforts and deſigns of theſe men, he took particular care not to diſtinguiſh them from the other ſects of non-conformiſts. It was a conſtant artifice, as I have obſerved, to apply to the preſbyterians, under the general name of non-conformiſts, all the actions and extravagancies of the independents, anabaptiſts, and republicans in general.

In a very few days, the commons voted the king a new ſupply of twelve hundred and fifty thouſand pounds to continue the war; and one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds to the duke of York, for the great ſervice he had done to the nation.

After this, was brought into the houſe a bill, which paſſed without any difficulty, namely, "That no non-conformiſt teacher under what denomination ſoever ſhall dwell, or come, unleſs upon the road, within five miles of any corporation, or any other place where they had been miniſters, or had preached, after the act of oblivion, unleſs they firſt took the following oath:

"I do ſwear that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatſoever to take arms againſt the king; and that I do abhor the traiterous poſition of taking arms by his authority againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him, in purſuanee of ſuch commiſſions; and that I will not at any time endeavour any alteration of government either in church or ſtate [u]."

The reaſon alledged in the act to juſtify this ſeverity was, that the miniſters had ſettled themſelves in the corporations, ſometimes three or four in a place, and took opportunities to inſtil into the minds of the ſubjects, their poiſonous principles of ſchiſm and rebellion, to the great danger of the church and kingdom.

This bill met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords, even from the earl of Southampton lord treaſurer, though intimate friend of the earl of Clarendon, principal author of the perſecution againſt the non-conformiſts [w]. Indeed, the oath required to be taken by the non-conforming miniſters ſuppoſed a thing, which was not generally allowed, namely, that every good ſubject and good chriſtian, was obliged in conſcience to believe what was contained in this oath, otherwiſe it was abſurd to impoſe it on the miniſters. For there is a great difference between enjoining a certain practice, and obliging part of the ſubjects to ſwear that they believe it founded in religion and conſcience, whilſt the reſt are left free, either to believe or not believe it. Accordingly the commons, being aware of the force of ſo preſſing an objection, prepared a bill to oblige all the ſubjects to take the ſame oath. But the bill was thrown out, though only by two or three voices. At laſt, notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, the act, called the five mile act, paſſed in the houſe of lords, and the king gave it the royal aſſent the 31ſt of October, as well as to the money bill and ſome others, after which he prorogued the parliament to the 20th of February 1665-6.

Several writers have endeavoured to juſtify the rigour of the five mile act, and what they have ſaid amounts to this. ——That this rigour was occaſioned more by the ſeditious behaviour of the non-conformiſts, than by the exerciſe of their religion. In which aſſertion the ambiguity of the word non-conformiſt is ſtill retained, as if all the ſects included under that denomination formed but one and the ſame body, united by the ſame common doctrines and intereſts, which is notoriouſly falſe. The preſbyterians alone were conſiderably more numerous than all the other non-conformiſts together, and had doctrines and intereſts really ſeparate from thoſe of the other ſects. They could not be, nor were they, accuſed of being engaged in the conſpiracies, real or pretended, of the independents and anabaptiſts ſince the king's reſtoration, who had even poſitively promiſed, they ſhould not be moleſted for their religion, after the great ſervice they had done him. And yet, becauſe their enemies had artfully included them in the general denomination of non-conformiſts, they were to partake of the puniſhment due to the other ſects, who were called by the ſame name, though they had no ſort of union with them. Wherefore the reader may judge, whether this ſeverity did not partly ariſe from their religion. In ſhort, by the ſole ambiguity of the word non-conformiſt, the objections and juſt complaints of the preſbyterians are pretended to be combated.

The ſame year, the council of Scotland ſhewed no leſs animoſity againſt the preſbyterians; on pretence of ſome inſolence committed by Alexander Smith, a private miniſter, a proclamation was publiſhed the 24th of December, ordering that all the ſilenced preſbyterian miniſters ſhould, within forty days, remove themſelves and their families from the places where they had been miniſters, and not reſide within twenty miles of the ſame, or within ſix miles of Edinburgh, or any cathedral church, nor within three miles of any royal borough, nor ſhould be more than two together in the ſame pariſh, on pain of incurring the penalties of the law againſt movers of ſedition. I own, I ſee no other difference between ſentencing men to death, and putting them out of a capacity to live, unleſs, that the latter puniſhment offers thoſe who inflict it a more exquiſite vengeance. But this rigour will appear the more extreme, if it be conſidered that the preſbyterians made properly the body of the Scotch nation [x].

[1665-6] In the beginning of the year 1666, the king's affairs were in an ill ſituation. The king of France, preſſed by the repeated inſtances of the ſtates general, recalled his embaſſadors, and publiſhed, the 19th of January, a declaration of war againſt England. This was not owing to his belief that the affairs of the ſtates were deſperate (for the ſequel ſhewed they could defend themſelves without his aſſiſtance) but becauſe the penſionary, who was entirely attached to his intereſt, could no longer ſupport himſelf without this declaration, which, as will hereafter appear, was not very prejudicial to England.

On the other hand, the ſtates found means to ſecure the king of Denmark, by the promiſe of paying him yearly, as long as the war with England ſhould continue, fifteen hundred thouſand florins, three hundred thouſand of which were to be paid by the king of France. For this he engaged to maintain a fleet at ſea of thirty men of war for the ſervice of the allies.

The ſtates alſo raiſed ſo many enemies to the biſhop of Munſter, that he was forced to make peace and diſband his forces. This peace was concluded at Cleve, and ſigned the 18th of April.

[1666.] The naval war was renewed, with all theſe diſadvantages to England. If the king of France had acted with the ſincerity the ſtates thought they had reaſon to expect, very probably the Engliſh fleet would not have ventured to appear with unequal force againſt the united fleets of France and Holland. But Lewis XIV. as I have ſaid, only declared war againſt England to ſave Mr. De Wit, who was juſt ſinking, as appears in ſeveral letters of count d'Eſtrades. The penſionary being ſecure by this declaration, it was not difficult for the king of France to find pretences for retarding the aſſiſtance he had promiſed the ſtates. Though his declaration was publiſhed the 19th of January, the fleet which he promiſed ſhould join that of the ſtates, was in the Mediterranean, under the command of the duke of Beaufort, who, by accidents, real or pretended, arrived not at Belle-Iſle till the end of September.

On the other hand, the king of Denmark, without a junction of his fleet with that of the ſtates, contented himſelf with guarding his own coaſts. So, this year, as the laſt, the war by ſea was carried on between England and the ſtates only.

The king returning to London the 1ſt of February, proclaimed war againſt France, on the 10th.

A few days before, the queen miſcarried, which entirely deſtroyed the common report, that ſhe was incapable of having children.

The command of the Engliſh fleet was given to prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle[y]. They repaired to it the 23d of April, but were not ready to ſail till the end of May. It conſiſted of ſeventy-eight ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips. In all appearance, the king was till then ignorant of the French king's ſecret intentions. But he knew, the duke of Beaufort had orders to repair to Belle-Iſle with his fleet, ſaid to conſiſt of thirty-ſix ſail, to join the Dutch fleet in the channel. Wherefore, he ſent expreſs orders to prince Rupert to ſail with twenty great ſhips, and join ten more at Plymouth, in order to go in queſt of the duke of Beaufort, which the prince immediately obeyed. It cannot well be denied, that this order was ſent with too much precipitation, and without due conſideration. For, beſides that the Engliſh fleet could, without danger, have waited for the French, which could not, with ſafety, have ventured to paſs ſo narrow a ſea as the channel, while the Engliſh ſhould be in their ſtation, the French fleet was yet in the Mediterranean, when the order was ſent to prince Rupert, and that of Holland upon the point of ſailing out of their ports. The king had afterwards reaſon to ſee how unſeaſonably this order was given.

The fleet of the ſtates, commanded by Ruyter, put to ſea with ſeventy-one ſhips of the line, twelve frigates, thirteen fireſhips, and eight yatchs, and anchored between Newport and Dunkirk. Ruyter had under his particular conduct the ſquadron of the Maeſe: that of north Holland and Frieſeland was commanded by Evertzen, and that of Zealand by Tromp. The Engliſh having a fair wind, ſailed to attack the enemy, who, on their ſide, cut their cables to be the ſooner ready to receive them. Tromp's ſhip was ſo diſabled at the firſt, that he was obliged to leave it for another. The ſame thing happened to Ruyter, who was coming to his aſſiſtance, and the powder of a Dutch ſhip taking fire, ſhe blew up into the air. Ruyter ſunk an Engliſh ſhip of fifty guns, then another of ſeventy, and afterwards three others of the firſt rate. In ſhort, this firſt day, the advantage was wholly on the ſide of the Dutch, except that they loſt vice admiral Evertzen, who was killed by a cannon ball.

The fight, interrupted by the night, was renewed early the next morning, but, after laſting ſome hours, was diſcontinued till noon by reaſon of a calm. After that, the wind riſing, both fleets renewed the engagement with equal bravery. Tromp being once more obliged to change his ſhip, found himſelf ſo engaged in the Engliſh fleet, that he would have been infallibly taken or ſunk, if Ruyter, by prodigious efforts, had not brought him off. This ſecond day, the Engliſh had ſtill the diſadvantage, by loſing eight of their largeſt ſhips either ſunk or burnt, and ſix taken, with ſir George Aſcough admiral of the white. The duke of Albemarle would have taken the advantage of the night to retire, but was purſued too cloſely to execute his deſign. So that he was obliged to fight all the next day, as he retired towards his own ſhore. About the evening, he diſcovered prince Rupert's ſquadron coming to his aſſiſtance. Whereupon the two Engliſh admirals attacked their enemies again the next morning. But this fourth day proved as unſucceſsful to them as the three former. They loſt four of their beſt ſhips, and were obliged to retreat with precipitation. A miſt happily conveyed them from Ruyter's purſuit. In theſe four days the Engliſh loſt twenty-three great ſhips, beſides ſeveral others of leſs note, ſix thouſand men, and two thouſand ſix hundred priſoners. Among the ſlain were ſir William Berkley, vice admiral of the white ſquadron, and ſir Chriſtopher Minnes. The Dutch loſt ſix ſhips, two thouſand eight hundred ſoldiers, and fourſcore ſailors, beſides the admirals Evertzen, Vander Hulſt, and Stockhover, with ſome other officers. Though the victory was ſo evidently on the ſide of the Dutch, bonfires and rejoycings were made at London, as if the Engliſh had been conquerors[z].

The two fleets ſoon put to ſea again, and as they were in queſt of each other, they met the 24th of July, and fought a furious battle, where the victory was obſtinately diſputed. The Engliſh fleet conſiſted of above a hundred ſail; and the Dutch, of eighty-eight ſhips of the line, beſides nineteen fireſhips. While Ruyter, and young Evertzen, engaged the red and white ſquadron, Tromp after a long diſpute routed the blue ſquadron, commanded by ſir Jeremy Smith. But by an unpardonable error, inſtead of remaining with the fleet, he amuſed himſelf with purſuing the flying ſhips of the enemy. On the other hand, young Evertzen, who commanded one of the Dutch ſquadrons, was killed with a cannon ball, and his ſquadron entirely defeated. But the Engliſh admiral who fought againſt him, was not guilty of the ſame error as Tromp. Inſtead of purſuing the flying enemy, he joined the red ſquadron, commanded by prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle, and theſe two ſquadrons attacked Ruyter, who nevertheleſs, by means of the night, diſengaged himſelf. But the next day, he was obliged to ſuſtain the fight alone againſt theſe two ſquadrons, there being no news of Tromp. He never in his whole life ſhewed ſo much bravery and capacity as in this ſecond engagement. He ſuſtained, with his ſingle ſquadron, the brunt of the two Engliſh ſquadrons, and at laſt retreated with ſuch wonderful conduct, that he gained more honour by it than he would have done by a victory. The Engliſh leaving the chace in ſight of Fluſhing, went after Tromp, who, though he was met off Harwich, recovered the Texel without any loſs. Ruyter at his return, loudly complained of Tromp's conduct, and, to ſatisfy him, the ſtates put Tromp under an arreſt, diſmiſſed him from his poſt, and put Van Ghent in his place[a].

About the time of theſe engagements between the Engliſh and Dutch, the duke of Beaufort arrived with his fleet at Rochelle, where he ſtayed to take in freſh water, which he greatly wanted.

As in the laſt engagement the Dutch fleet was diſperſed, part retiring to Fluſhing, and part to the Texel, the duke of Albemarle finding himſelf maſter of the ſea, detached twenty men of war to brave the coaſts of Holland. Holms coming to the iſle of Vlye, burnt a hundred merchant ſhips, and two men of war deſigned for convoys. Then he advanced to the iſle of Schelling, and making a deſcent, burnt many houſes in the little town of Brandaris. His deſign was to improve a treaſon carrying on in this iſle by one Hemſkirk, for which Buat a French gentleman, who ſecretly correſponded with the Engliſh, was beheaded at the Hague. But Holms not finding things ready as he expected, returned to the fleet.

After this expedition, the Engliſh fleet ſailed into the channel, and anchored at St. Hellens; the iſle of Wight being the moſt proper ſtation for hindering the junction of the French and Dutch fleets. Ruyter on his ſide poſted himſelf in St. John's bay, near Boulogne, where he was ſeized by a diſtemper, which for ſome time was believed mortal. This obliged the ſtates to recall their fleet, of which they gave notice to the king of France.

Mean time, the duke of Beaufort, ignorant of the retreat of the Dutch fleet, left Belle-Iſle, where he arrived about the 20th of September, and entering the channel, ſafely failed by the isle of Wight, without being attacked, and got into Dieppe. He staid there a whole day without hearing any news of Ruyter. At last, being informed, that the Dutch fleet was retired, he sailed once more by the isle of Wight, without meeting with any opposition, and got into the ports of Bretagne. It is very surprising, that the English, who lay at the isle of Wight to prevent the junction of the two enemies fleets, should suffer that of France to pass and repass without molestation[b]. This may give occasion to suspect, there was some intelligence between France and England. But as I cannot trace it, I shall not insist upon it. But it plainly appears, the king of France, after having amused the Dutch a whole year on divers pretences, did not really declare against England till the 19th of January 1665-6, and still amused them all this year, with the hopes of the arrival of the duke of Beaufort, who entered the channel but in September, when the sea campaign was over. If to this be added, Lewis's unwillingness to succour the states, as appears in his letter to d'Estrades, there will be no cause to wonder at the little advantage received by the Dutch from the junction of France.

[z] De Wit was on board the Dutch fleet, who was ſaid to have invented chain ſhot on this occaſion, which did incredible damage to the rigging of the Engliſh, and was a great means of the Dutch getting the advantage. And it is thought, if prince Rupert had not come up when he did, the Engliſh fleet was ſo unrigged, that they would have been all taken and ſunk, or burnt. And yet a day of thankſgiving was appointed. Burnet, p. 229. Echard ſays, the Engliſh had but nine men of war taken or burnt; and the Dutch loſt above fifteen ſhips, twenty-one captains, and above five thouſand common ſeamen. Tom. III. p. 161.

This year, the states had intended to assist the malecontents in England and Scotland, in order to give the English arms a diversion at home. This design was even communicated to the king of France. But he found so many objections to it, that it was suffered to fall unexecuted. Probably, the states had some correspondents among the republicans, who being partly discovered, a great noise was made, and, according to custom, all the non-conformists were charged with the plot.

The misfortune which this year befel the city of London, I mean the terrible fire which laid so great a part of that vast city in ashes, gave a fresh occasion to the enemies of the republicans, to charge them with being the authors thereof. This was only because the fire happened to break out the 3d of September[c], a day esteemed fortunate by the republicans, on account of the victories of Dunbar and Worcester, obtained by Oliver Cromwell, when general of the armies of the common-wealth of England. To represent without any aggravation, the ravages made by this fire in London, I need only insert the inscription upon one of the sides of the column, erected on the place where the fire broke out. This column at London, is called the monument, and visited by all strangers, but they only who understand the English language, can read this inscription[d].

"In the year of Christ 1666, the second day of September, at the distance of 202 feet (the height of this column) a terrible fire broke out about midnight, which, driven on by a high wind, not only wasted the adjacent parts, but also very remote places, with incredible noise and fury. It consumed eighty-nine churches, the city gates, Guildhall, many public structures, hospitals, schools, libraries, a vast number of stately edifices, thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling houses, four hundred streets. Of the six and twenty wards it utterly destroyed fifteen and left eight others shattered and half burnt. The ruins of the city were four hundred thirty-six acres, from the Tower by the Thames side, to the Temple church, and from the north-east gate, along the city wall, to Holborn-bridge. To the estates and fortunes of the citizens, it was mercileſs, but to their lives very favourable, that it might in all things resemble the last conflagration of the world. The destruction was sudden, for in a small space of time the same city was seen most flourishing, and reduced to nothing. Three days after, when this fatal fire had baffled all human counsels and endeavours in the opinion of all, it stopped, as it were, by a command from heaven, and and was on every side extinguished."

Men failed not to give a scope to their imagination, and to form conjectures upon the causes and authors of this fire. The pious and religious ascribed it to the just vengeance of heaven, on a city, where vice and immorality reigned so openly and shamefully, and which had not been sufficiently humbled by the raging pestilence of the foregoing year. Some again, as I have said, ascribed this misfortune to the malice of the republicans; others to the papists. And there were some so bold, as even to suspect the king and the duke of York. But though several suspected persons were imprisoned, it was not possible to discover, or prove, that the baker's house, where this dreadful calamity first broke out, was fired on purpose. However, one Robert Hubert a French huguenot[e], native of Rouen, and a lunatic, confessing himself guilty of this fact, was condemned and executed. But it appeared afterwards, by the testimony of the master of the ship, who brought him from France, that though he was landed at the time, he did not arrive in London till two days after the fire began. It is pretended likewise, that a Dutch boy, ten years of age, confessed, that his father, and himself, had thrown fire-balls into the baker's house, through a window that stood open. But, besides the objection which may be made to this testimony from the boy's age, there must have been some circumstance in his narrative, not agreeable to the fact, since it was not thought proper to make a farther enquiry. Perhaps this was only a groundless report.

But that which gives most cause to believe this fire did not happen casually, is, the testimony of Dr. Lloyd, afterwards bishop of Worcester. That prelate told Dr. Burnet,——"That one Grant a papist had some time before applied himself to Lloyd, who had great credit with the countess of Clarendon (who had a large estate in the new river that is brought from Ware to London) and said, he could raise that estate considerably, if she would make him a trustee for her. His schemes were probable, and he made one of the board that governed that matter; and by that he had a right to come as often as he pleased to view their works at Islington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out, and called for the key of the place where the heads of the pipes were, and turned all the cocks that were then open, and stopped the water, and went away, and carried the keys with him. So when the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the streets to find water, but there was none. And some hours were lost in sending to Islington, where the door was to be broke open, and the cocks turned; and it was long before the water got to London. Grant indeed denied, that he had turned the cocks. But the officer of the works affirmed, that he had, according to order, set them all a running, and that no person had got the keys from him besides Grant; who confessed, he had carried away the keys, but pretended he did it without design."

This is Dr. Burnet's account, and agrees in the main with Echard's in his history of England. However, an anonymous author, who has writ against Dr. Burnet's history, accuses him directly of falsehood, and asserts that "Grant was not one of the board till after the fire." But it is difficult to know, what regard is due to the testimony of this anonymous writer, whereas one can hardly help crediting that illustrious prelate, when he says, he had it from Dr. Lloyd, that Grant was made one of the board before the fire, and that it was by his means. However, this great fire was generally imputed to the papists, and the rather, because several other things afterwards helped to confirm this suspicion.

The parliament meeting the 21st of September, the king, in a speech to both houses, told them, the money granted him had not sufficed to carry on the war, considering his two powerful enemies. He boasted of the great success with which God had been pleased to bless his arms, supposing his fleet to have been always victorious. Immediately after, the commons liberally voted the king a supply of eighteen hundred thousand pounds. Thus in the space of two years, this war cost the people of England five millions, five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; that is, above sixty millions of Dutch florins, and above seventy-two millions of French livres, allowing thirteen livres Tournois to one pound sterling.

Mean while, the two houses beginning to discover, that the king was not the zealous protestant he affected to appear; that the papists had great influence in his council, and that their religion made a visible progress, presented to him an address for executing the laws against popish priests and jesuits, who were labouring to pervert his subjects. The king, according to the method of his father, grandfather, and his own, immediately published a proclamation for banishing the priests and jesuits, on pain of being punished according to law, if found in the kingdom after the 10th of December. So banishment was the worst that could happen to them, even supposing the king's order should have been executed. But the more rigorous the proclamations were, the more favourable was the execution. This manifestly appears in their being so often repeated. But to give a more convincing proof of the court's disposition in this respect, I shall here produce a passage in a letter to the earl of Sandwich, embassador at Madrid, from secretary Bennet, lately created earl of Arlington, a reputed papist, though he professed the protestant religion. In this letter he told the embassador, "Your excellency knows sufficiently the springs upon which the animoſity to the Roman catholics riſes, and how hard it is for his majeſty to forbear declaring againſt them, when the complaint ariſes from both houſes of parliament, and accordingly you can yourſelf frame your anſwer to the queen of Spain."

The rigour exerciſed againſt the preſbyterians in Scotland cauſed ſome of the moſt impatient to riſe in arms to the number of fifteen hundred, and form a regular body with officers in proportion to head them. Probably, they hoped, if they ſhould gain ſome advantage, to be joined by their brethren. But in their firſt action with the king's forces, they were diſperſed with the loſs of three hundred men, and one hundred priſoners, who were moſt of them executed. It was not forgot to ſay that they held intelligence with the Engliſh preſbyterians, and, if they had gained a victory, the like inſurrection would have appeared in England. But it may eaſily be judged, that the preſbyterians in England would not have been ſpared, if they could have been proved guilty, conſidering how the government ſtood affected towards them. Inconſiderable as this inſurrection was, the Engliſh hiſtorians have been pleaſed to repreſent it as very important, in ſaying, the nation was ſuddenly alarmed with an inſurrection of the preſbyterians in Scotland, with whom it was not doubted thoſe of England held a ſtrict correſpondence. Theſe authors are to be forgiven for not being willing to miſs the firſt opportunity to include the Engliſh preſbyterians in theſe conſpiracies, thought it be only on the authority of a "it is believed."

The king was impatient for the diſpatch of the money bill, of which it ſeemed the commons took no farther notice, He therefore thought it neceſſary to quicken them by a meſſage. He likewiſe told them, he could not permit any adjournment at Chriſtmas, except for the principal holidays. But this meſſage, it ſeems, produced no great effect. The commons were then examining complaints againſt the lord Mordant, governor of Windſor caſtle, who was accuſed of ſome arbitrary and tyrannical actions. But neither this affair, nor the money bill could be finiſhed before the concluſion of the year.

[1666-7] The parliament met the 2d of January, after a ſhort adjournment, and immediately the commons accuſed the lord Mordant, at the bar of the lords houſe, and then preferred articles of high crimes and miſdemeanors againſt him. But they were diſpleaſed, that the accuſed was ſuffered to be within the bar of the houſe, whilſt his accuſation was reading. This occaſioned a diſpute between the two houſes. There was alſo another difference between them, concerning the commiſſioners appointed by the commons to levy the poll tax, and to take the public accounts on oath. This was the ſubject of ſeveral fruitleſs conferences [f].

The king came to the parliament the 8th of January, and gave the royal aſſent to the poll bill, but complained of the nomination of commiſſioners, as a mark of their diſtruſt of him [g].

The miſunderſtanding between the two houſes ſtill continuing, the king came to the parliament the 8th of February, and after paſſing ſeveral acts, he aſſured them, the money granted ſhould be laid out for the ends it was given. Then he prorogued the parliament to the 10th of October. The acts paſſed were; an act to continue, for eleven months, the monthly aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds, which with the poll tax, was conceived ſufficient to make good the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds, granted to the king. The other acts concerned chiefly the new buildings in London, which were finiſhed ſooner than could be expected, and in a manner more beautiful and regular than before the fire [h].

It is now time to ſpeak of the peace between England and Holland, which was now, though very ſecretly, negotiating, at the time the parliament granted eighteen hundred thouſand pounds for carrying on the war. In November 1665, before the king of France had declared againſt England, the ſtates, for a foundation of peace, had offered the king one of theſe two conditions, either that each of the parties ſhould reſtore what had been taken, or both keep what they were poſſeſſed of. This was a ſure way to obviate all difficulties which might occur in the negotiation of peace. Beſides, the laſt of theſe conditions was very advantageous to England, by reaſon of the great number of ſhips taken from the Dutch before even the war was proclaimed. This offer was renewed at Paris about the middle of the year 1666, in a conference there between Mr. de Lyonne, the lord Holles the Engliſh embaſſador, and Mr. Van Beuninghen envoy from the ſtates. Probably, Charles expected greater advantages in the continuance of the war, ſince he returned no anſwer to this offer. He only complained of its obſcurity, without ſignifying wherein it conſiſted. Nevertheleſs, he received this advantage from it, that he knew how the ſtates were diſpoſed, and what he could depend on: ſo that it was in his power to make peace whenever he ſhould think proper. The 17th of September the ſame year, the ſtates repeated the ſame offer in a letter to the king. But as this was when the parliament was going to ſit, and when the king expected a large ſupply for carrying on the war, he did not think fit to embrace it. He contented himſelf with ſignifying to the ſtates in a letter of the 4th of October, his diſſatisfaction at their proceedings, and at the calumnies they had raiſed againſt him, in accuſing him of being the aggreſſor, and rejecting all propoſals for peace. Then he largely juſtified himſelf upon what had been alledged by the ſtates againſt him. But the moſt important part of this letter was the king's poſitive aſſurance that he had accepted the mediation of Sweden. A place therefore to treat was to be agreed on. The choice of this place afforded the king a pretence to defer the negotiation ſome months. He was at firſt for having the peace negotiated at London, to which the ſtates would have readily conſented, if the kings of France and Denmark had believed it conſiſtent with their honour. Upon the repreſentation made by the ſtates, concerning the refuſal of the two kings their allies, he anſwered, that he had no affair to negotiate with France, and complained of the king of Denmark for making war againſt him without any reaſon. He was ſo offended with that king, that he made no ſcuple to tell the ſtates, it was at the inſtigation of Denmark, that he ſent his fleet to Berghen, and agreed with him to divide the ſpoil. At laſt, the ſtates left the nomination of the place to him, provided it was approved by their allies. The king accepted the offer, but inſiſted that the ſtates ſhould firſt write to him to teſtify that they would willingly have ſent their plenipotentiaries to London, if the two kings their allies would have given their conſent. This letter was writ, as he deſired, the 13th of January, 1666-7, and the king in his anſwer of the 20th, named the Hague for the place of conference. He knew, the penſionary would not accept it, on account of the cabals which the Engliſh embaſſadors might make againſt him in favour of the young prince of Orange. Accordingly De Wit privately cauſed the king of France to reject the propoſal.

All the king's proceedings clearly ſhew, he was deſirous of peace, and as it was in his power, he might have concluded it before the end of the year 1666. But too much haſte would have deprived him of the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds granted for the continuance of the war. This was the true reaſon of the difficulties raiſed by him concerning the place of congreſs, in order to gain time till the money bill was paſſed. After he had given his aſſent to the laſt bill for the continuation of the monthly aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds, all difficulties began to vaniſh. Seven or eight days after, the earl of St. Albans was ſent to Paris to notify to the king of France, that Charles conſented that things ſhould remain in the ſtate to which the chance of war had reduced them. He added however one condition, namely, that France ſhould reſtore to him the iſle of St. Chriſtophers and three other ſmall iſlands in America, ſeized by that crown the laſt year. But this was a thing propoſed to be diſcuſſed at the congreſs, whereas the choice of the alternative made the eſſence of the treaty with the ſtates. So, it may be ſaid, that from this time the peace was in a manner concluded; nothing being wanted but the formality of a treaty.

Mean while, the king of France, to ſerve Mr. De Wit, in preventing the king of England from inſiſting upon his nomination of the Hague, for the place of conference, thought of an expedient in which he ſucceeded. This was to name Dover for the place of congreſs. And when it was objected to, he added Breda, Bois le-duc, and Maeſtricht, leaving to the king of England the choice of one of theſe four towns.

[f] Rapin has expreſſed this affair very confuſedly, and therefore it is ſomewhat altered in the tranſlation.

[g] He gave his aſſent at the ſame time to a bill for burying in woollen. See Statut. 18 Car. II.

[h] To this end, a bill was now paſſed, for laying twelve pence upon every chaldron, and twelve pence upon every tun of coals, that ſhould be brought into the port of London for ten years, the better to enable the lord mayor and aldermen to recompenſe thoſe perſons, whoſe grounds ſhould be taken from them, in order to enlarge the ſtreets, &c.—And about this time was ſet up an office for inſuring houſes from fire, which was principally contrived by dr. Barbon, one of the firſt and moſt conſiderable rebuilders of the city. Echard, tom. III. p. 177.

Of

At laſt, Charles having no longer intereſt to delay the peace, writ to the ſtates the 18th of March, that he was willing to ſend his plenipotentiaries to Breda.

[1667] The difficulty concerning the place of congreſs being removed, the next thing was to appoint embaſſadors, and diſpatch the paſſports. And it was agreed the conferences for the peace ſhould begin the 10th of May. But the Engliſh plenipotentiaries arrived not at Breda till the 20th. Theſe were the lord Holles, and Mr. Henry Coventry [i]. From France came count d'Eſtrades, and Mr. Courtin; from Denmark, Meſſ. Klingenberg and Caniſius, and from the ſtates general, Meſſ. Beverninch, Hubert, and Yonſtal. The mediators from the king of Sweden were, Meſſ. Fleming and Coet. But the laſt dying at Breda, during the conferences, count de Dhona, the Swediſh embaſſador to the ſtates, took his place.

At the firſt opening of the congreſs a very obvious miſtake was diſcovered, but which, in all appearance, had been connived at by the two parties for fear of obſtructing the congreſs. In their letter to the king of England, the 17th of September, the ſtates had made two propoſals for peace, the ſecond of which was that each ſhould keep what he had taken, before or during the war. This was what the ſtates had ever adhered to, without any variation. But the king, in a letter to the ſtates, the 24th of April, 1667, ſaid,——"We take this opportunity to declare to you, that we accept the choice propoſed to us, that is, that each party ſhall keep whatſoever he has taken during this war, which being granted, we ſhall order our embaſſadors to proceed in the preſent treaty, upon the foundation of that made between us in the year 1662."

It is manifeſt, that in the ſecond condition propoſed by the ſtates, was included whatever had been acquired by either party, not only during, but before the war, and that in the king's letter was compriſed only what had been taken during the war. Now the king, according to the terms of his acceptation, pretended, the ſtates ſhould make him ſatisfaction for the two ſhips, the Good Hope, and the Bon Adventure, taken, or ſunk before the treaty of 1662. Moreover, he pretended, that as the ſtates were obliged by the ſame treaty to reſtore to him the iſle of Poleron in the Eaſt Indies, and as that iſle was ſtill in their poſſeſſion, it ſhould be delivered to him. Theſe two articles were the principal ſubject of the diſputes in the conferences of Breda, and retarded the concluſion of the treaty, to the great damage of the Engliſh, as will hereafter appear. The ſtates kept to the terms of their offer, and the king to thoſe of his acceptation.

I have already ſpoken of the two ſhips taken by the Dutch in the interval between the two treaties of the year 1659, and 1662. As for the iſle of Poleron, the ſtates pretended, they had reſtored it in form, and produced a receipt from the Engliſh officer, to whom it was delivered. But before this ſurrender, they had entirely diſpeopled it, and cut down all the clove-trees, and in ſhort had ſeized it again ſince the beginning of this war. But the king pretended, there were eſſential defects in the form of the reſtitution, and that the ſtates were obliged to reſtore it by the terms of the treaty 1662. The importance of this iſle conſiſted in that within four or five years it might be new ſtocked with clove-trees, if it was in the hands of the Engliſh, and ſo prove very prejudicial to the Dutch, who were maſters of the whole ſpice trade.

To decide theſe two articles, from which both parties made it a point of honour not to recede, couriers were to be ſent ſeveral times to London and the Hague, and thoſe from London brought only ſtricter orders to the embaſſadors to inſiſt upon the two ſhips and the iſle of Poleron. But at length the king yielded the laſt, ſo that the whole negotiation was reduced to the ſatisfaction demanded for the two ſhips. It is not very ſurprizing, that the king ſhould inſiſt on this article. He had begun the war under the ſpecious pretence of procuring reparation for all the damages done to his ſubjects, which he computed at ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. To enable him to obtain this reparation by force of arms, the parliament had furniſhed him with five hundred and fifty-five thouſand pounds. He had moreover taken ſixſcore ſhips, before the war was declared, and about fourſcore ſince. In all appearance, he had not applied the product of theſe captures to the benefit of his ſubjects, who, according to his calculation, had loſt ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds, and for which the war was undertaken. He could not therefore well diſpenſe with procuring the merchants, who had loſt theſe two ſhips, the ſatisfaction demanded by them, without giving occaſion to believe, this war had been undertaken for imaginary pretenſions. For the pretenſions concerning theſe ſhips were properly the only things that were ſpecified. All the reſt conſiſted in generals, the diſcuſſion whereof was neceſſary, by reaſon of the choice propoſed by the ſtates. It was not that they feared a diſcuſſion, ſince they had offered it in the firſt of their two conditions. But it was the king's intereſt to avoid it, and accept the ſecond condition. If he had embraced it, in the ſame terms as offered by the ſtates, all the grounds of this war, ſo expenſive to England, would have remained in obſcurity. He could not therefore in honour but inſiſt upon the only article, which could be conſidered as a juſt cauſe of the war, though it did not amount to ten thouſand pounds ſterling. Mean while, as ſince the offer of the ſtates, he ſaw, he could make peace when he pleaſed, he thought it a needleſs expence to put to ſea a powerful fleet, as he had done the two foregoing years, and that it was better to ſave the beſt part of the money granted for the continuance of the war. To this end, relying on the certainty of peace, he laid up his great ſhips, and kept only a ſquadron of twenty ſail, while the ſtates continued their preparations as uſual, in their uncertainty of the king's intention concerning peace.

Mean time, the ſtates ſeeing what difficulties the king formed upon an article of ſo little conſequence, believed, or pretended to believe, he was averſe to peace. They therefore reſolved, either to force him to relinquiſh his pretenſions, or at leaſt to continue the war this ſummer with advantage, becauſe they knew, that the king would have no fleet at ſea.

Purſuant to this reſolution, Ruyter ſailed out of the Texel with fifty ſhips, and came the 8th of June to the mouth of the Thames, from whence he detached vice-admiral Van Ghent, with ſeventeen of his lighteſt ſhips, and ſome fire-ſhips.

Van Ghent, the 10th of June, ſailed up the Medway, made himſelf maſter of the fort of Sheerneſs, and after burning a magazine full of ſtores, to the value of forty thouſand pounds, blew up the fortifications. This action alarmed the city of London; ſo that to prevent greater miſchiefs, ſeveral ſhips were ſunk, and a large chain put acroſs the narroweſt part of the river Medway. But by means of an eaſterly wind, and a ſtrong tide, the Dutch ſhips broke through the chain, and ſailed between the ſunk veſſels. They immediately burnt three large ſhips, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all taken from them in the preſent war, and carried away with them the hull of the Royal Charles, beſides burning and damaging ſeveral others. After this they advanced as far as Upnor caſtle, and burnt the Royal Oak, the Royal London, and the Great James. The Engliſh fearing all the Dutch fleet would ſail up to London bridge, ſunk [thirteen] ſhips at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall, and platforms furniſhed with artillery to defend them, were raiſed in ſeveral places. The conſternation was very great, and the complaints were no leſs ſo. It was openly ſaid, the king out of avarice had kept the money ſo generouſly given him to continue the war, and left his ſhips and ſubjects expoſed to the inſults of the enemy, though he had exclaimed againſt the injuſtice done him, in believing him capable of ſuch an action. The king was under an inexpreſſible concern, as well for fear of greater damage from the Dutch fleet, as for the mortification this affair gave him, and the ſhame of having nothing to ſay to the murmurs of his people. Beſides he could not but reproach himſelf for being the cauſe of this inſult, by inſiſting too long upon an affair of ten thouſand pounds, and thereby retarding the concluſion of the peace [k].

After this exploit, Ruyter ſailed to Portſmouth, with a deſign to burn the ſhips in that harbour; but finding them ſecured, he ſailed to the weſt, and took ſome ſhips in Torbay. He then ſailed eaſtward, beat the Engliſh before Harwich, and chaced a ſquadron of nineteen men of war commanded by ſir Edward Spragg, who was obliged to retire into the Thames. In a word, he kept the coaſts of England in a continual alarm all July, till he received the news of the concluſion of a peace.

This event had ſo changed the face of affairs, that the Engliſh embaſſadors at Breda grew more pliant, and were eaſily perſuaded to yield the article of the two ſhips. It was however with the reſervation of the king's approbation, before the ſigning of the treaty. For this purpoſe, Coventry, after all the articles were ſettled, paſſed into England the 2d of July, and returned the 8th with the king's approbation, and the 21ſt the treaty of peace was ſigned. It was divided however into three ſeparate treaties, by reaſon of ſome inconveniences which would otherwiſe have followed. But by a writing ſigned by all the plenipotentiaries, it was declared, that the three treaties ſhould be eſteemed but one and the ſame.

The moſt important articles of the treaty between England and France, were, VII. The moſt chriſtian king ſhall reſtore to the king of Great Britain, that part of the iſle of St. Chriſtophers, which the French have taken from the Engliſh, ſince the declaration of war.

X. The king of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to the moſt chriſtian king, the country of Acadia, in North America, ſometime in poſſeſſion of the ſaid moſt chriſtian king.

XI. The moſt chriſtian king ſhall reſtore to the king of Great Britain, the iſles of Antegoa, and Montſerrat, if they are ſtill in his poſſeſſion, and in general, all the territories, iſles, towns, and fortreſſes, which may have been conquered by his arms, and which belonged to the king of England before the beginning of the war with the ſtates general, and reciprocally the king of Great Britain ſhall reſtore the territories, iſles, towns, &c.

XVII. This article contained a regulation of all the captures, which might be made ſince the concluſion of the peace.

XVIII. In caſe of a war it is ſtipulated, that ſix months notice ſhall be given to the merchants to withdraw their effects.

Principal Articles of the treaty between Great Britain and the ſtates general.

Article III. Both ſides ſhall forget and forgive all offences, damages, and loſſes, which either have ſuffered during this war, or at any time before, or under any pretence, as if they had never happened.——Each party ſhall hold for time to come in full right of ſovereignty, propriety and poſſeſſion, all ſuch countries, iſles, towns, forts, places and colonies, as, whether during this war, or before, have been taken and kept from the other by force of arms, and in what other manner ſoever, and that as they poſſeſſed and enjoyed them the 10th day of May laſt.

IV. All ſhips, goods and moveables, which at any time have come into the power of either party, ſhall remain in the preſent poſſeſſors thereof, without any compenſation or reſtitution for the ſame.

V. All actions, demands, and pretenſions whatſoever for the ſame ſhall remain void, obliterated, and diſannulled, &c.

XV. The ſaid lord the king, and the ſaid lords the ſtates, ſhall not receive into their dominions any ſuch perſons as ſhall be declared fugitive rebels, of the one or the other.

XIX. All ſhips and veſſels of the United Provinces, as well men of war as merchant ſhips, and others, which ſhall meet in the Britannic ſeas any ſhips of war belonging to the king of Great Britain, ſhall ſtrike the flag, and lower the ſail as it has formerly been practiſed.

XXXII. If the former differences ſhall be renewed, and turned into an open war, the ſhips, merchandize, and all moveable effects of both parties, which ſhall be found in the ſea-ports and dominions of the adverſe party, ſhall be by no means confiſcated or damaged; but there ſhall be granted to the ſubjects of both parties the term of ſix whole months, during which time they may tranſport the ſaid effects, where they pleaſe.

XXXVI. For the greater aſſurance that the preſent treaty ſhall be obſerved with good faith on the part of the ſtates general, they engage themſelves by theſe preſents, that thoſe perſons who ſhall be choſen by the ſaid ſtates general, or the particular provinces, into the offices of captain general ſtadtholder, field marſhal, admiral, ſhall ſwear that they will obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved religiouſly this treaty.

By a ſeparate article it was agreed, that if any of the murderers of Charles I. ſhould be found in the dominions of the ſtates general, they ſhould be delivered to the king, &c.

If it is now conſidered, what advantages England received from a war undertaken upon ſo ſlight grounds, and with ſuch animoſity, it will not be eaſy to diſcover a ſingle advantage that was not really contained in the treaty of the 4th of September 1662. But on the contrary, it will be found, that this war coſt five millions five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, beſides the loſs of the ſhips of war, whether in ſea engagements, or in the affair of Chatham[l]. And yet the king had aſſured the parliament, in one of his ſpeeches, that he would never lay down his arms, till he had procured his ſubjects a reaſonable ſatisfaction for their loſſes, which upon his computation amounted to ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds. And if theſe loſſes are ſuppoſed real, this peace was ſo much the more diſhonourable to the king and the Engliſh nation. But, on the other hand, it is eaſy to perceive, that the king and duke of York reaped by it conſiderable advantages: the king, by the large ſupplies of money which were granted him, but not expended in the war, at leaſt, the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds given in January and February this year, and by the ſale of above two hundred ſhips taken from the Dutch; the duke of York, by his claims upon theſe captures as lord high admiral, and by the preſent of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds made him by the parliament. Such was the concluſion of this great armament, which was to humble the pride of the Dutch, and render them for ever incapable to ſupport their trade and diſpute the empire of the ſeas with England. The peace was proclaimed at London, and at the Hague, the 24th of Auguſt.

The king of France, as hath been ſeen, gave no very real aſſiſtance to his allies, ſince his fleet never joined that of the ſtates, not even this laſt year, when the Engliſh were in no condition to oppoſe the junction. He had then other deſigns, which he diſcovered in June, by an invaſion of the Netherlands, on account of his queen's pretenſions to Brabant, after the death of Philip IV. her father. In the whole courſe of the war between the king of England and the ſtates general, he clearly ſhewed his intention to make Charles his friend, in which he afterwards ſucceeded but too well. He would never have declared againſt him, notwithſtanding his ſtrict engagement with the ſtates in the treaty of 1662, had he not believed ſuch a declaration abſolutely neceſſary to ſupport Mr. De Wit, who otherwiſe was in great danger of ruin. He earneſtly wiſhed to ſee the end of this war, in which he had very unwillingly engaged. This appeared chiefly in the conferences at Breda, where his two plenipotentiaries performed properly the office of Mediators, though thoſe of Sweden had the name. Accordingly he was greatly ſuſpected in Holland of a ſecret correſpondence with England.

Complaints and murmurs againſt king Charles and his miniſters ſucceeded the animoſity with which the Dutch war was begun. When the advantages obtained by the peace were compared with the expence of the war, they were found ſo diſproportionable, that men could not forbear ſuſpecting, it had been raiſed by motives repugnant to the intereſt of England. The people had been told, it was undertaken to procure the merchants ſatisfaction for the damages received from the Dutch: to revenge the indignities the nation had ſuffered: and to incapacitate the United Provinces ever to rival England again, but nothing of all this had been done. The merchants had received no ſatisfaction even for the two ſhips, the Good Hope and the Bon-Adventure, though that article was the moſt ſpecified. Inſtead of revenging the affronts offered the nation, England had received a real and moſt mortifying indignity in the buſineſs of Chatham. Laſtly, after the peace of Breda, the United Provinces were in a more flouriſhing condition than before the war, and looked on this peace as a triumph for them. On the other hand, few people could digeſt the king's preſſing the parliament for money to carry on the war, and that after receiving eighteen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling he ſhould be ſo intent upon peace, as not to put himſelf in a condition to obtain reaſonable terms. This was a ſubject very apt to raiſe a ſuſpicion of the ſincerity of his intentions for the good of his people. In ſhort, it was more and more diſcovered that the papiſts had great influence at court, and that the proclamations publiſhed againſt them at the deſire of the parliament, were far from being rigorouſly executed. The earl of Arlington, almoſt open protector of the papiſts, was made ſecretary of ſtate, and in great favour, while the credit of the earl of Clarendon their enemy daily declined. This began to produce ſuſpicions diſadvantageous to the king. Beſides, his diſſolute life did not help to preſerve the high opinion conceived of him in the beginning of his reign. His court was a ſcene of debauchery, where his miſtreſſes ruled abſolutely, and nothing was done but through their means. They conſumed his vaſt revenues, with almoſt all the money granted by parliament, ſo that in the midſt of riches, he was always in want, and forced to ſeek new pretences to draw money from his parliament, to ſupply his private occaſions.

[l] The Dutch were alſo, on their part, put to very great charges. For ſir William Temple affirms, that in the year 1665, there were raiſed in the provinces forty millions of guilders, of which twenty-two in the province of Holland. And upon the biſhop of Munſter's invading them at the ſame time by land, they had, in the year 1666, above threeſcore thouſand land men in pay; and a fleet of above an hundred men of war at ſea. Obſervat. upon the United provinces, p. 71.

Theſe ſuſpicions and complaints reaching the king, he reſolved to appeaſe them by ſacrificing the earl of Clarendon, who had hitherto acted as prime miniſter. He knew, the people are always exceſſively pleaſed with ſacrifices of miniſters, who had enjoyed the greateſt credit, and on whom generally all the miſcarriages are thrown. But this was only a pretence uſed by the king to be delivered of a miniſter, whom he no longer loved, and whoſe preſence and counſels were become inſupportable to him. The chancellor's regular life, his averſion to debauchery and libertiniſm, his grave and ſevere manners, his neglect of the king's favourites and miſtreſſes, and laſtly, his principles and maxims concerning religion and the ſtate, ill agreed with the diſorderly life of the court, and ſtill leſs with the projects formed in favour of the papiſts, under colour of eaſing the preſbyterians. For this reaſon, and for his rough and always too haughty behaviour, he had rendered himſelf odious to all the courtiers, who never ceaſed to do him ill offices, eſpecially when they ſaw him in the decline of his favour. He had often taken the liberty to reprove the king for his diſorderly life, and at firſt his reproofs were well received. But when the king had once abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures, he could no longer bear the preſence of a man, whoſe advice he had formerly received with a ſort of ſubmiſſion. The duke of Buckingham and ſome others perceiving this diſpoſition of the king, neglected nothing to cheriſh it. As often as they ſaw the chancellor coming, they would ſay to his majeſty, "Here comes your ſchoolmaſter!" At other times they mimicked him before the king, in order to make him ridiculous. The duke of Buckingham uſed to walk in a ſtately manner, with a pair of bellows before him for the purſe, whilſt colonel Titus carried a fire ſhovel on his ſhoulder for the mace. The king ſuffered theſe buffooneries, and thereby diſcovered his diſguſt to his miniſter. But as theſe are only trifles, and as the king's diſguſt turned at laſt into real hatred, it is proper to relate the more ſerious cauſes which have been offered in vindication of the king's reſentment.

1. It is pretended, the king deſigning to be divorced from his queen on ſeveral weak pretences, could never obtain the chancellor's approbation.

2. The king intended, after his divorce, to marry Mrs. Stuart his relation, of whom he was amorous. The earl of Clarendon, to prevent this, perſuaded the young duke of Richmond to marry her, by repreſenting, how ſerviceable it would be to gain him the king's favour. The duke, following this advice, made his addreſſes to the lady, who, knowing nothing of the king's deſign, believed ſhe ought not to refuſe ſo good an offer, and the marriage was immediately concluded. The king thus diſappointed, baniſhed the duke with his new ducheſs from court, and never forgave the chancellor.

3. Another, and, as was generally thought, the moſt apparent cauſe of the king's reſentment againſt the chancellor, was his oppoſing Popham's project of ſettling an annual revenue of two millions of pounds ſterling upon the king, which was ſeconded by the earl of Southampton.

4. The moſt probable cauſe of the chancellor's ruin was, that the papiſts, whoſe counſels and projects were liſtened to, and approved by the king, omitted nothing to deſtroy him, knowing, that under his miniſtry they could never hope to accompliſh their deſigns.

5. A ſtately houſe built by him near St. James's park[m], and in the very year of the plague, did him great injury in the minds of the people. It is pretended, it coſt him fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, though at firſt he deſigned to lay out but fifteen or ſixteen thouſand. People gave it the name of Dunkirk-houſe, becauſe it was ſuppoſed that his advice for the ſale of that place had furniſhed him with the means to build it. He committed another error in purchaſing for this houſe the ſtones deſigned for repairing St. Paul's.

However this be, the king, under colour of giving ſome ſatisfaction to his people in ſacrificing this miniſter, deprived him of his office of high chancellor, and made ſir Orlando Bridgeman lord keeper of the great ſeal.

The earl of Southampton lord treaſurer, dying three months before the chancellor's diſgrace, the king was at once deprived of two great and faithful Miniſters, whoſe loſs was never repaired, at leaſt, with regard to their morals, their religion, and affection for their country. A little before Southampton's death, ſome perſon in council ſpeaking againſt the chancellor, he with ſome emotion ſaid—"The earl of Clarendon is a true proteſtant, and an honeſt Engliſhman, and while he is in place we are ſecure of our laws, liberties, and religion: but whenever he ſhall be removed, England will feel the ill effects of it." In this he proved a true prophet.

After the earl of Southampton's death, the king put the treaſury into commiſſion. Among the commiſſioners was ſir Thomas Clifford a known papiſt[n], on whom afterwards fell the king's choice for lord treaſurer.

The parliament meeting the 10th of October, the king ſpoke but little, and left it to the lord keeper, to acquaint both houſes with his intentions. His ſpeech ran chiefly upon a ſort of excuſe for the king's having, contrary to cuſtom, after a prorogation to October, ordered the parliament by proclamation to meet the 25th of July, and then, by another proclamation deferred the new ſeſſion to the time firſt appointed. He communicated to them the concluſion of the peace, and deſired them to ſettle the balance of trade with Scotland. He ſaid, the king having named commiſſioners to ſtate the public accounts, and examine to what uſes the money granted by parliament had been applied, and this commiſſion not having ſucceeded as he expected, he left them to follow their own method, and examine them as ſtrictly as they pleaſed. He added, that ſome malicious perſons had diſperſed falſe reports againſt the government, with deſign to create a diſaffection in his ſubjects: but that his majeſty promiſed himſelf from their affection, they would, on the contrary, endeavour to preſerve a good underſtanding between him and his people. That if any juſt grievances have happened, his majeſty was ready to redreſs them, and did not doubt they would imprint upon the hearts of his ſubjects that known truth——"That there is no diſtinct intereſt between the king and his people, but the good of one is the good of both."

Some days after, the two houſes preſented an addreſs to the king to thank him for ſeveral things: 1. That he had diſbanded the late raiſed forces: 2. That he had diſmiſſed the papiſts from out of his guards, and other military employments: 3. That he had revoked the canary patent: 4. And more eſpecially, That he had diſplaced the late lord chancellor, and removed him from the exerciſe of public truſt and employment in affairs of ſtate. The king anſwered to this laſt article, "That he would never employ the earl of Clarendon again in any public affairs whatſoever."

The king ſufficiently diſcovering his intention not to protect the earl of Clarendon, the houſe was thereby encouraged to ſeek reaſons or pretences to impeach him of treaſon. But it is too little to ſay, the king would not protect him. It is certain, he himſelf was his adverſary, and actuated the commons againſt him. This he clearly ſhewed, by reprimanding Sir Stephen Fox who was of his houſhold, and member of the houſe of commons, for having voted in favour of the earl of Clarendon. To which Sir Stephen replied, "That he knew the earl to be an honeſt man, and was ſure could never be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge." At laſt, the commons proceeded with great paſſion, ordered an accuſation to be drawn and preſented to the houſe, the ſubſtance whereof is as follows:

"I. That the earl of Clarendon hath deſigned a ſtanding army to be raiſed, and to govern the kingdom thereby; and adviſed the king to diſſolve this preſent parliament, and to lay aſide all thoughts of parliaments for the future; to govern by a military power, and to maintain the ſame by free quarter and contribution.

[m] It ſtood at the upper end of St. James's-ſtreet, where Albemarle-ſtreet, and the ſtreets adjoining now are. It was built in his abſence, in 1665, chiefly at the charge of the vintners company, who deſigning to monopolize his favour, made it more large and magnificent than ever he intended. So that when he came to ſee it, he ſaid with a ſigh, "This houſe will one day be my ruin." Echard, tom. III. p. 192.

[n] The reſt of the commiſſioners were, the duke of Albemarle, the lord Aſhly Cooper, ſir William Coventry, and ſir John Duncomb. Sir Thomas Clifford was then comptroller of the houſhold. Ibid.

" II. That he hath, in the hearing of the king's ſubjects, falſely and ſeditiouſly ſaid, That the king was in his heart a papiſt, or popiſhly affected, or words to that effect.

" III. That he hath received great ſums of money for the procuring of the canary patent, and other illegal patents; and granted illegal injunctions to ſtop proceedings at law againſt them, and other illegal patents formerly granted.

" IV. That he hath adviſed and procured divers of his majeſty's ſubjects to be impriſoned againſt law, in remote iſlands, garriſons, and other places, thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law, and to produce precedents for the impriſoning any other of his majeſty's ſubjects in like manner.

" V. That he procured his majeſty's cuſtoms to be farmed at under rates, knowing the ſame; and great pretended debts to be paid by his majeſty, to the payment of which his majeſty was not ſtrictly bound, and afterwards received great ſums of money for procuring the ſame.

" VI. That he received great ſums of money from the company of vintners, or ſome of them or their agents, for enhancing the prices of wines, and for freeing them from the payment of legal penalties, which they had incurred.

" VII. That he had in a ſhort time gained to himſelf a greater eſtate than can be imagined to be gained lawfully in ſo ſhort a ſpace: and, contrary to his oath, he hath procured ſeveral grants under the ſeal, from his majeſty to himſelf and relations, of ſeveral of his majeſty's lands, hereditaments and leaſes, to the diſprofit of his majeſty.

" VIII. That he hath introduced an arbitrary government in his majeſty's foreign plantations, and hath cauſed ſuch as complained thereof before his majeſty and council, to be long impriſoned for ſo doing.

" IX. That he did reject and fruſtrate a propoſal and undertaking approved by his majeſty, for the preſervation of Nevis and St. Chriſtopher's, and reducing the French plantations to his majeſty's obedience, after the commiſſions were drawn for that purpoſe; which was the occaſion of our great loſſes and damages in thoſe parts.

" X. That he held correſpondence with Cromwell and his accomplices, when he was in parts beyond the ſeas, attending his majeſty, and thereby adhered to the king's enemies.

" XI. That he adviſed and effected the ſale of Dunkirk to the French king, being part of his majeſty's dominions; together with the ammunition, artillery, and all ſorts of ſtores there, and for no greater value than the ſaid ammunition, artillery, and the ſtores were worth.

" XII. That the ſaid earl did unduly cauſe his majeſty's letters patents, under the great ſeal of England, to one dr. Crowther, to be altered, and the enrollment thereof to be unduly razed.

" XIII. That he hath in an arbitrary way examined and brought into queſtion divers of his majeſty's ſubjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods, chattles, and properties, determined thereof at the council table, and ſtopped proceedings at law by order of the council table, and threatened ſome that pleaded the ſtatute of the 17th of Char. I.

" XIV. That he hath cauſed Quo Warrantos to be iſſued out againſt moſt of the corporations of England, immediately after their charters were confirmed by act of parliament, to the intent he might require great ſums of money of them for renewing their charters; which, when they complied withal, he cauſed the ſaid Quo Warrantos to be diſcharged, and proſecutions therein to ceaſe.

" XV. That he procured the bills of ſettlement for Ireland, and received great ſums of money for the ſame, in a moſt corrupt and unlawful manner.

" XVI. That he hath deluded and betrayed his majeſty, and the nation, in all foreign treaties, and negotiations relating to the late war, and betrayed and diſcovered his majeſty's ſecret councils to his enemies.

" XVII. That he was the principal author of that fatal council of dividing the fleet about June 1666 [o]."

Upon the foundation of theſe articles, the commons, on the 12th of November, impeached the earl of high treaſon at the bar of the lords houſe, and deſired that he might be ſent to the Tower. But the lords did not think proper to commit him upon an accuſation of treaſon in general, without any particular charge.

This raiſed a warm diſpute between the two houſes; which ſeveral conferences could not allay. At laſt, the commons came to this reſolution: " That the lords not having complyed with the deſire of the commons, in committing the earl of Clarendon, and ſequeſtering him from parliament upon the impeachment from that houſe, was an obſtruction of the public juſtice of the kingdom, and a precedent of evil and dangerous conſequence." At the ſame time, they appointed a committee to draw up a declaration to vindicate their proceedings.

But the earl of Clarendon ſeeing himſelf expoſed to the commons' rage, and knowing the king and the whole court were againſt him, thought it adviſeable to withdraw into France, and leave the following apology behind him, addreſſed to the lords [p]:

" I am very unfortunate to find myſelf to ſuffer ſo much, under two very diſadvantageous reflections, which are in no degree applicable to me.

" The firſt, from the greatneſs of my eſtate and fortune, collected and made in ſo few years, which, if it be proportionable to what is reported, may very reaſonably cauſe my integrity to be ſuſpected.

" The ſecond, that I have been the ſole manager and chief miniſter in all the tranſactions of the ſtate, ſince the king's return into England, to Auguſt laſt, and therefore, that all miſcarriages and misfortunes ought to be imputed to me and my councils.

" Concerning my eſtate, your lordſhips will not believe that after malice and envy hath been ſo inquiſitive and ſo ſharp-ſighted, I will offer any thing to your lordſhips, but what is exactly true; and I do aſſure your lordſhips in the firſt place, that (excepting from the king's bounty) I have never received nor taken one penny but what was generally underſtood to be the juſt lawful perquiſites of my office, by the conſtant practice of the beſt times, which I did in my own judgment conceive to be that of my lord Coventry, and of my lord Elleſmere; the practice of which I conſtantly obſerved, although the office in both their times was lawfully worth double to what it was to me, and I believe now is.

" That all the courteſies and favours which I have been able to obtain from the king for other perſons in church or ſtate, or in Weſtminſter-hall, have never been worth to me five pounds: ſo that your lordſhips may be confident I am as innocent from corruption as from any diſloyal thought, which after near thirty years ſervice of the crown, in ſome difficulties and diſtreſſes, I did never expect would be objected to me in my age.

" And I do aſſure your lordſhips, and ſhall make it very manifeſt, that the ſeveral ſums of money, and ſome parcels of land, which his majeſty hath bountifully beſtowed upon me ſince his return into England, are worth more than all I have amounts unto; ſo far I am from advancing my eſtate by indirect means. And though this bounty of his hath very far exceeded my merit, or my expectation, yet ſome others have been as fortunate at leaſt in the ſame bounty, who had as ſmall pretences to it, and have no great reaſon to envy my condition.

" Concerning the other imputation of the credit and power of being chiefeſt miniſter, and of cauſing all to be done that I had a mind to; I have no more to ſay, than that I had the good fortune to ſerve a maſter of a very great judgment and underſtanding, and be always joined with perſons of great ability and experience, without whoſe advice and concurrence, never any thing hath been done.

" Before his majeſty's coming into England he was conſtantly attended by the then marquis of Ormond, the late lord Culpepper, and Mr. ſecretary Nicholas, who were equally truſted with myſelf, and without whoſe joint advice and concurrence, when they were all preſent (as ſome of them always were) I never gave any council. As ſoon as it pleaſed God to bring his majeſty into England, he eſtabliſhed his privy council, and ſhortly out of them he choſe a number of honourable perſons of great reputation (who for the moſt part are ſtill alive) as a committee for foreign affairs, and conſideration of ſuch things as in the nature of them required much ſecrecy; and with theſe perſons he vouchſafed to join me: and I am confident this committee never tranſacted any thing of moment (his majeſty being always preſent) without preſenting the ſame firſt to the council board; and I muſt appeal to them concerning my carriage, and whether we were not all of one mind in matters of importance.

"For more than two years I never knew any differences in the council, or that there were any complaints in the kingdom, which I wholly impute to his majeſty's great wiſdom, and the entire concurrence of his counſellors, without the vanity of aſſuming any thing to myſelf; and therefore I hope I ſhall not be ſingly charged with any thing that hath ſince fallen out amiſs. But from the time Mr. ſecretary Nicholas was removed from his place, there were great altetions; and whoſoever knew any thing of the court and council, know well how much my credit hath ſince that time been diminiſhed, though his majeſty graciouſly vouchſafed ſtill to hear my advice in moſt of his affairs: nor hath there been, from that time to this, above one or two perſons brought to the council, or preferred to any conſiderable office in the court, who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or ſuſpected to have any kindneſs for me; and moſt of them moſt notoriouſly known to have been very long my enemies, and of different judgment and principles from me in church and ſtate, and have taken all opportunities to leſſen my credit with the king, and with all other perſons, by miſrepreſenting and miſreporting all that I ſaid or did, and perſuading men I have done them ſome prejudice with his majeſty, or croſt them in ſome of their pretenſions. Though his majeſty's goodneſs and juſtice was ſuch that it made little impreſſion upon him.

"In my humble opinion, the great misfortunes of the kingdom have proceeded from the war, to which it is notoriouſly known that I was always moſt averſe, and may without vanity ſay, I did not only foreſee, but declare the miſchiefs we ſhould run into, by entering into a war, before any alliances made with the neighbouring princes. And that it may not be imputed to his majeſty's want of care, or the negligence of his counſellors, that no ſuch alliances were entered into, I muſt take the boldneſs to ſay, his majeſty left nothing unattempted in order thereunto; and knowing very well, that France reſolved to begin a war upon Spain, as ſoon as his catholic majeſty ſhould depart this world, which being much ſooner expected by them, they had in the two winters before been at great charges in providing plentiful magazines of all proviſions upon the frontiers, that they might be ready for the war, his majeſty uſed all poſſible means to prepare and diſpoſe the Spaniard with that apprehenſion, offering his friendſhip to that degree, as might be for the benefit and ſecurity of both crowns.

"But Spain flattering herſelf, that France would not break with them, at leaſt, that they would not give them any cauſe by adminiſtering matter of jealouſy to them, never made any real approach towards a friendſhip with his majeſty, but, both by their embaſſadors here, and to his majeſty's embaſſadors at Madrid, always perſiſted, as preliminaries, upon the giving up of Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica.

"Though France had an embaſſador here, to whom a project of a treaty was offered, and the lord Holles, his majeſty's embaſſador at Paris, uſed all endeavours to purſue and proſecute the ſaid treaty, yet it was quickly diſcerned, that the principal deſign of France, was to draw his majeſty into ſuch a nearer alliance as might advance their deſign; without which, they had no mind to enter into the treaty propoſed.

"And this was the ſtate of affairs when the war was entered into with the Dutch, from which time neither crown much conſidered the making any alliance with England.

"As I did from my ſoul abhor the entering into this war, ſo I preſumed never to give any advice or council for the way of managing it, but by oppoſing many propoſitions, which ſeemed to the late lord treaſurer and myſelf to be unreaſonable; as the payment of the ſeamen by tickets, and many other particulars which added to the expence.

"My enemies took all occaſions to inveigh againſt me, and make their friendſhip with others out of the council, of more licentious principles, and who knew well enough how much I diſliked and complained of the liberty they took to themſelves of reviling all councils and councillors, and turning all things ſerious and ſacred into ridicule. They took all ways imaginable to render me ungrateful to all ſorts of men (whom I ſhall be compelled to name in my defence) perſuading thoſe that miſcarried in any of their deſigns, that it was the chancellor's doing; whereof I never knew any thing. However, they could not withdraw the king's favour from me, who was ſtill pleaſed to uſe my ſervice with others, nor was there ever any thing done but with the joint advice of at leaſt the major part of thoſe who were conſulted with. And as his majeſty commanded my ſervice in the late treaties, ſo I never gave the leaſt advice in private, nor wrote one letter to any one perſon in either of thoſe negotiations, but upon the advice of the council, and alſo after it was read in council, or at leaſt, by the king himſelf, and ſome others; and if I prepared any inſtructions or memorials, it was by the king's command, and the requeſt of the ſecretaries who deſired my aſſiſtance; nor was it any wiſh of my own, that any embaſſador ſhould give me any account of the tranſactions, but to the ſecretaries, whom I was always ready to adviſe; nor am I conſcious to myſelf of ever having given advice that hath proved miſchievous or inconvenient to his majeſty; and I have been ſo far from being the ſole manager of affairs, that I have not, in the whole laſt year, been above twice with his majeſty in any room alone, and very ſeldom in the two or three years preceding.

"And ſince the parliament at Oxford, it hath been very viſible, that my credit hath been very little, and that very few things have been hearkened to, which have been propoſed by me, but contradicted, eo nomine, becauſe propoſed by me.

"I moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips to remember the office and truſt I had for ſeven years, in which, in diſcharge of my duty, I was obliged to ſtop and obſtruct many mens pretences, and refuſed to ſet the ſeal to many pardons and other grants, which would have been profitable to thoſe who procured them, and many whereof, upon my repreſentation to his majeſty, were for ever ſtopt, which naturally have raiſed many enemies to me: and my frequent concurring, upon the deſire of the late lord treaſurer (with whom I had the honour to have a long and vaſt friendſhip to his death) in repreſenting ſeveral exceſſes and exorbitances, the yearly iſſue ſo far exceeding the revenues, provoked many perſons concerned, of great power and credit, to do me all the ill offices they could. And yet I may faithfully ſay, that I never meddled with any part of the revenue or the adminiſtration of it, but when I was deſired by the late lord treaſurer to give him my aſſiſtance and advice, having had the honour formerly to ſerve the crown as chancellor of the exchequer, which was for the moſt part in his majeſty's preſence. Nor have I ever been in the leaſt degree concerned, in point of profit, in letting any part of his majeſty's revenue; nor have ever treated or debated it, but in his majeſty preſence, in which my opinion concurred always with the major part of the councillors who were preſent.

"All which, upon examination, will be made manifeſt to your lordſhips, how much ſoever my integrity is blaſted by the malice of thoſe who, I am confident, do not believe themſelves. Nor have I in my life, upon all the treaties, or otherwiſe, received the value of one ſhilling from all the kings and princes in the world (excepting the books of the Louvre-print ſent me by the chancellor of France, by that king's direction) but from my own maſter, to whoſe entire ſervice, and the good and welfare of my country, no man's heart was ever more devoted.

"This being my preſent condition, I do moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips to entertain a favourable opinion of me, and to believe me to be innocent from thoſe foul aſperſions, until the contrary ſhall be proved: which I am ſure can never be by any man worthy to be believed: and ſince the diſtempers of the times, and the difference between the two houſes in the preſent debate, with the power and malice of my enemies, who gave out that I ſhould prevail with his majeſty to prorogue or diſſolve this parliament in diſpleaſure, and threaten to expoſe me to the rage and fury of the people, may make me to be looked upon as the cauſe which obſtructs the king's ſervice, and unity and peace of the kingdom.

"I moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips, that I may not forfeit your lordſhip's favour and protection, by withdrawing myſelf from ſo powerful a proſecution, in hope that I may be able, by ſuch withdrawing, hereafter to appear and make my defence, when his majeſty's juſtice (to which I ſhall always ſubmit) may not be obſtructed, or controlled, by the power and malice of thoſe who have ſworn my deſtruction."

by

The lords having received this apology the 3d of December, deſired a conference with the commons, to communicate it to them. The duke of Buckingham, who was to deliver it, ſaid, "The lords have commanded me to deliver you this ſcandalous and ſeditious paper, ſent from the earl of Clarendon: they bid me to preſent it to you, and deſire you in convenient time to ſend it to them again, for it has a ſtyle which they are in love with, and therefore deſire to keep it."

The reading of this apology threw the commons into a flame. Some of the earl's enemies [q] took occaſion to make the moſt virulent ſpeeches againſt him, and at laſt, the houſe voted his apology ſcandalous and malicious, and a reproach to the juſtice of the nation, and ordered it to be burnt by the common hangman.

The 13th of December, the lords ſent to the commons a bill for the baniſhment of the earl of Clarendon, which met with great oppoſition in that houſe. Some of the members even propoſed a bill of attainder againſt him. At laſt the houſe voted, "that the king ſhould be prayed to iſſue out his proclamation for ſummoning the ſaid earl to appear by a day, and to apprehend him in order to his trial, and that the lords be ſent to for their concurrence, in this vote." But the lords refuſed their concurrence, becauſe the vote was contrary to their bill.

At laſt, on the 18th of December, the bill ſent by the lords paſſed the houſe of commons, and the king willingly gave his aſſent. The truth is, it was the king who had employed the duke of York, to prevail with the earl of Clarendon to withdraw, whether the earl's friends had at laſt ſoftened the king, or he was not deſirous of having the articles of impeachment diſcuſſed, which might have diſcovered things he had rather conceal.

Thus was the earl of Clarendon ſacrificed to the malice of his enemies. But they were ſuch enemies, that it may be ſaid, their perſecution did him more honour, than the crimes, which for the moſt part were groundleſs, could do him injury. Theſe enemies were, firſt, the king himſelf, who on this occaſion forgot all the ſervices this faithful miniſter had done his father and himſelf, at a time when his affection and fidelity could not be ſuſpected, ſince there was no appearance of his being ever rewarded. What is more ſtrange, the king came to hate him, merely becauſe he ſerved him too well, and, in a juſt concern for his glory, did what lay in his power to prevent his falling into contempt, and engaging in projects which could not but render him unfortunate. His other enemies were, the king's miſtreſſes and favourites, perſons of profligate lives, of no religion, or of one contrary to that of the eſtabliſhment, who hated him only becauſe they thought him too honeſt, or believed him incapable of being gained to aſſiſt their deſigns. For it is generally allowed, that not a ſingle article of his accuſation, except that of the ſale of Dunkirk, could be proved.

If the preſbyterians had procured the lord Clarendon's ruin, there had been nothing ſtrange in it, ſince he was their profeſſed enemy. For it may be affirmed, that from him came all their misfortunes, ſince the beginning of this reign. But the preſbyterians had then no credit, no acceſs either to court or parliament. What is moſt ſurpriſing in the downfall of this miniſter, is the animoſity wherewith he was purſued by the ſame houſe of commons, which he himſelf had, if I may ſo ſay, compoſed of men of the moſt extravagant principles, with reſpect to religion and government. But he found himſelf miſtaken in his views. For, theſe ſame principles, with regard to the royal power, ſo firmly attached the houſe to the king, that they made no ſcruple to abandon the earl of Clarendon, though head of the party, when once the king expreſſed his diſpleaſure againſt him. This is not the only inſtance of the ableſt politicians labouring their own ruin, by ſeemingly the beſt contrived projects.

Among the great ſervices rendered by the earl of Clarendon to Charles I. and Charles II. his excellent hiſtory of the rebellion and civil wars in England, ought to be remembered, which was not publiſhed till after his death. In this hiſtory are undeniable proofs of the author's ſincere affection for Charles I. Nay, very likely, it was writ with the ſole deſign to juſtify the conduct of that unfortunate prince, and place it in the beſt light it is capable of. If any thing can injure this hiſtory, it is, that the views of the author are too undiſguiſed. This gives impartial readers occaſion to think, it was not writ ſo much for the inſtruction of the public in the truth of facts, as to prepoſſeſs them, by various artifices, and numberleſs inſinuations, in favour of a ſyſtem, which all readers, verſed in the hiſtory and government of England, will doubtleſs, not admit. Another charge againſt this author, is, the contempt and animoſity which he every where ſhews againſt the preſbyterians and the Scots, even in places where it ſeems foreign to his purpoſe. But this came from his heart. His immoderate paſſion againſt preſbyterianiſm, was this great man's foible. He gloried in his hatred of the preſbyterians, and perhaps contributed more than any other to that exceſs of animoſity which ſtill ſubſiſts among the followers of his maxims and principles.

From a private gentleman, and a lawyer, the earl of Clarendon roſe to the higheſt degree of fortune, that a man of his rank could aſpire to. For, by his merit and his inviolable attachment to Charles I. and Charles II. he was raiſed to the dignity of earl, of lord high chancellor, and of prime miniſter of ſtate. But what gives a farther luſtre to his glory, is, that from the marriage of his daughter with the duke of York, ſprung two princeſſes ſucceſſively queens of England. He ſpent the reſt of his days in baniſhment, among proteſtant preſbyterians, and papiſts, whoſe declared enemy he had been, during the time of his favour, but who failed not to pay him all the reſpect due to his merit, and the dignities with which he had been honoured in his own country. He died at Roan the latter end of December 1674, aged ſixty-ſeven.

The day after the act for the earl of Clarendon's baniſhment paſſed in the houſe of commons, the king gave his aſſent to it by commiſſion. Then, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, by ſecretary Morrice, to wiſh them to adjourn to the 6th of February. In the reign of James I. there was a difference between the king and commons, concerning the right of adjournment. The commons pretended, that though the king had power to diſſolve or prorogue a parliament, he could not adjourn it, and that adjournment entirely belonged to each houſe. But the lords refuſing their concurrence, the commons were obliged to drop their pretenſion. From that time James I. and Charles I. always ſuppoſed this right as undeniable, and yet the point had never been decided in form. It ſeems therefore, that Charles II. by deſiring the parliament to adjourn, was willing to ſhew ſome regard to the pretenſions of the commons, or at leaſt to avoid all occaſion of diſpute with them. But this condeſcenſion laſted not long; for it will hereafter appear, that he frequently adjourned the parliament by his own authority, without any diſlike expreſſed by the commons. Now the difference between an adjournment and a prorogation conſiſts in this, that a prorogation ends the ſeſſion, and annuls all affairs which have been propoſed or debated in parliament without being finiſhed, ſo that they cannot ſerve for ground to the reſolutions of a new ſeſſion, unleſs they are propoſed afreſh. But an adjournment only ſuſpends them till the parliament reaſſembles. For this reaſon, when the commons have voted the king a ſupply, the parliament is ſeldom or never prorogued, but only adjourned when ſome ſhort receſs is neceſſary, that at their meeting again, they may proceed upon the vote till it be paſſed into an act.

Before the parliament met in October, the king publiſhed a proclamation, for the rigorous execution of the laws againſt thoſe who repaired to hear maſs at the chapels of embaſſadors. He ſtill perſiſted in his diſſimulation with regard to religion, and in his deſign to perſuade his ſubjects, that he was a good proteſtant. It was properly for this that theſe proclamations were intended. But the nonperformance of them had a quite contrary effect. For it could not be thought neceſſary ſo frequently to repeat them, if the king had been pleaſed with ſeeing them executed according to law.

The ſame month of October, the king rode in great ſtate into the city, and laid the firſt ſtone of the foundation of the Royal Exchange. This building was finiſhed in a very ſhort time.

This year, death, as I have ſaid, took out of the world Thomas Wriotheſley earl of Southampton, lord treaſurer. The other leſs remarkable deaths were thoſe of Dr. Matthew Wren biſhop of Ely, (great enemy of the preſbyterians, who, out of revenge for his ſeverity to them before the civil wars, kept him priſoner in the Tower from the year 164[illegible] till the reſtoration, when he was reſtored to his biſhopric of Ely, where he died, aged eighty-one years) and of the famous poet Abraham Cowley, little known to ſtrangers, but very much, and deſervedly, eſteemed by the Engliſh.

After the removal of the earl of Clarendon, the king and his miniſters, of whom the earl of Arlington, and ſir Orlando Bridgeman were the principal, believed it abſolutely neceſſary to give the people ſome ſatisfaction, by demonſtrating the court's attention to the welfare of the nation. The king of France, by his invaſion of Flanders, had ſo clearly ſhewn, he did not intend to ſtand to his queen's renunciation of all the members of the Spaniſh monarchy, that he could not poſſibly be miſtaken. Beſides his power was daily increaſing, whereas that of Spain was viſibly declining. It was therefore the intereſt of Europe in general, and of England in particular, to take early and effectual meaſures, to ſet bounds to this formidable power, which might produce great changes, if care was not taken to ſtop its progreſs. Nothing was more popular than ſuch a deſign, and nothing more capable to re-ingratiate the king with his ſubjects. So, the 1ſt of January 1667-8, a reſolution was taken, to enter into a ſtrict union with the ſtates general of the United Provinces, to prevent the king of France's entire reduction of Flanders, and the reſt of the Spaniſh Netherlands. The court likewiſe reſolved, to endeavour to engage the king of Sweden into the ſame meaſures, and ſo form a triple alliance capable to intimidate Lewis XIV. and oblige him to proceed with more caution.

To execute this project, ſir William Temple was ordered to the Hague, with the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary. I ſhall not dar,end to the particulars of the negotiation, which are related in the writings of ſir William Temple, publiſhed in a French verſion. I ſhall only obſerve, that by the addreſs of the envoy, the treaty of alliance between the king and the ſtates was concluded in five days, and what is more, ſigned by the ſtates general, without communicating it to the particular provinces, which had never been practiſed before. Moreover, the count de Dhona, embaſſador of Sweden, engaged for his maſter, that he ſhould enter into the treaty, if a place was left for him as a principal. Afterwards, that court ſigned a like treaty in the name of the king of Sweden with the king of England and the ſtates general, it being agreed, that this treaty ſhould be conſidered as part of the former when ratified. Theſe treaties were firſt ſent into England, and ratified by the king, and ſhortly after, the king of Sweden's ratification was likewiſe received. Thus was concluded, in a very little time, a triple league, the moſt important that had been long ſince made in Europe, and which was to check the power, as well as vaſt deſigns of France.

For the underſtanding this treaty, of which I ſhall preſently give the ſubſtance, it muſt be obſerved, that Lewis XIV. after his laſt campaign, during which he had ſeized many ſtrong places of the Spaniſh Netherlands[r], had, at the preſſing inſtances of the ſtates general, conſented to a treaty with Spain, till the end of March 1668. Moreover, he had left to the queen regent of Spain, the choice of either yielding to him the places conquered by him in the laſt campaign, or elſe the duchy of Luxemburgh, or, inſtead of it, Franche Comté, Cambray and Cambreſis, Douay, Aire, St. Omer, Bergue, Furnes, and Linck, for which he promiſed to ſurrender all the reſt of his conqueſts. Theſe offers, as it appears, were founded upon the ſuppoſition, that the French queen's renunciation, in the treaty of her marriage, was of no force. Though the thing had been decided only by the king of France himſelf, the ſtates general, ſeeing no poſſibility of obliging him to deſiſt from his pretenſions, had approved of this alternative, and poſitively engaged to join their forces with thoſe of France, to compel Spain to embrace one or other of theſe offers. They could not therefore recede, after ſuch an engagement. For which reaſon, they reſolved to make with England three different treaties, which, however, were to take place, as containing but one and the ſame treaty.

The firſt treaty contained a defenſive alliance between England and the ſtates general, againſt all who ſhould attack either of the parties, with a ſpecification of the ſuccours to be mutually given, in caſe of ſuch an attack. This alliance to be perpetual.

By the ſecond treaty, the king and the ſtates were obliged to uſe their joint endeavours to diſpoſe the king of France to make peace in the Netherlands, upon one of the propoſed conditions, and likewiſe the king of Spain to make choice of one of the two before the end of May. But, in caſe of any difficulty from the Spaniard, they engaged to uſe their endeavours to induce the king of France to ſtop all farther progreſs of his arms in Flanders, and leave it wholly to the allies, to procure the ends propoſed in this league.

The third treaty contained, 1. That if in procuring peace between France and Spain, any difficulties ſhould ariſe concerning the renunciation, care ſhould be taken ſo to ſettle the articles of peace, as to create no prejudice to the rights of either. But if one ſide only ſhould reject this expedient, then the allies ſhould proceed againſt the refuſer, in the manner agreed in the ſecond treaty. 2. That the allies ſhould uſe their endeavours to eſtabliſh peace between Spain and Portugal. And though they did not pretend to hinder the king of France from aſſiſting Portugal, they would however prevent, as far as lay in their power, his aſſiſting that nation by making war in the Netherlands. 3. But, in caſe the king of France rejecting the conditions contained in the ſecond treaty, ſhould make farther progreſs in Flanders, then the allies ſhould join with Spain, and make war upon the king of France, till they ſhould compel him to comply with the terms of the Pyrenean treaty. 4. That all theſe articles ſhould be ratified within four weeks[s].

This treaty which, as I ſaid, was ſigned by the king of Sweden as a principal, and was called the triple league, received the applauſes of all Europe, except France. Indeed, the tendency of it was not only to ſave the Netherlands, purſuant to the true intereſts of England and the ſtates general, but alſo to prevent a fatal war, which muſt have thrown all Europe into a flame. It is perhaps the only ſtep taken by Charles, through the whole courſe of his reign, really tending to the advantage of England. It will hereafter appear, that, probably, he had no other intention than to dazzle the public and amuſe the world, by a proceeding ſo much to his honour. But in ill ſupporting what he had ſo happily begun, he manifeſtly ſhewed, that he erred not through ignorance, or want of knowing the intereſts of his kingdom, and thoſe of all Europe.

Shortly after, ſir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the ſtates general, and about the ſame time the treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily finiſhed, under the guaranty of the king of England.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting, the parliament met the 10th of February. The king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that he had made a league defenſive with the ſtates of the United Provinces, and another for an efficacious mediation of peace between France and Spain, into which the king of Sweden had, by his embaſſador, offered to enter as a principal. He added, that the poſture of his neighbours, and the conſequence of the new alliance, obliging him to ſet out a fleet to ſea, he ſhould want a ſpeedy ſupply: that beſides, it was neceſſary to build ſome large ſhips, and fortify the ports. He concluded with deſiring them to think ſeriouſly of ſome courſe, to beget a better union and compoſure in the minds of his ſubjects in matters of religion.

The commons joyfully received the news of the triple alliance; but before they proceeded to the conſideration of the king's ſpeech, they reſolved to inquire into the miſmanagements during the late war. They appointed for that purpoſe a committee, which diſcovered many miſdemeanours in the conduct of ſeveral perſons, "as in the affair of Berghen in Norway; in the plundering the Eaſt India ſhips while the Dutch paſſed by; in the not ſetting out a ſufficient fleet laſt year; in the ſeparation of thoſe that were out, ſo that they became uſeleſs; in the want of proviſion and ammunition in the fleet, and in the forts; in payment of the ſeamen by tickets; in the want of intelligence and dividing the fleets in the ſecond year of the war; in the buſineſs of Chatham, &c." The commons accuſed Brounkard, that, after the firſt battle, he had carried falſe orders from the duke of York, while that prince was repoſing himſelf, which had prevented the entire deſtruction of the enemy's fleet, and expelling him the houſe ordered him to be impeached. As to to the affair of Chatham, they accuſed commiſſioner Pett for having neglected his duty. Sir William Penn was accuſed of having embezzled great quantities of rich goods taken in a Dutch prize[t].

The king was doubly concerned to put an end to theſe examinations, ſince moſt of the miſcarriages reflected upon him, though only ſome particular officers were directly accuſed, and beſides, the commons waſted the time, which, according to him, would have been better employed in conſidering the ſupplies he had demanded. He therefore preſſed the commons, by three ſeveral meſſages, to haſten the money bill, telling them in his laſt meſſage, that he intended to prorogue the parliament the 4th of May. But, being informed the houſe was not pleaſed with his meſſage, becauſe a prorogation would have defeated all their proceedings againſt delinquents, he let them know, the 24th of April, that he intended only an adjournment for three months; and withal deſired, that the money bill might be ready againſt the 4th of May.

Beſides the ſupply, the houſe of commons was employed in another affair, with which they were deeply affected. They began to diſcover the king's ſecret intentions, and believed, that under colour of eaſing the preſbyterians, his deſign was to obtain a general indulgence for all the non-conformiſts, including the papiſts under that general denomination. An inſinuation in his ſpeech confirmed this ſuſpicion. Wherefore, to ſtop the progreſs of a deſign ſo contrary to their principles, with regard both to popery and preſbyterianiſm, they preſented an addreſs to the king, to pray him "That he would iſſue out his proclamation for enforcing the laws againſt conventicles; and that care might be taken for the preſervation of the peace againſt all unlawful aſſemblies of papiſts and non-conformiſts."—The king, according to his uſual cuſtom, failed not to publiſh a proclamation, declaring, "That upon information, that divers perſons abuſing the clemency uſed to the diſſenters (even whilſt it was under conſideration to find out a way for the better union of his proteſtant ſubjects) had of late openly held unlawful aſſemblies and conventicles, he would by no means permit ſuch notorious contempts of himſelf and his laws to go unpuniſhed, &c." He ſuppoſed, the parliament was upon this union, becauſe he had recommended it to them. But the commons were far from thinking of this affair, unleſs by this union the king meant an entire conformity with the church of England, which was not his intention.

At the ſame time a great diſpute aroſe between the two houſes, occaſioned by Mr. Skinner, a merchant of London, who believing to have juſt cauſe of complaint againſt the Eaſt India company, brought the matter by petition into the houſe of lords originally. The lords, after an examination, relieved him in five thouſand pounds coſts. On the other hand, the company having petitioned the commons, Skinner was taken into cuſtody, for applying originally to the lords, in a common plea, which was not agreeable to the law. The petition preſented to the commons by the Eaſt India company was voted ſcandalous by the lords, and ſeveralc onferences between the two houſes, were not capable to decide this difference. At laſt, the commons voted, "That whoever ſhould be aiding or aſſiſting in putting in execution the order or ſentence of the houſe of lords, in the caſe of Thomas Skinner againſt the Eaſt India company, ſhould be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of the houſe."

The ſame day this vote paſſed in the houſe of commons, being the 8th of May, the king came to the houſe of peers, and paſſing the bill for raiſing three hundred and ten thouſand pounds by an impoſition on wines and other liquors, and ſome other acts, he adjourned the parliament to the 11th of Auguſt. He adjourned it again a ſecond time to the the 1ſt of March, and at laſt prorogued it to the 19th of October, 1669 [u].

I have already mentioned the affairs between France and Spain, and the alternative offered by the French king. The marquis of Caſtel Rodrigo, or rather the court of Spain, not being in haſte to make a choice, Lewis XIV. in February invaded Franche Comté [w], and in leſs than a fortnight ſubdued the whole province. This conqueſt however did not make him riſe in his demands, but he was ſtill willing to ſtand to the offer of the two conditions he had propoſed. But the court of Spain delayed, as much as poſſible, to declare upon the offered alternative, deſigning to engage England and the ſtates in a war againſt France. Mean while, as the treaty of the triple league was directly contrary to the deſign of Spain (the three allies having only engaged to take up arms in caſe the king of France refuſed to ſtand to his propoſal) it was not poſſible for the court of Spain to accompliſh their ends. At laſt, after many tergiverſations, the marquis of Caſtel Rodrigo declared, he accepted the firſt condition, by which France was to keep what had been conquered the laſt campaign. This choice greatly ſurpriſed the ſtates, who had relied on the Spaniards accepting rather the ſecond condition, which appeared leſs advantageous to them. But the policy of the Spaniſh court was to throw England and the ſtates into an unavoidable neceſſity of making war againſt France, if ſhe ſhould offer to purſue her conqueſts in the Netherlands.

This choice being made, the peace was no longer difficult. The town of Aix la Chapelle was agreed on for the place of treaty, and the plenipotentiaries of France and Spain, of England, Sweden, and the ſtates, repairing thither, the treaty was concluded and ſigned the 2d of May, after a fortnight's negotiation. The treaty contained in ſubſtance, That the king of France ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Charleroy, Binch, Aeth, Douay, Fort-de-la Scarpe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Liſle, Armentieres, Courtray, Berghes, Furnes, with all their dependencies. The king of France, on his ſide, reſtored Franche Comté to the crown of Spain. The allied ſtates were guarantees of this peace, and all other princes and ſtates were allowed to be ſo if they pleaſed [x].

Though the treaty of Aix la Chapelle had conſiderably increaſed the power of France, the ſtates general of the United Provinces believed it a great advantage, to have ſtopped the progreſs of the French arms. They aſcribed to themſelves the whole glory, though, indeed, the triple league would never have been thought of by them, had it not been firſt propoſed by the king of England. To immortalize their glory, they ſtruck a medal, on one ſide of which was ſeen Holland leaning againſt a trophy, and on the reverſe, an inſcription to this effect: "That they had ſecured the laws; reformed religion; aſſiſted, defended, and reconciled kings; reſtored freedom to the ocean; procured by their arms a glorious peace, and eſtabliſhed the tranquillity of all Europe." On the other hand, Joſuah Van-Beuninghen, who had been employed in negotiating the peace, ſtruck a medal, and compared himſelf to Joſhua ſtopping the courſe of the ſun. As the king of France had taken the ſun for his device, the meaning of the medal could not be miſtaken. But the ſtates immediately ſuppreſſed it. As for the firſt, and ſome others, which diſcovered too great preſumption, they were not broke till two years after. They had afterwards cauſe to repent of this inſult offered to Lewis XIV.

When I ſaid, that Charles, in all appearance, propoſed the triple league only to amuſe the public, and appeaſe in ſome meaſure the diſcontents of the people, which began to appear, I founded my conjecture, firſt, upon ſir William Temple's ſuſpicion, that the king would not long continue in this reſolution. This ſuſpicion appears in ſeveral of his letters. But as they were writ to the earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, he contented himſelf with inſinuating his belief, without daring to ſpeak too openly. Secondly, it has been ſeen in a letter of the king of France to d'Eſtrades, how little Charles concerned himſelf for the preſervation of the Netherlands, ſince, believing, that Lewis directed his views that way, he offered to let him make that conqueſt unmoleſted, without reſerving an inch of land to himſelf, provided Lewis would abandon the ſtates general. Thirdly, the ſale of Dunkirk to France ſhewed, that Lewis's conqueſts in Flanders would give but little jealouſy to Charles. In the fourth place, at the very time that all Europe was diſſolved in joy for the concluſion of the triple league, ſir Thomas Clifford, the king's favourite, ſaid openly,—"Well, for all this noiſe, we muſt yet have another war with the Dutch before it be long." Fifthly, France herſelf did not diſcover much uneaſineſs at this triple alliance. She not only inſiſted upon all her pretenſions, but even Mr. de Lionne, ſecretary of ſtate, writing to d'Eſtrades on occaſion of the triple alliance, has theſe words,——"If the Dutch enter into alliances contrary to the intereſts of his majeſty, we ſhall not be ſo much troubled at it as they imagined: I know what I ſay, and upon what foundation I ſpeak it." If to this be added, king Charles's ſtrange conduct afterwards, in making a league with France againſt Holland, it cannot but be ſuſpected, that there was at that time a ſecret correſpondence between France and England. Sixthly, events are commonly the beſt interpreters of men's actions. And it will preſently appear, that [x] From this time, England had the beſt opportunity of holding the ballance of Europe, which if it had immoveably obſerved, and with reaſonable vigour, it might have ſaved ſpending thoſe millions of treaſure, and oceans of blood, that have ſince happened. Echard—Whatever the Spaniſh loſt by the French ravages, the Engliſh gained a very great private benefit by it; for one Brewer, ſaid to be of Engliſh parents, with about fifty Walloons, who wrought and dyed fine woollen cloths, thereupon came into England, and by them the Engliſh were in a few years inſtructed to make and dye fine woollen cloths, cheaper by forty per cent. than they could before. Charles made but little account of his engagements, entered into by the triple alliance; but it is not yet time to ſpeak of theſe matters.

After the removal of the earl of Clarendon, the face of the Engliſh court was entirely changed. The king, more at eaſe by the abſence of a troubleſome miniſter, whoſe very preſence was a reproof to his conduct, gave himſelf up to his pleaſures, without any reſerve or diſcretion. The duke of Buckingham, who had no religion, and gloried in his debaucheries, and Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter, the greateſt wit, and the moſt ſatirical and licentious poet of his age, were his principal favourites[y]. With theſe two men, and his miſtreſſes, the king ſpent almoſt his whole time, and it was with difficulty that his miniſters could find an opportunity to ſpeak to him of his affairs. Pleaſures and debauches were the ſole entertainments of the court, and vice appeared there barefaced. In a word, England had never ſeen a more diſorderly court, and, unhappily, their example had but too much influence upon the reſt of the people. The king was prodigal to exceſs. Beſides his ſtanding revenues, which, as we have ſeen, amounted to twelve hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, he had conſumed the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds given him the laſt year by the parliament, in uſes for which that money was not intended. This year, he had aſked a ſupply of his parliament, pretending a neceſſity to build ſome new ſhips of war, and to put a great fleet to ſea, in maintenance of his engagements by the triple alliance. The parliament had granted him three hundred and ten thouſand pounds, but the act not paſſing till two days after the ſigning of the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, not a ſingle ſhip was built, and the neceſſity of putting a fleet to ſea, vaniſhed at once. Notwithſtanding this, he was always in want, and his revenues perpetually anticipated.

But a ſtill greater misfortune to England was, that only papiſts, or men of no religion, had any credit at court. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Rocheſter, and the king's miſtreſſes, were not perſons who gave themſelves any trouble to ſtop the progreſs of popery. The earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, was, like the king, a diſguiſed, and Clifford, a declared papiſt. The duke of York was not only a catholic, but alſo very zealous for his religion. Being conſidered as preſumptive heir to the crown, great court was made to him, and with the more application, as his revenues being large, and his management frugal, he had wherewithal to gain courtiers. It may be judged, that his zeal had ſuffered him not to advance proteſtants to places of truſt, when he could introduce perſons of his religion. He had ſo powerful a party at court, and ſo many creatures about the king's perſon, that he was in a manner abſolute there, and directed the reſolutions of the council. Laſtly, if the king had any religion, he was moſt inclined to popery. He found, beſides, a conſiderable advantage in careſſing the papiſts, whom he eſteemed his firm friends, whereas he could not help dreading the zeal of the proteſtants, in caſe they ſhould diſcover he had abjured their religion.

After this view of the ſtate of the Engliſh court, it is eaſy to conceive, that thoſe who had moſt credit and acceſs to the king, could hardly intend the benefit of the kingdom. Every one of his moſt intimate councillors would have been glad to ſee the king abſolute, that he might have at command the whole riches of England to laviſh upon them. The king himſelf was ſo uneaſy to be continually forced to deviſe freſh pretences to demand money of his parliament, that he could have wiſhed to be delivered from that trouble, and to have free liberty to take what he wanted without aſking. But on the other hand, he thought himſelf obliged to proceed circumſpectly, the example of his father not permitting him to engage in the ſame courſe, before he had taken greater precautions. This was the reaſon, that for ſome years the court projects were executed gradually, and with great diſſimulation, notwithſtanding the warm temper of the duke of York, and the eagerneſs of the papiſts. For it may be affirmed, that the king alone oppoſed their career, whether out of fear or prudence.

This ſummer, the king diverted himſelf with making ſeveral progreſſes into the country, to view the ports and the navy. He ſent a ſquadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by ſir Thomas Allen, who forced the Algerines to a peace very advantageous to England.

Nothing more of any importance paſſed during the reſt of this year, except ſome embaſſies, which the ſequel requires ſhould be mentioned. Sir William Godolphin was ſent to the court of Spain; Mr. Ralph Montague was firſt envoy, and ſoon after embaſſador to France; the earl of Carliſle went embaſſador to Stockholm[z], and ſir William Temple embaſſador extraordinary to the ſtates general. On the other hand, monſieur Colbert was ſent from France to reſide as embaſſador at the Engliſh court.

There were alſo ſome changes at court: among others, ſir Thomas Clifford was made treaſurer of the houſhold, the duke of Monmouth, the king's natural ſon, was made captain of his life-guard of horſe; ſir John Trevor, lately returned from France, where he had been envoy, was ſworn one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, on the reſignation of ſir William Morrice, to whom was given ten thouſand pounds ſterling.

This year died Algernoon Percy, earl of Northumberland, who was ſucceeded by his ſon[a]; the famous poets Davenant, and Denham; and the great ſoldier ſir William Waller, ſo often mentioned in the hiſtory of the civil wars. He had been impriſoned by the independent parliament, and confined till the king's reſtoration, when he was delivered, being conſidered on account of his ſufferings as a ſort of royaliſt.

[1669.] Though the year produced no memorable events, it was however fatal to Europe, ſince it was, probably, this year that meaſures began to be taken for the ſtrict union of France with England. At leaſt, it appears in ſir William Temple's letters, that Mr. Puffendorf, who had this year been ſent envoy from Sweden to the court of France, calling at the Hague in his return, ſaid to ſir William Temple[b], that a miniſter at the French court had aſſured him, that the triple alliance would not ſubſiſt, and that the Engliſh court had already changed their meaſures. The ſame Mr. Puffendorf ſaw a letter in marſhal Turenne's hands at Paris, from monſieur Colbert the French embaſſador in London, wherein that embaſſador, ſpeaking of the Engliſh court, has theſe words:—"I have at laſt made them ſenſible of the whole "extent of his majeſty's liberality." So, it is ſcarce to be doubted, that Colbert's embaſſy to London was deſigned to gain or corrupt the Engliſh court, and that he ſucceeded. It is the time only that is queſtioned, ſince the thing itſelf appeared manifeſtly in the ſequel.

The latter end of March, Coſmo de Medici prince of Tuſcany arrived in England, where he was received with all the reſpect due to his birth and particular merit. As his deſign was only to ſee England after he had viſited Spain and France, he was ſhewn, by order of the king, whatever was curious, and particularly the two univerſities.

Shortly after his departure, prince George of Denmark came alſo to pay the king a viſit, but made no long ſtay then in England.

The 9th of July the large and magnificent theatre at Oxford, built at the expence of Dr. Sheldon archbiſhop of Canterbury, was opened. He was chancellor of the univerſity, and ſhortly after reſigned that honour to the duke of Ormond. The duke was ſtill lord lieutenant of Ireland, but ſoon after was removed, and ſucceeded by the lord Roberts, who was not of the duke's principles.

In all appearance, the king had now formed a ſort of ſcheme with regard to religion. This was to incorporate the preſbyterians with the church of England, and procure a toleration for all the other non-conformiſts. He might have in this a double view. Firſt, to gain the preſbyterians, who were very numerous in the kingdom, and perhaps make uſe of them, thus united with the church of England, to check the fury of the epiſcopalians, who were not leſs enemies to the papiſts than to the preſbyterians. If the king had not been a papiſt, which was then little known, it would be difficult to underſtand this policy, ſince, ſuppoſing him a zealous member of the church of England, what occaſion had he to guard againſt her? But being a catholic, the advantages of theſe precautions are very viſible. His ſecond view, univerſally allowed, and afterwards manifeſtly diſcovered, was, by procuring an indulgence for all non-conformiſts without diſtinction, to procure alſo the ſame favour for the papiſts. In purſuance of this ſcheme, the king and his miniſters affected to expreſs great kindneſs for the preſbyterians, and this kindneſs encouraged them to appear more openly, and hold their aſſemblies with leſs caution and ſecrecy. In ſhort, ſir Orlando Bridgeman lord keeper, whether privy to the king's ſecret intentions, or led by motives of mildneſs and humanity, acquainting two of the moſt eminent preſbyterian miniſters[c], that he deſired a conference with them; they waited on him accordingly, and he freely told them, he deſigned to make them ſome propoſals for a comprehenſion for the preſbyterians, and a toleration for the independents and the reſt. Upon this occaſion, theſe two preſbyterian miniſters had ſeveral conferences with two epiſcopal doctors[d], one of whom was chaplain to the lord keeper. When it is conſidered, that in the Savoy conference, at the beginning of this reign, the two parties could not agree in any one point, and that in the preſent conference an agreement was immediately made, it can hardly be doubted, that the two epiſcopal divines came fully prepared to facilitate the accommodation. However this be, they agreed among them concerning reordination, which was the point they moſt differed about, That all preſbyterian miniſters who had been already ordained, ſhould be admitted into the miniſtry of the church of England with this form of words, "Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and adminiſter the holy ſacraments, in any congregation of England, where thou ſhalt be lawfully appointed thereunto." This was not properly a new ordination, but only a power to exerciſe their miniſtry in the church of England. It was alſo agreed, that ceremonies ſhould be left indifferent, ſo that they might be uſed or not, according as every one ſhould think fit: and that the liturgy ſhould be altered: Moreover, that thoſe who could not be comprehended ſhould be indulged: and for ſecurity to the government, the names of the teachers, and all the members of the congregations ſhould be regiſtered. Agreeably to this ſcheme, the lord chief juſtice Hale undertook to draw up a bill againſt the enſuing parliament, and the lord keeper promiſed to ſupport it with all his power. It is eaſy to perceive, this project, however neceſſary to the king's deſigns, was however directly contrary to the principles of the parliament, who were averſe to all condeſcenſion. Accordingly it came to nothing.

Mean time, whether the ſecret of what paſſed in the conferences was not well kept, or the non-conformiſts, encouraged by the court, aſſumed too much liberty, the archbiſhop of Canterbury reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to break their meaſures. For that purpoſe he writ to all his ſuffragan biſhops a circular letter, requiring them to take a very particular account of them in their dioceſes. When he was provided with the neceſſary informations, he went to the king, and obtained from him a proclamation to enforce the laws againſt conventicles, and particularly the act for reſtraining non-conformiſts from inhabiting in corporations. This proclamation was executed like thoſe againſt the papiſts. For, about two months after, the king cauſed the non-conformiſt miniſters to be told, that he inclined to favour them, and if they would addreſs him for his clemency and the liberty they enjoyed under him, it would be accepted. Whereupon ſuch an addreſs was prepared, and preſented to the king at the earl of Arlington's lodgings, who received it graciouſly, and returned a favourable anſwer[e].

The parliament, according to the prorogation, met the 19th of October. The king in a ſhort ſpeech demanded money for the diſcharge of his debts, and briefly propoſed the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. Then the lord keeper enlarged upon theſe points. But the commons, inſtead of taking the king's ſpeech into conſideration, proceeded upon other affairs. The public accounts were examined[f], with the uſes to which the king had applied the money given him by the parliament, and ſir George Carteret, who had the keeping of ſome of the books being found very blameable, was expelled the houſe. Then they addreſſed the king to thank him for his proclamation againſt conventicles, praying him to continue the ſame care to ſuppreſs them for the future.

But, not contented with this, they appointed a committee to enquire into the behaviour of the non-conformiſts. This committee reported, "That there were divers conventicles and other ſeditious meetings near the parliament, where great numbers of diſaffected perſons frequently met, which was not only an affront to the government, but alſo of imminent danger to both houſes, and the peace of the kingdom." It ſeems, the houſe was aſhamed to ſhew ſo much reſentment againſt the preſbyterians, ſolely on the account of religion, and therefore took great care to intereſt the ſtate, in order to create a belief, that the preſbyterians were guilty of ſedition. For they were always included under the general denomination of non-conformiſts, ſo that it was believed they ought to be reſponſible for the conduct of the other ſects, with whom however they had no communication. Upon the report of the committee, the houſe declared, that they would firmly adhere to the king in the maintenance of the eſtabliſhed government of the church and ſtate, againſt all enemies whatſoever. When it is conſidered, that the ſtate had never enjoyed a more perfect tranquillity than at preſent, it can hardly be queſtioned, that this declaration of the commons was owing to the forementioned project, which, doubtleſs, was come to their knowledge, and of which they were reſolved to prevent the execution, by directly declaring how much they were againſt it.

At laſt the commons voted the king a ſupply of four hundred thouſand pounds. But, before they conſidered of the means to raiſe this ſum, they revived the debate concerning Skinner and the Eaſt India company, and came to ſeveral reſolutions, which the lords looked upon as ſo many violations of their privileges in point of judicature. The difference between the two houſes daily increaſing, the king ſaw, it would be very difficult to reconcile them, and that the commons would not proceed upon the money bill till this affair was adjuſted; and as he had no room to expect an agreement, he prorogued the parliament the 11th of December, to the 14th of February following.

The parliament of Scotland met the ſame day with that of England. But before I ſpeak of the tranſactions of that parliament, it will not be improper, briefly to ſhew the character of the duke of Lauderdale, the king's high commiſſioner. This lord made ſo great a figure in this reign, both in England and Scotland, that his character muſt not be thought foreign to our hiſtory.

John Maitland, earl (afterwards duke) of Lauderdale, was, during the troubles in Scotland, a rigid preſbyterian, a zealous covenanter, and a diſtinguiſhed enemy of the royal authority. But he turned to the king's intereſt in 1647, when duke Hamilton invaded England, for the ſervice of Charles I. From that time, he was looked upon in Scotland as an enemy of his country. But, after the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, and the compoſure of the differences between the Scots, he followed the king into England, was taken at the battle of Worceſter, and confined in ſeveral priſons, till the king's reſtoration. During his impriſonment he had great impreſſions of religion on his mind. But after the king had received him into his favour and council, he ſo entirely wore them out, that ſcarce any trace of them was left. Whether he knew the ſecret ſentiments of the king and duke of York, with regard to religion and the government, or only ſuſpected them, he imagined, the beſt way to preſerve his favour, was to enter into all the king's ſuppoſed views, and endeavour to render him abſolute in both kingdoms. Upon the king's reſtoration, it was debated in council, whether epiſcopacy ſhould be reſtored in Scotland. The earl of Lauderdale ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, for an extraordinary reaſon, namely, "That if the king pleaſed the Scots, he would be ſure of them in order to the executing of any deſign he might afterwards be engaged in." This advice, though it was not followed, was acceptable to the king, and rivetted the duke in his favour. The reſolution to reſtore epiſcopacy having been executed, no man appeared more ardent againſt the preſbyterians, nor had they a more violent perſecutor. I ſhall doubtleſs have occaſion to ſay more of him hereafter, but this ſuffices to give ſome idea of his character.

It was through his means and intrigues that the parliament, held this year in Scotland, paſſed an act which raiſed the king's ſupremacy higher than ever. The ſame parliament approved the raiſing of the militia, and it was enacted, that it ſhould be kept up, and be ready to march into any of the king's dominions, for any cauſe in which his majeſty's authority, power, or greatneſs, ſhould be concerned; and that orders ſhould be tranſmitted to them from the council, without any mention of orders from the king. It was not at firſt known, what could be the intent of an act which ſeemed to take the militia out of the king's hands, and put it into the power of the council. But it was afterwards perceived, that this was Lauderdale's contrivance, that if the king ſhould have occaſion to call in the Scotiſh army, it ſhould not be neceſſary to ſend any orders himſelf, but that the council, upon a ſecret intimation, might do it without order; and then, if the deſign ſhould miſcarry, it ſhould lie on the council, whom the king might diſown, and ſo none about him be liable for it. This ſhews, that projects were then forming to render the king abſolute in England.

This year, the king's mother died in France, the 10th of Auguſt, in the ſixtieth year of her age. The famous duke of Albemarle died likewiſe the 3d of January, and was ſucceeded in his eſtate and honour by Chriſtopher his only ſon. To theſe deaths may be added that of the famous Prynne, the indefatigable author of more than two hundred treatiſes, moſt of them of little eſteem[g].

[1669-70] The parliament meeting the 14th of February, the king told the two houſes, "That when they laſt met, he aſked them a ſupply, and now aſked it again with great inſtance: the uneaſineſs and ſtraitneſs of his affairs could not continue without very ill effects to the whole kingdom. He let them know, that having fully informed himſelf of the expences of the laſt war, he could aſſure them, that no part of the monies they had given him, had been diverted to other uſes. But on the contrary, a very great ſum had been raiſed out of his ſtanding revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted, and all for the war. Laſtly, he recommended to them, not to ſuffer any occaſion of difference between themſelves to be revived."———

The lord keeper then made a ſpeech, which I think neceſſary to inſert at length, to ſhew the king's confidence in this parliament, which had already granted him ſuch large ſums.

My lords, and you knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons,

"AT your laſt meeting, his majeſty did acquaint you with the great occaſions he had for a ſupply, and that he had forborn to aſk it ſooner, more in conſideration of giving ſome time for the eaſe of the people, after the burden of the war, than that the condition of his affairs could ſo long have wanted: and his majeſty hath commanded me now to ſpeak more fully and plainly upon this ſubject. His majeſty hath not only by his miniſters, but in his own royal perſon, examined the accompts, touching the expences of the laſt war, and had thought himſelf concerned to let you know, that all the ſupplies which you gave him for the war, have been by him applied to the war, and no part of them to any other uſes: nay, ſo far from it, that if the preparations towards the war ſhall be taken to be for the uſe of the war, as they muſt be, a great part of his own revenue, to many hundred thouſands of pounds, hath been employed alſo, and ſwallowed up in the charge of the war, and what did neceſſarily relate to it. To which may be added the great debts contracted by his majeſty in the war, and the great charges in the repairs of the hulls of his ſhips, and putting his navy into ſuch a condition as it was before. Beſides, his majeſty thinks it ought to be conſidered, that when the charges of the war were at the higheſt, the inevitable effects of it, and thoſe other calamities, which it pleaſed God at that time to bring upon us, did make ſo great a diminution of his revenues, that, beſides all other accidents and diſadvantages, the loſs that he ſuſtained in three branches of his revenue, in his cuſtoms, exciſe, and hearth-money, by reaſon of the war, the plague, and the fire, did amount to little leſs than to ſix hundred thouſand pounds. Thus you ſee, that though your ſupplies have been great, yet the charges occaſioned by the war, and the calamities which accompanied it, have been greater: and that the debt which is left upon his majeſty, and which he complains of, hath been contracted by the war, and not by the diverſion of the monies deſigned for it.

"His majeſty hath commanded me to ſay one thing more to you upon this ſubject, That he did not enter into the war upon any private inclination or appetite of his own. The firſt ſtep he made towards it, did ariſe from your advice, and the promiſes of your aſſiſtance: but if the charges and accidents of the war have outgone all your ſupplies, and left him under the burden of this debt, he thinks, that as well the juſtice to your promiſe, as the duty and loyalty you have always ſhewed him, will oblige you to relieve him from it: and the rather, when you ſhall ſeriouſly conſider, how uneaſy this burden muſt be to him, and what ill conſequences the continuance under it muſt draw upon all his affairs; in which particular you, and every perſon you repreſent in this nation, will be concerned, as well as himſelf. His majeſty doth therefore command me in his name, to deſire you once more, and to conjure you, by that conſtant duty and loyalty which you have always expreſſed to him, and by all the concernment you have for the ſupport of the honour and ſafety of his government, to provide ſuch a ſupply for him at this time, as may bear proportion to the preſſing occaſions that he hath, and to the ſtate of his affairs at home and abroad; and ſo ſpeedily and ſo effectually, as may anſwer the ends for which he hath deſired it. His majeſty hath further commanded me, to put you in mind of what was at your laſt meeting propoſed to you concerning an union between the two kingdoms, and to let you know, that the parliament of Scotland, hath ſince declared to his majeſty, That ſuch commiſſioners as his majeſty ſhall name, ſhall be authorized on their part, to treat with commiſſioners for this kingdom upon the grounds and conditions of the union. His majeſty therefore thought fit now again to recommend it to you, to take that matter effectually into your conſideration."

It would have been cruel not to be moved with the king's wants, after having ſo gloriouſly maintained a war againſt Holland, for which the parliament had granted him but five millions five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, ſince the peace. Wherefore the commons, as an effectual mark of their affection for the king, and of their reliance on the truth of the keeper's ſpeech, voted the king a ſupply capable to deliver him from his heavy burden. For this purpoſe they prepared two bills, one "to lay a duty upon all wines and vinegar imported into the kingdom, from the 24th of June, 1670, to the 24th of June, 1678;" the other "for the advancing the ſale of his majeſty's fee farm rents, and other rents." The firſt is computed at five hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling; the other, is believed to have raiſed more than double that ſum, ſo that he could depend upon ſeventeen hundred thouſand pounds. Thus the king received for this glorious war with Holland, ſeven millions ſeven hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling, which amounts to eighty two millions five hundred and ſixty thouſand Dutch florins. And yet, there are Engliſh writers who ſeem to triumph, that this war coſt the ſtates forty millions.

The difference between the two houſes being revived this ſeſſion, the king, fearing the conſequences, ſummoned both houſes to Whitehall, and propoſed to them an expedient to end it; namely, by razing all entries and records, votes and reſolutions concerning Skinner's affair, which was agreed to, and ſo the diſpute was at end.

This agreement produced an addreſs, preſented jointly to the king by both houſes the 11th of March, to pray him to give order for the ſuppreſſion of conventicles in and near London and Weſtminſter, and to put the laws in execution againſt popiſh recuſants. The king anſwered, that effectual courſe ſhould be taken in both caſes.

[1670.] The 11th of April, the king came to the houſe of peers and paſſed twelve bills, among which were the two money bills, and a third for the ſuppreſſion of ſeditious conventicles. The ſubſtance of this act was, that, "If any perſon upwards of ſixteen, ſhould be preſent at any aſſembly, conventicle, or meeting, under colour or pretence of any exerciſe of religion, in any other manner, than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, where there were five perſons, or more, beſides thoſe of the houſehold; in ſuch caſes the offenders were to pay five ſhillings for the firſt offence, and ten for the ſecond. And the preachers and teachers in any ſuch meetings, were to forfeit twenty pounds for the firſt, and forty for the ſecond offence. And laſtly, thoſe who ſuffered any ſuch conventicles in their houſes, barns, yards, &c. were likewiſe to forfeit twenty pounds[h]." Moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians, attached to the church of England, endeavour to excuſe the ſeverity of this act, by ſaying, it was made more upon political, than upon religious accounts. But this is always by means of the general name of non-conformiſts, under which the preſbyterians were compriſed, though, ſince the king's reſtoration, they had never been concerned in any inſurrection, or ill deſign againſt the government.

After paſſing theſe acts, the king adjourned the parliament to the 24th of October.

It ſeems, that hitherto the king had reaſon to be pleaſed with a parliament, which, beſides a ſtanding revenue of [g] Let it be remembered of him, that he was a conſiderable inſtrument in the reſtoration, was received into favour, had the records of the Tower committed to him, which he put into good order, and died a member of the preſent parliament, being one of the repreſentatives for the city of Bath.

[h] This act was ſeverely executed in London, and put things in ſuch diſorder, that many of the trading men began to talk of removing with their ſtocks over to Holland. But the king put a ſtop to further ſeverities. Burnet, p. 270.

twelve hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, had granted him ſolely for the war with Holland, above ſeven millions and a half, without reckoning ſo many other extraordinary ſums given him before the war. This parliament, ſuppoſing the king a zealous member of the proteſtant church of England, deſired but two things, which, upon that ſuppoſition he might readily grant. The one was, to come into their views and meaſures for the deſtruction of the preſbyterians; the other to diſable the papiſts from giving any jealouſy to the proteſtants. On the other hand, the parliament might juſtly ſuppoſe, that after having carried the royal prerogative ſo high, the king had reaſon to be pleaſed, and would endeavour to preſerve a happy union with a parliament ſo devoted to him. It is certain, if the king had entirely complied with the parliament in theſe two articles, and confined his prerogative within the extenſive bounds which the parliament ſeemed to preſcribe to it, he might have ſpent his days with more happineſs, tranquillity, and plenty, than any of his predeceſſors. But the parliament's ſuppoſition being falſe, it is not ſurpriſing, that the king would not enter into their views. Inſtead of being zealous for the proteſtant religion, his intention was to overturn it. Inſtead of deſtroying the preſbyterians, his deſign was to grant them an indulgence, in order to have a pretence to procure the ſame for the papiſts. Inſtead of being content with the power aſcribed him by the parliament, he thought it unworthy a king to found the extent of his authority upon acts of parliament only. Beſides, it was a pain to him to be forced to demand money, and to uſe for that purpoſe pretences notoriouſly falſe, though the parliament ſeemed to be ſatisfied with them. It would have been more agreeable to him to ſay, "It is my will and pleaſure," than to be obliged to uſe humble intreaties to the commons. This his favourites were continually repreſenting to him, and to this the example of what he had himſelf ſeen practiſed in neighbouring ſtates ſtrongly prompted him. He was therefore impatient to free himſelf from this yoke of the parliament, and the more, as by augmenting his power, he ſhould be better able to countenance the papiſts, and introduce their religion, which was his own as well as his brother's. But if father Orleans the jeſuit is to be credited, theſe were not the motives which induced the king to take other reſolutions. "It was ſolely the indignation of his miniſters to ſee a republican ſpirit creeping into the parliament, and engaging them in ſo many proceedings againſt the royal authority. Among other things, the triple alliance into which the republican cabal had forced the king, contrary to his inclination, appeared to the miniſters an audacious uſurpation upon the royal prerogative, the conſequences of which were to be prevented. Full of theſe reſentments, they perſuaded the king to render himſelf abſolute, in purſuance of the rights of his crown, and the laws of the kingdom, to confine the parliament within the bounds preſcribed by immemorial cuſtom, and not to ſuffer a mixture of a republic with a monarchy, introduced by violence and encroachments, for fear this mixture ſhould in time produce a monſtrous anarchy, and expoſe England to a horrible confuſion, like that from whence ſhe was ſo lately delivered."

I ſhall make no remark on the little foundation this writer had to aſcribe a republican ſpirit to this parliament, nor on the king's being forced into the triple alliance by the pretended republican cabal, nor laſtly on the maxims he eſtabliſhes with reſpect to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government; becauſe every unbiaſſed reader is, I ſuppoſe, able to ſee clearly the weakneſs of this reaſoning. But, ſince father Orleans ſays himſelf that he was informed by James II. of the particulars of his own and his brother's reign, I believe this hiſtorian's word may be taken, that at the time I am ſpeaking of, Charles had reſolved to render himſelf abſolute. This is a truth which muſt always be remembered, if we deſire to underſtand all the events of this reign.

This reſolution being taken, the king eaſily ſaw, that the execution of it required an artful and cautious conduct, and ſuch ſecret and imperceptible methods, as would not too plainly diſcover his intentions. For he could not ſuppoſe, that becauſe he deſired to be abſolute, the people of England would immediately give up their liberties and privileges. It was therefore neceſſary, to lead them to it inſenſibly and by degrees, and to that end he wanted a ſecret council compoſed of few perſons, in whom he might entirely confide, and whoſe intereſt it was to accompliſh this deſign. The ordinary council conſiſting of twenty-one perſons, was not proper to conduct the affair; for, beſides that ſome counſellors had a right to their places, as for inſtance the archbiſhop of Canterbury, it was very difficult to engage ſo many perſons of the firſt rank in ſuch a plot. To effect therefore the undertaking with the more caution, the king eſtabliſhed a cabinet council of five perſons only, namely,

Clifford,
Arlington,
Buckingham,
Aſhley,
Lauderdale.

As the initial letters of theſe five names compoſe the word CABAL, this ſecret council was from thence called the cabal. But before I proceed to the reſolutions taken by this council, it will be neceſſary to give a brief character of the members.

Sir Thomas Clifford, according to father Orleans, only wanted a ſtage, where ſound reaſon and virtue were more frequent than at this time in England, to appear ſuperior to the others. He was a declared and known papiſt, ſo that he took no pains to diſguiſe his religion. It was he who, after the triple alliance was concluded, ſaid, "notwithſtanding all this noiſe, we muſt yet have another war with Holland." As the event juſtified his prediction, very probably, the ſcheme I have juſt mentioned, was then formed, and he in the ſecret.

Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, paſſed for a man of the leaſt genius of the five, but this was well ſupplied by his great experience, and knowledge in foreign affairs. It is pretended, that being one of the king's retinue in his journey to Fontarabia in the year 1659, he was the principal inſtrument to induce him to change his religion. However that be, he was truly a catholic, though, with the king, he outwardly profeſſed the proteſtant religion[j]. This is now univerſally agreed.

George Villiers duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, had a very lively wit. He might have made a great miniſter of ſtate, had not his ſtrong paſſion for pleaſures, and all ſorts of debaucheries, diverted him from buſineſs. But nothing could tempt him to quit a diſſolute life, to which he had been uſed from his youth. He gloried in having no religion, and was reckoned an atheiſt. Such a favourite was no great honour to the king[k].

Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, created two years after earl of Shaftſbury, was one of the greateſt geniuſes England had produced for many years. This is the teſtimony equally given him by his friends and enemies. Father Orleans gives the following character of him, "He was the moſt capable of the five to manage any important undertaking, and was the ſoul of this I am now ſpeaking of. He had a vaſt genius, was penetrating, bold, and equally ſteady, both on the right and the wrong ſide; a conſtant friend, but an implacable enemy, and the more dangerous, as being void of all religion and conſcience, it was the eaſier for him to plot, becauſe he was not deterred by the number or enormity of any crimes, when he judged them neceſſary to preſerve himſelf, or deſtroy thoſe who had incurred his hatred." I ſhall obſerve here, that this character of the earl of Shaftſbury is not founded upon what he had done before his admiſſion into the cabinet council, but upon what he did afterwards. For, leaving the king's party for that of the people and parliament, the royaliſts aſcribe to his intrigues alone, all the troubles which afterwards happened. Mr. Locke ſpeaks otherwiſe of him. It is true, he ſays nothing advantageous of him in reſpect of religion. But however this be, in allowing the character given by father Orleans, it is eaſy to ſee, what ſort of men the king thought he wanted for the execution of his deſign[l].

[j] In the whole courſe of his miniſtry, he ſeemed to have made it a maxim, That the king ought to ſhew no favour to popery, but that all his affairs would be ſpoiled, if ever he turned that way; which made the papiſts become his mortal enemies.

[k] Burnet ſays farther of him, That he had the art of turning perſons and things into ridicule beyond any man of his age; he poſſeſſed the king when abroad with very ill principles, both as to religion and morality, and with a very mean opinion of his father king Charles I. whoſe ſtrictneſs was with him a frequent ſubject of raillery, p. 52.

[l] Burnet ſays of him, That as to religion he was a deiſt at beſt: he had a wonderful faculty in ſpeaking to a popular aſſembly, and a particular talent to make others truſt to his judgment. He had the art of governing parties, and make himſelf head of them. He was good at oppoſing and running things down, but had not the like force in building up. He had a general knowledge of the ſlighter parts of learning, but underſtood little to the bottom. He pretended Oliver Cromwell offered to make him king. He was indeed of great uſe to him, in withſtanding the enthuſiaſts of that time. His ſtrength lay in the knowledge of England, and of all the conſiderable men in it. He knew the ſize of their underſtandings and their tempers, and how to apply himſelf dexterouſly to them. He often changed ſides, and gloried in doing it at the propereſt ſeaſon. But his reputation was at laſt ſo low, that he died in good time for his family, and party, p. 57. He

The duke of Lauderdale was the moſt proper of the five to ſerve the king in this affair. To deſcribe a lord, who had ſo great a ſhare in the affairs of England and Scotland in this reign, I ſhall inſert here, the characters given of him by father Orleans, Mr. Echard, and Dr. Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury.

The firſt contents himſelf with ſaying, that the duke of Lauderdale, ſecretary of ſtate in Scotland, was a very ſubtle man, and a refined politician.

Mr. Echard ſays of the duke, "The enlarging of the king's power and grandeur in Scotland, was much owing to the management of the preſent commiſſioner Lauderdale, who had formerly been as much for depreſſing, as he was now for exalting the prerogative. From the time of his commiſſion, the Scots are ſaid to calculate the date of all the enſuing inconveniences in this, and the following reign. For having there undertaken to make the king's power abſolute, and arbitrary, he ſtrained the royal prerogative to all kinds of exceſſes; and aſſumed to himſelf a ſort of a lawleſs adminiſtration of affairs, the exerciſe of which was ſuppoſed to be granted to him, upon the large promiſes he had made: and more apprehending other mens officious interfering than diſtruſting his own abilities, he, in time, took care to make himſelf his majeſty's ſole informer, as well as his ſole ſecretary, and by that means, not only upon pretence of the king's prerogative, the affairs of Scotland were diſpoſed of in the court of England, without any notice taken of the king's council in Scotland; but ſtrict obſervation was alſo made of all Scotchmen that came to the Engliſh court; and to attempt an addreſs, and acceſs to his majeſty, otherwiſe than by Lauderdale's mediation, was to hazard his perpetual reſentment. By theſe ways he gradually made himſelf the almoſt only ſignificant perſon of the whole Scotiſh nation; and in Scotland itſelf, procured to himſelf that ſovereign authority, as to name the privy counſellors, to place and remove the lords of the ſeſſion, and exchequer, to grant gifts and penſions, to levy and diſband forces, to appoint general officers, and to tranſact all matters of importance."

This ſhews to a demonſtration, how much the king was delighted with the abſolute power exerciſed in his name in Scotland, and, conſequently, that he would have been glad to enjoy the like power in England.

If I ſhould tranſcribe all that is ſaid of duke Lauderdale, by Dr. Burnet, I ſhould, I fear, be too tedious, and therefore I ſhall content myſelf with ſelecting a paſſage, where he is beſt deſcribed.——"The earl of Lauderdale, made a very ill appearance: he was very big: his tongue was too big for his mouth, which made him bedew all that he talked to: and his whole manner was rough and boiſterous, and very unfit for a court. He was very learned, not only in Latin, in which he was a maſter, but in Greek and Hebrew. He had read a great deal of divinity, and almoſt all the hiſtorians ancient and modern; ſo that he had great materials. He had with theſe an extraordinary memory, and a copious, but unpoliſhed expreſſion. He was a man, as the duke of Buckingham called him to me, of a blundering underſtanding. He was haughty beyond expreſſion, abject to thoſe he ſaw he muſt ſtoop to, but imperious to all others. He had a violence of paſſion, that carried him often to fits like madneſs, in which he had no temper. If he took a thing wrong, it was a vain thing to ſtudy to convince him: that would rather provoke him to ſwear he would never be of another mind: he was to be let alone: and perhaps he would have forgot what he had ſaid, and come about of his own accord. He was the coldeſt friend, and the violenteſt enemy I ever knew: I felt it too much, not to know it. He at firſt ſeemed to deſpiſe wealth; but he delivered himſelf up afterwards to luxury and ſenſuality: and, by that means, he ran into a vaſt expence, and ſtuck at nothing that was neceſſary to ſupport it. In his long impriſonment he had great impreſſions of religion on his mind: but he wore theſe out ſo entirely, that ſcarce any trace of them was left. His great experience in affairs, his ready compliance with every thing that he thought would pleaſe the king, and his bold offering at the moſt deſperate counſels, gained him ſuch an intereſt in the king, that no attempt againſt him, nor complaint of him, could ever ſhake it, till a decay of ſtrength and underſtanding forced him to let go his hold. He was in his principles much againſt popery, and arbitrary government: and yet by a fatal train of paſſions and intereſts, he made way for the former, and had almoſt eſtabliſhed the latter. And whereas ſome, by a ſmooth deportment, made the firſt beginnings of tyranny leſs diſcernable and unacceptable, he, by the fury of his behaviour, heightened the ſeverity of his miniſtry, which was liker the cruelty of an inquiſition, than the legality of juſtice. With all this he was a preſbyterian, and retained his averſion to king Charles I. and his party, to his death."

If to theſe five members of the cabal, are joined, as in reaſon they ought, the king and the duke of York, it will be found that all the ſeven were for an abſolute and arbitrary government; and that, with regard to religion, four were papiſts, namely, the king, the duke, Arlington and Clifford, and three without any religion, or at leaſt they conſidered it only as an engine of ſtate, theſe were Buckingham, Aſhley, and Lauderdale.

It would be difficult to know the tranſactions of the cabal, if father Orleans inſtructed by king James II. had not told us that a war with Holland was there reſolved, in order to furniſh the king with a pretence to keep on foot both land and ſea forces. For it is manifeſt, that ſuch a deſign could be accompliſhed, but by force or fear. The pretence for this war was to be taken from the diſpute about the flag, which might eaſily be renewed, and from the general complaints of the Engliſh merchants concerning their commerce, of which great uſe had been made for undertaking the former war. "But, adds father Orleans, the true reaſon of making this war upon Holland, was the ſecret correſpondence between the republicans of England and the Dutch, who were inceſſantly exciting them to rebellion, and to ſhake off the yoke of monarchy, being ever ready to ſupport thoſe that ſhould attack it." This ſeems to contradict what the ſame author advances a few lines before, namely, that the true ground of the war was to furniſh the king with a pretence for raiſing an army. There is however no contradiction: for it muſt be conſidered, that the deſign of the king and the cabal concerned two points, which went hand in hand, and formed properly but one deſign; namely, to introduce an arbitrary government, and to extirpate the proteſtant religion. As it could not be expected, that the Engliſh would tamely give up their religion and liberty without any reſiſtance, it was natural to begin with depriving them of the only aſſiſtance they could hope for, by attacking the Dutch, and diſabling them to ſuccour England. Thoſe therefore who are called by father Orleans the republicans of England, were the perſons, who, it was ſuppoſed, would oppoſe the king's deſigns, as well epiſcopalians as preſbyterians, and the republicans properly ſo called. It is therefore clear, that the true reaſon of making war upon the ſtates, was as much to put it out of their power to aſſiſt the Engliſh, as to have a pretence for raiſing forces, and that this was but one and the ſame reaſon.

Some time before, Mr. Colbert de Croiſſy, the French embaſſador at London, having ſounded the king and his miniſters, concerning a ſtrict alliance with his maſter, found them very favourably diſpoſed[m], eſpecially when he had told them, that the deſign of the alliance was to humble the pride of the ſtates general. Indeed nothing could more promote their intention, than the concurrence of France to deſtroy the hated and formidable power of the Dutch, who were alone capable of aſſiſting the Engliſh. Some pretend, that the king then ſigned a ſecret treaty with France; but if ſo, this treaty, in all appearance, was only in general terms, which required more particular articles. However this be, the king of France to finiſh this affair ſo happily begun, came to Dunkirk on pretence of viewing the Riſbank which was then raiſing; and bringing with him the ducheſs of Orleans his ſiſter-in-law, ſhe took occaſion from the neighbourhood of England to deſire leave to viſit her brother, which was readily granted, ſince every thing was already concerted. She was met by the king at Dover, where ſhe arrived the 15th of May, and ſtayed above a fortnight amidſt continual pleaſures and diverſions. But theſe diverſions hindered her not from executing the commiſſion ſhe was charged with, which was, as it is pretended, to make a propoſal to her brother in the name of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, of inſuring him an abſolute authority over his parliament, and reſtoring the catholic religion in his three kingdoms, as ſoon as the ſtates ſhould be ſufficiently humbled. Though the conferences between the king and his ſiſter were managed with great ſecrecy, the events with which they were followed, clearly diſcovered that this was the ſubject of them; and abbot Primi and father Orleans poſitively ſay it, except what concerns re-

[m] He found a way to bring them into a favourable diſpoſition, namely, by diſtributing among them a hundred thouſand piſtoles, which were ſent to him for that purpoſe, by his maſter the king of France. See Life of De Witt, tom. II. p. 344.

The

ligion, which popiſh authors and ſome others ſcruple to own, for fear of juſtifying the ſuſpicions afterwards entertained by the parliament, and the meaſures they would have taken to preſerve religion from utter deſtruction [n].

An accident which happened ſhortly after, ſeemed likely to break the good underſtanding between the courts of France and England. The 19th of June, the ducheſs of Orleans in perfect health, called, according to cuſtom, for a glaſs of ſuccory water at four in the afternoon. She had no ſooner drank it, but ſhe found herſelf ill, and her pain increaſing, ſhe died about two in the morning. She was univerſally believed to be poiſoned, but the author of her death is not ſo unanimouſly agreed on, though the duke of Orleans her huſband was by many ſecretly accuſed [o]. The firſt account of her death was brought to the king by ſir Thomas Armſtrong, who told him plainly, what the French thought of this ſudden death, adding, that though he was in the chamber of the deceaſed at ſix the ſame morning, the ſtench of the corps was ſo ſtrong, that he could hardly bear the room. The king could not help falling into tears, and expreſſing himſelf very paſſionately againſt the duke of Orleans, ſaying, "He was a—! but, prithee, Tom, do not ſpeak of it." Preſently after, arrived the marquis of Bellefonds with the news, and to pay the compliment of condolence from the French king. He gave an account of the ducheſs's death, in the moſt proper manner to remove all ſuſpicion.

The king was ſoon comforted for the loſs of his ſiſter, and not thinking that this death, uncommon as it was, ought to break, or even retard, the meaſures taken with the court of France, he ſent the duke of Buckingham to Paris, to conclude and ſign the Dover agreement. The pretence uſed by the duke of Buckingham for his journey, was his deſire to ſee France, and learn the language.

In September, Lewis XIV. made an irruption into Lorrain by his general marſhal de Crequi. The duke, who had not expected to be attacked, was obliged to fly, and leave his duchy a prey to the marſhal, who took poſſeſſion in the name of his maſter. In vain did the duke hope for the interceſſion of Charles to the king of France, in return for the money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer to ſerve him with all his forces. His envoy was anſwered, "That the king was ſorry for what had happened, and that the preſent violence, like the miſchiefs of a ſudden inundation, muſt be endured at this time."

The parliament being to meet the 24th of October, the king, a few days before, publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all officers and ſoldiers ſerving in any of the armies of the late uſurped powers, not having a conſtant habitation, to depart out of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and not to return again or come within twenty miles, till after the 10th day of December next; and in the mean time to carry no ſword, piſtol, or any other arms. This was to ſhew the houſes his care of their preſervation.

The parliament aſſembling, the king after a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, referred all to the lord keeper. Probably, he durſt not with his own mouth declare things ſo oppoſite to his deſigns, and which tended only to inſnare the parliamen. He choſe rather to have this done by the keeper, who not being privy to the ſecrets of the cabal, might ſpeak with more aſſurance, as being perſuaded of what he ſaid. He repreſented therefore in his ſpeech——"That France and the ſtates general are powerfully arming by ſea and land; are building new ſhips, and filling their magazines with all ſorts of warlike proviſions. That, ſince the beginning of the laſt Dutch war, France has ſo increaſed the number of her ſhips, that her ſtrength by ſea is thrice as much as it was before; and ſince the end of it, Holland has been very diligent alſo in augmenting her fleets. That in ſuch a juncture common prudence requires, that his majeſty ſhould make ſome ſuitable preparations: that he has therefore given order, for the fitting out fifty ſail of the greateſt ſhips againſt the ſpring, beſides thoſe which are to be for the ſecurity of the merchants in the Mediterranean, as foreſeeing, if he ſhould not have a conſiderable fleet, temptation might be given to thoſe who ſeem not now to intend it, to give us an affront, if not to do us miſchief. To which may be added, that his majeſty, by the leagues he hath made for the good of his kingdoms, is obliged to have a certain number of forces in caſe of infraction thereof; as alſo for the aſſiſtance of ſome of his neighbours, in caſe of invaſion. And his majeſty would be in a very ill condition to perform his part of the leagues, if, (while the clouds were gathering ſo thick about us) he ſhould, in hopes that the wind would diſperſe them, omit to provide againſt the ſtorm." He then told them, "that his majeſty had made ſeveral leagues, as the triple alliance; another with the ſtates general; another with the duke of Savoy; another with the king of Spain; not to mention the leagues formerly made with Sweden and Portugal, nor thoſe treaties now depending between his majeſty and France, or between him and the ſtates general touching commerce; wherein his majeſty will have a ſingular regard to the honour of this nation, and alſo to the trade of it, which never was greater than now it is." He added, "that his majeſty finds by his accounts from the year 1660 to the late war, the ordinary charge of the fleet communibus annis, came to about five hundred thouſand pounds a year. If that particular alone takes up ſo much, the revenue will in no degree ſuffice to take off the debts due upon intereſt, much leſs give him a fund for ſetting out this fleet, which by common eſtimation cannot coſt leſs than eight hundred thouſand pounds." He then intimated to them, "that his majeſty intended to put an end to this meeting before Chriſtmas, and therefore prayed them to take his majeſty's affairs into their ſpeedy and affectionate conſideration [p]."

The houſe of commons, charmed with all theſe great alliances made for the honour and advantage of the nation, prepared immediately three bills, one to raiſe eight hundred thouſand pounds by way of ſubſidies [q]; another to lay an additional exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors for ſix years; a third for laying impoſitions upon proceedings at law for nine years. Theſe three bills were to produce to the king two millions five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. But, before any bill was finiſhed, the king adjourned the parliament to the latter end of January.

The prince of Orange came to London about the cloſe of the year 1669 [r], to pay a viſit to the king his uncle. The principal motive of his journey, was to demand of the king the re-payment of money lent him by the prince his father in the time of his exile [s]. He was graciouſly received, and after a ſtay of about three months, returned into Holland.

Before his arrival, ſir William Temple was recalled from his embaſſy in Holland [t]. He was not a proper inſtrument to be employed in the deſigns of the cabal. Beſides, the court was diſpoſed to a ſpeedy rupture with the Dutch [u].

The parliament meeting towards the latter end of January after a ſhort receſs, the commons began with preparing a bill which made it death for any man "maliciouſly to diſable or diſmember another, to put out an eye, to cut off a noſe or lip, &c [x]." This was owing to an attempt upon ſir John Coventry, a member of the commons, in the ſtreet, in which his noſe was ſlit. This fact was, by the king's order, committed to the duke of Monmouth his natural ſon, and the duke had employed ſome other perſons, who, after the deed, retired to his houſe [y].

The 14th of February, the king ſent a meſſage to the

She was afterwards created ducheſs of Portſmouth, and is ſaid to be ſtill alive. See Echard, tom. III. p. 254.

[o] The duke, her huſband, heard ſuch things of her behaviour, that it was ſaid, he ordered a great doſe of ſublimate to be given her in a glaſs of ſuccory water, of which ſhe died a few hours after in great torments: and when ſhe was opened, her ſtomach was all ulcerated. Burnet, p. 301.

[u] This year died Henry Jenkins, who deſerves to be remembered on account of his extreme age. He was a poor fiſherman of Yorkſhire, born in 1501, and living in the reigns of eight kings and queens of England, died this year, aged 169 years, exceeding the famous Thomas Parr, who died 1635, full ſeventeen years.

[x] This was afterwards called Coventry's act, from the name of the perſon that was the occaſion of it.

[y] The perſons that committed this fact were, ſir Thomas Sandys, Charles Obrian, eſq. Simon Parry, and Miles Reeves, who all fled from juſtice. Statutes, 22 Car. 2. c. 1. The reaſon of his uſage, it ſeems was this: he was an oppoſer of the money bills, and when paſſed, moved the laying a tax on the play houſes, which were become neſts of proſtitution. This was oppoſed by the court: it was ſaid, the players were the king's ſervants, and a part of his pleaſure. Coventry aſked, whether did the king's pleaſure lie among the men or women players? This was carried with great indignation to court. It was ſaid, this was the firſt time the king was perſonally reflected on: if it was paſſed over, more of the ſame kind would follow. Whereupon, the forementioned perſons were ſent to watch for ſir John, and leave a mark upon him. He defended himſelf ſo well, that he got more credit by it than houſe of commons, to haſten the money bills. But the houſe thought proper, before theſe bills were preſented to the king, to addreſs him concerning the growth of popery, for which the concurrence of the lords was obtained. As this addreſs may ſerve to illuſtrate the hiſtory of this reign, it is not unneceſſary to inſert it entire.

May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty,

" WE your majeſty's moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the lords and commons in this preſent parliament, being ſenſible of your majeſty's conſtancy to the proteſtant religion, both at home and abroad, hold ourſelves bound in conſcience and duty, to repreſent to your majeſty the cauſes of the dangerous growth of popery in your majeſty's dominions, the ill conſequence whereof we heartily deſire may be prevented. And therefore what we humbly conceive to be ſome preſent remedies for the ſaid growing evils, we have hereunto added in our moſt humble petitions.

Cauſes of the growth of popery.

" THAT there are great numbers of prieſts and jeſuits frequenting the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and moſt of the counties of this kingdom, more than formerly, ſeducing your majeſty's good ſubjects.

" 2. That there are ſeveral chapels, and places uſed for ſaying of maſs, in the great towns, and many other parts of the kingdom, beſides thoſe in embaſſadors houſes, whither great numbers of your majeſty's ſubjects conſtantly reſort and repair without controul; aud eſpecially in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, contrary to the laws eſtabliſhed.

" 3. That there are fraternities or convents of Engliſh popiſh prieſts and jeſuits at St. James's, and at the Combe in Herefordſhire, and other parts of the kingdom; beſides, ſeveral ſchools are kept in divers parts of the kingdom for the corrupt educating of youth in the principles of popery.

" 4. The common and public ſelling of popiſh catechiſms, and other ſeditious books, even in the time of parliament.

" 5. The general remiſſneſs of the magiſtrates and other officers, clerks of the aſſize, and clerks of the peace, in not convicting of papiſts according to law.

" 6. That ſuſpected recuſants are free from all offices chargeable and troubleſome, and do enjoy the advantage of offices and places beneficial; executed either by themſelves, or perſons entruſted for them.

" 7. That the advowſance of churches, and preſentations to livings are diſpoſed of by popiſh recuſants, or by others entruſted by them as they direct; whereby moſt of thoſe livings and benefices are filled with ſcandalous and unfit miniſters.

" 8. That many perſons take the liberty to ſend their children beyond the ſeas, to be educated in the popiſh religion; and that ſeveral young perſons are ſent beyond the ſeas, upon the notion of their better education, under tutors and guardians, who are not put to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and uſually corrupt the youth under their tuition into popery.

" 9. That there have been few exchequer proceſſes iſſued forth ſince the act of parliament againſt popiſh recuſants convict, though many have been certified thither.

" 10. The great inſolences of papiſts in Ireland (where do publickly appear archbiſhops and biſhops reputed to be made ſo by the pope, in oppoſition to thoſe made under his majeſty's authority, according to the religion eſtabliſhed in England and Ireland) and the open exerciſe of maſs in Dublin, and other parts of that kingdom, is further a great cauſe of the preſent growth of popery. That Peter Talbot, the reputed archbiſhop of Dublin, was publicly conſecrated ſo at Antwerp with great ſolemnity; from whence he came to London, where he exerciſed his function; and was all along, in his journey to Cheſter, treated with the character of his grace by the popiſh recuſants whom he viſited; and at his landing at Dublin, was received with great ſolemnity by thoſe of the popiſh religion there, where alſo he exerciſed his function publicly, great multitudes then flocking to him, and ſtill continues to do the ſame. His preſent reſidence is within three miles of Dublin, at his brother's colonel Richard Talbot, who is now here ſoliciting your majeſty as public agent on the behalf of the Iriſh papiſts of that kingdom."

Remedies againſt theſe growing miſchiefs.

" We the lords and commons aſſembled in this preſent parliament, do in all humility repreſent to your ſacred majeſty in theſe our petitions following;

" 1. THAT your majeſty by your proclamation would be moſt graciouſly pleaſed to command, that all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits do depart this realm, and all other your majeſty's dominions, on or before a ſhort day to be prefixed, at their perils; except only ſuch foreign prieſts as attend her majeſty's perſon by the contract of marriage, and embaſſadors according to the law of nations: and that all judges, &c. do cauſe the laws now in force againſt popiſh recuſants convict, to be put in due execution: and in the firſt place, for the ſpeedy convicting ſuch popiſh recuſants, that all judges and juſtices aforeſaid do ſtrictly give the ſaid laws in charge unto the juries at all aſſizes and ſeſſions, under the penalty of incurring your majeſty's higheſt diſpleaſure.

" 2. That your majeſty would be pleaſed to reſtrain and hinder the great concourſe of your native ſubjects from hearing of maſs, and other exerciſes of the Romiſh religion, in the houſes of foreign embaſſadors or agents, and in all other chapels and places of this kingdom.

" 3. That your majeſty would be pleaſed to take care, and cauſe, that no office or employment of public authority, truſt or command in civil or military affairs, be committed to, or continued in the hands of any perſon being a popiſh recuſant, or juſtly reputed ſo to be.

" 4. That your majeſty would be pleaſed to take notice of all fraternities or convents of Engliſh, and other popiſh prieſts, jeſuits or friars, and ſchools for the educating of youth in the principles of popery, erected within your majeſty's dominions, and to cauſe the ſame to be aboliſhed, and the ſaid prieſts, jeſuits, friars, and ſchool-maſters to be duly puniſhed for ſuch their inſolences.

" 5. That your majeſty would be pleaſed, from time to time, to require and cauſe, that all the officers of, or relating to the exchequer, iſſue forth proceſſes effectually againſt popiſh recuſants convict certified thither. And that ſuch officers as ſhall refuſe or neglect to do their duty as aforeſaid, be ſeverely puniſhed for ſuch their failures.

" 6. That your majeſty would be pleaſed to give order, for apprehending and bringing over into England, one Plunket, who goes under the name of primate of Ireland, and one Peter Talbot, who takes on him the name of archbiſhop of Dublin, to anſwer ſuch matters as ſhall be objected againſt them."

The king replied to this addreſs, that he would do what was deſired, but ſuppoſed, no perſon would wonder, if he made a difference between thoſe papiſts, that had newly changed their religion, and thoſe that were bred up in it, and had faithfully ſerved him and his father in the late wars. A few days after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, which ran much in the ſame ſtile with thoſe that had been iſſued on this occaſion, and was no better obſerved. From the beginning of the reign of James I. to the end of that of Charles II. the ſame method was conſtantly practiſed. Upon the inſtances of the parliament to prevent the growth of popery, theſe three kings had never ſcrupled to grant whatever was deſired, and in conſequence to publiſh proclamations; but there was a wide difference between the publication and the execution.

I ſhall obſerve here, that in the beginning of the civil wars, Charles I. poſitively denied he had any papiſts in his ſervice. But Charles II. his ſon, in his forementioned anſwer, not only publicly owns it, but ſays alſo, that in conſideration of the great ſervices of the papiſts to his father and himſelf in the civil wars, he is obliged to give them marks of his favour.

This affair being ended, the commons proceeded upon the three money bills, and as if theſe had not been ſufficient to ſupply the king's extreme wants, they afterwards added a fourth, for impoſitions on foreign commodities. Theſe bills being ſent up to the lords, were debated in their houſe. On the ſecond reading of the ſubſidy bill, the lord Lucas roſe up, and in preſence of the king, who was then in the houſe (where he frequently came without any formality) made a ſpeech, which was very diſagreeable to his majeſty.

than by all the actions of his life. His noſe was ſo nicely needled up, that the ſcar was hardly to be diſcovered. The commons put a clauſe in the bill, that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon the perſons concerned. Burnet, p. 269.

I do not think it neceſſary to inſert the whole ſpeech, but however, ſhall relate ſome paſſages, which will ſhew what many thought, though few had the boldneſs of the lord Lucas to ſpeak it publicly.

He firſt complained, "That whereas, upon the king's reſtoration, it was the hopes of all good men, that the nation would be freed from the burthens they had been ſo long oppreſſed with, theſe burthens were heavier than ever, whilſt their ſtrength was diminiſhed, and they were leſs able to ſupport them.———that if the vaſt ſums given were all employed for the king and kingdom, it would not ſo much trouble them: but they could not, without infinite regret of heart, ſee ſo great a part of the money pounded up in the purſes of a few private men, who, in the time of his majeſty's moſt happy reſtoration, were worth very little or nothing, but were now purchaſing lands, and kept their coaches and ſix horſes, their pages, and their lacqueys; while in the mean time, thoſe that had faithfully ſerved the king, were expoſed to penury and want, and had ſcarce ſufficient left to buy them bread.—But, ſuppoſing all the money given was employed for the uſe of his majeſty, and he was not cozened, as without doubt he is, are there no bounds to, no moderation in, giving? Will it be ſaid, that his majeſty will not be able to maintain the triple alliance, without a plentiful ſupply, and we ſhall thereby run the hazard of being conquered: this may be a reaſon for giving ſomething, but it is ſo far from being an argument for giving ſo much, that it may be clearly made out, that it is the direct and ready way to be conquered by a foreigner. And it may be the policy of the French king, by his often alarms of armies and fleets, to induce us to conſume our treaſure in vain preparations againſt him; and after he has by this means made us poor and weak enough, he may then come upon, and deſtroy us. It is not the giving a great deal, but the well managing the money given, that muſt keep us ſafe from our enemies.———Beſides, what is this but ne moriare mori, to die for fear of dying, and for fear of being conquered by a foreigner, to put ourſelves in a condition almoſt as bad? Nay, in ſome reſpect, a great deal worſe; for when we are under the power of the victor, we know we can fall no lower, and the certainties of our miſeries are ſome ſort of diminution of them: but in this wild way, we have no certainty at all; for if you give thus much to day, you may give as much more to morrow, and never leave giving, till we have given all that ever we have away.—It is therefore neceſſary to be able to make ſome eſtimate of ourſelves: would his majeſty be pleaſed to have a quarter of our eſtates? For my part he ſhall have it: would he be pleaſed to have half? For my part, upon good occaſions he ſhall have it. But then let us have ſome aſſurances of the quiet enjoyment of the remainder, and know what we have to truſt to.—The commons have here ſent up a bill for the giving his majeſty the twentieth part of our eſtates, and I hear there are other bills alſo preparing, which together will amount to little leſs than three millions of money, a prodigious ſum! And ſuch, that if your lordſhips afford no relief, we muſt ſink under the weight of it. I hope, therefore, your lordſhips will ſet ſome bounds to the over-liberal humour of the commons. If you cannot deny or moderate a bill for money, all your great eſtates are wholly at their diſpoſal, and you have nothing that you can properly call your own.—Upon the whole matter, I moſt humbly propoſe, that you would be pleaſed to reduce the twelve pence in the pound, to eight pence."—

This ſpeech, afterwards printed and publiſhed, was ſo offenſive to the king and his miniſters, that it was ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. But however, it made ſome impreſſion upon the lords, who ſent the bill to the commons with amendments, that is, with ſome alterations[z]. This occaſioned a diſpute between the two houſes, the commons refuſing to receive the amendments. But in a conference the difference was ended, by the acquieſcence of the lords, to the reaſons of the commons. The two firſt money bills, namely, the ſubſidy bill, and the additional tax upon beer, and other liquors, being ready, the king came to the houſe of lords the 6th of March, and paſſed theſe two acts, with another, "for reveſting the power of granting wine licences in his majeſty's heirs and ſucceſſors, and for ſettling a revenue on his royal highneſs in lieu thereof," which amounted to twenty-four thouſand pounds a year[a].

There ſtill remained two other money bills, which had been ſent to the lords, one for "impoſitions on proceedings at law," and another for "an additional impoſition upon ſeveral foreign commodities." The firſt bill paſſed the houſe of lords without any difficulty. But the ſecond occaſioned a violent conteſt between the two houſes. The London merchants having preſented a petition to the lords, in which they ſhewed the diſproportion of the rates impoſed upon certain commodities, to be ſuch as would utterly ruin the whole trade of theſe commodities, and bring an irreparable prejudice upon all the Engliſh plantations, and conſequently upon the kingdom; thereupon the lords judged it neceſſary to make alterations in the bill, and lower ſome of the rates, and then returned the bill to the commons. The commons maintained, the lords had no right to make any amendments in bills of impoſitions and rates, and could only receive or reject them as they were ſent, and the lords aſſerted the contrary. This diſpute produced ſeveral conferences, in which the two houſes mutually communicated their reaſons, anſwers, and replies. It would be too long to enter into the diſcuſſion of this difference, which, beſides, would hardly be intelligible to thoſe who have not a thorough knowledge of the conſtitution of Engliſh parliaments. I ſhall only relate one circumſtance, which may be underſtood by all, and wherein conſiſted the eſſential part of the diſpute. The commons maintained, that by a fundamental right, it belonged to their houſe (in excluſion of the lords) to impoſe rates upon merchandiſe. They meant by this fundamental right, a conſtant uſage or cuſtom, according to the principles of the parliament, in the time of Charles I. The lords, after the example of Charles I. demanded of the commons where was the charter or contract to be found, by which the lords diveſted themſelves of this right, and appropriated it to the commons with an excluſion to themſelves? To this the commons replied by another queſtion, where was the record by which the commons ſubmitted, that this judicature ſhould be appropriated to the lords in excluſion of themſelves? Wherever their lordſhips ſhould find the laſt record, they would ſhew the firſt endorſed upon the back of the ſame roll. In ſhort, the king perceiving the conteſt daily increaſed, came to the houſe of peers, and after the royal aſſent given to an act for impoſitions on proceedings at law, and ſome others, he prorogued the parliament to the 16th of April, 1672, and afterwards by ſeveral prorogations to the 4th of February 1672-3. So that this prorogation continued a year and nine months.

Probably, every reader will be ſurpriſed at the extreme liberality of the commons to the king, and eſpecially in this ſeſſion. As to the former ſupplies, it may be ſaid, they had ſome foundation true or falſe. But for the preſent ſupply, which was greater than any before, it was founded upon a contingency which had not even the leaſt appearance. For it was upon a ſuppoſition, that France and the ſtates general, who were making great preparations, might invade England, if they found her unarmed, though ſhe was in peace with France, and in ſtrict alliance with Holland. Beſides, the ſtates had hitherto made no extraordinary preparations, becauſe they did not yet ſuſpect, they ſhould be attacked. And as to France, the king knew, he had nothing to fear from that quarter. Nevertheleſs, upon the king's bare propoſition, ſupported by no probability, a ſum of two millions and a half was granted him, which ſome even compute at three millions. Nothing is more proper to render probable what is aſſerted by many authors, that ſcarce a member, however inconſiderable, was without a penſion from the king according to his credit in the houſe, and that theſe penſions were increaſed in proportion to the ſums granted to the king. Thus much is certain, that afterwards upon an enquiry, ſome were found guilty of this colluſion.

[1671.] Before I proceed, it muſt not be forgot to ſpeak of the death of Anne Hyde ducheſs of York, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, the late chancellor. She died the 31ſt of March in the 34th year of her age, after an abjuration of the proteſtant religion during her long indiſpoſition[b]. From her marriage proceeded eight children, two of which only ſur-vived her, Mary and Anne, who were both queens of England. The reſt all died young [c].

The duke of York was a papiſt before the king's reſtoration, but I can't find at what time he changed his religion. It was a ſecret for ſome time, but had now been ſo divulged, that it was openly talked of in the court and country. At laſt, ſoon after the death of his ducheſs he made a formal abjuration of the proteſtant religion before father Simons, an Engliſh jeſuit, and from that time openly declared himſelf a papiſt. His inducement, as it is ſaid, to make public profeſſion of his religion, was this: The king had, for ſome years, even before Clarendon's diſgrace, entertained a ſecret deſign of divorcing his queen, whom he had never loved. He had communicated this deſign to ſome of his confidents, but it was always oppoſed by the earl of Clarendon, whether from the injuſtice of the thing, or for the ſake of his daughter the ducheſs of York, and her poſterity. After the removal of that miniſter, the king finding himſelf more free, perſiſted in his deſign, which, as it is affirmed, was encouraged by the papiſts, and approved by the court of Rome. One pretence for the divorce, was, that the queen had been pre-engaged to another, who however was not named. It was alſo pretended, ſhe was incapable of having children, though ſhe had twice miſcarried. But as theſe facts are very difficult to be proved, the king was aſſiſted to find a more plauſible pretence; which was to lay ſnares to betray the queen into ſuch freedoms, as might be the ground of an accuſation of adultery. But the king could not reſolve to uſe a method ſo unjuſt and diſhonourable [d]. Nevertheleſs the divorce was reſolved, and as a pretence only was wanting, an effectual one would certainly have been found. The prieſts and jeſuits who were continually about the duke of York, had long preſſed him to make open profeſſion of the Roman catholic religion, but had not yet been able to ſucceed, becauſe the duke ſaw, it would make him forfeit the affection of moſt of the Engliſh. At laſt, upon the duke of York's refuſal they ſtrenuouſly laboured the affair of the divorce, and cauſed, as it is ſaid, the pope to promiſe his conſent. When the buſineſs was thus far advanced, they intimated to the duke of York, that they were able either to effect or hinder the king's divorce, and would undertake the latter, if he would make open profeſſion of the catholic religion. This, as it is pretended, engaged him to declare himſelf a papiſt, being apprehenſive, that if the king ſhould be divorced from his queen, he would marry again, and have ligitimate children. I relate theſe particulars as I found them in the hiſtories and memoirs of thoſe times, but I muſt warn the reader, that the authors of them alledge no other proof than their own teſtimony [e].

After the prorogation of the parliament, the cabal ſought, with all poſſible ardour, means to execute their projects. Theſe were, firſt, to render the king abſolute, or in their language, a great prince: and under this article was compriſed, the eſtabliſhment of popery, if not the entire deſtruction of the proteſtant religion. For there is no viſible medium between theſe two things. I have already given the reaſon why the article of religion is omitted by the king's adherents. The ſecond project was to break the triple alliance. The third, to make war upon Holland, though it was difficult to invent any the leaſt plauſible pretence. To execute the two laſt, Mr. Henry Coventry, who had been plenipotentiary at the treaty of Breda, was ſent to Sweden, and ſir George Downing to the Hague. Temple, as I have ſaid, was recalled; but to amuſe the ſtates, the king feigned to ſend for Temple only to be informed of ſome matters, and that he ſhould immediately return. He was however ſtill in London, and though the king had no deſign to ſend him back to Holland, yet to take away all ſuſpicion from the Dutch of his intention to break with them, he had hitherto refuſed his permiſſion to ſir William to ſend for his wife and family. At laſt, he was openly recalled, and obtained leave for his wife and children to come over, who were ſtill at the Hague. The recalling of Temple, and ſending of Downing in his place, ſufficiently diſcovered the king's intentions [f]. Temple was extremely beloved in Holland, as he had always behaved with integrity and a concern for the common intereſts of both nations. The other had ſerved for inſtrument to engage the king and the ſtates in the late war, and was looked upon in Holland as a man of no honour, and a real incendiary. So that when the ſtates heard, he was coming in the room of Temple, they no longer doubted of a rupture with England. Mean while Downing being arrived at the Hague, was not wanting in proteſtations, that the king his maſter was reſolved to maintain the triple alliance, and if he was equipping a fleet, it was wholly owing to the great preparations of his neighbours, and particularly the king of France, of whom he had juſt cauſe to be jealous. But withal, he failed not to complain of the obſtinacy of the Dutch, upon an affair of little importance, concerning the colony of Surinam: adding ſome complaints of the Engliſh merchants againſt the Dutch Eaſt India company. Theſe were the two articles on which the king intended to found a rupture; but as he did not think them of ſufficient weight, he projected to draw the ſtates into a ſort of inſult upon him, which might give him a more plauſible pretence for a war.

To this end, the king having granted ſir William Temple a yacht to bring over his lady, the admiralty gave expreſs orders to the captain to go in queſt of the Dutch fleet, then at ſea, and, if they refuſed to ſtrike, to fire upon them. The captain met with them as he was returning with the embaſſadreſs and her children. When he ſaw, the fleet paid no regard to the king's yacht, he fired ſeveral ſhots at them. Mr. de Ghent, who commanded the fleet, ſurpriſed at this inſult, ſent a boat to the yacht to know the meaning of it. The captain only anſwered, he had his inſtructions, and was bound to follow them. Upon this Mr. de Ghent went to the yacht on pretence of paying a compliment to the embaſſadreſs, which being performed, he talked with the captain, and was anſwered as before. The admiral replyed, he had no orders from his maſters in that point, and did not know how the affair was agreed between his majeſty and the ſtates; but though it were ſettled, the captain could not pretend the fleet ſhould ſtrike to a yacht, which was but a pleaſure boat, and could not paſs for a man of war. The captain ſtill perſiſted in ſaying, he only followed his orders. However, the fleet did not fire a ſingle ſhot at the yacht, and the captain purſued his courſe, pleaſed that he had come off ſo well.

Beſides the two millions and a half granted to the king by the parliament, the king of France, if abbot Primi is to be credited, ſent him alſo a very conſiderable ſum to enable him to equip a fleet much ſuperior to that of the ſtates [g]. So the king thought only of war, though with all poſſible artifice he endeavoured to remove all ſuſpicion of his having any ſuch deſign. He ſpent the whole ſummer, and part of the autumn in progreſs through ſeveral parts of his kingdom. The 28th of May he celebrated the feaſt of St. George in a very ſolemn manner at Windſor, and inſtalled in the order of the garter, the king of Sweden and the elector of Saxony, by their proxies, and after them the young duke of Albemarle. He alſo made a viſit to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was magnificently entertained, and to ſeveral other places, which it is needleſs to mention. After his return, both their majeſties were invited to the lord mayor's feaſt, on the 30th of October, where no coſt was ſpared to diſplay the grandeur and riches of the city of London.

Before I proceed to the tranſactions of the next year, I think myſelf obliged to take notice of an attempt, the moſt extraordinary that can poſſibly be deviſed by a private man. I mean that of Blood, a famous villain, robber, and aſſaſſin, who formed the deſign of ſtealing the crown, ſcepter, and globe, which are kept in the Tower. With the aſſiſtance only of two or three more, he executed this deſign ſo dexterouſly and happily, that they were got out of the Tower with their booty, before they were ſeized. To give ſome account of Blood, I ſhall briefly ſay here, that the duke of Ormond, when he was lord lieutenant of Ireland, having [e] Burnet ſays, the duke of Buckingham offered, that if the king would give him leave, he would ſteal the queen away, and ſend her to a plantation, where ſhe ſhould be well looked after. But the king himſelf rejected this propoſal with horror. He ſaid, it was a wicked thing to make a poor lady miſerable, only becauſe ſhe was his wife, and had no children by him which was no fault of hers, p. 262, 263.

[f] Mr. de Witt told ſir William's ſecretary, That he ſhould take ſir William's ſtay or coming back for certain ſigns of what the king's intentions were, towards the preſerving or changing the meaſures he had taken with the ſtates. Temple's lett. p. 248.

cauſed ſome of Blood's accomplices to be hanged, who intended to ſurpriſe the caſtle of Dublin, Blood ſwore, he would revenge their deaths. For this purpoſe, Blood followed the duke of Ormond into England, when he was recalled, and watched him ſo well, that with the aſſiſtance of ſeven or eight perſons on horſeback, he ſtopped his coach in the night, as he was going to Clarendon-houſe, where he lived, knocked down his footmen [h], and forced the duke up behind one of the horſemen, in order to carry him to Tyburn, and hang him there, with a paper pinned on his breaſt, to ſhew the cauſe of this execution. But the duke forcibly throwing himſelf off the horſe, with the villain who had tied the duke faſt to him, defeated the deſign, and the authors could never be diſcovered till after Blood's attempt upon the crown. This attempt was very extraordinary, but the king's conduct on the occaſion was ſtill more ſurpriſing. For having a curioſity to examine Blood himſelf, he ordered him to be brought to Whitehall, and put ſeveral queſtions to him, which the villain anſwered with aſtoniſhing boldneſs, confeſſing all, and unconcernedly relating the circumſtances of the thing. Then the king aſked him, whether he knew the authors of the attempt upon the duke of Ormond? Blood confeſſed, it was himſelf. Not content with this, he told the king, he had been engaged in a deſign to kill him with a carbine, from out the reeds by the Thames ſide above Batterſea, where he often went to ſwim. But that when he had taken his ſtand in the reeds for that purpoſe, his heart was checked with an awe of majeſty, and did not only relent himſelf, but diverted his aſſociates from the deſign. He alſo told the king, he was prepared to ſuffer death, as having deſerved it; but muſt tell his majeſty, that he had hundreds of accomplices, who had bound themſelves by a horrible oath, to revenge the death of any of the fraternity, upon thoſe who ſhould bring them to juſtice; which would expoſe his majeſty and all his miniſters, to the daily fear and expectation of a maſſacre. But, on the contrary, if he ſpared the lives of a few perſons, his own would be ſecure. The king was ſurpriſed, and probably, intimidated by Blood's diſcourſe, and thought, doubtleſs, the attempt of this villain on the duke of Ormond, to revenge the death of his accomplices, might be imitated, in revenge of his death, by his ſurviving comrades. However this be, the king ſent the earl of Arlington to the duke of Ormond, to deſire him not to proſecute Blood, which the duke could not refuſe [i]. Afterwards, he gave him his pardon, and not content with ſaving his life, conferred on him five hundred pounds a year in land in Ireland. From that time, Blood was continually at court, and the king treated him with that freedom and familiarity, that many perſons applied to him for favours from the king. This gave occaſion to the king's enemies to ſay, that he kept the villain about him, to intimidate thoſe who ſhould dare to offend him in things which were not puniſhable by law, as had been practiſed in the caſe of ſir John Coventry, for ſome railleries upon him in the houſe of commons. As for Edwards, the keeper of the crown, a man fourſcore years old, who had done his utmoſt, though in vain, to hinder the theft, and had received ſo many wounds that he was left for dead, the king contented himſelf with aſſigning him a reward of two hundred pounds, the payment of which was ſo long delayed, that the poor man died before he received it [k].

In the courſe of this year died two famous generals, diſtinguiſhed by their bravery and experience in the civil wars. The firſt was the lord Fairfax, the generaliſſimo, and the other Edward Montague earl of Mancheſter. I ſhall ſay no more of them, becauſe they have been ſufficiently deſcribed in the reign of Charles I. I ſhall only add, that both were very ſerviceable in the king's reſtoration [l].

The league againſt Holland, much like that of Cambray againſt the common-wealth of Venice, was ſtill kept ſo ſecret, that the ſtates could only ſuſpect it, without any certainty. The deſign of the allies was to begin with the ruin of the Dutch, before declaration of war, and then to attack them all together, at the ſame time and in different places. The king of France, the elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Munſter, were to invade them by land, and the Engliſh and French fleets jointly to attack them by ſea. This was the project, but it met with an unforeſeen difficulty. Though Charles had received two millions five hundred thouſand pounds from the parliament, and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds from the king of France, he was ſtill in want. Indeed, he had applied part of the money received to the equipment of his fleet, which could not amount to half, and it was difficult to conceive what became of the reſt. However this be, he ſignified to his miniſters, that he could not begin the war without fifteen hundred thouſand pounds, and as he could not apply to the parliament, which was prorogued, he promiſed the treaſurer's ſtaff, to the perſon who ſhould invent the means of raiſing that ſum. Sir Thomas Clifford proved the moſt happy and ingenious. He went to the king, and told him, that by ſhutting up the exchequer he would be ſure of that ſum. The king readily underſtood the advice, and reſolving to follow it, performed his promiſe, and made Clifford lord treaſurer. Some however aſcribe this project to the lord Shaftſbury, and ſay, that Clifford having artfully drawn it from him, gloried in it to the king [l].

To underſtand this project (which though plain to Engliſh readers, is not ſo to foreigners) it is to be obſerved, that at the exchequer are received, by direction from the lord treaſurer, all the ſums deſtined to public uſes, and the intereſts of the money borrowed upon parliamentary funds, which commonly cannot be raiſed under ſeveral months, or even years. So, when the king has a mind to have all at once the money that has been granted him, he borrows it of private perſons at a large intereſt, and aſſigns them payment upon the exchequer, which applies to this uſe the money, raiſed from the granted funds, as it comes in. Moreover, at the time I am ſpeaking of, all the monied men in London, not to keep large ſums in their houſes, put their money into the hands of bankers and goldſmiths, without intereſt. And when they wanted any part, they drew upon their goldſmiths or bankers, who immediately paid it. Now, as it was morally impoſſible, that all the private perſons who had money at a banker's, ſhould want it all at once, thoſe who had the money in their hands kept only a ſum ſufficient to anſwer the uſual demands, and lent the reſt to the king at a large intereſt, upon the parliamentary funds. So, in ſhutting up the exchequer, he received all the money which came into it [n], without paying any thing of what he owed. But at the ſame time, the perſons who had put their money into the hands of the bankers and goldſmiths, were entirely [k] Edwards had a grant of two hundred pounds for himſelf, and one hundred for his ſon. Both, by the delays of payment, were obliged to ſell their orders for half the money, and the old man lived not long to enjoy the remainder. The manner of Blood's ſtealing the crown was thus; he goes to the Tower in a clergyman's habit, with a woman whom he called his wife, and who, he pretended, wanted to ſee the crown; and having ſeen it, ſhe feigned to be taken with a qualm, and deſired Mr. Edwards, the keeper of the crown to ſend for ſome ſpirits, who immediately cauſed his wife to fetch ſome, of which ſhe drank, and being invited to repoſe herſelf on a bed, ſhe did ſo, and ſoon recovered. At their departure, they were very thankful for this civility. Three days after Blood comes with a preſent of gloves from his wife, and having thus begun an acquaintance, he improves it by frequent viſits. At laſt he tells Mr. Edwards that he had a mind to make a match between a nephew of his, and Mr. Edwards's daughter, which nephew, he ſaid, had three hundred pounds a year. Accordingly, a day was appointed for the young couple to ſee one another. Blood comes with three more, armed with rapier blades in their canes, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket piſtols. One of the fellows ſtays at the door, and the others go in. Blood told Mr. Edwards, he would not go up ſtairs till his wife came down, and deſired him, in the mean time, to ſhew his friends the crown, to paſs away the time. As ſoon as they were in the room, and the door ſhut as uſual, they immediately gagged the old man, and knocked him down for endeavouring to make a noiſe. One of the companions put the globe in his breeches, Blood kept the crown under his gown, and a third was filing the ſceptre (being too long to manage) when their companion without gave them notice, that young Mr. Edwards was juſt come home, and gone up ſtairs; upon which they all made off with the crown and globe. But old Edwards getting up and making a noiſe, they were purſued and taken, as they were making to their horſes, which waited at the Iron Gate in St. Catherine's. Blood, though he ſaw himſelf a priſoner, had the impudence to ſtruggle for the crown. Strype's Contin. of Stow's Survey, tom. I. p. 92. Echard.

[l] This year alſo died William Seymour duke of Somerſet; and the famous critic, Meric Caſaubon, prebend of Canterbury.

[m] The ſubſtance of the ſtory, as it is told by Mr. Echard, from a manuſcript of ſir Joſeph Tyley's, is this:—The king, under preſent neceſſities, promiſed the white ſtaff to any one of his miniſters, who could put him in a way to raiſe fifteen hundred thouſand pounds, without applying to his parliament. The next day lord Aſhley told ſir Thomas Clifford, that there was a way to do this; but that it was dangerous, and might in its conſequences inflame both parliament and people. Sir Thomas, impatient to know the ſecret, plied the lord Aſhley with viſits, and having drunk him to a proper height, led him inſenſibly to the ſubject of the king's indigence; lord Aſhley, warm and unguarded, dropt the important ſecret of ſhutting up the exchequer. Sir Thomas took the hint, left Aſhley as ſoon as he could, went the next night to Whitehall, and attending till the king rose, demanded the white ſtaff. The king renewed his promiſe, if the money could be found, and then ſir Thomas diſcloſed the ſecret. The project was put in execution, and Clifford advanced to be treaſurer, and created a peer. Aſhley was touched, and ſaid, That Clifford had ploughed with his heifer. However, to ſatisfy him, he was firſt made earl of Shaftſbury, and ſoon after lord chancellor of England. Tom. III. p. 288.

[n] The bankers, who had formerly furniſhed the king with large ſums of money, at the extorſive intereſt of eight per cent. had lodged in the exchequer between thirteen and fourteen hundred thouſand pounds. R. Coke, p. 168. Burnet, p. 306.

ruined, ſince it was not in their power to diſpoſe of their capital; eſpecially, as the bankers refuſed even to pay the notes drawn daily upon them, on pretence, that they received nothing from the exchequer. This cauſed an extreme conſternation in London, but the king and his miniſters purſued their meaſures, and, deaf to the complaints of ſo many ruined families, kept the exchequer ſhut up one year; and, at the expiration of that term, it continued ſhut up by a new order, ſome months longer. But the whole misfortune did not conſiſt in twelve or eighteen months expectation. It is eaſy to imagine, the king having received all the money which came into the exchequer during that time, the ſums which were brought in, when it was opened, were not ſufficient to diſcharge the arrears of theſe eighteen months. This is the true ſtate of the affair, which cauſed the Engliſh to exclaim ſo loudly againſt the king and the cabal. But the hopes the cabal then had to render the king abſolute, made them very eaſy under the complaints and reproaches of the people.

[1671-2] But Charles had in his thoughts a project which would furniſh him with ſtill more conſiderable ſums. This was to ſurpriſe the Dutch fleet returning from Smyrna richly laden [o], before any declaration of war. He had practiſed the ſame thing the laſt year, with regard to the Bourdeaux fleet, and received a great advantage from it. This fleet being much richer, inſpired him with great expectations. To this end he put to ſea thirty ſix men of war [p] under the command of Holms, who had orders to cruiſe in the channel, and intercept this fleet. Holms being informed that the Dutch fleet approached, divided his own into three ſquadrons. That of Holland conſiſted of ſeventy two ſail of merchant ſhips, many of which had no guns, under the convoy of five men of war, commanded by experienced officers. Theſe drew up the merchantmen in three ſquadrons, in good order, and put themſelves between them and the Engliſh fleet, after having enjoined them to purſue their courſe without breaking their line. Holms attacked this fleet the 13th of March [q], and fought the whole day without gaining the leaſt advantage. The next day at nine in the morning the fight was renewed, and laſted all the day, though on the ſide of the Dutch, captain de Haes, who acted as admiral, had been killed about noon. On the ſide of the Engliſh, the vice-admiral's ſhip was diſabled. On the morrow, at eight in the morning, Holms, who had been reinforced by ſome frigates, renewed the engagement, and at laſt took one man of war, the captain and moſt of the ſailors being ſlain, and three merchant ſhips [r], which were brought into the Thames. This was all the advantage the Engliſh received from an action, which highly reflected on the king. It was carefully publiſhed at London, that this engagement was but an effect of chance, becauſe the Dutch refuſed to ſtrike. Though every one openly ſpoke againſt ſo diſhonourable an action, the king was not affected with the ſentiments of the vulgar, and inſtead of repairing the injury done to the ſtates, in ſeizing their ſhips before the war was declared, ſent out a ſquadron to meet four Dutch Indiamen, which were immediately taken and condemned. At the ſame time, he ordered all the Dutch ſhips in his ports to be ſeized, though, by an expreſs article of the treaty of Breda, no merchant ſhips were to be taken till ſix months after a declaration of war. The ſtates, ſeduced by ſo ill an example, ſeized alſo the Engliſh ſhips. But, upon the ſtrong repreſentation of ſome of the deputies, how much the honour of princes and ſtates was wounded by theſe depredations, and that the king of England's acting againſt the faith of treaties, was not a ſufficient reaſon to engage the ſtates to imitate ſo blameable a conduct, the Engliſh ſhips were diſcharged and ſent into England. The king could not then help releaſing ſome of the Dutch ſhips, but did not reſtore all.

One of the branches of the project formed by the cabal was, as I ſaid, to render the king abſolute [s], and under this branch was compriſed the extirpation of the proteſtant, or at leaſt the introduction of the popiſh religion; though father Orleans, and the writers on the king's ſide, when ſpeaking of this project, ſay nothing of this article. Father Orleans, however, could not forbear owning it in the courſe of his hiſtory. I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from him, which, though extremely ſoftened with reſpect to the end, clearly ſhews, it was one of the branches of the project. After ſpeaking of what had paſſed concerning the papiſts, and other non-conformiſts, he adds, "The king, who was no good chriſtian in his actions, though a catholic in his heart, did all that could be expected from his indolent temper, to preſerve the common liberty, that the catholics might partake of it. But the church of England prevailed, and chancellor Hyde was ſo warm upon this occaſion, that the king was obliged to yield rather to his importunities than his reaſons. It was therefore the re-eſtabliſhment of this liberty of conſcience, that the lord Aſhley believed neceſſary to the execution of the projected deſign. He communicated his thoughts to his colleagues of the cabal, who were of the ſame opinion, not only on account of the reaſon he alledged, which was, the gaining of the non-conformiſts who were juſtly feared, but alſo upon another, which he readily approved, namely, the favouring of the catholics whom moſt of them loved, and the reſt eſteemed. Arlington and Clifford were ſecretly catholics, and both died in the communion of the church. Buckingham had no occaſion to be converted, could he only have prevailed with himſelf as to libertiniſm. Aſhley was not averſe to the catholic religion, till intereſt and malice threw him into the contrary party. It will eaſily be conceived, that the king readily conſented to it, ſince he was a catholic, and continued ſo to his death, though policy cauſed him to pretend the contrary. As for the duke of York, he ſupported the deſign with all his power. All the difficulty lay in the extent of this liberty, and the two kings of France and England, acting in concert, debated the affair in the negotiation of their treaty. Several propoſals were made, ſome more, ſome leſs, advantageous to the catholics. France was for the moſt moderate, ſafeſt, and moſt reaſonable methods. At laſt, it was agreed, that Charles ſhould grant liberty of conſcience to all his ſubjects in general."

It appears from hence, that religion was concerned in the projects of the cabal. But probably, ſome were for having the progreſs of the popiſh religion ſubſervient to render the king abſolute, and others were for rendering the king abſolute to favour the progreſs of popery. Wherefore, theſe two articles were never ſeparated, nor indeed could be, ſince they entirely depended on each other. The king plainly ſhewed it, when he publiſhed his declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſince he could not grant this liberty without aſſuming a power to abrogate acts of parliament, or at leaſt ſuſpend the execution thereof ſo long as he pleaſed. This declaration, dated the 15th of March, 1672, conſiſted of various articles, of which I ſhall here give the ſubſtance:

1. His majeſty publiſhes it, "in virtue of his ſupreme power in eccleſiaſtical matters," which is a right inherent in his perſon, and declared to be ſo by ſeveral acts of parliament.

2. He declares his expreſs reſolution to be, that the church of England be preſerved and remain entire in her doctrine, diſcipline and government, as now it ſtands eſtabliſhed by law.

3. That no perſon ſhall be capable of holding any eccleſiaſtical benefice or preferment of any kind, who is not exactly conformable.

4. That the execution of all penal laws in matters eccleſiaſtical againſt whatſoever ſort of non-conformiſts or recuſants, be immediately ſuſpended.

5. He declares, that he will from time to time allow a ſufficient number of places, as ſhall be deſired, in all parts of his kingdom, for the uſe of ſuch as do not conform to the church of England, to meet and aſſemble in, in order to their public worſhip and devotion.

6. That none of his ſubjects do preſume to meet in any place, until ſuch place be allowed, and the teacher of that congregation be approved by him.

7. He declares, that this indulgence, as to the allowance of public places of worſhip, and approbation of teachers, ſhall extend to all ſorts of non-conformiſts and recuſants, except the recuſants of the Roman catholic religion, to whom he will no ways allow public places of worſhip, but only indulge them their ſhare in the common exemption from the executing the penal laws, and the exerciſe of their worſhip in their private houſes only [t].

[s] The lord Clifford told a perſon of quality in private diſcourſe, that the king, if he would be firm to himſelf, might ſettle what religion he pleaſed, and carry the government to what height he would: For if men were aſſured in the liberty of their conſciences, and undiſturbed in their properties, able and upright judges made in Weſtminſter-hall; and if, on the other hand, the fort of Tilbury was finiſhed to bridle the city, the fort of Plymouth to ſecure the weſt, and arms for twenty thouſand men in each of theſe, and in Hull for the northern parts, with ſome addition (which might be eaſily and undiſcernedly made to the forces on foot) there were none who would have either will, opportunity, or power to reſiſt. Kennet, p. 312, note.

[1672] Two days after, the king publiſhed his declaration of war againſt the ſtates, dated the 17th of March [u]. This declaration, as that of the former war, was founded upon generals, and affected pretences. This is always the caſe when war is firſt reſolved, and reaſons or pretences are afterwards ſought. "The king hiſtorically introduced his juſt reaſons to begin the firſt war upon the ſtates, though it was ended by the treaty of Breda. He added, that peace was no ſooner concluded, than violated by the ſtates, in not ſending commiſſioners to London to ſettle the trade of the two nations in the Eaſt Indies: and when he ſent over his embaſſador to put them in mind of it, he could not in three years get any ſatisfaction from them in the material points, nor a forbearance of the wrongs which his ſubjects received in thoſe parts."

It is eaſy to ſee to what great diſcuſſions theſe generals are liable.

"2. He ſaid, that having reſtored Surinam to them, they were obliged, by the treaty of Breda, to permit the Engliſh in that colony to remove with their effects, but that this permiſſion was refuſed."

The Dutch maintained on the contrary, that the Engliſh inhabitants of Surinam remained there upon their own choice.

"3. He complained of abuſive pictures and medals diſperſed over Holland, reflecting on his honour."

The ſtates ſaid, they knew but of one abuſive medal, the ſtamp of which they had ordered to be broke.

"4. He complained, that in Holland his right of the flag had been repreſented as ridiculous."

It is eaſy to perceive, whether his pretenſion concerning the yacht which brought over the lady Temple was juſt or not.

This was the ſubſtance of what was moſt plauſibly alledged for undertaking the war. He ended with this declaration:——"And whereas we are engaged by a treaty to ſupport the peace made at Aix la Chapelle, we do finally declare, that notwithſtanding the proſecution of this war, we will maintain the true intent and ſcope of the ſaid treaty; and that in all the alliances which we have or ſhall make in the progreſs of this war, we have and will take care, to preſerve the ends thereof inviolable, unleſs provoked to the contrary." He took but little care of his honour, in pretending to ſhew, that his deſign in breaking with the ſtates and uniting with France, was, to maintain the treaty of Aix la Chapelle. But there was nothing ſo abſurd which the cabal did not think they could impoſe on the public, wherein they were much miſtaken, as will appear in the ſequel.

This war was ſo contrary to the intereſts of England and all Europe, the defence of which Charles had ſo often boaſted to undertake by means of the triple league; it was ſo directly oppoſite to juſtice, equity, faith, and the religion of the Engliſh, publicly profeſſed by the king, that no man could believe it till the blow was ſtruck. The Hollanders imagined, he only intended to exact ſome money from them, or at moſt, to intimidate them in order to oblige them to reſtore the prince of Orange his nephew to the poſts enjoyed by his anceſtors. France herſelf could hardly believe, but that he intended to deceive her, till he had fallen upon the Smyrna fleet. But all were miſtaken in aſcribing to the king any affection for his people. His ſole aim was to render himſelf abſolute, in order to enjoy all the riches of England without controul, and without any obligations to his parliament. The duke of York, his preſumptive heir, found his account in ſo fine a ſcheme, and, beſides, thought of eſtabliſhing his religion for which he was exceſſively zealous. As for the cabal, they were men entirely deſtitute of all principles of honour, juſtice, or religion, each of whom was ſolely intent upon making his fortune by ſacrificing the intereſt of the public. For it cannot be thought, that perſons of their abilities could be ignorant, that what they were acting was directly contrary to the intereſts of England. They did not believe, they could execute their grand project without a ſtrict alliance with the king of France, who artfully perſuaded them, that after the republic of Holland ſhould be deſtroyed, the two crowns would jointly labour to render the king abſolute in England, and eſtabliſh the catholic religion. But they had too much cauſe afterwards to ſee that they were deceived by France. Indeed it was not Lewis's intereſt to render the king of England abſolute in his dominions, but rather to ſow and cheriſh diviſion between the king and his ſubjects, in which, by ſeeming to enter into the views of the cabal, he was but too ſucceſsful. But there occurred in the execution of the project an obſtacle, which the ſecret councillors ſhould have foreſeen, and perhaps did foreſee without being able to help it. This was the king's immenſe profuſeneſs, which was the reaſon that all the ſums received from France and the parliament were inſufficient to ſupport the war two years, ſo that he was obliged to have recourſe to the parliament, who at laſt broke meaſures ſo well concerted. On the other hand, this project alarming all Europe, the ſtates found protectors, who rendered the execution very difficult.

The ſame day that the declaration of war againſt the ſtates was publiſhed at London, the like was publiſhed at Paris, founded upon no juſter grounds. For the king of France gave no other reaſon of the war than his diſpleaſure at the conduct of the ſtates. This union between France and England (which then appeared openly, whatever care had been hitherto taken to conceal it) ſhewed the ridiculouſneſs of what the king ordered the lord keeper to tell the parliament, "That common prudence required, that his majeſty ſhould make ſuitable preparations, when France had ſuch forces both at land and ſea." It appeared by this, that the king ſcrupled not to tell his parliament the contrary of what he thought, which could not but make him loſe the confidence of his people, as it happened accordingly.

About a month after, the biſhop of Munſter alſo proclaimed war againſt the Dutch, on pretence, that they had endeavoured to corrupt the governors of his frontier places. As for the elector of Cologne, he had already introduced French troops into his dominions, to provide, as he pretended, for his ſecurity. But though he proteſted an intention to obſerve an exact neutrality, the ſtates were perfectly informed of his treaty with France. Thus theſe four princes were united for the utter deſtruction of the republic of the United Provinces, without mentioning ſeveral princes of Germany engaged by the king of France to ſtand neutral, that they might not aſſiſt Holland.

The ſtates having ſome time foreſeen the impending ſtorm, had endeavoured to divert it, by giving the king of England all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably expect. They had offered to agree to whatever he deſired concerning the flag, and beſides, they had on the 24th of February made the prince of Orange captain general, and admiral, though he was then but twenty two years of age. They believed, this would ſuffice to content the king his uncle, for they were yet ignorant that his deſign was to overturn their republic, without any regard to the intereſts of the prince of Orange. This change in favour of the young prince, would, perhaps, have never been made, had it not been deemed neceſſary to appeaſe the king of England. There were three parties in Holland: that of the penſionary (which was the more powerful, and called the Louveſtein party, from the name of the caſtle where the prince's father had confined the leading men of this faction) that of the prince of Orange; and a third which affected a neutrality, and had hitherto joined with neither of the two firſt, but on this occaſion believed it neceſſary to join with the ſecond, in hopes of ſatisfying the king of England. The ſtates therefore ſent a deputation to the prince, to offer him the dignities of captain general, and admiral, and the penſionary de Witt, to his mortification, was appointed head of the deputation. Thus the prince of Orange ſaw himſelf captain general, but without an army, or at leaſt, with an army ſo inconſiderable, and filled for the moſt part with unexperienced officers, choſen more for their attachment to the penſionary, than their perſonal merit.

I ſhall not relate the progreſs of the king of France, and his two allies, the biſhop of Munſter, and the elector of Cologne, in the firſt campaign. This is ſo well known, that it would be loſt time to recite it. Let it ſuffice to obſerve, that the king of France took the field the beginning of May; made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places on the Rhine without almoſt any oppoſition; and ſwimming that river, ſubdued all Guelderland with the towns upon the Yſſel, and at laſt

[t] The preſbyterians went in a body, and dr. Manton, in their name, thanked the king for this declaration. Moſt of them had yearly penſions of fifty pounds, and the chief of them of a hundred pounds. Burnet, p. 308.

[u] To furniſh the government with ſome fair pretenſions at leaſt for this war, the committee for the Eaſt India company was ſummoned to ſhew, whether the Dutch had not broke in upon their trade, for which public ſatisfaction ought to be demanded? They anſwered, and gave it under their hands, That ſince the treaty at Breda, the Dutch had ſufficiently obſerved the articles of trade. Kennet, p. 310.

arrived at Utrecht, which had ſent deputies to Doeſburgh to offer their ſubmiſſion to his orders. At the ſame time, the biſhop of Munſter, after ravaging the province of Overyſſel, invaded Frieſeland and Groninghen, ſo that only Holland and Zealand remained free, of which the former was threatened with a like invaſion.

But this was not all the ſtates had to fear. Whilſt three of their provinces were loſt, and two others attacked, the danger from ſea was no leſs. The two fleets of France and England joined the beginning of May; the firſt conſiſting of forty, and the laſt of a hundred men of war. That of the ſtates had ſeventy-two large ſhips, and forty frigates and fire-ſhips, and conſequently was very inferior in number to the combined fleet of England and France[x]. It was commanded by the famous Ruyter, aſſiſted by Cornelius de Wit, the penſionary's brother, as deputy from the ſtates. Ruyter having put to ſea before the enemy's fleets were joined, had endeavoured to prevent the junction. But not ſucceeding, and being informed, that the two fleets lay at anchor in Solbay in Suffolk, he reſolved to attack them. He had like to have ſurprized them, but being diſappointed, prepared for battle. The two fleets of France and England (now compoſing but one) were ranged in three ſquadrons. The duke of York, high admiral of England, commanded the red ſquadron; the count d'Etrees, the white; and the earl of Sandwich, the blue. The fleet of the ſtates was likewiſe divided in the ſame manner; Ruyter was oppoſed to the duke of York, Bankert to count d'Etrees, and Van Ghent, to the earl of Sandwich. All I can gather from the various deſcriptions of this battle, fought the 28th of May, is, that both ſides diſplayed all the art and ſkill which experience had taught the commanders and officers, that they fought with equal bravery, with almoſt equal loſs, and both ſides challenged the victory. The admiral-ſhip of the Engliſh being diſabled, the duke of York was obliged to hoiſt his flag in the London. The Royal James, commanded by the earl of Sandwich, not being able to diſengage from a fireſhip, after ſhe had ſunk two, was blown up with the earl and her whole crew[y]. The Engliſh loſt two ſhips more, the Hollanders three, and Van Ghent was killed. The hiſtorians of the two parties equally pretend, that their fleet chaced that of the enemies, but both ſpeak of it very faintly. For, it is not entirely the ſame with engagements at ſea, as with thoſe at land, where commonly he that remains maſter of the field of battle, juſtly aſſumes the honour of the victory; whereas in naval engagements, a fog, a calm, a wind, either contrary or tempeſtuous, may oblige the victorious fleet to retire the firſt. However this be, bonfires were equally made at London, and the Hague, for the ſucceſs of this battle, though with very little reaſon. The Engliſh complain, the French did not diſcharge their duty, and only fought at a diſtance, after having ſeparated from the fleet. This conduct is aſcribed to ſecret orders given to count d'Etrees, not to expoſe too much his majeſty's ſhips, but to leave the Engliſh and Dutch fleets to deſtroy one another[z].

Some time before, the king had created the earl of Lauderdale, duke of the ſame name; the lord Aſhley Cooper, earl of Shaftſbury; lord Arlington, earl of Arlington; and ſir Thomas Clifford, lord Clifford. About the ſame time ſir Thomas Oſborn was ſworn into the privy council, and the new duke of Lauderdale, and the earl of Arlington, received the order of the garter. This was doubtleſs, to recompenſe theſe members of the cabal, for their great ſervices, in adviſing him to ſuſpend, by his ſole authority, the execution of two acts of parliament[a], till he ſhould think fit to take off the ſuſpenſion. Though this ſuſpenſion was not in itſelf diſadvantageous to the public, yet, as it proceeded from the ſame principle by which the king aſſumed a power of ſuſpending the penal laws againſt the non-conformiſts, it was ſufficiently clear, that he would not ſtop there.

I have already taken notice of the ſad condition of the ſtates of the United Provinces. There were two provinces, Guelderland, and Utrecht, in the power of the French. Overyſſel was in the hands of the elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Munſter. The two provinces of Frieſeland and Groninghen were not only threatened, but alſo attacked. In ſhort, the province of Holland found no readier way to ſtop the progreſs of the French king[b], who was at Utrecht, than by opening the ſluices, and laying the country under water[c]. This melancholy ſituation of affairs, raiſed a great diſcontent in the people of Holland: and as the penſionary de Witt had been many years at the head of the government, all the calamities of his country were charged to his ill conduct. Moreover, the people openly accuſed him of betraying his country. At laſt, the general diſcontent roſe into ſedition, and cauſed the ſtates of Holland to annul the perpetual edict made in the year 1667, by which they had obliged themſelves never to own the prince of Orange for Stadtholder, and to diſpenſe with that oath; after which, the prince was made Stadtholder. Some time after, the two brothers, Cornelius, and John, de Witt, the firſt grand bailiff of Putten, and the other penſionary of Holland, but who had lately thrown up his employ, were torn in pieces by the mob of the Hague. The ſtory is too well known to need a recital. It ſuffices to ſay, the prince of Orange remained in peaceable poſſeſſion of the government of Holland and Zealand; for Frieſeland, and Groninghen had a ſeparate Stadtholder, namely, the young prince Henry Caſimir, of Naſſau, under the tuition of the princeſs his mother[d], and three provinces were in the hands of the enemy.

The king of France, who had ever feared the prince of Orange's advancement, no ſooner ſaw him inveſted with his eminent dignity, than he endeavoured to corrupt him with the offered ſovereignty of Holland. But he found the young prince deaf to all his offers, and reſolute to ſerve the ſtates who had intruſted him with its government, to the laſt moment of his life[e]. The king of England ſeconded his ally in this deſign. The ſtates had ſent embaſſadors to him with propoſals of peace, as they had alſo to the king of France at Utrecht. But the king, after a refuſal to treat but in conjunction with France, and fearing the ſtates deſign was to diſunite them, or render them jealous of each other, diſpatched the duke of Buckingham, and the earl of Arlington, (two members of the cabal) with George Savil, lord Hallifax, into Holland, on pretence of treating of a peace jointly with France. Theſe embaſſadors paſſing through the Hague, in their way to Utrecht, affected to give out, that they were come to bring peace. But when they came to treat, their propoſals were ſo exorbitant, that it was evident peace was not the king's view in this embaſſy. It was rather to draw cloſer the alliance between France and England, and concert new meaſures for the proſecution of the war, as the ſequel clearly diſcovered. In paſſing through the Hague, the duke of Buckingham aſked the prince, what it was he propoſed to himſelf in the deſperate ſituation of his country. To which the prince replied, "That it was true their condition was dangerous, but he had one way ſtill not to ſee its ruin compleated, and that was to lie in the laſt dyke." It is reported, the ſame duke, in a viſit to the princeſs of Orange, having told her that they were good Hollanders, was immediately anſwered by her, "That was more than they aſked, which was only that they ſhould be good Engliſhmen." For the war was ſo evidently contrary to the intereſt of England, that the Engliſh themſelves openly murmured at it. But, as I have ſaid, not only on this occaſion, but throughout this whole reign, the intereſt of the king, and that of the people were always directly oppoſite. The king, after the

It ſeems, the day before the earl obſerving, that the Engliſh fleet rode in Souldbay, in danger of being ſurpriſed by the Dutch, adviſed, that they ſhould weigh anchor, and get out to ſea. But the duke of York, ſlighting the advice, told the earl, "That he ſpake that out of fear:" which the earl is thought to have ſo highly reſented, that it rendered him careleſs of his own ſafety. example of his father and grandfather, thought he could ſilence the complaints of the people by a proclamation to forbid, under ſevere penalties, to ſpeak againſt the government, but this ſerved only to increaſe the murmurs.

In the mean time, the king of France ſeeing, that the drowning of Holland put a ſtop to his conqueſts, marched his army into Flanders, leaving the duke of Luxemburgh at Utrecht, and came to Paris in Auguſt, attended by the duke of Monmouth, who, in purſuance of Charles's engagement in their treaty, had brought him, at the opening of the campaign, ſix thouſand effective men.

I ſhall not relate the particulars of the war carried on by land during the reſt of the campaign, becauſe England had no part in it, and, beſides, it is fully deſcribed by the hiſtories of thoſe times. It is ſufficient for the reader to know in general, that though the ſtates had ſome ſucceſs againſt the biſhop of Munſter, their affairs were reduced to a wretched condition, and the neighbourhood of the duke of Luxemburgh ſcarce gave them time to breathe. Their whole refuge lay in the alliances they expected to make with the emperor, Spain, and ſome princes of Germany, and in the hopes that the Engliſh parliament which was to meet, according to the prorogation the 30th of October, would ſee the intereſt of England and of all Europe. But the king deprived them of this laſt reſource, by proroguing the parliament to February.

The 4th of December the king declared in council, that he would raiſe more forces, and diſpoſe of them in convenient quarters, to be employed on occaſion. And for payment of them, he ordered that the exchequer ſhould continue ſhut till the 1ſt of May 1673, though he had poſitively promiſed it ſhould be opened the beginning of the year. He publiſhed on this account, a proclamation, in which it was ſaid, "That notwithſtanding his majeſty had not been wanting on his part, to comply with all honourable ways and means that might effect a peace, yet the continuance of thoſe inevitable neceſſities which firſt obliged him to ſhut up the exchequer, compelled him to continue to ſtop the payment of monies till the 1ſt of May next: doubting not but that his loving ſubjects would have ſuch truſt and confidence in his juſtice, that it would take away all apprehenſions of their being in the leaſt defrauded of their juſt dues."

The ways and means uſed by the king to effect a peace, conſiſted, in that his two embaſſadors at Utrecht were contented to demand in his name, a million of pounds ſterling, for the expences of the war; the compliment of the flag without any exception; a hundred thouſand pounds yearly for the liberty of fiſhing; the ſovereignty of all that ſhould remain of the United Provinces, for his nephew the prince of Orange; a participation of the whole India trade; the town of Sluis, the iſles of Cadſant, Walcheren, Goerée, Voorne; and laſtly, an entire ſatisfaction to the king of France. It muſt have been great obſtinacy in the ſtates to find fault with ſuch reaſonable demands. Conſequently the king could not in honour diſpenſe with the continuation of the war, and the keeping the Exchequer ſhut to maintain it.

Sir John Trevor dying this year, ſir Henry Coventry, lately returned from Sweden, where he had ſucceſsfully negotiated for the king, ſucceeded him in the office of ſecretary of ſtate.

Sir Orlando Bridgeman reſigning the great ſeal, the new earl of Shaftſbury was made lord high chancellor[f]. A few days after, the king performed his promiſe to Clifford, by making him lord treaſurer, ſo that all the great offices of the ſtate were held by the cabal, or by perſons devoted to their intereſts. But that it may be ſeen, how the five lords of the cabal flattered the king, and one another, at the very time, the nation was moſt loudly exclaiming againſt the government, I ſhall inſert here part of a ſpeech made by the lord Shaftſbury, as chancellor, to the lord Clifford, when he tendered him the oath in Weſtminſter-hall, upon his admiſſion to the office of treaſurer. After telling him the nature of his office, he added,—"My lord, I may juſtly ſay you are in a place of the very firſt rank as to dignity, power, truſt, and influence of affairs; a place that requires ſuch a man as our great maſter's wiſdom hath found for it; from whoſe natural temper we may expect courage, quickneſs and reſolution; from whoſe education wiſdom, and experience; and from whoſe extraction that noble and illuſtrious houſe of the Cliffords[g], an heroic mind, a large ſoul, and an unſhaken fidelity to the crown. My lord, it is a great honour, much even beyond the place itſelf, that you are choſen to it by the king, who, without flattery, I may ſay, is as great a maſter in the knowledge of men and things, as this, or any other age hath produced: and let me ſay farther, it is not only your honour that you are choſen by him, but it is your ſafety too, that you have him to ſerve; with whom no ſubtle inſinuations of any near him, nor the aſpiring intereſt of a favourite, ſhall ever prevail againſt thoſe that ſerve him well. Nor can his ſervants fear to be ſacrificed to the malice, fury, or miſtake of a more ſwelling popular greatneſs: a prince under whom the unfortunate fall gently: a prince in a word, that beſt of all mankind deſerves the title of deliciæ humani generis. Let me end with this wiſh, or rather prophecy, that you may exceed all your predeceſſors in this place; the abilities and fidelity of the renowned lord Burleigh; the ſagacity, quickneſs, and great diſpatch of his ſon the lord Saliſbury; and the uprightneſs, integrity, and wiſdom of that great man that went laſt before you, the earl of Southampton."

It will hereafter appear, that the earl of Shaftſbury preſerved not long the ſentiments of eſteem and admiration for the king, expreſſed in this ſpeech.

[1672-3] Hitherto the cabal had ſailed with a proſperous gale on a very dangerous ſea, famous for wrecks, without any oppoſition. But at laſt they were ſtopped in their courſe by a rock which it was not poſſible to avoid, I mean the parliament. It was now almoſt two years ſince the parliament was aſſembled, and as, in that interval, the king had taken ſome ſteps which inſtilled great fears into his ſubjects, the new ſeſſion was expected with the utmoſt impatience, in hopes, that the parliament would apply proper remedies to the preſent evils, and find means to prevent thoſe with which the kingdom was ſtill threatened. The parliament therefore met the 4th of February, and choſe a ſpeaker by the direction of the court, ſir Edward Turner, the laſt ſpeaker having been made chief baron of the Exchequer. The choice falling upon ſir Job Charleton, he deſired to be excuſed; but the lord chancellor Shaftſbury told him, before the king and both houſes, that no excuſes would be admitted. "The conjuncture of time (ſays he) and the king's and kingdom's affairs, require ſuch a houſe of commons, and ſuch a ſpeaker. For, with reverence to the holy ſcripture, the king may on this occaſion ſay, he that is not with me is againſt me: for he that doth not now put his hand and heart to ſupport the king in the common cauſe of this kingdom, can hardly ever hope for ſuch another opportunity, or find a time to make ſatisfaction for the omiſſion of this." Preſently after, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I AM glad to ſee you here this day; I would have called you together ſooner, but that I was willing to eaſe you and the country, till there was an abſolute neceſſity. Since you were laſt here, I have been forced to a moſt important, neceſſary and expenſive war; and I make no doubt, but you will give me ſuitable and effectual aſſiſtance to go through with it. I refer you to my declaration for the cauſes, and indeed the neceſſity of this war; and ſhall now only tell you, that I might have digeſted the indignities to my own perſon, rather than have brought it to this extremity, if the intereſt as well as the honour of the whole kingdom had not been at ſtake: And if I had omitted this conjuncture, perhaps I had not again ever met with the like advantage. You will find, that the laſt ſupply you gave me, did not anſwer the expectation for the end you gave it, the payment of my debts. Therefore I muſt in the next place recommend them again to your eſpecial care.

"Some few days before I declared the war, I put forth my declaration for indulgence to diſſenters, and have hitherto found a good effect of it by ſecuring peace at home, when I had war abroad. There is one part in it that hath been ſubject to miſconſtruction, which is that concerning the papiſts; as if more liberty were granted to them, than to the other recuſants; when it is plain, there is leſs: for the others have public places allowed them, and I never intended that they ſhould have any, but only have the freedom of their religion in their own houſes, without any concourſe of others. And I could not grant them leſs than this, when I had extended ſo much more grace to others, moſt of them having been loyal, and in the ſervice of me, and of the king my father: and in the whole courſe of this indulgence, I do not intend, that it ſhall any any ways prejudice the church, but I will ſupport its rights, and it in its full power. Having ſaid this, I ſhall take it very ill to receive contradiction in what I have done. And I will deal plainly with you, I am reſolved to ſtick to my declaration. There is one jealouſy more that is maliciouſly ſpread abroad, and yet ſo weak and frivolous, that I once thought it not of moment enough to mention; but it may have gotten ſome ground with ſome wellminded people, and that is, that the forces I have raiſed in this war, were deſigned to controul law and property: I wiſh I had more forces the laſt ſummer, the want of them convinces me, I muſt raiſe more againſt this next ſpring; and I do not doubt but you will conſider the charge of them in your ſupplies. I will conclude with this aſſurance to you, that I will preſerve the true reformed proteſtant religion, and the church, as it is now eſtabliſhed in this kingdom; and that no man's property or liberty ſhall ever be invaded. I leave the reſt to the chancellor."

The ſpeech afterwards ſpoke by the chancellor, is ſo remarkable, that it well deſerves a place in this hiſtory.

" My lords, and you knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons,

" The king hath ſpoke ſo fully, ſo excellently well, and ſo like himſelf, that you are not to expect much from me. There is not a word in his ſpeech that hath not its full weight: And I dare with aſſurance ſay, will have its effect with you. His majeſty had called you ſooner, and his affairs required it, but that he was reſolved to give you all the eaſe and vacancy to your own private concerns; and the people as much reſpite from payments and taxes, as the neceſſity of his buſineſs, or their preſervation, would permit. And yet (which I cannot but here mention to you) by the crafty inſinuations of ſome ill-affected perſons, there have been ſpread ſtrange and deſperate rumours, which your meeting together this day, hath ſufficiently proved both malicious and falſe. His majeſty hath told you, that he is now engaged in an important, very expenſive, and indeed a war abſolutely neceſſary and unavoidable. He hath referred you to his declaration, where you will find the perſonal indignities by pictures and medals, and other public affronts, his majeſty hath received from the ſtates, their breach of treaties, both in the Surinam, and Eaſt India buſineſs: And at laſt they came to that height of inſolence, as to deny the honour and right of the flag, though an undoubted jewel of this crown, never to be parted with, and by them particularly owned in the late treaty of Breda, and never conteſted in any age. And whilſt the king firſt long expected, and then ſolemnly demanded ſatisfaction, they diſputed his title to it, in all the courts of Chriſtendom, and made great offers to the French king, if he would ſtand by them againſt us. But the moſt chriſtian king too well remembered, what they did at Munſter, contrary to ſo many treaties and ſolemn engagements; and how dangerous a neighbour they were to all crowned heads. The king and his miniſters had here a hard time, and lay every day under new obloquies. Sometimes they were repreſented as ſelling all to France for money to make this war: Portſmouth, Plymouth, and Hull, were to be given into the French hands for Caution. The next day news came, that France and Holland were agreed. Then the obloquy was turned from treachery to folly; the miniſters are now fools, that ſome days before were villains.

And indeed the coffee-houſes were not to be blamed for their laſt apprehenſions; ſince if that conjunction had not taken effect, then England had been in a far worſe caſe than it now is, and the war had been turned upon us. But both kings knowing their intereſts, reſolved to join againſt them, who were the common enemies to all monarchies, and I may ſay eſpecially to ours, their only competitor for trade and power at ſea; and who only ſtand in their way, to an univerſal empire, as great as Rome. This the ſtates underſtood ſo well, and had ſwallowed ſo deep, that under all their preſent diſtreſs and danger, they are ſo intoxicated with that vaſt ambition, that they ſlight a treaty, and refuſe a ceſſation. All this you, and the whole nation ſaw, before the laſt war; but it could not then be ſo well timed, or our alliances ſo well made. But you judged aright, that at any rate, DELENDA EST CARTHAGO, that government was to be brought down. And therefore the king may well ſay to you, it is your war! he took his meaſures from you, and they were juſt and right ones; and he expects a ſuitable aſſiſtance to ſo neceſſary and expenſive an action; which he has hitherto maintained at his own charge, and was unwilling either to trouble you, or burthen the country, until it came to an inevitable neceſſity. And his majeſty commands me to tell you, that unleſs it be a certain ſum, and ſpeedily raiſed, it can never anſwer the occaſion.

" My lords and gentlemen, reputation is the great ſupport of war or peace. This war had never begun, nor had the ſtates ever ſlighted the king, or ever refuſed him ſatisfaction; neither had this war continued to this day, or ſubſiſted now, but that the ſtates were deceived in their meaſures, and apprehended his majeſty in that great want of money, that he muſt ſit down under any affronts, and was not able to begin or carry on a war. Nay, at this day the ſtates ſupport themſelves amongſt their people by this only falſehood, that they are aſſured of the temper of England, and of the parliament, and that you will not ſupply the king in this war; and that if they can hold out till your meeting, they will have new life, and take new meaſures. There are lately taken two of their principal agents, with their credentials and inſtructions to this purpoſe, who are now in the Tower, and ſhall be proceeded againſt according to the law of nations. But the king is ſufficiently aſſured of his people; knows you better; and can never doubt his parliament. This had not been mentioned, but to ſhew you of what importance the frankneſs and ſeaſonableneſs of this ſupply is, as well as the fulneſs of it. Let me ſay, the king has brought the ſtates to that condition, that your hearty conjunction at this time in ſupplying his majeſty, will make them never more formidable to kings, or dangerous to England. And if after this you ſuffer them to get up, let this be remembered, the ſtates of Holland are England's eternal enemies both by intereſt and inclination. In the next place, to the ſupply for the carrying on of the war, his majeſty recommends to you the taking care of his debts. What you gave the laſt ſeſſion did not anſwer your own expectation. Beſides another conſiderable aid, you deſigned his majeſty, was unfortunately loſt in the birth; ſo that the king was forced for the carrying on his affairs, much againſt his will, to put a ſtop to the payments out of the exchequer. He ſaw the preſſures upon himſelf, and growing inconveniences to his people by great intereſt; and the difference through all his buſineſs between ready money and orders. This gave the king the neceſſity of that proceeding; to make uſe of his own revenue, which hath been of ſo great effect in this war. But though he hath put a ſtop to the trade and gain of the bankers, yet he would be unwilling to ruin them, and oppreſs ſo many families as are concerned in thoſe debts; beſides, it were too diſproportionable a burthen upon many of his good ſubjects. But neither the bankers, nor they, have reaſon to complain, if you now take them into your care, and they have paid them what was due to them when the ſtop was made, with ſix per cent. intereſt from that time. The king is very much concerned both in honour and intereſt, to ſee this done, and yet, he deſires you not to miſtime it; but that it may have only the ſecond place, and that you will firſt ſettle what you intend about the ſupply,

" His majeſty has ſo fully vindicated his declaration from that calumny concerning the papiſts, that no reaſonable ſcruple can be made by any good man. He has ſufficiently juſtified it by the time it was publiſhed in, and the effects he had from it; and might have done it more from the agreeableneſs of it to his own natural diſpoſition, which no good Engliſhman can wiſh other than it is. He loves not blood, or rigorous ſeverities; but where mild and gentle ways may be uſed by a wiſe prince, he is certain to chuſe them. The church of England, and all good proteſtants, have reaſon to rejoice in ſuch a head, and ſuch a defender. His majeſty doth declare his care and concerns for the church, and will maintain them in all their rights and privileges, equal, if not beyond any of his predeceſſors. He was born and bred up in it: it was that his father died for: we all know how great temptations and offers he reſiſted abroad, when he was in his loweſt condition; and he thinks it the honour of his reign, that he hath been the reſtorer of the church. It is that he will ever maintain, and hopes to leave to poſterity in greater luſtre, and upon ſurer grounds, than our anceſtors ever ſaw it. But his majeſty is not convinced, that violent ways are the intereſt of religion, or the church. There is one thing more, that I am commanded to ſpeak to you of, which is the jealouſy that hath been fooliſhly ſpread abroad, of the forces the king had raiſed in this war. Wherein the king hath opened himſelf freely to you, and confeſſed the fault on the other hand. For if this laſt ſummer had not proved a miracle of ſtorms and tempeſts, ſuch as ſecured their Eaſt India fleet, and protected their ſea coaſts from a deſcent, nothing but the true reaſon, want of money, could have juſtified the defect in the number of our forces. It is that his majeſty is provided for againſt the next ſpring, having having given out orders for the raiſing of ſeven or eight regiments more of foot, under the command of perſons of the greateſt fortunes and quality. And I am earneſtly to recommend to you, that in your ſupplies, you will take into your conſideration, this neceſſary addition of charge.

" And after his majeſty's concluſion of his ſpeech, let me conclude, nay, let us all conclude with bleſſing God, and the king! let us bleſs God, that he hath given us ſuch a king, to be the repairer of our breaches, both in church and ſtate; and the reſtorer of our paths to dwell in: that in the midſt of war and miſery, which rages in our neighbour countries, our garners are full, and there is no complaining in our ſtreets; and a man can hardly know that there is a war. Let us bleſs God that he hath given this king ſignally the hearts of his people, and moſt particularly of his parliament, who in their affection and loyalty to their prince, have exceeded all their predeceſſors: a parliament, with whom the king hath many years lived with all the careſſes of a happy marriage. Has the king had a concern? you have wedded it. Has his majeſty wanted ſupplies? you have readily, chearfully, and fully provided for them. You have relied upon the wiſdom and conduct of his majeſty in all his affairs: ſo that you have never attempted to exceed your bounds, or to impoſe upon him: whilſt the king, on the other hand, hath made your counſels the foundation of all his proceedings; and hath been ſo tender of you, that he hath upon his own revenue and credit, endeavoured to ſupport even foreign wars, that he might be leaſt uneaſy to you, or burthenſome to his people. And let me ſay, that though this marriage be according to Moſes's law, where the huſband can give a bill of divorce, put her away and take another; yet I can aſſure you, it is as impoſſible for the king to part with this parliament, as it is for you to depart from that loyalty, affection and dutiful behaviour, you have hitherto ſhewn towards him. Let us bleſs the king for taking away all our fears, and leaving no room for jealouſies; and for thoſe aſſurances and promiſes he hath made us. Let us bleſs God and the king, that our religion is ſafe; that the church of England is the care of our prince; that parliaments are ſafe; and that our properties and liberties are ſafe. What more hath a good Engliſhman to aſk? But that this king may long reign, and this triple alliance of king, parliament, and people, may never be diſſolved."

I ſhall make no reflections on this ſpeech, becauſe it would lead me too far; and beſides, I imagine every diſintereſted reader can ſee the falſity of moſt of the things related, and the groſs artifice wherewith they are vented. I ſhall only obſerve, that this ſpeech was ſpoke by a member, or rather by the head of the cabal, who perfectly knew the king's ſecret intentions. The earl of Shaftſbury therefore muſt have had a forehead of braſs to pronounce ſuch a ſpeech before ſo auguſt an aſſembly. But very likely, this was only for form ſake, and the cabal believed themſelves ſo ſecure, that the parliament itſelf would not dare to ſeem to know their artifices. But they were miſtaken, and even the houſe of commons had already given ſome indications of vigour, before the king and chancellor had delivered their ſpeeches. Preſently after their meeting, they loudly complained of writs iſſued out by the lord chancellor, for electing and returning of perſons to ſit in their houſe, in the room of ſuch as were dead, or removed. And by the way, all the members elected by virtue of theſe writs, were the chancellor's creatures. This complaint cauſed the king immediately after the two ſpeeches, to declare to the commons, " That he had given order to the lord chancellor to ſend out writs, for the better ſupply of their houſe, having ſeen precedents for it; but if any ſcruple or queſtion did ariſe about it, he left it to the houſe to debate as ſoon as they could." Accordingly, the very next day the commons voted the writs and returns irregular, and expelled all the members thus elected.

There were in this parliament, as in moſt others, two parties, called the court and country party. This was their diſtinction, and it manifeſtly implied, that the intereſts of the court were directly oppoſite to thoſe of the people, as the intereſts of one party are uſually to thoſe of the contrary. The court party had always prevailed, while the people were perſuaded of the good intentions of the king and his miniſters. But as the king diſcovered himſelf, both by his way of living, and frequent ſigns of irreligion; or by his inclination for the papiſts; or by his profuſion, and avidity of money; or laſtly, by his union with France, and the war with the ſtates, his party ſenſibly decreaſed every day, for two very natural reaſons. Firſt, becauſe many of thoſe members, who, at the beginning, were of the king's party through inclination and zeal for religion, whilſt they conſidered him as protector of the church of England, loſt this inclination, as ſoon as they were convinced, that the king was far from deſigning the good of the church or ſtate. The king's proteſtations loſt all their effect, when it was once ſeen, that his actions correſponded ſo little with his words. Secondly, for the ſame reaſon, the people, perceiving that religion and the ſtate were in danger, choſe ſuch repreſentatives to fill the vacancies of the houſe, whoſe principles were directly oppoſite to the deſigns of the court. As the vacancies by the death of the members could not but be very numerous in a parliament, which had now ſat twelve years, the country party came by degrees to prevail, and the king and his miniſters no longer found it ſo eaſy to carry whatever they deſired, as at the beginning of the parliament. It is certain, ſo long as the people do not ſuſpect the king of ill deſigns againſt liberty and religion, the court party prevail in the parliament, or rather there are not then two different parties. For, ſuppoſing the king an exact obſerver of the laws himſelf, and careful to ſee them punctually obeyed, there can be no difference between the two parties, but with reſpect to the quantity of money granted to the king. But as the people are under obligations to the king, for his maintenance of order, equity, moderation, and juſtice in the government, they are never uneaſy with the power and wealth heaped on ſuch a king, and commonly the country party, if there is one in the parliament, is much inferior to the king's. But the caſe is quite different, when the people are once prejudiced againſt their ſovereign, and no longer confide in his promiſes. For then, the court party is compoſed of men, who have only their own private fortune in view, and is not ſo numerous as that of the people, which, beſides the public intereſt, finds likewiſe a private advantage in oppoſing the deſigns of the court. In this caſe, the people uſually chuſe able repreſentatives, and ſuch as are believed well affected to their country, and it is very rarely that the intrigues of the court are capable of hindering theſe elections. A proof of what I advance was ſeen in the elections of the parliament of the 3d of November 1640, under Charles I. wherein the country party was ſo ſuperior to that of the court. This proof is confirmed by the tranſactions of the parliament I am now ſpeaking of, which for twelve years had appeared ſo devoted to the king, and which changed from one extreme to another, when they had once loſt their former confidence in the king and his miniſters. It is in vain to aſcribe this change to the intrigues and cabals of ſome particular enemies of the court. Never would private perſons be powerful enough to corrupt a whole parliament, or the greater part, if their credit was not built upon the miſmanagement of the king and his miniſters. As we are entering upon a new period, I believed it neceſſary to prepare the reader for this change, by ſhewing him the true cauſe of it.

We have ſeen in the two ſpeeches of the king and the chancellor, what vaſt ſupplies the king demanded of his parliament, namely, a conſiderable aid for the ſea ſervice; another for the land; a third to diſcharge ſome old debts; a fourth to refund the money taken out of the exchequer, and which could not amount to leſs than two millions two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling for the ſpace of ſeventeen months. All this computed, muſt have amounted at leaſt to five millions. Though the chancellor's ſpeech made but little impreſſion on the commons, they would however ſhew, that in demanding a redreſs of grievances, as was their intention, they did not act through a ſpirit of paſſion and revenge. Wherefore, though they were by no means convinced of the neceſſity or juſtice of the war undertaken by the king, they voted a ſupply of an eighteen months aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds per menſem, which in all amounted to twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds, for the king's extraordinary occaſions, without ſpecifying that it was for the ſupport of the war. But for fear the king ſhould prorogue them when the money bill was paſſed, they reſolved that the redreſs of grievances ſhould keep an even pace with it.

For this purpoſe, the 19th of February the commons preſented an addreſs to the king, in which they told him—" That having taken into conſideration his declaration for indulgence to diſſenters, they found themſelves bound in duty to inform his majeſty, That penal laws in matter eccleſiaſtical cannot be ſuſpended but by act of parliament; they therefore moſt humbly beſought his majeſty, to give ſuch directions, that no apprehenſions or jealouſies, might remain in the hearts of his faithful ſubjects." To this addreſs the king ſent the following anſwer. " That he is very much much troubled, that the declaration which he put out for ends ſo neceſſary to the quiet of this kingdom, eſpecially in that conjuncture, ſhould prove the cauſe of diſquiet, and give occaſion to the queſtioning of his power in eccleſiaſtics, which he finds not done in the reigns of any of his anceſtors. That he never had thoughts of uſing it otherwiſe than as it hath been intruſted in him to the peace and eſtabliſhment of the church of England, and the eaſe of all his ſubjects in general: neither doth he pretend to ſuſpend any laws wherein the properties, rights, or liberties of any of his ſubjects are concerned, nor to alter any thing in the eſtabliſhed doctrine or diſcipline of the church of England: but his only deſign in this was, to take off the penalties inflicted by ſtatutes upon the diſſenters, and which he believed, when well conſidered of, they themſelves would not wiſh executed according to the rigour of the law: neither hath he done this with any thought of avoiding, or precluding the advice of his parliament; and if any bill ſhall be offered to him, which ſhall appear more proper to attain the aforeſaid ends, and ſecure the peace of the church and kingdom, when tendered in due manner to him, He will ſhew how readily he will concur in all ways that ſhall appear for the good of the kingdom."

The commons eaſily perceived, the king was not inclined to deſiſt from his declaration. Wherefore, three days after, they preſented another addreſs, in which, "They thanked him for his gracious aſſurance and promiſes of maintaining the religion eſtabliſhed, and the liberties and properties of the people: and they did not in the leaſt doubt, but that his majeſty had the ſame gracious intentions in giving ſatisfaction to his ſubjects, by his anſwer to their laſt petition and addreſs: but that they found, that the ſaid anſwer was not ſufficient to clear the apprehenſions that might juſtly remain in the minds of his people, by his majeſty's having claimed a power to ſuſpend penal laws in matters eccleſiaſtical, and which his majeſty did ſtill ſeem to aſſert, in the ſaid anſwer, to be entailed in the crown, and never queſtioned in any of the reigns of his anceſtors: wherein they humbly conceived his majeſty had been much miſinformed, ſince no ſuch power had ever been claimed or exerciſed by any of his majeſty's predeceſſors. And if it ſhould be admitted, might tend to the interrupting the free courſe of the laws, and altering the legiſlative power, which had always been acknowledged to reſide in his majeſty, and in his two houſes of parliament. They therefore with an unanimous conſent became humble ſuitors to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to give them a full and ſatisfactory anſwer to their ſaid petition and addreſs, and that his majeſty would take ſuch effectual order, that the proceedings in this matter might not for the future be drawn into conſequence or example." The king's anſwer to this addreſs was, "It is of conſequence, and I will take it into conſideration."

At the time, theſe addreſſes were preparing, ſir Job Charleton, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons being taken ill, humbly prayed his majeſty, that he might be eaſed of the burden he was not able longer to ſuſtain. Edward Seymour, ſo famous in the reign of William III. was, by the court's recommendation, choſen in his room.

The king and the cabal were extremely miſtaken in imagining, that the declaration for liberty of conſcience, would gain the preſbyterians, in return for ſo great a favour. The leaders of the preſbyterians were too wiſe to be taken in ſo palpable and dangerous a ſnare. It was eaſy for them to ſee, they were only deſigned for inſtruments to advance the intereſts of the Romiſh religion. When they reflected, that this favour was received from the king, the duke of York, and the members of the cabal, they could not believe, it flowed from a principle of religion or humanity. They ſaw beſides ſo many extraordinary proceedings, ſo many invaſions upon the rights of the people; the papiſts indulged in their religion; the king making exorbitant demands upon his parliament; an army incamped at the very gates of London [h] in the midſt of winter; a war begun to deſtroy the only proteſtant ſtate capable of ſupporting religion; and papiſts in the principal poſts; all this ſufficiently demonſtrated, that the ſuſpenſion of the penal laws was not for their ſake. So, inſtead of thanking the king for this pretended favour, alderman Love, a city member, and an eminent diſſenter, ſpoke with the greateſt warmth againſt the declaration [i]. This declaration for liberty of conſcience, wrought a great change in the houſe of commons. For that houſe, which had been ſo fiercely animated againſt the preſbyterians, ſeeing them ſacrifice their own, to the intereſts of religion and the kingdom, ordered a bill to be brought in for their eaſe; a bill by which all the penalties againſt them in the act of uniformity were removed, and nothing required but the taking the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy. This bill was read the firſt time on the 27th of February, and in a few days was completed. But the lords having made ſome amendments, the king prorogued the parliament before theſe amendments could be agreed to by the commons.

This bill, which was readily paſſed by the commons, ſufficiently ſhewed their diſtruſt of the court with regard to the declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſince by it all pretence was taken away of confounding the preſbyterians with the other non-conformiſts. So long as the commons had not ſuſpected the king's intention to favour the papiſts, they had affected to rank all the diſſenters in one claſs, in order to include the preſbyterians in the ſtatutes made againſt the non-conformiſts in general. But when the king was perceived to uſe this confuſion to favour the papiſts, the commons were willing to own, the ſeveral ſects ought to be diſtinguiſhed, and rather than abandon religion to the intrigues and artifices of the court and the papiſts, reſolved to eaſe the preſbyterians. In this, they diſcovered a true zeal for the proteſtant religion in general, knowing, it was not ſo dangerouſly attacked by the preſbyterians, as by the papiſts. But it was not on this occaſion only that they ſhewed their attachment to the proteſtant religion. At the very time they were preparing the bill for the eaſe of the preſbyterians, another was brought in to enjoin frequent catechiſing in the parochial churches [k] for the inſtruction of youth, intimating thereby, how neceſſary this precaution was thought in the preſent juncture. But this bill, as well as the other, was rendered abortive by the prorogation of the parliament [l].

There is no plainer indication, of what the parliament thought of the deſigns of the court in favour of the papiſts, than the addreſs preſented by both houſes to the king about the ſame time. This addreſs contained, firſt complaints on the growth of popery; on the great reſort of Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits in the kingdom; on the admiſſion of ſo many recuſants into places of truſt, and particularly in the army. After this, the two houſes deſired, "1. That his majeſty would be pleaſed to iſſue out his royal proclamation, to command all prieſts and jeſuits (without exception of thoſe in attendance upon the queen, not being natural born ſubjects) to depart within thirty days out of the kingdom: and that his majeſty would be pleaſed, in the ſame proclamation, to command all judges and other officers, to put the laws in execution againſt all ſuch prieſts and jeſuits, as ſhould be found in the kingdom after that time. 2. That his majeſty would be pleaſed likewiſe to iſſue out commiſſions, to tender the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy to all officers and ſoldiers now in his ſervice and pay, and that ſuch as refuſed the ſaid oaths, might be immediately diſbanded. 3. That the commiſſaries of the muſters be commanded and enjoined by his majeſty's warrant, upon the penalty of their places, not to permit any officer to be muſtered in the ſervice and pay of his majeſty, until he hath taken the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and received the ſacrament of the lord's ſupper, according to the uſage of the church of England; and that every ſoldier ſhould take the ſaid oaths before his firſt muſter, and receive the ſacrament in like manner, before his ſecond muſter." Upon this addreſs, the king publiſhed a proclamation in the uſual ſtile, the ſeventh of that kind, by which (after a declaration, that as he had always adhered to the church of England, againſt all temptations whatſoever, ſo he was reſolved to maintain and defend it) he ſtrictly commanded all jeſuits and Romiſh prieſts to depart the kingdom, and the laws to be put in due execution, againſt all popiſh recuſants, or juſtly ſuſpected to be ſo, &c. This proclamation was not ſatisfactory to the commons, becauſe it extended but to one ſingle article of their petition, without any mention of the removal of papiſts from places of truſt. Wherefore, they proceeded to a new bill, in order to obtain their end, being reſolved not to finiſh the money bill, till they had procured a redreſs of their grievances, and particularly a revocation of the declaration for liberty of conſcience.

The king was never ſo perplexed ſince his reſtoration. The cabal had promiſed to make him abſolute, but, after all, ſuggeſted no other means than the uſing of force, at all hazards. He had hoped to obtain his aim by degrees, in gaining now one point, then another, and to ſee himſelf at laſt able to trample on all his oppoſers. He had moreover relied on the aſſiſtance of France, after the commonwealth of Holland ſhould be deſtroyed. But he had preposterouſly imagined, he ſhould have time to form all his meaſures, and be able to ſupport his deſign, whenever it ſhould be oppoſed. Perhaps too, he had depended upon the condeſcenſion of the parliament, which had always been ſo favourable to him. But as the commons were proceeding, the time was come, that the king muſt either give way, or break with the parliament. In this laſt caſe, he had too much ſenſe to believe, that a handful of papiſts, with a few flattering courties and miniſters, were able to ſupport him, at a time when he could expect no aſſiſtance from France, and when the malecontents might be countenanced by a Dutch fleet. Beſides, his exchequer was empty; and therefore he muſt have reſolved to raiſe money on his ſubjects by means of his army: for he knew, if he had not wherewith to content his adherents, he would hardly engage them to betray the intereſts of their country. But this army was proteſtant, excepting a few popiſh officers and ſoldiers. The officers of the fleet, and the ſailors, were alſo proteſtants. It was therefore unnatural to expect to engage ſuch a fleet and army in his deſigns, ſo contrary to their religion and liberties. Laſtly, he conſidered that theſe very miniſters and courtiers, who appeared ſo devoted to his ſervice, would deſert him, as it happened to the king his father, when he ſhould be no longer able to protect them. In a word, it was too ſoon to begin the execution of a project of this nature, for which he was unprepared, and yet, by the parliament's laſt addreſs, he was obliged either to execute or relinquiſh it. His honour ſeemed engaged to ſupport the declaration for liberty of conſcience, for he had told the parliament, that he would adhere to it, and his inclination led him to favour the papiſts, whoſe religion he had ſecretly embraced. He found himſelf moreover obliged, not to abandon to the reſentment of the parliament, miniſters, who, in giving him their advice, had depended upon his protection. But honour was not capable to ballance the difficulties which he foreſaw, if he perſiſted in his enterpriſe. On the other hand, his council was divided. The duke of Ormond, and the earl of Arlington adviſed him to wait a more favourable opportunity; but the duke of York, and the reſt of the cabal, were for his throwing off the maſk, and ſupporting his declaration. They repreſented, that his father's ruin was owing to his condeſcending to the firſt demands of the parliament of 1640; and ſaid, they ſaw no leſs cauſe to fear now; for ſhould the declaration be recalled, other demands would be ſet up, which would never end, till they were carried ſo high, that the king would not be able to grant them, without undoing himſelf: and that after a thouſand condeſcenſions, he would be at laſt forced to break with the parliament, and all the fruit he ſhould reap from his compliance, would be to make them the bolder. They farther added, that his holding his reſolution a few days would bring the parliament to reaſon, his majeſty having a party among them which began to make the leaders waver; and that there were forces ſufficient on foot to ſupport the one ſide, and intimidate the other. It is pretended the earl of Shaftſbury undertook to anſwer for the ſucceſs. All this was very capable to hold the king in ſuſpence. It is believed, the ladies engaged in this affair, and fearing that a rupture would deprive them of the king's bounties, ſtrongly ſollicited him to recall his declaration. However that be, the king, after ſome heſitation, called for the declaration, and with his own hands broke the ſeal.

The 8th of March the king came to the parliament, and after preſſing the commons to diſpatch the money-bill, ſaid to both houſes,——"If there be any ſcruple yet remaining with you touching the ſuſpenſion of the penal laws, I here faithfully promiſe you, that what hath been done in that particular, ſhall not for the future be drawn into example and conſequence; and as I daily expect from you a bill for my ſupply, ſo I aſſure you I ſhall as willingly receive and paſs any other you ſhall offer me, that may tend to the giving you ſatisfaction in all your juſt grievances."

This ſpeech was ſo agreeable to the parliament, that both houſes went in a body and thanked the king for ſo full and ſatisfactory an anſwer.

But if the two houſes were pleaſed, the cabal was not ſo. They had formed a project, and prepared a ſcheme to render the king abſolute. Nay, they had taken ſome ſteps towards the execution. This ſcheme had never been formed, had it not been ſuppoſed, the king would have the courage and reſolution to withſtand the complaints of the parliament; for the projectors could never think, the parliament would ſuffer the liberties of the people to be invaded without oppoſition. All their hope therefore was founded upon the king's ſteadineſs. They were to engage in a conteſt, in which they flattered themſelves to render the king victorious. But they ſaw, to their great aſtoniſhment, the king was retreating, when he ſhould have prepared for battle, and conſequently the hopes of victory were entirely vaniſhed. But this was not at all they had to fear; they were in danger of being abandoned by the king, after this firſt ſtep, to the reſentment of the two houſes; for how could they hope for the protection of the king, who had juſt given ſuch manifeſt marks of his own fear?

The earl of Arlington, as I have obſerved, had in ſome meaſure, deſerted the cabal, by his advice to the king, to revoke his declaration for liberty of conſcience. The earl of Shaftſbury ſoon followed him, but in a manner more ſurpriſing, more public, and with more remarkable circumſtances. As ſoon as he ſaw, the king had not ſufficient reſolution to execute the great work which was projected, he thought it but juſt to forſake a prince, who had forſaken himſelf, and left his counſellors expoſed to danger. This was the ſecond time the earl had experienced the king's inconſtancy, and want of reſolution. The affair of the declaration was common to him with the reſt of the cabal. But the writs iſſued out of chancery for the election of members to fill the vacancies of parliament, were peculiar to him. He had undertaken to iſſue theſe writs as chancellor, on pretence of ſome precedents which were never known, upon the king's poſitive promiſe to ſtand by him, and yet, he was deſerted by the king, at the firſt inſtance of the commons, or rather before their complaints. This was, however, a thing of very great conſequence. For if the crown could have iſſued writs for filling the vacancies in parliament, it would have been very eaſy for the miniſters to have had ſuch members returned as they pleaſed, as it happened on this firſt occaſion, wherein all thoſe that were choſen were creatures of the court. Father Orleans, who received his information of the Engliſh affairs from king James II. poſitively affirms, as one that could not be miſtaken when he follows ſuch a guide, "That the ancient cuſtom was, on the death of a member, for the chancellor to iſſue a writ under the great ſeal, for the election of another: and though the writ contained nothing to obſtruct the freedom of the elections, yet the king might find means to prevent any member from being choſen, who was againſt him. That this cuſtom had been changed during the troubles of the laſt reign, when the commons aſſumed the power of iſſuing the writs by their ſpeaker, and that this abuſe had been ſuffered to continue, ſince the king's reſtoration, through the weakneſs or ignorance of the chancellors before Shaftſbury." But this is a groundleſs aſſertion, as appears from what the king ſaid himſelf to both houſes, at the beginning of this ſeſſion, "That he had given order to the lord chancellor to ſend out writs, for the better ſupply of their houſe, having ſeen precedents for it." Had this been a right inherent in the crown, and firſt invaded by the commons, during the troubles of the laſt reign, would the king have ſaid only, "That he had ſeen ſome precedents for it." This remark is only to ſhew, with what caution the hiſtory of father Orleans, though dictated by king James himſelf, is to be read.

The earl of Shaftſbury was therefore more expoſed to the reſentment of the commons, than any other of the cabal, not only for pernicious counſels given the king, in conjunction with his four colleagues, the ſecret whereof was not yet known, but chiefly for the writs iſſued by him as chancellor, ſo deſtructive of their rights and privileges. He had therefore reaſon to fear a vigorous proſecution for this fact, and it is certain, the party oppoſite to the court had already projected an accuſation againſt him. On the other hand, the weakneſs he had diſcovered in the king, gave him no hopes of a protection from thence. He believed, therefore, he had no other way to divert the impending ſtorm, than by quitting the king's party, and throwing himſelf into the contrary. "He executed this reſolution, ſays father Orleans, the day after the king reſolved to revoke his declaration for liberty of conſcience. It was eleven at night before the king had taken his laſt reſolution, and the next morning the earl of Shaftſbury appeared in the houſe of lords, at the head of the moſt violent party, againſt the catholic religion, the Dutch war, and the union with France." He did more, if father Orleans is to be credited, for in a full houſe he diſcovered the reaſons which had induced the king to grant liberty of conſcience, join with France, and declare war againſt againſt the ſtates. I doubt not his diſcovering this ſecret to his new party, but confeſs, I muſt have better evidence than that of father Orleans, to convince me, that this diſcovery was made publicly in a full houſe, and on this very occaſion, eſpecially, before the king and duke of York, who were that day preſent in the houſe. This would have been a formal accuſation againſt the king, the duke of York, and the other four members of the cabal, of which he could have given no proofs, if they had been demanded. He had too much ſenſe to expoſe himſelf to ſuch a danger. The occaſion of his declaring publicly againſt the king, on the day I am ſpeaking of, was this.

The lord treaſurer Clifford, ignorant of Shaftſbury's intentions, paid him a viſit the night before, and communicating to him a project for eſtabliſhing a perpetual fund to free the king from his dependance on the parliament, read to him a ſpeech, he had prepared to ſpeak on the morrow concerning this project in the houſe of lords. The earl of Shaftſbury ſeemed highly pleaſed with the ſpeech, and deſired to hear it again. The next day, the king and duke of York coming to the houſe to countenance the project with their preſence, the lord Clifford ſpoke his ſpeech. He had no ſooner done, than the earl of Shaftſbury ſtood up and anſwered his ſpeech from the beginning to the end. He demonſtrated the project to be extravagant and impracticable; that it would overturn the government, and perhaps ſend the king and royal family abroad again, to ſpend their days in exile without hopes of a return. If the treaſurer's ſpeech ſurpriſed the lords who perceived the deſign of it, their aſtoniſhment was increaſed when they ſaw the chancellor, a leading member of the cabal, declare ſo openly againſt the king. It is ſaid the duke of York, whilſt Shaftſbury was ſpeaking, whiſpered the king, "What a rogue have you of a lord chancellor!" and that the king replied, "What a fool have you of a lord treaſurer!" I know not whether the truth of theſe particulars is to be relied on, ſome of which are improbable. For what likelihood is there, that the king, after breaking the ſeal of his declaration with his own hands, for fear of the parliament, ſhould appear, within a few hours after, in the houſe of lords, to ſupport, by his preſence, the treaſurer's project, which tended to the ſubverſion of parliaments? or that he ſhould call the treaſurer fool, for a propoſal which the king could not be ignorant of, and had doubtleſs approved [z].

However, the earl of Shaftſbury from this time was always at the head of the country party, and cauſed the king to undergo great mortifications, as will hereafter appear. But I muſt give here a very material caution to thoſe who read father Orleans's hiſtory, or ſuch Engliſh or foreign authors as eſpouſe the king's cauſe. All theſe writers paint the earl of Shaftſbury in very black colours. He was, according to them, the greateſt villain that ever lived; his wickedneſs was anſwerable to the extent of his genius, and the depth of his penetration. He was perpetually contriving how to torment the king and duke of York, or rather to ruin them irrecoverably. He was not only the head but the ſoul, of his party, by which they were actuated. In ſhort, every thing tranſacted afterwards by the parliament againſt the king, is ſolely imputed to him, and it is artfully inſinuated, that, had it not been for ſuch an agent, the nation would have remained in tranquillity, and the parliament, content with the king's favourable anſwers, and gracious promiſes, would have been quiet, and attempted nothing againſt the court. Thus, according to theſe writers, all the meaſures and precautions taken afterwards by the parliament againſt the deſigns of the court, were entirely owing to Shaftſbury's malice and revenge. It is eaſy to perceive, that their deſign is to cauſe to vaniſh the grounds of the parliament's fear and complaint of the conduct of the court, by inſinuating, that theſe complaints were frivolous, and the effects of Shaftſbury's vengeance, who, they ſay, directed both houſes of parliament, or rather had them entirely at command. For my part, I am no way concerned to vindicate the earl of Shaftſbury's honour, but believe myſelf obliged to remark, for the more eaſy diſcovery of the truth, that the project of the cabal to render the king abſolute, and introduce popery, is of unqueſtionable certainty. The authors juſt mentioned, ſcruple not to own it, and ſhould they deny it, the thing would not be leſs true. Conſequently the parliament coming to a full and exact knowledge of this deſign, which was only ſuſpected before, had all the reaſon in the world for their fear and caution againſt the king and his miniſters. This being granted, let the earl of Shaftſbury have been a villain, or an honeſt man; let him have betrayed the king's ſecrets, and acted only through a ſpirit of revenge; let his fear of the parliament be the ſole motive of his engaging in the country party againſt the king; or let him have acted from a principle of honour and duty, in order to ſave the church and ſtate, the thing itſelf, remains the ſame. The good or bad qualities of the earl of Shaftſbury did not cauſe the parliament to have more or leſs reaſon to fear the deſigns of the king and his miniſters. If they were prejudicial to religion and the ſtate, as cannot be denied, the parliament had reaſon to take the beſt meaſures to prevent them. Why therefore are theſe meaſures, theſe precautions, aſcribed to Shaftſbury's malice and artifices, ſince there was another and more natural cauſe. Before the earl of Shaftſbury appeared in the party contrary to the court, the parliament had begun to take theſe precautions, though the court's deſigns were yet but ſuſpected: they were better informed by the earl of Shaftſbury; why therefore is it ſuppoſed, that after this information, they ſuddenly relinquiſh their former motives, and act only with a view to ſerve as inſtruments of Shaftſbury's revenge? this is not even probable, and yet the authors abovementioned loſe no opportunity of reproaching the earl of Shaftſbury, and aſcribing ſolely to him all the mortifications, the king afterwards received. Beſides the reader's inſtruction, my deſign, in what I have ſaid, is to hinder ſuch as have read, or ſhall read the other hiſtorians, from thinking it ſtrange that I do not every moment exclaim againſt the earl of Shaftſbury's conduct, as if he were the ſole author of what was done againſt the king; and that I content myſelf with ſaying in a word, this lord uſed all his intereſt and credit to break the meaſures of the king and his miniſters.

Immediately after this change in the earl of Shaftſbury, the commons paſſed a bill, afterwards called the teſt act, intitled, "An act for preventing the dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants." This act required that all perſons enjoying any office or place of truſt and profit, ſhould take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy in public and open court, and ſhould alſo receive the ſacrament in ſome pariſh church, immediately after divine ſervice; and deliver a certificate ſigned by the miniſters and churchwardens, atteſted by the oaths of two credible witneſſes, and put upon record: and that all perſons taking the ſaid oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy ſhould likewiſe make and ſubſcribe this following declaration——"I do declare, that I do believe, that there is not any tranſubſtantiation in the ſacrament of the lord's ſupper, or in the elements of bread and wine, at or after the conſecration thereof, by any perſon whatſoever."——This bill readily paſſed the houſe of commons, and after ſome difficulties, was alſo

[z] This buſineſs of Shaftſbury's turning againſt the court is thus related by Burnet. The lord Clifford reſolving to aſſert the declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſhewed the heads he intended to ſpeak on to the king, who approved of them. He began the debate with rough words, calling the vote of the commons, Monſtrum horrendum ingens, and run on in a high ſtrain. When he had done the earl of Shaftſbury, to the amazement of the whole houſe ſaid, He muſt differ from the lord that ſpoke laſt, toto cœlo. He ſaid while theſe matters were debated out of doors, he might think with others that the king's ſupremacy did warrant the declaration: But now, that ſuch a houſe of commons were of another mind, he ſubmitted his reaſons to theirs. They were the king's great council, and muſt both adviſe and ſupport him. The king was all in fury to be thus forſaken by his chancellor, and told the lord Clifford how well he was pleaſed with his ſpeech, and how highly offended with the other. The debate went on, and upon a diviſion the court had the majority. But above thirty of the moſt conſiderable of the houſe proteſted againſt the vote. So the court ſaw they gained nothing in carrying a vote, that drew after it ſuch a proteſtation. It ſeems Clifford, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, were for violent meaſures, whilſt Arlington and Shaftſbury preſſed the king to content the parliament. Accordingly, in the afternoon of the day that the matter had been argued in the houſe of lords Shaftſbury and Arlington got all thoſe members of the commons, who were in the court party, to go privately to the king one after another, and tell him, that upon Clifford's ſpeech the houſe was in ſuch fury, that probably they would have gone to impeachments, had it not been for Shaftſbury's ſpeaking on the other ſide, who, they believed, ſpoke the king's ſenſe, as the other did the duke's. So they made the king apprehend, the chancellor's ſpeech, with which he was ſo offended, was really a great ſervice done him, and perſuaded him farther, that he might now ſave himſelf, and obtain an indemnity for his miniſters, if he would part with the declaration, and paſs the bill. Whereupon, before night the king was quite changed, and ſaid to his brother, that Clifford had undone himſelf, and ſpoiled all by his ſpeech; and though Shaftſbury had ſpoke like a rogue, yet that had ſtopt a fury, which the other's indiſcretion had kindled. The duke, in the evening told Clifford what the king ſaid. Upon which Clifford went to the king, and ſaid, he thought, that in what he had done he had both ſerved and pleaſed the king, but was ſurpriſed to find by the duke, that the king was of another mind. The king, in ſome confuſion, owned, that all he had ſaid was right in itſelf, but he ſhould have conſidered better what the commons could bear. Clifford finding he muſt loſe the white ſtaff, conſulted with Buckingham whom to recommend for treaſurer, and they pitched upon ſir Thomas Oſborn, afterwards duke of Leeds, p. 348, &c.

approved by the lords [a]. The earl of Briſtol, though a papiſt, made a ſpeech on this occaſion, and concluded with ſaying, "Upon the whole matter, however the ſentiments of a catholic of the church of Rome (not of the court of Rome) may oblige me, upon ſcruple of conſcience, to give my negative to this bill, yet as a member of a proteſtant parliament, my advice prudentially cannot but go along with the main ſcope of it, the preſent circumſtances of time, and affairs conſidered, and the neceſſity of compoſing the diſturbed minds of the people."

Beſides this bill there was another preparing to prevent intermarriages between proteſtants and papiſts. This tended directly to break the preſent negotiation of the duke of York's marriage with an archduchеſs of Inſpruch [b], and to hinder him from marrying any other catholic princeſs. The king, in the mean while, was very uneaſy, as he ſaw the parliament was informed of his ſecret reſolutions, and effectual meaſures were taken to prevent their execution. Wherefore he quickened the commons by ſeveral meſſages, to finiſh the money bill. But, inſtead of ſatisfying him, the commons, having provided for the ſecurity of religion, preſented him two addreſſes of grievances, one concerning England, the other Ireland. In the firſt, they told the king, that they were firmly perſuaded of his intention to govern according to the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom. Yet finding that ſome abuſes and grievances were crept into the government, they craved leave humbly to repreſent them to his majeſty's knowledge, and to deſire,

"1. That the impoſition of twelve pence per chaldron upon coals, for providing of convoys, by virtue of an order of council, dated the 15th of May 1672, may be recalled, and all bonds, taken by virtue thereof, cancelled.

"2. That his majeſty's proclamation of the 4th of December 1672, for preventing diſorders which may be committed by ſoldiers, and whereby the ſoldiers now in his majeſty's ſervice are in a manner exempted from the ordinary courſe of juſtice, may likewiſe be recalled.

"3. And whereas great complaints have been made out of ſeveral parts of the kingdom, of divers abuſes committed in quartering of ſoldiers, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to give orders to redreſs thoſe abuſes, and in particular, that no ſoldiers be hereafter quartered in any private houſes, and that due ſatisfaction may be given to the inn-keepers and victuallers where they lye, before they remove.

"4. And, ſince the continuance of ſoldiers in this realm will neceſſarily produce many inconveniences to his majeſty's ſubjects, they humbly repreſented it as their petition and advice, that when this preſent war is ended, all the ſoldiers that have been raiſed ſince the laſt ſeſſion of parliament may be diſbanded.

"5. That his majeſty would likewiſe be pleaſed to conſider of the irregularities and abuſes in preſſing ſoldiers, and give orders for the prevention thereof in future."

Theſe demands ſhew, how by degrees the court was labouring to introduce an abſolute authority: Firſt, by a light impoſition, by virtue of an order of council, of twelve pence upon every chaldron, or thirty ſix buſhels of coals. The tax was inconſiderable, but the conſequence very great. Secondly, the magiſtrates, in aſſuming the power of quartering ſoldiers in private houſes, eaſily found an opportunity to gall and oppreſs their enemies, and ſuch as were not well inclined to the court. Thirdly, in preſſing ſoldiers, the officers had room to commit many acts of injuſtice, by liſting not the moſt proper perſons for the ſervice, but the rich who were able to redeem themſelves with money. Though this practice was much uſed with regard to ſailors, and continues to this day, it had never extended to ſoldiers, or at leaſt but on very extraordinary occaſions.

The petition concerning the Iriſh grievances contained ſeveral articles, chiefly relating to religion. In one of theſe the commons deſired, his majeſty would be pleaſed to diſmiſs out of all command, civil or military, colonel Richard Talbot, who notoriouſly aſſumed the title of agent for the Roman catholics in Ireland, and forbid him all acceſs to his court. This Talbot was afterwards created duke of Tyrconnel, and lord lieutenant of Ireland by James II [c].

The king replied to theſe addreſſes, that as they conſiſted of ſo many different parts, it could not be expected he ſhould give a preſent anſwer. But promiſed, that for the ſeveral particular things contained in them, he would before the next meeting take ſuch effectual care, that no man ſhould have reaſon to complain. After this the money bill paſſed without oppoſition. But, not to approve expreſly the war for which the money was intended, the bill was intitled, "A ſupply of his majeſty's extraordinary occaſions [d]," and a particular proviſo was tacked to it, "That no papiſt ſhould be capable of holding any public employment."

[1673.] Before the bill in favour of the proteſtant diſſenters and ſome others were ready, the king came to the parliament the 29th of March, and paſſed ſeveral acts, amongſt which were the money bill, the teſt act, and an act for a general and free pardon, but with many exceptions [e]. Then he adjourned the parliament to the 20th of October. If the king in his declaration for liberty of conſcience had intended the eaſe of the proteſtant non-conformiſts, as he would have had it believed, he might have deferred the adjournment of the parliament a few days, till the bill paſſed in their favour was ready, or at leaſt might have preſſed the two houſes to finiſh it. But as the papiſts were excluded from the benefit of this act, he ſhewed no farther concern for the intereſt of the preſbyterians, but adjourned the parliament before the lords had given their conſent to the bill.

The teſt act having received the royal aſſent, moſt of the catholic officers quitted their places. The duke of York himſelf, who was the lord high admiral, reſigned that profitable office [f], and the lord Clifford that of high treaſurer. He retired to his paternal eſtate at Chudleigh in Devonſhire, where he died ſhortly after.

While theſe things paſſed in the parliament, preparations for the ſea war were making in England and Holland with equal ardour and vaſt expence. The duke of York having reſigned his office of lord high admiral, prince Rupert was appointed to command the fleet. Ruyter having ſecret intelligence, that the Engliſh fleet would not be ready ſo ſoon, put to ſea with forty two men of war, and ſixteen veſſels to be ſunk in the Thames [g]. He came into the mouth of the river the 2d of May, where he found he had been miſinformed, and that forty five large ſhips were coming to attack him. Upon this diſappointment, he retired to expect the reſt of his fleet at Schonevelt in Zealand. In this interval, prince Rupert ſailed to meet the French fleet coming from Breſt, and joined them in the channel the 16th of May. After the junction, the combined fleet conſiſted of one hundred and forty ſail of all ſorts, of which there were thirty large French ſhips [h]. The Dutch fleet had but an hundred and nine ſail, namely, fifty four large ſhips, fourteen frigates, twenty four fireſhips, eleven advice boats, and ſix galliots [i]. As I am not ſufficiently verſed in marine affairs to give clear ideas of ſea engagements, I ſhall only ſay, that this year was ſignalized by three naval engagements, fought with ſuch equal loſs, that neither could juſtly boaſt of victory, though both challenged it in every battle. The firſt was fought near Schonevelt the 28th of May. The ſecond off Fluſhing the 4th of June, but this was rather a cannonading of about four hours, after which both ſides retired to their reſpective coaſts. The third, fought the 11th of Auguſt, was the moſt obſtinate. The Engliſh loſt vice-admiral Spragg, who was drowned in changing his ſhip [k], and the Dutch, vice-

As to what paſſed at land between France and the ſtates, I ſhall only ſay, that the king of France took Maeſtricht in June, and the prince of Orange, Naerden, a town near Amſterdam, in September, and afterwards Bonn, the reſidence of the elector of Cologne, in October. Theſe two conqueſts, and the neceſſity the king of France was under to maintain the war againſt Spain (which had at laſt declared againſt him, beſides that the emperor, and ſeveral German princes, were alſo upon the point of declaring for the ſtates) obliged him to abandon all his conqueſts in the United Provinces, except Maeſtricht and Grave, where he left garriſons, after having drawn out all the reſt in November.

In the mean time, a congreſs was held at Cologne for peace, but with no ſucceſs.

The 19th of June the king, at Buckingham's recommendation, made ſir Thomas Oſborn, afterwards earl of Danby, lord treaſurer.

The duke of York, as I have ſaid, had caſt his eyes upon an archduchеſs of Inſpruch, a branch of the houſe of Auſtria. But the empreſs dying at that time, the emperor married this princeſs himſelf. The duke was therefore obliged to make his addreſſes elſewhere; and as his zeal for the popiſh religion allowed him not to marry a proteſtant princeſs, he made choice of Maria d'Eſte, ſiſter to Francis duke of Modena, and the marriage was immediately concluded and ſolemnized by his proxy Henry Mordaunt, earl of Peterborough. The king of France greatly contributed to the marriage, by declaring the young princeſs, then but fifteen years of age, an adoptive daughter of France, and by engaging to pay her portion.

As the duke's marriage with a catholic princeſs could not but be very diſagreeable to the Engliſh, the court eaſily foreſaw, that the parliament, which was to meet the 20th of October, would endeavour to oppoſe it. There were ſeveral bills ready, which could be finiſhed in a few days; and as the parliament was only adjourned, the court feared they would begin with compleating theſe bills, two of which the court was deſirous to put a ſtop to, namely, the bill againſt intermarriages between proteſtants and papiſts, and that for the eaſe of the proteſtant diſſenters. Wherefore the king eaſily reſolved to prorogue the parliament. The firſt thing the commons did, after their meeting, was, to preſent an addreſs to the king, to deſire that the duke's marriage with the princeſs of Modena might not be conſummated, and that he might not be married to any but a proteſtant. Upon this, the king prorogued the parliament to the 27th of the ſame month, to defeat the two bills above mentioned, and ſome others not more agreeable to him.

The 27th of October the king coming to the parliament with the uſual formalities, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them,——"That having conſented to a negotiation at Cologne, he hoped to have welcomed them with an honourable peace; but the Dutch had diſappointed him in that expectation, and treated his embaſſadors at Cologne with the contempt of conquerors, and not as might have been expected from men in their condition. That this obliged him to move them again for a ſupply, the ſafety and honour of the nation neceſſarily requiring it; that it muſt be proportionable to the occaſion, and if he had it not ſpeedily, the miſchief would be irreparable in his preparations for the next ſpring."—He told them, "That he was ſteady in maintaining all the profeſſions and promiſes made to them concerning religion and property; and ſhould be very ready to give them freſh inſtances of his zeal for preſerving the eſtabliſhed religion and laws, as often as any occaſion ſhall require. In the laſt place, he commended to their conſideration and care, the debt he owed the goldſmiths, in which very many others of his good ſubjects were involved."——

This debt to the goldſmiths was contracted by the king when he ſhut up the exchequer, and amounted to more than two millions ſterling. Thus the king, after a ſeizure of other men's property, by a pure act of authority, pretended, it belonged to the parliament to make reparation, on account of the application of the money to a war, of which he had not vouchſafed to communicate the deſign to them. This was the hardeſt caſe that had for a long time happened in England. For, on one hand, it was a melancholy thing to ſee ſo many families ruined, in ſupport of an expence which ought to have been common to the whole nation. But on the other hand, to pay this debt, was to eſtabliſh a precedent of a terrible conſequence, and authoriſe the king and his ſucceſſors to employ the ſame, or the like methods, for raiſing of money, without conſent of parliament. As for the twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds granted the king for his extraordinary occaſions in the laſt ſeſſion, he believed, that ſum ought not to be employed in diſcharging this debt, nor even in maintaining the Dutch war, ſince a new ſupply was demanded for that purpoſe.

After the king had ended his ſpeech, the chancellor enlarged with great eloquence upon all the points touched by the king. But his ſpeech made little impreſſion upon the commons. They were no ſooner returned to their houſe, but inſtead of voting the king thanks for his ſpeech, they adjourned themſelves to the 30th of the month. The ſame day the king ſent them his anſwer to their addreſs concerning the duke of York's marriage, the ſubſtance of which was,——"That he perceived the houſe of commons had wanted a full information of this matter, the marriage not being barely intended, but compleated, according to the forms uſed amongſt princes, and by his royal conſent and authority: nor could he in the leaſt ſuppoſe it diſagreeable to the houſe of commons, his royal highneſs having been, in the view of the world, for ſeveral months, engaged in a treaty of marriage with another catholic princeſs, and yet a parliament held during the time, and not the leaſt exception taken at it." The houſe was by no means pleaſed with this anſwer; and therefore reſolved to preſent a ſecond addreſs, with their reaſons againſt the marriage. The ſame day it was voted, that a bill ſhould be prepared for a general teſt between proteſtants and papiſts, that is to ſay, an oath which ſhould ſerve to diſtinguiſh proteſtants from papiſts, with this clauſe, "That they who refuſed to take it ſhould be incapable of bearing any office civil or military, or to ſit in parliament, or to come within five miles of the court."

The 31ſt of October the commons took the king's ſpeech into conſideration, and after a ſerious debate in a grand committee, came to the following reſolution, "That the houſe conſidering the preſent condition of the nation, will not take into any farther debate, the conſideration of any aid, or ſupply, or charge upon the ſubject, before the time of payment of the eighteen months aſſeſſment granted by a late act of parliament, intitled, An act for raiſing the ſum of twelve hundred thirty eight thouſand, ſeven hundred and fifty pounds, be expired; except it ſhall appear, that the obſtinacy of the Dutch ſhall render it neceſſary; nor before this kingdom be effectually ſecured from popery, and popiſh counſellors, and the other preſent grievances be redreſſed."

The king, as may well be imagined, was extremely offended with this reſolution, and the more as it was followed by an addreſs for a general faſt, to be obſerved throughout the whole kingdom, which intimated to the people, that the kingdom was in great danger. Two days after, the houſe in a body waited on the king with a ſecond addreſs againſt the duke of York's marriage, in which, after many compliments, they repreſented to him,——"1. That if this match do proceed, it will be a means to diſquiet the minds of his proteſtant ſubjects at home; and to fill them with endleſs jealouſies and diſcontents; and will bring his majeſty into ſuch alliances abroad, as will prove highly prejudicial, if not deſtructive to the intereſts of the very proteſtant religion itſelf. 2. They find by ſad experience, that ſuch marriages had increaſed and encouraged popery in the kingdom, and had given opportunity to prieſts and jeſuits, to propagate their opinions, and ſeduce great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects. 3. They do already obſerve, how much the party is animated with the hopes of this match, which was lately diſcouraged by his majeſty's gracious conceſſions in the laſt meeting of the parliament. 4. They greatly fear this may be an occaſion to leſſen the affections of the people to his royal highneſs, who is ſo nearly related to the crown, and whoſe honour and eſteem they deſire may always be entirely preſerved. 5. That for another age more at leaſt, this kingdom will be under the continual apprehenſions of the growth of popery, and the danger of the proteſtant religion. Laſtly, they conſidered, that this princeſs having ſo near a relation and kindred to many eminent perſons of the court of Rome, may give them great opportunities to promote their deſigns, and carry on their practices here, and by the ſame means penetrate into his majeſty's moſt ſecret counſels, and more eaſily diſcover the ſtate of the whole kingdom. And finding by the opinions of very learned men, that it is generally admitted, that ſuch treaties and contracts by proxies are diſſolvable, of which there are ſeveral inſtances to be produced, they do in all humility beſeech his majeſty, to put a ſtop to the conſummation of this intended marriage. And this they do the more importunately deſire, becauſe they have not, as yet, the happineſs to ſee any iſſue of his majeſty, that might ſucceed in the government of his kingdom."———To this addreſs the king briefly replied, "That it was a matter he would take into his preſent conſideration, and would ſpeedily return an anſwer." After which the commons proceeded farther, and voted the ſtanding army a grievance, and accordingly, prepared an addreſs to be preſented to his majeſty, ſhewing, "That the ſtanding army was a grievance, and a burthen to the nation."

But the 4th of November, the day on which the commons were to preſent their addreſs, the king came unexpectedly to the houſe of peers, and ſent for the commons. It happened that the ſpeaker and the uſher of the black rod met both at the door of the houſe of commons, but, as the ſpeaker was within the houſe, the door was immediately ſhut againſt the uſher, who came with the king's meſſage. The ſpeaker was forced into the chair, and while the uſher continued knocking at the door, the houſe voted, "That the alliance with France was a grievance. 2. That the evil counſellors about the king were a grievance. And, 3. That the duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, and not fit to be truſted or employed in any office or place of truſt." Upon which there was a general cry, "to the queſtion, to the queſtion!" But, the black rod knocking earneſtly at the door, the ſpeaker leaped out of the chair, and the houſe roſe in great confuſion. When the commons came to the houſe of lords, the king made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, in which he repreſented the great advantages which the enemy would reap from the leaſt appearance of a difference between him and his parliament.—He told them, he would not be wanting to let all his ſubjects ſee, "That no care ſhould be greater than his own in the effectual ſuppreſſing of popery." He then prorogued the parliament to the 7th day of January following, and thus put an end to the twelfth ſeſſion of this long parliament, which had continued but nine days.

Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, the king took the great ſeal from the earl of Shaftſbury, and gave it to ſir Heneage Finch[m], with the title of lord keeper. Soon after, the king ordered that no perſon who was a Roman catholic, or reputed to be ſo, ſhould preſume to come near his perſon or court. He likewiſe publiſhed a proclamation for the rigorous execution of the laws againſt papiſts. This was the eighth of the kind ſince his reſtoration, and executed as the other ſeven.

But the proclamation was not capable to remove the fears occaſioned by the duke of York's marriage with the princeſs of Modena, which was conſummated the 21ſt of November, on the day of her arrival in England with the ducheſs her mother[n].

[1673-4.] The parliament meeting the 7th of January, the king repreſented to both houſes,—"That no propoſal of peace from the Dutch had been yet offered with an intent to conclude, but only to amuſe: that therefore, the way to a good peace, was to ſet out a good fleet, which there was time enough to do effectually, if the ſupply was not delayed. That a ſpeedy, a proportionable, and above all, a chearful aid, was now more neceſſary than ever: he once more put them in mind of his debt to the goldſmiths: and then told them, that his alliance with France had been very ſtrangely miſrepreſented to them, as if there were certain ſecret articles of dangerous conſequence; but he would make no difficulty of letting the treaties, and all the articles of them, without any the leaſt reſerve, be ſeen by a ſmall committee of both houſes, who might report the true ſcope of them."

Then the lord keeper enlarged upon all theſe points with exceſſive flattery to the king, for his extraordinary care to maintain the laws and religion, and that this might not be doubted, he alledged for proof, the aſſurances given by the king. Above all, he magnified the king's offer, of letting them ſee the treaties with France, as a condeſcenſion which could not be ſufficiently acknowledged, but by an extraordinary ſupply. In a word, the king's and the keeper's ſpeeches were founded upon this principle, that the war with the ſtates was juſt and neceſſary, and conſequently to be vigorouſly maintained, in order to an honourable peace.

It does not appear, that the two houſes much regarded the king's offer of laying before them his treaties with France, ſince it was in his power to ſhew them what he pleaſed, and ſuppreſs the reſt. The king perceived therefore, into what difficulties the cabal had thrown him by their violent counſels. He had loſt the confidence of his people, and neither his words nor his promiſes were any longer relied on. It was in vain for him to proteſt his zeal for the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of his ſubjects: theſe proteſtations could not obliterate his paſt proceedings, which gave but too juſt cauſe to ſuſpect his ſincerity. Wherefore, the parliament, without regarding his words, conſidered his actions, and laboured to take effectual meaſures, to prevent the execution of the court's deſigns, which were but too manifeſt. There were many things concerning which they openly expreſſed their fear and diſcontent. 1. The growth of popery publicly encouraged by the court. 2. The exorbitant power of France, which in the end could not but prove prejudicial to England. 3. The Dutch war, undertaken directly contrary to the intereſt of England, and for which however the king was inceſſantly demanding ſupplies, on a ſuppoſition of its being juſt and neceſſary, though he had alledged no lawful cauſe for it. 4. The management of affairs in Ireland, where the act of eſtabliſhment was openly trampled upon, and papiſts continually advanced or encouraged. 5. The king's proceedings in England, which were clear evidences of his principles and deſigns; namely, his raiſing a land army without any neceſſity; his granting liberty of conſcience by his ſole authority; his ſhutting up the exchequer; his diſpenſing with acts of parliament; his making a ſtrict alliance with France, when he ſhould rather have uſed his endeavours to oppoſe the increaſe of her greatneſs. 6. The open profeſſion of the popiſh religion by the duke of York, and his marriage with a popiſh princeſs, authoriſed by the king, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the parliament. 7. The three miniſters, ſtill employed by the king, namely, Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, all three of the moſt arbitrary principles, plainly ſhewed, it was not for the good of the kingdom, that the king uſed their counſels. Theſe were too real cauſes of complaint, to be ſilenced by the king's general proteſtation on every occaſion to maintain the laws and religion. Something more ſubſtantial than words was neceſſary to diſpel the ſuſpicions and fears of the people and parliament. Wherefore the parliament reſolved to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate. This very parliament which had conſidered as execrable rebels, the oppoſers of Charles I's uſurpations, was obliged to purſue the ſame meaſures againſt the encroachments of Charles II. as were begun with by the parliament of 1640. If this produced not a civil war, it is to be aſcribed to the weakneſs, fears, or, perhaps, to the abilities of the king, who, leſs obſtinate, and more diſcerning than his father, did not think proper to abandon himſelf entirely to the counſels of his miniſters, and particularly of the duke his brother. For, certainly, as the parliament ſtood affected, an extreme confuſion, if not a ſecond and more bloody civil war muſt have been the conſequence of the king's attachment to his principles and deſigns. Nothing is more proper to confirm this conjecture, than the revolution in the reign of James II. That prince, naturally more furious and obſtinate than his brother, reſolving to run all hazards, found the Engliſh, in their turns, as reſolute to venture all in the defence of their laws, religion, and liberty.

In order to proceed according to this plan, the houſe of lords preſented an addreſs to the king, praying him to iſſue out his royal proclamation, requiring all papiſts and reputed papiſts to remove out of London and Weſtminſter, during the ſeſſion of the parliament. Accordingly his majeſty without delay publiſhed a proclamation, dated the 14th of January, declaring, "That as he had always manifeſted his zeal for the preſervation of the true religion eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, and to hinder the growth and increaſe of popery, ſo he was now ready, upon this occaſion, to prevent all fears and dangers that might ariſe by the concourſe of perſons of that profeſſion, in or near the cities of London and Weſtminſter, &c." This pretended zeal had ſhewed itſelf but in eight proclamations, already publiſhed by him at ſeveral times againſt the papiſts, the negligent execution of which is very viſible from the number. When the king's affectation of boaſting continually his zeal for the proteſtant religion and againſt popery is conſidered, and when on the other hand it is remembered, that he had abjured the proteſtant religion, and had a chapel ſecretly in his palace, where he daily heard maſs, and ſometimes even communicated the ſame day at his proteſtant and popiſh chapels, one knows not what to think of ſuch monſtrous diſſimulation.

The next day, both houſes joined in an addreſs to the king for a general faſt, to implore God's bleſſing againſt the efforts of popery, &c. Nothing was more offenſive to the king than ſuch addreſſes, which plainly implied, that religion was in danger, and through his fault; but he durſt not refuſe them, and therefore the 4th of February was appointed for a day of humiliation.

At laſt, the commons taking the king's laſt ſpeech into conſideration, voted, "That the houſe will in the firſt place proceed to have their grievances effectually redreſſed, the proteſtant religion, their liberties and properties effectually ſecured, and to ſuppreſs popery, and remove all perſons and counſellors popiſhly affected, or otherways obnoxious or dangerous to the government." Then they preſented an addreſs to the king——"That the militia of the city of London, and county of Middleſex, might be in readineſs at an hour's warning, and the militia of all other counties in England at a day's warning, for ſuppreſſing of all tumultuous inſurrections which might be occaſioned by papiſts or any other malecontented perſons." The king anſwered to this addreſs, "That he would take a ſpecial care, as well for the preſervation of their perſons, as of their liberties and properties."

This addreſs was only to inſinuate to the people, that the kingdom was in danger, and to juſtify beforehand the meaſures intended to be taken by the houſe, againſt thoſe who were conſidered as the principal authors of the danger, I mean the members of the cabal. By the death of lord Clifford, and the change in the earl of Shaftſbury, this council was reduced to three, namely, the dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, and the earl of Arlington. The houſe began with the duke of Lauderdale, and unanimouſly voted, "That an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, to remove the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his preſence and councils for ever, being a perſon obnoxious and dangerous to the government."

The duke of Buckingham, while the commons were debating upon the heads of his accuſation, requeſted to be heard before their houſe, which was granted. But as his ſpeech, in vindication of himſelf, was full of ambiguities, the houſe referred his examination to the next day, and drew up ſome queries, to which he was required to give diſtinct anſwers. As theſe queſtions follow from what had paſſed, and tend to illuſtrate the hiſtory, I think myſelf obliged to inſert them, without adding his anſwers, the greateſt part of which left things as obſcure as they were before [o].

1. Whether any perſons declared to his grace any ill advice or purpoſes againſt the liberties and privileges of the houſe of commons: or to alter the government; who they were, and what they adviſed?

2. Some words fell from your grace yeſterday, wherein you were pleaſed to ſay, you had got nothing, but others had gotten three, four, or five hundred thouſand pounds; who were they that had gotten theſe ſums, and by what means?

His anſwer to this was,——That he was not at all acquainted by what means they got ſo much: that the duke of Ormond had got five hundred thouſand pounds, which was upon record; that lord Arlington had not got ſo much, but had got a great deal.

3. By whoſe advice was the army raiſed, and monſieur Schomberg made general [p]?

4. By whoſe advice was this army brought up to awe the debates and reſolutions of the houſe of commons?

5. Who made the triple alliance?

6. Who made the firſt treaty with France, by which the triple alliance was broken?

He anſwered, I made it.

7. By whoſe advice was the exchequer ſhut up, and the order of payment there broken?

8. Who adviſed the declaration in matters of religion?

9. Who adviſed the attacking the Smyrna fleet before the war was proclaimed [q]?

10. By whoſe advice was the ſecond treaty at Utrecht?

11. By what council was the war begun without the parliament, and thereupon the parliament prorogued?

12. By whoſe advice was the parliament prorogued the 4th of November laſt?

I did not think fit to add all the duke's anſwers, becauſe it is not juſt to prejudice the reader againſt thoſe whom the duke of Buckingham accuſed to clear himſelf. But the queſtions are very proper to ſhew, what it was that the commons blamed in the conduct of the king and the cabal. They were ſo little ſatisfied with the duke's anſwers, that they paſſed the ſame vote againſt him as againſt Lauderdale.

The commons, it ſeems, principally intended to ruin the earl of Arlington, ſince, notwithſtanding his defence before the houſe, they drew up an impeachment againſt him, conſiſting of ſeveral articles. But as the impeachment was not purſued, I do not think it juſt to inſert the articles, ſince I cannot alſo inſert what the earl could urge in his defence. I ſhall therefore only ſay, that the impeachment chiefly concerned the open protection, granted by the earl of Arlington, as ſecretary, to the catholics; and ſome actions tending to promote arbitrary power, or his own private intereſt [r].

After this, the commons proceeded to prepare a bill for a general teſt, by which every perſon refuſing to take it ſhould be made incapable to enjoy any office civil or military, to ſit in either houſe of parliament, or to come within five miles of the court. The teſt was in theſe words:

"I do ſolemnly, from my heart, and in the preſence of almighty God profeſs, teſtify and declare, that I do not believe in my conſcience that the church of Rome is the only catholic and univerſal church of Chriſt, out of which there is no ſalvation; or that the pope hath any juriſdiction or ſupremacy over the catholic church in general, or over myſelf in particular; or that it belongs to the ſaid church of Rome alone to judge of the true ſenſe and interpretation of the holy ſcriptures; or that in the holy ſacrament of the euchariſt, there is made a perfect change of the whole ſubſtance of the bread into Chriſt's body, or of the whole ſubſtance of the wine into Chriſt's blood, which change the ſaid church of Rome calleth Tranſubſtantiation; or that the virgin Mary, or any other ſaint ought to be worſhipped or prayed unto: and all theſe aforeſaid doctrines and poſitions I do renounce and diſclaim, as falſe and erroneous, and contrary to God's word, and the chriſtian religion." It was not without reaſon that this oath was called the teſt or trial, ſince it was as a touchſtone to diſtinguiſh the papiſts from the proteſtants, there being no catholic who could in conſcience take this oath. The king had already given his conſent to an act which impoſed much the ſame oath. But that was only for thoſe who were in office or employment, whereas this was univerſal, and might be required of all ſuſpected perſons. But, before the bill was ready, the king prorogued the parliament, and ſo defeated both this, and ſeveral other bills tending to the ſame end.

Since the ſtates general had perceived that the parliament approved not of the war the king was making againſt them, they had never ceaſed to ſollicit the king to a ſeparate peace [s], and had offered him whatever he could reaſonably expect, in ſuppoſing he deſigned the advantage of his kingdom. But as that was not the caſe, it is plain, their offers could not ſatisfy him. To content him, the commonwealth of the ſeven provinces ſhould have been entirely deſtroyed, and the king of France put in poſſeſſion. But as he durſt not openly avow this demand, he pretended to find in the offers of the ſtates, only ambiguous or inſolent propoſitions, and from thence took occaſion to reject them. But affairs afterwards took a turn which obliged him to come into other meaſures. The victories he hoped for at Sea with the aſſiſtance of France, came to nothing. If his fleet was [o] The firſt day of his being before the houſe, he fell into ſuch diſorder, that he pretended he was taken ill, and deſired to be admitted again. Next day he was more compoſed. He juſtified his own deſigns, laying all the ill counſels upon others, chiefly the lord Arlington, intimating plainly, that the root of all errors was in the king and duke. He ſaid, hunting was a good diverſion, but if a man would hunt with a brace of lobſters, he would have but ill ſport. He had applied this ſaying to prince Rupert and lord Arlington; but now it was underſtood to go higher. Burnet, p. 367.

[p] This army was to make a deſcent into Holland. See a little lower.

[q] He ſaid, it was lord Arlington. See Echard, tom. III. p. 348.

[r] The earl excuſed himſelf, but without blaming the king. This had ſo good an effect, that he was acquitted, though by a ſmall majority. But the care he took to preſerve himſelf, loſt him his high favour with the king. Burnet, p. 366.

[s] The ſtates, ſays Burnet, committed a great error in deſiring this peace, without deſiring at the ſame time, that king Charles ſhould enter into the alliance for reducing the French to the terms of the triple alliance. But the prince of Orange thought, that if he could once ſeparate the king from his alliance with France, the other point would ſoon be brought about, p. 366.

not beaten in the four late engagements, at leaſt, it had gained no advantage over that of the ſtates. He had expected to give a mortal wound to the ſtates by a deſcent into Holland, and for that purpoſe had ſent for Schomberg to head his forces. But that general had been unſucceſsful in his expedition, and obliged to return without any thing done. The king of France, as I ſaid, had been forced to abandon his conqueſts in Holland, to defend himſelf againſt the new enemies raiſed him by the ſtates. In ſhort, the parliament diſcovering the ſecret intent of this war, not only refuſed any farther ſupplies, but were preparing to bring the adviſers to juſtice. On the other hand, the king had managed the money granted by parliament, and that of the exchequer, with ſo little œconomy, that he had not a ſhilling left. His profuſion had been ſo exceſſive, that it appeared, from orders counterſigned by the earl of Arlington ſecretary of ſtate, that he had given away above three millions ſterling, to ſeveral private perſons. In a word, he did not know which way to turn himſelf for the continuance of the war, as he ſaw his parliament little inclined to furniſh the means. All theſe reaſons were very capable to induce him to liſten to the offers made him by the ſtates. He therefore began by degrees, to diſcover, that he ſhould not be averſe to a reaſonable peace, provided the ſtates would have ſuch regard to his honour as he had room to expect. When there was no other difficulty, the ſtates wrote him a very ſubmiſſive letter, and at the ſame time ſent full powers to the marquis del Freſno, the Spaniſh embaſſador at London, to conclude a peace in their name, on the conditions already offered, but rejected by the king, on pretence they were only deſigned to amuſe him. Theſe propoſals were ſo reaſonable, and offered in ſo ſolemn a manner, that they could not be rejected without alarming the whole kingdom, and confirming the ſuſpicions, which were but too general, that the war was not deſigned for the advantage of the people. Beſides, the king's affairs required a ſpeedy peace [t].

Preſently after the receipt of the ſtates letter, the king came to the parliament the 24th of January, and communicated to both houſes the offers from the Dutch, deſiring their advice on the affair. They anſwered that it was their opinion, his majeſty ſhould proceed in a treaty with the ſtates, in order to a ſpeedy peace. From that time, all difficulties relating to the peace were removed, in the conferences between the marquis del Freſno, and the king's commiſſioners [u], and the treaty was concluded in a fortnight [w].

In this ſhort interval, the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the grievances of the nation. They inſiſted chiefly upon keeping an army compoſed of regular troops, and after a vote that it was a grievance to the kingdom, they reſolved to addreſs the king for diſbanding all forces raiſed ſince the year 1663. The examination of this affair gradually led them to that of the horſe and foot guards, eſtabliſhed by the king without the concurrence or approbation of the parliament. It was found, that they were of vaſt charge to the king and kingdom: that they were a ſtanding army in diſguiſe, which might be eaſily augmented: that guards were only in uſe in arbitrary governments: that they were altogether uſeleſs, as appeared from the king's daily truſting his perſon to his people without a guard.

The debate was interrupted by the king's coming to the houſe of peers, the 11th of February. The commons being ſent for, the king communicated to both houſes, that he had ſigned the peace with the Dutch. He told them moreover, in anſwer to their addreſs concerning the forces, that he had given orders for diſbanding even more than were deſired, and for ſending back the Iriſh regiments. He added, that he muſt needs acquaint them, that there was a great want of capital ſhips, and he ſhould be glad to be equal in number with his neighbours: he hoped therefore to have their aſſiſtance on ſuch an occaſion, to preſerve the honour and ſafety of the nation. The houſes thanked him for the peace he had made, and for his gracious anſwer to their addreſs.

This however was not capable to induce the commons to ſuſpend their debates upon the grievances. They voted, "that a committee ſhould be appointed to inſpect the laws lately made in Scotland, whereby an army is authoriſed to march into England or Ireland, by the ſole direction of the council of Scotland; and peruſe ſuch other laws as tend to the breach of the union of the two nations." They likewiſe in a grand committee reſolved, that a committee ſhould be appointed to inſpect the ſtate and condition of Ireland, more eſpecially with regard to religion, the militia, and the forces of that kingdom. They moreover appointed another committee,——"To inſpect the law, and to conſider how the king might commit any ſubject by his immediate warrant as the laws then ſtood; and to report their opinions;" and further, "they were to conſider how the law then ſtood touching the committing of perſons by the council table, and to report the ſame." Upon this occaſion they ordered a particular bill to be brought in, concerning writs of Habeas Corpus, which was read three times, and paſſed the houſe. A bill was likewiſe ordered to be brought in for a teſt to be taken by the members of both houſes.

It was a great mortification to the king to ſee the commons ſo rigouroufly examining his conduct; for all their reſolutions, in this ſeſſion, pointed to the former proceedings of the court. It may well be thought, that, as the project of the cabal was to render the king abſolute, and advance the intereſts of popery, the king and his miniſters had not been very ſcrupulous to gain firſt one point, and then another, in order to eſtabliſh precedents, and put the king in poſſeſſion of arbitrary power, in things which were not equally obvious to all. As the commons proceeded, it appeared plainly, they were reſolved not to omit any point. The king, therefore, to defeat their deſigns, made uſe of his conſtant method, and coming to the parliament the 24th of February, prorogued it to the 10th of November following, before any bill was ready for the royal aſſent. Thus ended the 13th ſeſſion of this parliament, after ſitting ſix weeks and three days. The prorogation was afterwards continued, and laſted about fourteen months.

The peace was proclaimed the 28th of February in London, with much greater demonſtrations of joy and ſatisfaction from the people, than the war had been two years before. The ſole difference between this peace and that of Breda was, that the ſhips and veſſels belonging to the ſtates, whether ſingle or in fleets, ſhould ſtrike the flag, and lower their topſail to thoſe of England [x], whether ſingle or in fleets, provided they carried the king's flag. Moreover the ſtates were to pay the king eight hundred thouſand patacoons at four payments, namely, two hundred thouſand on the exchange of the ratifications, and the reſt at three payments, within the ſpace of three years. Thus the people of England diſcharged the expence of the war, and the king alone reaped the benefit [y].

[1674] The king finding himſelf freed from the cares of war, and the uneaſineſſes cauſed by the parliament, abandoned himſelf entirely to a ſoft, indolent, and effeminate life. The ducheſs of Orleans his ſiſter had brought him, at their interview at Dover, the daughter of a gentleman of Bretagne, called de Queroualle, who commanded the king's affection beyond any of his miſtreſſes, and was created ducheſs of Portſmouth. But this particular fondneſs for her did not prevent his having many others, by whom he had ſeveral children, educated with no ſmall expence. In a word, not to dwell on what paſſed at a court ſo corrupted as that of Charles II. I ſhall only ſay, that the king's miſtreſſes had engroſſed the whole credit of the court, and that he could refuſe them nothing.

It does not appear, that France complained much of Charles for deſerting her, in making a ſeparate peace with the Dutch. This cauſed ſeveral politicians to think, that the king of France had given a full conſent to the peace, in order to make Charles mediator between him and his enemies, whoſe number was greatly increaſed, ſince the

And that it might have ſome ſhew of a peace both begged and bought, he propoſed, that a ſum of money ſhould be offered the king by the ſtates, which ſhould be made over by him to the prince, for the payment of the debt he owed him. Rouvigny, the French embaſſador, preſſed the king much to give his parliament all ſatisfaction in points of religion. The king anſwered him, if it was not for his brother's folly (la ſottiſe de mon frere) he would get out of all difficulties. In concluſion, the prince of Orange brought the ſtates to make applications to the king, in the ſtyle of thoſe who begged peace, though it was viſible they could have forced it, with the offer of two or three hundred thouſand pounds for the expence of the war, p. 366, 367.

laſt year. This ſuſpicion is farther confirmed by Charles's offer of his mediation to the king of France, ſoon after his peace with the ſtates, which he readily accepted, without the leaſt reſentment of what had been lately tranſacted. When the king was aſſured that his mediation was accepted by France, he ſent ſir William Temple into Holland to offer the ſame to the ſtates. As their towns and provinces were now recovered, except Maeſtricht and Grave, they paſſionately wiſhed for peace. The only obſtacle was, the intereſt of their allies, the emperor, the empire, and Spain, who having engaged in the war for their ſake, could not be abandoned without extreme ingratitude. The only way to pleaſe them was to bring things to a treaty, where they might find their ſatisfaction. So, without being much ſollicited, they accepted the king of England's mediation. It is true, France and the allies had already accepted that of the king of Sweden, who had uſed his endeavours to procure a peace by his embaſſadors at the congreſs of Cologne. But ſince that congreſs was broken off by the forcible carrying away of prince William of Fuſtemberg [z], the Swede had rendered himſelf ſuſpected to the allies, by diſcovering too much partiality to France. So the ſtates were not diſpleaſed to find another mediator to renew the conferences, though they had no great reaſon to confide in the king of England. But they were deſirous of peace, and ſuch was the ſituation of the affairs of Europe, that another mediator was not eaſy to be found. Wherefore, it was more advantageous to accept him, than to have none at all, and loſe the hope of ending the war. However this be, they ſo ſtrongly ſolicited all the princes their allies, that at laſt they were induced to accept the king of England's mediation. But there was a wide difference between agreeing upon a mediator and concluding a peace. So many various intereſts to adjuſt, made it eaſy to foreſee, that peace would be a very difficult work, beſides the accidents which the continuation of the war might produce, and which would be too apt to alter the pretenſions of the two parties. For inſtance, whilſt a mediation of peace was talked of at the Hague, a battle was fought at Seneff, which indeed decided nothing, but might have had great conſequences, if victory had entirely declared for one of the armies [a]. Moreover the prince of Orange took Grave in October.

I cannot forbear taking notice of a thing which became more public afterwards, and of which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more amply, namely, that, at the very time Charles performed the office of a mediator, he received from France an annual penſion of one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. By this we may judge of his impartiality. Moreover it appears in Coleman's letters, the duke of York's ſecretary [b], ſome of which were writ this year, that there was a cloſe union between the king of France and the duke of York, and that the latter entirely relied on the aſſiſtance of France for the execution of the project formed in favour of the Engliſh papiſts. This manifeſtly ſhews, that Charles had not deſiſted from his firſt deſigns, and only waited a favourable opportunity to execute them, when France, diſcharged from the burden of the preſent war, ſhould be in a condition to grant him the neceſſary aſſiſtance.

During theſe tranſactions, the papiſts of England were labouring to prevail with the king to diſſolve a parliament which was ſo oppoſite to them; this appears alſo in Coleman's letters. But the king did not think proper to take ſuch a ſtep ſo ſoon, which might have done him great prejudice, by exaſperating the people, and from which he could reap no other advantage, than to procure ſome eaſe for the papiſts. But this was not his principal view. For though he was a diſguiſed papiſt, he had ſo little zeal for religion, that he was by no means inclined to hazard his temporal intereſts, in complaiſance to the papiſts. He publiſhed therefore, on the contrary, a proclamation, to ſtifle the falſe report that the parliament would quickly be diſſolved, and to ſatisfy the people that the thing had never come under deliberation.

To finiſh the events of this year 1674, I ſhall only take notice of ſome particulars which may be of uſe for the ſequel. In September, the earl of Arlington was made lord chamberlain of the king's houſhold, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, who had been plenipotentiary at the congreſs of Cologne, was made ſecretary in his room. On the other hand the duke of Buckingham, who had been the king's principal favourite, loſt his favour and credit to ſuch a degree, that the king, without any ceremony, gave him a public affront, in declaring his office of chancellor of Cambridge vacant, and in influencing the election in favour of his natural ſon the duke of Monmouth.

The earl of Clarendon died this year at Roan in the 67th year of his age, after a ſeven years exile; during which he digeſted the memoirs he had collected to compoſe his hiſtory of the rebellion and civil wars of England. The famous John Milton, author of the poem called Paradiſe loſt, died alſo this year [c].

[1674-5] Of the five members of the cabal, only the earl of Arlington, and the duke of Lauderdale remained about the king. The firſt finding himſelf in a very diſagreeable ſituation, ſince the parliament had ſo openly declared againſt him, believed, he had no other way to ſupport himſelf, than by taking, or pretending to take meaſures oppoſite to thoſe of which the cabal was accuſed. Accordingly he was the firſt who adviſed the king to call in his declaration for liberty of conſcience; and when he ſaw the parliament acting with ſuch vigour to break the meaſures of the court, he affected an extraordinary zeal for the proteſtant religion. He was conſtant at ſermons and ſacraments, and carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to perſecute the papiſts, whom he had till now protected. Some even ſay, he adviſed the king to remove the duke of York from his court. But if, by theſe proceedings, he gained any favour with the people, he loſt more with the king and duke, who no longer confided in him as before. The king had particularly ſhewn, he was diſpleaſed with him, by giving the treaſurer's ſtaff to ſir Thomas Oſborne, afterwards earl of Danby, which had ever been Arlington's ambition. This rendered the two earls mortal enemies to each other, and cauſed them to labour one another's deſtruction. The earl of Arlington, ſeeing that his enemy daily gained ground upon him, imagined he might recover his former credit and favour by performing a ſignal ſervice for the king; which was to engage the prince of Orange to enter into the meaſures of the Engliſh court, for procuring ſuch a peace as was deſired by the courts of France and England. As his counteſs was Mr. Odyck's ſiſter, who was much in the prince's confidence, he imagined, that with the aſſiſtance of Odyck, and his other relations and friends, it would be eaſy to ſucceed in the ſcheme he had projected. Wherefore, he obtained the king's leave to go to the Hague to execute his deſign. But as he was ignorant of the temper, humour and character of the prince of Orange, he took the very courſe to gain him which he ſhould have avoided. He endeavoured to vindicate all the proceedings of the cabal and Engliſh Court, by reaſons ſo weak and oppoſite to the truth, that he ſeemed in his diſcourſe to the prince, to think he had to deal with a child, ignorant of the moſt common affairs, which could not but offend him. But what offended him ſtill more, was, that he attempted to draw him into a diſcovery of the Engliſh lords, with whom he had held a ſecret correſpondence during the laſt war. In a word, this journey proved ſo unſucceſsful, that he loſt not only the prince of Orange's eſteem, but all his credit with the king. Beſides, he farther incurred the duke of York's hatred, by propoſing to the prince, without any order, as it is ſaid, a marriage with the princeſs Mary, the duke's eldeſt daughter, which was afterwards accompliſhed. It ſeems, the duke foreſaw how fatal that marriage would be to him. After the earl's return to court, his credit declined ſo viſibly, and the king ſhewed it ſo openly, that the courtiers made no ſcruple to mimick him in his preſence, for the king's diverſion. Thus had the earl of Clarendon been uſed. It is ſaid, that colonel Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, having been ſome time abſent from court, and upon his return happening to ſee the earl of Arlington one day acted by a perſon with a black patch on his noſe, and and a white ſtaff in his hand, could not forbear reproaching the king with his ingratitude, in ſuffering a man to be thus unworthily treated, who had ſerved him ſo faithfully, as well in his exile, as ſince his reſtoration; to which the king in his excuſe replied, that he had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with the earl's conduct; "for, not content to come to prayers as others did, he muſt be conſtant at ſacraments too. Why, anſwered Talbot, does not your majeſty do the very ſame thing? God's fiſh! replied the king with ſome heat, I hope there is a difference between Harry Bennet and me."

This ſhews, the king had changed neither inclination nor principles ſince his deſigns had appeared to be ruined. The truth is, he was not ſatisfied with the members of the cabal, though it was not for their counſels, but their not having purſued the general deſign with ſufficient ability. Sir William Temple in his memoirs, relates, that before he departed to offer the king's mediation to the ſtates, he endeavoured, in a private audience, to make the king ſenſible how ill-adviſed, and how ill-ſerved he had been by the cabal; to which the king anſwered—"It is true, I have ſucceeded ill, but if I had been well ſerved, I might have made a good buſineſs enough of it:" and ſo proceeded to juſtify what was paſt. The king is therefore to be conſidered at the time I am ſpeaking of, that is, during the fourteen months interval between the two ſeſſions, as waiting a favourable opportunity for the better executing his deſigns. And this opportunity was not to be found till France ſhould be at peace with her enemies, and in a condition to aſſiſt her ſecret ally. In the mean time, the king ſeems to have had no other buſineſs, than to get as much money as he could from his parliament. He began therefore, according to cuſtom, with publiſhing a proclamation againſt popiſh prieſts and jeſuits to prepare the parliament to be favourable to him.

[1675.] The fourteenth ſeſſion of this parliament began the 13th of April. The king opened it with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them—"That the principal end of his calling them now, was to know what they thought might yet be wanting to the ſecurity of religion and property, and to give himſelf the ſatisfaction of having uſed his utmoſt endeavours to procure and ſettle a right underſtanding between him and his parliament———For he muſt tell them, that he found the contrary was ſo much laboured, and the pernicious deſigns of ill men had taken ſo much place under ſpecious pretences, that it was high time to be watchful in preventing their contrivances; of which this was not the leaſt, that they endeavoured, by all means they could deviſe, to make it impracticable any longer to continue this preſent parliament———That he had done as much on his part as was poſſible to extinguiſh the fears and jealouſies of popery; and would leave nothing undone that might ſhew the world his zeal to the proteſtant religion as eſtabliſhed in the church of England, from which he would never depart. He then recommended the condition of the fleet, which he was not able, he ſaid, to put into that ſtate it ought to be, and which required a conſiderable ſum of money as well to repair as to build. Laſtly, he told them, that the ſeaſon of the year would not permit a long ſeſſion—That he intended to meet them again the next winter, and in the mean time recommended to them all ſuch temper and moderation in their proceedings, as might tend to unite him and them in counſel and affections, and diſappoint the expectations of thoſe, who could only hope by violent and irregular motions to prevent the bringing the ſeſſion to a happy concluſion."

The commons thanked the king for his ſpeech and promiſes to preſerve their religion and liberties: but as he had given them only proclamations, the little efficacy of which was well known, they believed them inſufficient, and accordingly proceeded to a new bill againſt the growth of popery, and particularly popiſh prieſts, that is, ſuch as had received orders from the ſee of Rome.

This done, the commons preſented a long addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, in which they ſaid,———"That upon a ſerious examination of the ſtate of the kingdom, they found, that ſome perſons in great employment under his majeſty, had fomented deſigns contrary to the intereſt of both his majeſty and his people, intending to deprive them of their ancient rights and liberties, amongſt which was the duke of Lauderdale [d], (this was clearly pointing at the cabal). That he had openly affirmed in the preſence of his majeſty ſitting in council, and before divers of his ſubjects attending there, that his majeſty's edicts ought to be obeyed; for his edicts are equal with laws, and ought to be obeyed in the firſt place. They then repreſented to his majeſty ſome acts which had been made by the parliament of Scotland, by which it appeared, that there was a militia ſettled in that kingdom of twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, who are obliged to be in a readineſs to march into any part of this kingdom, for any ſervice wherein his majeſty's honour, authority, and greatneſs may be concerned; and are to obey ſuch orders and directions, as they ſhall from time to time receive from the privy council there, and that the duke of Lauderdale was the promoter of this act. That by this means England was expoſed to an invaſion from Scotland under any pretence whatſoever, while the duke of Lauderdale was intruſted with the adminiſtration of that kingdom. For theſe reaſons, they humbly beſought his majeſty to remove the ſaid duke for ever from his perſon and council." The king did not think proper to grant this requeſt, and gave ſome reaſons for his refuſal, which were not ſatisfactory to the commons. And therefore they reſolved to prepare a ſecond addreſs againſt the duke.

The commons, after attacking the old members of the cabal, proceeded againſt a new one, namely, the lord treaſurer Danby, who was believed to be deeply engaged in the deſign of making the king abſolute. They examined his whole conduct ſince his admiſſion to his high poſt, and drew up ſeveral articles, in which they accuſed him of great miſdemeanours. In one of theſe articles, he was accuſed of ſaying at the hearing of a cauſe in the treaſury chamber, "That a new proclamation is better than an old act." But as ſufficient proofs were not found to ſupport the charge, it was dropt.

It may be eaſily inferred from theſe proceedings of the commons, that they were extremely jealous of the king and his miniſters, and did not doubt of the court's intention to introduce popery, and invade the liberties of the ſubject. Thoſe who would wholly aſcribe the ill humour of the commons to Shaftſbury's influences, can hardly anſwer the above-mentioned facts, which would not be leſs true, though the earl of Shaftſbury had never been born.

The commons ſhewed alſo their diſtruſt in another point which was no leſs grievous to the king. By an addreſs they prayed him to recall his troops out of France, and prevent his ſubjects from engaging in that ſervice for the future. The king rejected the firſt part of the addreſs, on pretence that in the treaty concluded with the ſtates, he had not engaged to recall thoſe troops, and that it could not be done without prejudice to the peace, which he now enjoyed with all his neighbours: but by a proclamation he prohibited his ſubjects from entering into the ſervice of France.

Whilſt the commons were thus proceeding with vigour, and giving on all occaſions ſignal marks of their diſtruſt, the lords remained idle, and ſeemed regardleſs of the fears and jealouſies expreſſed by the commons. Nay, ſome, and particularly the biſhops, obſerving that the commons were gradually departing from the principle which had been eſtabliſhed by this ſame parliament, as well concerning the church of England, as the royal authority, feared, they would lean too much to the oppoſite ſide. At the beginning of this parliament, whilſt it was believed that the king was and ever would be a protector of the church of England, and would give continual proofs of his affection for a people who had ſo generouſly reſtored him, it was thought the royal authority could not be carried too high, nor too many precautions taken againſt the non-conformiſts. But the face of things being changed, and the king having ſhewn by his conduct ſince he was on the throne, that he really deſigned to introduce popery, and render himſelf abſolute, theſe ſame principles, which had been conſidered as a bulwark to defend both church and ſtate, appeared too apt to countenance the deſigns aſcribed to the king and his miniſters, of invading the government and the eſtabliſhed religion. The commons therefore ſeeing, the king was not the perſon he was thought to be, and that he took advantage of the acts made in his favour to advance his own intereſts, which were not thoſe of the nation, uſed all poſſible precautions to hinder the execution of his deſigns. Theſe precautions went ſo far, that the houſe of lords were at laſt apprehenſive, that the commons intended to overturn every thing eſtabliſhed concerning the royal prerogative and the church's ſecurity, and that by degrees the nation would again become republican and preſbyterian. It is pretended, the biſhops were all or moſt of them of this opinion. To prevent an evil which to them appeared very dangerous, Robert Bartu, earl of Lindſey brought into the houſe of lords a bill, intitled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may ariſe from perſons diſaffected to the government." By this bill all perſons who enjoyed any office eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military, all privy councillors and members of parliament, were obliged, under a penalty, to take the oath which had been introduced firſt in the corporation act, then in the militia act, and afterwards more fully in the five mile act. The oath, to ſave the reader the trouble of looking for it elſewhere, was thus expreſſed, " I do declare that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatſoever to take up arms againſt the king; and that I do abhor the traiterous poſition of taking arms by his authority againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him, in purſuance of ſuch commiſſion: and I do ſwear, that I will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the government either in church or ſtate. So help me God."

When this oath was inſerted in the three forementioned acts, it produced no conſiderable debate, for the reaſons I have been ſpeaking of; but the caſe was very different when it was propoſed in this ſeſſion. Firſt, becauſe it was rendered in a manner univerſal, ſince it was extended to all perſons in any office whatever, and even to privy counſellors and members of parliament. Secondly, becauſe the times were altered, and moſt men had not the ſame opinion of the king, as when the three former acts were made. This bill occaſioned debates in the upper houſe, which laſted ſeventeen days, without a poſſibility of coming to any concluſion[e]. There were two powerful parties in the houſe, one for, and the other againſt the bill, and the votes of the biſhops turned the ſcale on the ſide of the firſt. This appeared, in that notwithſtanding all the efforts of the oppoſers of the bill, to hinder its being referred to a committee, they could not ſucceed. Whereupon ſome lords of that party entered their proteſtation againſt it[f]. The ſame thing happened, when the bill came to be examined in a committee of the whole houſe. In fine, with regard to the ſubſtance of the bill, the two parties diſplayed all their art and eloquence, the one for the paſſing, and the other for the rejecting it. In general, thoſe who argued for the bill maintained, that " the poſition of taking up arms by the king's authority againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him," was falſe and pernicious; and they ſupported their opinion by inſtances of what had been done in the laſt reign, where it cauſed ſuch great diſorders, and occaſioned the ſubverſion both of church and ſtate. They ſaid therefore, that the kingdom being ſtill full of fanatics, republicans, and enemies of the church, it was abſolutely neceſſary to impoſe this oath upon them, to diſtinguiſh them, that it might be known who were to be guarded againſt. That, otherwiſe, there was danger of ſeeing one day renewed, the diſorders which had reduced the kingdom to ſo deplorable a condition, and that the oath enjoined by this bill, was, " a moderate ſecurity to the church and crown[g]."

The other party maintained[h], " That the oath impoſed by this, contained three clauſes, the two firſt aſſertory, and the laſt promiſſory; that it was worthy the conſideration of the biſhops, whether aſſertory oaths, which are properly appointed to give teſtimony of a matter of fact, of which a man is capable to be aſſured by the evidence of his ſenſes, be lawful to be made uſe of to confirm or invalidate doctrinal propoſitions; and whether that legiſlative power, which impoſes ſuch an oath, does not neceſſarily aſſume to itſelf an infallibility. And as to promiſſory oaths, it was deſired, that the learned prelates would conſider the opinion of Grotius de jure belli et pacis, lib. 2. cap. 3. who ſeems to make it plain, that thoſe kind of oaths are forbidden by our ſaviour Chriſt, Matt. v. 34, 37. And whether it would not become the fathers of the church, when they have well weighed that and other places of the new teſtament, to be more tender in multiplying oaths, than hitherto the great men of the church have been?" But the queſtion being put, the oath was voted by the majority of the houſe, the biſhops being all for it.

Then they proceeded to the particulars of the oath contained in the bill, and it was alledged by the oppoſers, that the poſition of " taking arms by the king's authority againſt his perſon," was true and neceſſary in a limited government, like that of England, otherwiſe this would be to ſurrender the rights and liberties of the ſubject, to a prince, who being ſuppoſed a tyrant, (which was a very poſſible caſe) would not be reſtrained by the fear, either of God or man. That ſhould ſuch a future king undertake to aboliſh all the laws, and invade the eſtates and liberties of his ſubjects, they would be obliged by this oath, not to reſiſt him, but to ſubmit to his yoke. That even without ſuppoſing ſuch a tyranny, a king might happen to be made priſoner by his own ſubjects, as was the caſe of Henry III. and Henry VI. and then thoſe who ſhould have the ſovereign in their hands, might act in his name, and authority, by virtue of his commiſſions, while the ſubjects would be reſtrained by the obligation of this oath from endeavouring to free him from captivity. In ſhort, ſeveral other probable caſes were alledged, by which it was clearly proved, that the oath ought neceſſarily to have ſome reſtrictions, if it was not intended to ſurrender to the king all the liberties of the nation. But as ſuch reſtrictions were not eaſy to be expreſſed, they concluded, it was much better, to leave the oath in generals which ſhould not comprehend all poſſible caſes, as ſeemed to be the intention of this oath from the terms in which it was conceived.

This affair was interrupted by an accident which raiſed a violent conteſt between the two houſes. I ſhall not relate the particulars, which ſuppoſe the knowledge of many things concerning the privileges of both houſes, which few foreigners are acquainted with. I ſhall content myſelf with briefly ſhewing the occaſion of it. One Dr. Shirley having brought an appeal in the houſe of lords from a decree in chancery againſt ſir John Fagg, a member of the houſe of commons, they ordered Shirley to be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms for a breach of privilege. The warrant for taking Shirley into cuſtody was forcibly taken from the ſerjeant's deputy, by the lord Mohun. The commons demanded juſtice of the peers againſt the lord Mohun, and were anſwered by the lords, that he had only done his duty. The quarrel thus begun, daily increaſed, ſo that the houſes, in their anſwers and replies, came to language ſo reproachful, that there was no hope of an accommodation[i]. Wherefore the king came to the houſe of peers the 9th of June, and prorogued the parliament to the 13th of October. Thus ended the 14th ſeſſion of this parliament, before the money bill and other public bills were ready for the royal aſſent. The commons had deſigned to grant the king three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling[k], but at the ſame time reſolved to apply the antient tunnage and poundage to the maintenance of the navy, according to its original deſign, which amounted to four hundred thouſand pounds a year. As the king would have been a real ſufferer by ſuch an appropriation, he was not ſorry to have occaſion to prorogue the parliament, chuſing rather to be deprived of a ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds, than loſe a revenue of four hundred thouſand.

During the campaign of 1675, the king of France loſt the famous marſhal Turenne, who had done him very great ſervices. He was killed by a cannon ball in an action not important in itſelf, but rendered ſo by the death of that general, his army being obliged to repaſs the Rhine. Their retreat facilitated the recovery of Treves to the allies, which was yet in the hands of the French. In the beginning of the year, the contending powers had agreed, after long negotiations, to treat of a peace in the city of Nimeguen. But nothing conſiderable was done this year.

In England, ſince the laſt ſeſſion, there were ſome intrigues at court to engage the king to diſſolve the parliament. The preſbyterians earneſtly wiſhed it, hoping that the people diſſatisfied with the court, would, as uſually happens, chuſe repreſentatives who had other principles than thoſe of the preſent parliament. The papiſts had paſſion-

[e] The great ſpeakers for this bill, were, the lord treaſurer, and the lord keeper, with biſhop Morley, and biſhop Ward. The ſpeakers againſt it, were, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shaftſbury, the lords Holles and Hallifax, and the earl of Saliſbury. Kennet, p. 332.

[f] The proteſting lords, who were looked upon as of the country party, were Buckingham, Bridgewater, Wincheſter, Saliſbury, Bedford, Dorſet, Ayleſbury, Briſtol, Denbigh, Paget, Holles, Petre, Berkſhire, Mohun, Stamford, Hallifax, De-la-mer, Eure, Shaftſbury, Clarendon, Grey of Rolleſton, Say and Seal, Wharton. It muſt be obſerved, that this bill was contrived by the church party, and was diſliked by the duke, and the papiſts in general, becauſe they thought the bringing any teſt in practice, would certainly bring on one that would turn them out of the houſe.

[g] Theſe were the lord chancellor's words.

[h] They ſaid, there ought to be no teſts, beyond the oath of allegiance, upon the elections to parliament; it being the great privilege of Engliſhmen, that they were not to be taxed but by their repreſentatives; it was therefore thought a diſinheriting men of the main part of their birthright, to do any thing that ſhould ſhut them out from their votes in electing: all teſts in public aſſemblies were thought dangerous, and contrary to the public liberty: a great deal was ſaid, to ſhew, that the peace of the world was beſt ſecured by good laws, and good government, and that oaths and teſts were no ſecurity: the ſcrupulous might be fettered by them: yet the bulk of the world would boldly take any teſt, and as boldly break through it. Burnet, p. 384.

[i] The lords affirmed, that it is the undoubted right of the lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, though members of either houſe be concerned. The commons, on the other hand, maintained it to be the undoubted right of their houſe, that none of the members thereof be ſummoned to attend the houſe of lords, during the ſeſſion and privilege of parliament.

ately desired this dissolution before the last session, but, as it appears in one of Coleman's letters of August this year, they had altered their mind, and expected much from this very parliament which had hitherto been so averse to them. But it is not seen on what this hope was founded. I shall hereafter speak of this and some other letters of Coleman, in which it evidently appears, that the papists were at this time very active to procure great advantages to their religion, and relied much on the duke of York, and the assistance of France.

The 13th of October the king opened the 15th session of the parliament with a very short speech, in which, after recommending union to both houses, and the interests of the church of England, he demanded money, as well for building ships, as for taking off the anticipations upon his revenues, desiring them to remember, it was now above three years since he had asked any thing of them for his own private use.

Then the lord keeper made a speech full of flattery to the king, in which he endeavoured to shew, that no king had ever a more sincere affection for his subjects, or laboured with more zeal for the preservation of religion and liberty, and therefore it was not to be doubted, but they would behave themselves like those that deserved to be called the king's friends, and that they would put him at ease too.

But the commons, instead of being moved by so unseasonable a rhetoric, and by such ill-grounded reasons, resumed the consideration of the bills left unfinished the last session for the liberty of the subject, and added others for its better security.

Afterwards they took into consideration the sums granted to the king for the last war, and the expences of the same, and found, that the charges amounted to a million less than the receipt, and without being able to discover to what uses this million had been applied [l].

In the report made of this affair, it was said, that the parliament was not obliged to pay the king's private debts by a tax, for if this pretension was admitted, they would have to pay the like debts about a year and a half hence, and so encourage the court to exact yearly a million and a half, as they had hitherto done: that since the end of the war, the whole charge of the government, both by sea and land, amounted not to above seven hundred thousand pounds sterling, and the clear income of the revenue came at least to sixteen hundred thousand, and consequently there ought to have been a yearly remainder of near a million: and yet the king had anticipated his revenues near a million more, to pay which, would be to entail perpetual anticipations upon the kingdom, to its utter ruin and desolation. The parliament therefore resolved to grant the king nothing for taking off these anticipations. Nevertheless, a few days after they voted a supply of three hundred thousand pounds sterling for the building of twenty large ships of war [m], but withal resolved to appropriate tunnage and poundage to the use of the navy, which could not but be very disagreeable to the king.

Then the commons proceeded to examine the trade with France, and found, that the French imported yearly into England commodities to the value of a million more than they exported, upon which a bill was ordered to be prepared.

Lastly, the commons being informed of a public report, that many of their members were pensioners to the court, resolved to oblige all their members to take an oath, by which they were to protest, that they had not received any money from the court, since the 1st of January 1672. But I know not whether this resolution was executed [n].

The debates of the commons were a little interrupted, by a report made to the house of the insolence of a French jesuit named St. Germain. The jesuit being informed, that one Luzancy a French priest had embraced the protestant religion, and afterwards had publicly preached to justify his conversion, went to him, and, threatening to assassinate him, or carry him away by force into France, extorted from him a recantation in writing of his conversion and sermon. This was done during the session of the parliament. A complaint was laid before the secretaries of state, and also before the commons, attested by Luzancy, with an addition of the following particulars, which he offered to swear. That father St. Germain in several conferences with him declared: 1. That the king was a Roman catholic in his heart. 2. That the court were endeavouring to get a liberty of conscience in England for the Roman catholics, and that granted, in two years, most of the English would acknowledge the pope. 3. That he knew the king's intention concerning religion, and that he was sure his majesty would approve of all he should do in that matter. 4. That he laughed at the parliament, as being only a wave that had but a little time; and said, that nobody was better welcome at court, and had greater intrigues with any of the nobility than he. 5. That it was good sometimes to force people to heaven; and that there were an infinite number of priests and jesuits in London, that did God very great service. Luzancy added farther, that many persons of good credit and repute, were ready to justify upon oath, that several of the Roman catholics had spoken things quite as bad or worse. In a word, that they were grown so bold and insolent, that a proselyte could not walk the streets without being threatened and called opprobrious names.

This affair threw the house into a ferment, and obliged the king to publish a proclamation, promising two hundred pounds for the apprehending of St. Germain. But that jesuit was now retired into France, from whence he kept a constant correspondence with Coleman the duke of York's secretary, in whose letters it appeared, that the duke laboured the advancement of popery to the utmost of his power.

I have observed, how much this parliament had been against the presbyterians, and that the discovery of the court's design had induced them to bring in a bill for their ease, but that the bill became abortive by the sudden prorogation of the parliament. The affair of Luzancy and St. Germain caused the commons to think of a like bill, but they were prevented by the lords. The duke of Buckingham having in a speech to the peers shewn the mischiefs arising from the persecution of the protestant dissenters, desired leave to bring in a bill for their ease, which was granted immediately.

But this bill, and all the rest prepared by the commons, were unhappily stifled in their birth by the revival of the former contest between the two houses. This dispute about privileges was managed with such heat on both sides, that it was moved in the house of lords, to present an address to the king to dissolve the parliament; and the question being put, it was passed in the negative by only two voices. At last, the king seeing, no expedient could be possibly found to reconcile the two houses, prorogued the parliament from the 22d of November to the 15th of February 1677, that is, for fifteen months.

I shall close this year with some less important transactions, which ought not to be omitted.

In May, the prince of Newburg came into England, and was received with great distinction by the king, as well on account of his personal merit, as in consideration of the civilities received by the king in his exile from the duke his father.

The duchess of Mazarine having a difference with her husband, retired into England this year, where it is pretended, she would have supplanted the duchess of Portsmouth [o], had not an intrigue with a certain courtier been too soon discovered to the king. He assigned her however an annual pension of four thousand pounds sterling. Her house, to the day of her death, was the rendezvous of all the men of wit and quality, and St. Evremond, a refugee as well as herſelf, was one of her moſt conſtant attendants.

The 19th of December, Heneage lord Finch, baron of Daventry, who had been only lord keeper, was made lord high chancellor.

The moſt remarkable deaths were thoſe of dr. Lightfoot, dr. Willis, and Bulſtrode Whitelocke [p]. The laſt has been frequently mentioned in the recital of the differences between Charles I. and the parliament.

[1675-6] As there was to be no meeting of parliament the next year, the catholics, and the court, which openly protected them, were leſs reſerved and more active. This gave great uneaſineſs to the people, who, beſides, ſaw with concern the growing greatneſs of Lewis XIV. and the indolence of the king, who, inſtead of being uneaſy or jealous, manifeſtly ſeemed to behold it with pleaſure. It may be affirmed, that the principal article of Charles II's reign conſiſts, in the perpetual oppoſition between the particular intereſts of the king, and thoſe of the Engliſh nation. All the world ſaw and were ſenſible of it. It was the common talk, and the ſubject of daily libels. The king therefore by proclamation ſuppreſſed all coffee-houſes, on pretence of being places where diſaffected perſons met and deviſed malicious and ſcandalous reports againſt the king and his miniſters. Immediately after was publiſhed another proclamation, for diſcovering and puniſhing the writers, who daily publiſhed libels in London againſt the government. But it is ſeldom known, that ſuch proclamations produce any great effects, eſpecially in England, where the liberty of ſpeaking againſt the government is more unreſtrained, than in any other country.

Though all the contending powers had, the laſt year, conſented to ſend their plenipotentiaries to Nimeguen, to treat of a peace, by the mediation of England, there was no great likelihood of a general peace. Sir William Temple and ſir Leoline Jenkins, the Engliſh mediators and embaſſadors, repaired to Nimeguen in July, and only found there the plenipotentiaries of France, and thoſe of the ſtates general. The emperor, the king of Spain, the elector of Brandenburgh, retarded the negotiations, as much as poſſible, in hopes, that the king of England, being concerned in the preſervation of the Netherlands, would not ſuffer them to fall under the dominion of France, and that this would oblige him in the end to declare for the allies. But they were extremely miſtaken in imagining that the intereſt of England was that of the king. It was this that made the proceeding of the Engliſh court always unintelligible to them, as well as the reſt of the princes of Europe, who were ignorant of Charles's ſecret deſigns and his engagements with France.

[1676] In the beginning of the campaign of 1676, the king of France took Conde and Bouchain; after which, in June he returned to Paris, leaving his army to the conduct of the count de Schomberg. On the other ſide, the prince of Orange beſieged Maeſtricht towards the end of July, which gave Schomberg time to take Aire, and march to the relief of Maeſtricht. His approach, and ſome other accidents, obliged the prince to raiſe the ſiege.

The campaign being ended, all eyes were turned to the negotiations at Nimeguen. It ſoon appeared, that the deſign of France was only to divide the allies, and make a ſeparate peace with the ſtates. The king of England had alſo the ſame view, and therein aſſiſted France with all his power, having ſent orders to ſir William Temple, to endeavour to perſuade the ſtates and the prince of Orange, to give their conſent. The ſtates were inclinable enough, but the prince of Orange could not be prevailed with, who thought, it would be a betraying of the common cauſe and the intereſts of the princes, who had engaged in the preſervation of Holland, which without their aſſiſtance had been irrecoverably loſt. He ſaid, it was in his uncle's power to make peace when he pleaſed, by declaring againſt France. Bnt nothing was farther from the king's intention, who, inſtead of being jealous of the king of France, was privately doing him all the ſervice he could, in ſolliciting the ſtates and his nephew the prince, to make a ſeparate peace. This diſcovers with what partiality he acted as mediator.

The hope entertained by the allies, that England would at laſt declare againſt France, was the greateſt obſtacle to peace. The king not being ignorant of it, believed he ought to undeceive the allies, in order to induce them to make ſuch a peace as was deſired by France. For this purpoſe, he publiſhed two proclamations, in which, on pretence of regulating ſome things concerning the neutrality, his deſign was to ſhew, he had no intention to depart from it.

Since the king had made peace with Holland, the French privateers infeſted the Channel in ſuch a manner, that without any regard to the neutrality of England, they ſeized her ſhips, and, as if in open war, made prizes of them [q]. It was proved, that they had taken fifty three ſince the peace. At laſt, the thing went ſo far, that the commiſſioners of trade were obliged to preſent a report concerning theſe indignities, to the king, and to pray him that he would take ſome courſe about it. The king very graciouſly received the report, and ſent orders to his embaſſador at Paris to make complaints on this occaſion; but that was all the ſatisfaction the merchants could obtain [r]. For the court of France, knowing that Charles would not break with them for fifty three ſhips belonging to private men, took no notice of theſe complaints. The king's indolence produced at leaſt this effect, that the people of England, enraged to ſee themſelves thus expoſed to the piracies of the French, were extremely deſirous of a war with France, in order to be revenged, and impatiently waited the meeting of the parliament, in the belief that both houſes would be more careful than the king, of the intereſts of the nation.

The remaining part of this year afforded nothing memorable, beſides a proclamation publiſhed by the king, forbidding his ſubjects to hear maſs in the queen's chapel in Somerſet houſe, or in the houſes of embaſſadors. Theſe proclamations were always expreſſed in very rigorous terms, but executed with ſuch negligence, that the frequency of them only ſerved to ſhew, how little deſirous the king was to have his orders ſtrictly obſerved. They were uſually a preparative to the next ſeſſion, but during the intervals of parliament, the Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits, who ſwarmed in the kingdom, and all other papiſts were ſure of impunity.

This year died George Digby earl of Briſtol in the ſixty fifth year of his age, who has often been remembered in the courſe of this hiſtory [s].

[1676-7] The king, as I ſaid, had prorogued the parliament for fifteen months, except a few days. This prorogation, the longeſt that ever was known, raiſed a doubt, whether by it the parliament was not actually diſſolved. This doubt was owing to a ſtatute of Edward III. never repealed, whereby it was enacted, that a parliament ſhould be held once every year, and oftener if occaſion required. This diſpute made a great noiſe in the kingdom, and books were publiſhed on both ſides the queſtion. In general the court party maintained, that the parliament was not diſſolved, and the contrary party pretended it could not meet, after a fifteen months interruption. I believe the intereſt of neither party was herein much concerned, though perhaps ſome private perſons might have found ſome advantage in a new parliament.

The parliament however met the 15th of February according to the prorogation. The king in his ſpeech to both houſes declared, "That he was prepared to give them all the ſatisfaction and ſecurity, in the great concerns of the proteſtant religion as eſtabliſhed in the church of England, that ſhould be reaſonably aſked, or could conſiſt with chriſtian prudence. And he declared himſelf as freely, that he was ready to gratify them in a further ſecurity of their liberty and property, (if they could think it was wanted) by as many good laws as they ſhould propoſe, and as could conſiſt with the ſafety of the government, without which there could be neither liberty nor property left to any man." After this, reckoning he had given both houſes entire ſatisfaction, he told them, "That he expected and required from them, that all occaſions of differences between the two houſes ſhould be carefully avoided.———In the next place, he deſired them to conſider the neceſſity of building more ſhips, and how much all their ſafeties were concerned in it—And as they knew him to be under a great burthen of debts, he hoped, they would not deny him the continuance of the additional revenue of exciſe, which was near expiring.—And, that they might be ſatisfied how impoſſible it was (whatever ſome men thought) to ſupport the government with leſs than the preſent revenue, they might at any time ſee the yearly eſtabliſhed charge, by which it would appear, that the conſtant and unavoidable charge being paid, there would remain no overplus towards the diſcharging thoſe contingencies which might happen in all kingdoms, and which had been a conſiderable charge to him the laſt year."

Then the chancellor enlarged upon all theſe points; but as his ſpeech was wholly founded upon this unqueſtionable truth, according to him, that the king had only the welfare of his people in view; I ſhall tranſcribe only this ſingle paſſage——"For the king hath no deſires but what are public, no ends or aims which terminate in himſelf; all his endeavours are ſo entirely bent upon the welfare of his whole dominions, that he doth not think any man a good ſubject, who doth not heartily love his country: and therefore let no man paſs for a good patriot, who doth not heartily love and ſerve his prince. Private men indeed are ſubject to be miſled by private intereſts, and may entertain ſome vain and ſlender hopes of ſurviving the public; but a prince is ſure to fall with it, and therefore can never have any intereſts divided from it. To live and die with the king, is the higheſt profeſſion a ſubject can make, and ſometimes it is profeſſion only and no more; but in a king it is an abſolute neceſſity, it is a fate inevitable, that he muſt live and die with his people. Away then with the vain imaginations of thoſe who infuſe a miſbelief of the government; away with all thoſe ill-meant diſtinctions between the court and the country, between the natural and the political capacity; and let all who go about to perſuade others, that there are ſeveral intereſts, have a care of that precipice, to which ſuch principles may lead them."

As ſoon as the commons were withdrawn, the duke of Buckingham ſtood up in the houſe of lords, and made a very long ſpeech, to prove, that the parliament was diſſolved by the laſt prorogation. He grounded his opinion upon antient ſtatutes (which, he ſaid, are not like women, the worſe for being old) and chiefly upon the ſtatute of Edward III. namely, "That a parliament ſhould be holden every year once, and more often, if need be." He added, "Though theſe words are as plain as a pike ſtaff, and no man living that is not a ſcholar, can poſſibly miſtake their meaning, yet the grammarians in thoſe days made a ſhift to explain, that the words, if need be, related as well to the words, every year once, as to the words, more often, and ſo by this grammatical whimſey of theirs, have made this ſtatute to ſignify nothing. For this reaſon in the 36th year of the ſame reign, a new act of parliament was made, in which thoſe unfortunate words, if need be, are left out, and that act, relating to magna charta, and other ſtatutes, made good. Here now, my lords, there is not left the leaſt colour for any miſtake: for it is plainly declared, That the kings of England muſt call a parliament once within a year." Then he reduced the whole matter to this dilemma, "Either the kings are bound by theſe acts, or elſe the government of England by parliaments is at an end. For if the kings have power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate an act made for the maintenance of magna charta, they have alſo a power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate magna charta itſelf." It appears by the ſequel of this ſpeech, that the duke of Buckingham's aim was to put an end to this parliament, which had continued ſo long, and thereby rendered the commons, in ſome meaſure, ſovereigns over their countrymen. The duke was ſeconded by the earls of Saliſbury and Shaftſbury, and the lord Wharton. At laſt, after great debates, the houſe ſent all four to the Tower[t], from whence they were ſhortly after releaſed, except the earl of Shaftſbury, who was continued there above a year, becauſe he would not own the juſtice of his impriſonment[u].

A few days after, the commons voted the king a tax of five hundred and eighty four thouſand pounds, to build thirty ſhips, without appropriating tunnage and poundage. Beſides, they continued for three years the additional tax upon beer, which was to expire the 24th of June.

It appeared ſoon after, that their grand affair was to ſtop the great progreſs of France in the Netherlands, and engage the king in a war with that kingdom, for which purpoſe they preſented the following addreſs:

"We your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects, do moſt humbly offer to your majeſty's conſideration, that the minds of your people are much diſquieted with the manifeſt dangers ariſing to your majeſty, by the growth and power of the French king, eſpecially by the acquiſitions already made, and the farther progreſs like to be made by him in the Spaniſh Netherlands, in the preſervation and ſecurity whereof we humbly conceive the intereſt of your majeſty, and the ſafety of your people are highly concerned; and therefore we humbly beſeech your majeſty to take the ſame into your royal care, and to ſtrengthen yourſelf with ſuch ſtricter alliances, as may ſecure your majeſty's kingdoms, and ſecure and preſerve the Spaniſh Netherlands, and thereby quiet the minds of your majeſty's people." To which the king anſwered,——"That he was of the opinion of his two houſes of parliament, that the preſervation of Flanders was of great conſequence; and that he would uſe all means in his power for the ſafety of his kingdom."

[1677] This anſwer not being ſatisfactory, the houſe preſented a ſecond addreſs on the ſame ſubject the 30th of March. It was much the ſame with the firſt, excepting the addition, that in caſe his majeſty ſhould happen to be engaged in a war with France, they ſhould always be ready to aſſiſt him with ſuch ſupplies, as might enable him to proſecute the ſame with ſucceſs.

The king gave no anſwer to this addreſs till twelve days after, when he ſent a meſſage, "That the only way to prevent the dangers which might ariſe in theſe kingdoms, would be to put him timely in a condition to make ſuch fitting preparations, as might enable him to do what ſhould be moſt for their ſecurity."

This drew from the commons a third addreſs to the king, in which they informed him, that they were preparing a bill for the additional duty of exciſe, on which he might borrow two hundred thouſand pounds, and promiſed to give him ample teſtimony of their affection at their next meeting, after a ſhort receſs during Eaſter. The king not ſatisfied with ſo ſmall a ſum, told them plainly, that without ſix hundred thouſand pounds, it would not be poſſible for him to anſwer the ends of their ſeveral addreſſes.

Many members being abſent on account of the expected adjournment at Eaſter, the commons were cautious of proceeding upon other money bills; but deſired his majeſty's leave to adjourn, promiſing, that, after the receſs, they would comply with his demands. The ſame day, the 16th of April, the king came to the houſe of peers, and gave his aſſent to ſeveral acts. The chief were, 1. An act for the raiſing of five hundred and eighty four thouſand pounds ſterling, for building of thirty ſhips. 2. An act for an additional exciſe upon beer, and other liquors, for three years. 3. An act for prevention of frauds and perjuries. 4. An act for taking away the writ de hæretico comburendo. 5. An act for eradicating a judicature to determine differences touching houſes burnt by the late dreadful fire in Southwark[w]. Then the chancellor acquainted the two houſes, that the king gave them leave to adjourn to the 21ſt of May next.

The king, undoubtedly, had no deſire to begin a war with France, his private engagements with Lewis being too ſtrong to allow him ſuch a thought. However, he improved the preſent occaſion to draw money from his parliament, on pretence of providing for the ſafety of the nation. For that was all he had yet obliged himſelf to, though the commons imagined, he was ready to come into their meaſures, as ſoon as he ſhould be aſſured of a ſupply. The vigour with which the commons acted, was owing to the progreſs of Lewis in the Netherlands and on the Rhine, while Charles, plunged in pleaſures, remained unconcerned, and by his conduct effectually deſtroyed the principles eſtabliſhed by his chancellor, that it was impoſſible for the king and kingdom to have oppoſite intereſts. The 17th of March, the king of France took Valenciennes, and beſieged Cambray, while St. Omer was inveſted by the duke of Orleans. Cambray coſt him but ſeven days, and while he beſieged the citadel, the prince of Orange marched to the relief of St. Omer, and was overcome by the duke of Orleans at Montcaſſel. After this defeat, the citadel of Cambray and St. Omer, ſurrendered by capitulation, about the 20th of April. By this means the Spaniſh Netherlands were open on all ſides, and could be preſerved but by the aſſiſtance of England. This was clearly ſeen by the commons, and excited their endeavours to awaken the king out of his affected lethargy. The king knew the danger as well as, or better than his parliament. But, contrary to the maxim of his chancellor, the kingdom's danger was not his. The more powerful the king of France rendered himſelf, the greater was his private advantage, becauſe it was by the aſſiſtance of France, that he pretended to enſlave his own kingdom. Let a man ſtudy never ſo much to find plauſible reaſons for the king's conduct and negligence, with regard to the Netherlands and the growing power of France, he will find none, without ſuppoſing what I have ſaid concerning the king's deſigns. The Spaniards, and Dutch, the emperor and the princes of Germany, all reaſoned wrong. They ſuppoſed, that Charles would not ſuffer the Netherlands to be loſt, becauſe it was the intereſt of England to preſerve them, and were miſtaken in imagining, the king would be influenced by the good of his kingdom. But he had a particular intereſt directly contrary to that of England, namely, his own, which he blindly purſued. He would have ſeen the laſt town of the Spaniſh Netherlands loſt without being moved. Nevertheleſs, as it was alſo his intereſt not to diſcover his deſigns before the time, for fear of alarming the Engliſh, and engaging the parliament in other meaſures, he pretended to approve of their views. But this was only to obtain a ſupply, without promiſing however any thing but to make preparations, which properly was obliging himſelf to nothing at all. Such was the king's conduct in this whole affair, as will appear ſtill more plainly in the ſequel.

As the duke was taking coach, on his diſcharge out of the Tower, the earl looking out of his window, cried, "What, my lord, are you going to leave us?" "Ay, my lord, replied the duke, ſuch giddy headed fellows as I can never ſtay long in a place."

The parliament meeting the 21ſt of May, by the king's proclamation of ſummons, after an adjournment of near five weeks, the commons believed the king had ſpent this interval in making the alliances they had deſired, and that he would communicate to them what had been done. But the king only told them, by ſecretary Coventry, that he expected the houſe would forthwith proceed to the money bill, and the rather, becauſe he intended there ſhould be a receſs very quickly. This meſſage occaſioned warm debates in the houſe. They were inclined to give the king the ſix hundred thouſand pounds he had aſked, but were willing to have ſomething for their money, whereas the king was for being ſure of the ſupply before he proceeded in what was deſired by the commons. Their diſtruſt was not very honourable to him, but it was his fault, becauſe he had given ſo many occaſions for it, and therefore he could not think it ſtrange. He made it however ſubſervient to his deſign, and pretended in his turn to fear, that the commons intended to engage him in a war with France, and then leave him to extricate himſelf as well as he could, without granting the neceſſary aſſiſtance to ſupport it. On this pretence he ſent for the commons to Whitehall, and made them the following ſpeech:

"Gentlemen, I have ſent for you hither, that I might prevent thoſe miſtakes and diſtruſts, which I find ſome are ready to make, as if I had called you together only to get money from you, for other uſes than you would have it employed. I do aſſure you on the word of a king, that you ſhall not repent any truſt you repoſe in me, for the ſafety of my kingdoms, and I deſire you to believe, I would not break my credit with you; but as I have already told you, That it will not be poſſible for me to ſpeak or act thoſe things which ſhould anſwer the end of your ſeveral addreſſes, without expoſing my kingdoms to much greater dangers, ſo I declare to you again, I will neither hazard my ſafety nor yours, until I be in a better condition than I am able to put myſelf, both to defend my ſubjects, and offend my enemies. I do farther aſſure you, I have not loſt one day ſince your laſt meeting, in doing all I could for your defence, and I tell you plainly, it ſhall be your fault, and not mine, if your ſecurity be not ſufficiently provided for."

As this ſpeech, under general and obſcure terms, perfectly anſwered the king's ſecret intentions, it is abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome remaks, in order to ſhew diſtinctly and plainly, both the king's intention and character.

Firſt, the commons had deſired the king to provide for the ſafety of his kingdoms, upon the foundation, that their ſafety depended on the preſervation of the Spaniſh Netherlands. But the king ſays not a word which may oblige him to the defence of the Netherlands, and contents himſelf with promiſing, upon his royal word, that he will provide for the ſafety of his kingdom; which general promiſe left him room to ſay afterwards, that whatever he had done was for the ſafety of his kingdom.

Secondly, he ſuppoſed, that in providing for this ſafety, his kingdoms would be expoſed to great dangers, unleſs he had the money beforehand, which was a groundleſs ſuppoſition.

Thirdly, he told them, he ought to be put in a better condition to defend his ſubjects, and offend his enemies. By this laſt expreſſion he inſinuated, that he would enter into a league offenſive againſt France, which was not his intention as will hereafter plainly appear.

Fourthly, he told them, he had not loſt one day in doing all he could for their defence, which expreſſion ſignified nothing, ſince he had juſt told them, he could neither ſpeak nor act, before he had the demanded ſupply. In what therefore did his five weeks care conſiſt?

Fifthly, there is but one thing clear in this ſpeech, and that is, he would be ſure of the money before he began to act. By which he intimated to the commons, that he pretended to have as much reaſon to diſtruſt them, as they could have to diſtruſt him, though aſſuredly the caſe was very different.

This ſpeech occaſioned very great debates in the houſe of commons. The court party propoſed a ſpeedy grant of the deſired ſupply, to enable the king to make alliances, otherwiſe, they could not be expected to be made; and alledged, that the king had the ſame power of making war and leagues, as the houſe had in giving money; he could not have money without them, nor they alliances without him. The contrary party remarked, that nothing poſitive was promiſed by the king, except that he would provide for the ſafety of the kingdom, which might be explained ſeveral ways, without any aſſurance it ſhould be underſtood in the ſenſe of the Commons. As for ſaying that the king would make alliances when he ſhould have the ſupply, the expreſſion was too general to hazard upon it a ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds. But if alliances were made forthwith, and declared to day, the ſix hundred thouſand pounds would be granted to morrow.

This laſt opinion prevailed, ſuch was the diſtruſt conceived of the king. So, the houſe reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the king, which ſhould oblige him to ſpeak more plainly, that they might know how to proceed. The ſubſtance of this addreſs was:

"It is a great affliction to us, to find ourſelves obliged to declare againſt the granting the ſupply you are pleaſed to demand, conceiving it not agreeable to the uſage of parliaments, to grant ſupplies for the maintenance of wars and alliances, before they are ſignified in parliament; from which uſage if we depart, the precedent might be of dangerous conſequence in future times.———

"We humbly beſeech your majeſty to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with the ſtates general of the United Provinces, againſt the growth and power of the French king, and for the preſervation of the Spaniſh Netherlands, and to make ſuch other alliances with other ſuch of the confederates as you ſhall think fit and uſeful to that end.———

"Laſtly, they laid before him ſeveral reaſons to convince him, that, in this juncture, a war with France was abſolutely neceſſary, in order to oblige her to leave the reſt of Chriſtendom in repoſe, and promiſed to put him in a condition for a vigorous maintenance of the ſame."

Had the king really intended to ſtop the great progreſs of the king of France, this addreſs would have been more than ſufficient to engage him in a war with that prince, or at leaſt to have done ſomething to make him fear it. But as nothing was farther from his thoughts, he affected a diſtruſt of the commons, which he really had not. He had undertaken the firſt war againſt the ſtates, upon a like aſſurance without the leaſt heſitation. He had engaged in the ſecond war without even imparting his deſign to the parliament. But when a war with France was deſired, he pretended to fear from the commons, what he had not feared when a war with Holland was in queſtion; though it was manifeſt, this fear was entirely groundleſs. But any delay was to be uſed rather than oppoſe the progreſs of his good friend, and yet, he was unwilling to loſe the opportunity of procuring a ſupply from his parliament.

The commons pretended by their laſt addreſs to oblige the king to give a clear anſwer. But they found themſelves miſtaken. The king receiving this addreſs the 26th of May, ſent, two days after, for the commons to Whitehall, and for anſwer ſharply reproved them for invading his prerogative, in requiring him to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with the ſtates general. "Should I, ſaid he, ſuffer this fundamental power of making war and peace to be ſo far invaded, as to have the manner and circumſtances of leagues preſcribed to me by parliament, no prince or ſtate would any longer believe, that the ſovereignty of England reſts in the crown.———Wherefore you may reſt aſſured, that no condition ſhall make me depart from ſo eſſential a part of the monarchy." At the concluſion of this ſpeech he declared his pleaſure to them, that the houſe be adjourned till the 16th of July[x], telling them, he would give them notice by his proclamation when he intended they ſhould ſit again, which, he ſaid, would not be till winter, unleſs ſome extraordinary occaſion ſhould happen.

Nothing is a plainer demonſtration, how different the king's intereſts were from thoſe of his kingdom, than his conduct on this important occaſion. The commons believed it abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, to check the progreſs of the French king, and preſerve the Netherlands, and to that end, make alliances with the ſtates general and their confederates. This was a very evident truth. The king himſelf did not deny it, while there was hope of getting the ſix hundred thouſand pounds, demanded on pretence of putting himſelf in a condition to defend the kingdom, which ſhewed at leaſt that he believed it in danger. But when he ſaw the commons would not be ſatisfied with general promiſes, but required ſomething real, the neceſſity of putting the kingdom in a ſtate of defence vaniſhed at once. He adjourned the parliament for ſeveral months, without any notice of the danger with which the kingdom was threatened, though that danger ſubſiſted no leſs, than at the beginning of the ſeſſion. Thus the danger was preſſing to the kingdom, when it was no longer ſo to the king: a clear evidence that the king and parliament had different views and intereſts. So, on pretence of an attempt of the commons upon his prerogative, he took occaſion to order a long adjournment, which broke all the meaſures of the commons, and almoſt deſtroyed the hopes entertained by the allies, of aſſiſtance from England, which could not but be very advantageous to France. I do not think it poſſible to account for the king's conduct in a manner ſatisfactory to the impartial, without ſuppoſing that he expected aſſiſtance from France to make himſelf abſolute, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. On this ſuppoſition, inſtead of being concerned to ſtop the progreſs of France, it could not but be for his intereſt that ſhe ſhould become ſtill more powerful. Accordingly this was what he wiſhed, as all his proceedings manifeſtly ſhewed.

We learn from ſir William Temple himſelf, that whilſt he was at Nimeguen as plenipotentiary mediator for a peace, he was ſent for to London by the king, on pretence of making him ſecretary of ſtate, but in reality to diſpatch him to the Hague, to endeavour to perſuade the prince of Orange to conſent to a ſeparate peace with France. But Temple declined a commiſſion which he had before tried to execute, without being able to ſucceed. This ſhews with what zeal the king endeavoured to ſerve France, which only wanted to divide the allies by ſuch an expedient. It is certain, the king of France, though till now ſuperior to his enemies, was little able longer to ſuſtain a war with almoſt all Europe united againſt him. It was therefore in the king of England's power to procure a juſt and reaſonable peace by declaring againſt France, as he was deſired by the parliament. But this could never be obtained of him. On the contrary, fearing to be forced to it at laſt by the clamour of his people, he ſecretly laboured to procure France an advantageous peace, by the diviſions of her enemies.

Sir William Temple having refuſed to be employed upon this errand, Mr. Laurence Hyde was ſent to the Hague, to try to gain the ſtates and prince of Orange.

The king had the more hopes of prevailing with the prince, as there had been ſome time ſince a propoſal from him for his marriage with the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter to the duke of York; and as he did not doubt, that to ſucceed in that affair, the prince would grant every thing deſired of him concerning the ſeparate peace with France. It was for this end probably, that the king permitted the prince his nephew to come to his court, and ſollicit his affairs in perſon: but without any poſitive aſſurance that his addreſſes would be well received. The prince could not leave the army before the campaign was ended, and therefore arrived not in England till the 9th of October, when he landed at Harwich, and from thence went to the court. The king, the duke of York, the lord treaſurer, and ſir William Temple, were the only perſons informed of the motive of the prince's journey. The court, which was then at Newmarket, being returned to London, the prince had a ſight of the princeſs, and then demanded her in form of the king and duke of York, by whom his propoſal was differently received. The duke of York ſeemed very cold, and the king appeared to embrace it with joy: but it was on condition that he and the prince ſhould previouſly agree upon the terms of a general peace. This condition was like to render the prince's journey entirely fruitleſs. The prince was abſolutely againſt ſpeaking of a peace till after the marriage, and the king as reſolute to agree upon the plan of a peace before the marriage ſhould be concluded. They continued five or ſix days fixed to their reſolutions. The prince acquainted the king, by ſir William Temple, "That his allies, who were like to have hard terms of the peace, as things then ſtood, would be apt to believe, that he had made his match at their coſt, and for his part he would never ſell his honour for a wife. All this was not capable to divert the king from his reſolution, and the affair ſeemed upon the point of breaking off. But all was reconciled. Temple paying a viſit to the prince one night after ſupper, was told by him, "That he repented his coming into England, and reſolved to be gone in two days, if the king continued in his mind of treating upon the peace before he was married; but that before he went, the king muſt chuſe how they ſhould live hereafter; for he was ſure it muſt be either like the greateſt friends, or the greateſt enemies; and deſired ſir William to let his majeſty know ſo next morning, and give him account of what he ſhould ſay upon it." Sir William, in diſcharge of his commiſſion, repreſented to the king the ill conſequences of a breach with the prince, conſidering the ill humours of ſo many of his ſubjects on account of his engagements with France, and the invitation made the prince by ſeveral of them during the late war. The king having heard him with great attention, anſwered, "I never yet was deceived in judging a man's honeſty by his looks,———and if I am not deceived in the prince's face, he is the honeſteſt man in the world; and I will truſt him, and he ſhall have his wife, and you ſhall go immediately and tell my brother ſo, and that it is a thing I am reſolved on." The duke of York appeared at firſt a little ſurpriſed, but however anſwered, the king ſhould be obeyed, that he ſhould be glad his ſubjects would learn from him the obedience which they owed to their ſovereign,———adding, "I tell him my opinion very freely upon any thing, but when that is done, and I know his pleaſure upon it, I obey him." Immediately after ſir William waited on the prince with the agreeable news. The ſame day, the marriage articles were drawn and agreed, the princeſs's portion being forty thouſand pounds ſterling, and the day after the king declared the marriage in full council[y]. The city of London teſtified an extraordinary joy at the news, and ſir Francis Chaplain the lord mayor invited the king to a magnificent entertainment the 29th of October. The marriage was conſummated on the prince's birth-day, the 4th of November[z].

A few days after, the king, the duke of York, the prince of Orange, the lord treaſurer, and ſir William Temple, entered into conference for ſettling the ſcheme of a general peace, and after ſome debates, agreed upon theſe terms: "All ſhould be reſtored by France to the emperor, that had been taken from him in the war, the duchy of Lorrain to that duke, and all on both ſides between France and Holland: and to Spain, the towns of Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, Tournay, Conde, Valenciennes, St. Guillain, and Binch. That the prince of Orange ſhould endeavour to pro-

[y] The French embaſſador, and lord Arlington, appeared the only two perſons unſatisfied upon it at court; the firſt, not knowing how he ſhould anſwer it to his maſter, that an affair of that importance ſhould paſs without his communication, much leſs advice, in a court where nothing had been done ſo, for many years; and the lord Arlington, that it ſhould paſs without his knowledge, who ſtill endeavoured to keep up the court opinion of his confidence with the prince. Temple's mem. p. 455.

[z] Burnet, in his account of this matter, ſays that the lord treaſurer Danby ſeeing his ruin was inevitable, if he could not bring the king off from a French intereſt, gave the prince of Orange, by ſir William Temple, great hopes of a marriage with the duke's daughter, and got the prince to aſk the king's leave to come over to England. When the prince, after a fruitleſs ſtay for ſome weeks, was going away, the lord Danby preſſed his ſtaying a few days longer, and that the management of the matter might be left to him. So next morning he came to the king, and told him, he had received letters from all his majeſty's beſt friends in England, and ſhewed him a bundle of them, which he was ſure the king would not trouble himſelf to read. They all agreed, he ſaid, that the king ſhould make a marriage between the prince of Orange and the duke's daughter. If not, the parliament would certainly addreſs for it, and ſo the king would loſe the thanks of it. Whereas, if the king did it of his own motion, he would have the honour of it. Having enforced the thing with all the arguments he could, the king was convinced, and ſent for the duke, who obeyed the king's pleaſure. Danby ſo ordered the matter, that the ducheſs of Portſmouth could not ſpeak with the king, before he had declared the matter in council, p. 409, 410.

The

cure the conſent of Spoin; and the king that of France, for which purpoſe he ſhould ſend ſome perſon immediately over with the propoſition, who was to demand a poſitive anſwer in two days." The lord Duras, afterwards earl of Feverſham, a creature of the duke of York, was the perſon fixed upon to execute this commiſſion.

The prince and princeſs of Orange embarked for Holland ſhortly after. The king poſitively aſſured the prince, he would never depart from the ſcheme agreed upon for a general peace, and that if France refuſed her conſent, he would declare war againſt her. And yet, the prince had the mortification before his departure, to ſee the adjournment of the parliament prolonged from the 3d of December to the 4th of April[a].

The court of France were extremely ſurprized, as well with the ſcheme of the peace, as the manner in which it was pretended to impoſe it on them. But whether the lord Duras had ſecret orders to give hopes, that the ſcheme might be altered, or it was not deſpaired to gain the king of England, the envoy, after ſtaying ſome days beyond his commiſſion, returned without an anſwer, or at leaſt with an anſwer of no ſignification. It contained only, "that the moſt chriſtian king hoped, his brother would not break with him upon one or two towns, to which England had no pretenſion, but however, he would ſend orders to his embaſſador at London, to treat with his majeſty himſelf." It is known, the king of France offered Mr. Montague, the Engliſh embaſſador, large ſums for the king and the treaſurer, which were not accepted, at leaſt openly; but on the other hand, the king ſuffered himſelf to be ſo mollified by the offers or articles of France, that the ſcheme of peace agreed on with the prince of Orange, was at laſt reduced to nothing, and no more heard of.

From the lord Duras's return to the meeting of the parliament, the king was actually negotiating with the king of France, the terms on which he was to reſiſt the ſollicitations of his parliament, and prevent his declaring for the allies. This appeared openly in the parliament itſelf, by the letters of the lord treaſurer Danby, produced before the commons in 1678, by Mr. Montague, embaſſador at the French court; and ſince that, a fuller conviction has been given of this by Mr. Montague's letters, publiſhed by the earl of Danby, in the reign of William III. I ſhall tranſcribe the extracts of theſe letters, that the reader may be ſatisfied of what I ſay, without relying on my word. But I am to premiſe, that the king, after prolonging the adjournment to April 1678, thought proper to aſſemble the parliament, the 15th of January, and as ſoon as they met, to adjourn the commons, by a meſſage, to the 28th of the ſame month. The letters I mentioned were as follows:

Extract of a letter from Mr. Montague to the king from Paris, in the year 1677.

—— I am ſure the greatneſs of the king of France is ſupported only by your majeſty's connivance at what he does, and the good will Chriſtendom ſees you have for him. The advantage he has by it even in point of revenue, by his conqueſts, does amount to five times the ſum you have now from him: and though after-games are hard to play, I think I underſtand this court ſo well, and if you care to have it done, I am confident I could get you by agreement a million of livres a year to be paid while the war ſhall laſt, and four millions after the peace ſhall be made, I mean, ſir, over and above what you have from France now.——

Extract of a letter from Mr. Montague to the lord treaſurer Danby, writ a little after the former.

I expect his chriſtian majeſty's anſwer to the demands I made by the king's direction of two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, to be paid till the general peace is concluded, taking for granted that it will be conform to my orders from the king, to inſiſt upon two millions of livres a year during the war, and four millions after the peace, or elſe two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling during the war. But I am told this morning, that Mr. Courtin has agreed this matter with the king my maſter, and that his majeſty will be contented with two millions of livres a year only during the war: which I confeſs ſurpriſed me extremely, conſidering the neceſſity of his majeſty's condition, and the poſitiveneſs of his commands to me, to inſiſt upon two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, which I had done very effectually, and muſt have ſucceeded in, conſidering the reaſonableneſs of the demand, except the generoſity of the king our maſter's nature, who values money ſo little, has already condeſcended to the leſſer ſum of two millions of livres, &c.

Extract of a letter from the lord treaſurer Danby to Mr. Montague, embaſſador in France, the 17th of January 1677-8.

—— Yeſterday young Ruvigny came to me with Mr. Barillon (having given me his father's letters the day before) and diſcourſed much upon the confidence the French king hath of the firmneſs of ours to him: of the good opinion his maſter hath of me; of his king's reſolution to condeſcend to any thing, that is not infamous to him, for the ſatisfaction of our king; how certainly our king may depend upon all aſſiſtances and ſupplies from his maſter, in caſe the friendſhip be preſerved—The main of their drift was to engage me to prevail with the prince of Orange as to the town of Tournay—The king muſt come to ſome declaration of his mind to the parliament when it meets. That which makes the hopes of peace leſs probable, is, that the duke grows every day leſs inclined to it, and has created a greater indifferency in the king than I could have imagined; which being added to the French king's reſolutions, not to part with Tournay, does, I confeſs, make me deſpair of any accommodation. Nevertheleſs, I am aſſured that one principal cauſe of this adjournment for thirteen days, has been to find an expedient for the peace; and the effect hath hitherto been, that no body will now believe other than that the peace is already concluded between us and France.

Extract of another letter from the ſame hand to the ſame perſon, dated the 25th of March 1678.

—— In caſe the conditions of peace ſhall be accepted, the king expects to have ſix millions of livres a year for three years, from the time that this agreement ſhall be ſigned betwixt his majeſty and the king of France; becauſe it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in humour to give him any ſupplies after the making of any peace with France; and the embaſſador here has always agreed to that ſum, but not for ſo long a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the money at all; and all poſſible care muſt be taken to have this whole negotiation as private as is poſſible, for fear of giving offence at home, where for the moſt part we hear in ten days after of any thing that is communicated to the French miniſters.

At the bottom of the letter were theſe words under the king's own hand——

This letter is writ by my order, C. R.

I ſhall make no remarks upon theſe letters, which plainly ſhew, with what ſincerity the king diſcharged the office of mediator, and how much he favoured France. The beſt excuſe for him is, that theſe ſecret proceedings and negotiations were only to get money. But when it is conſidered, that he would have received much more from his parliament, if he had purſued the paths of uprightneſs, and might have had more left of what the parliament would have granted him in one ſingle year, than he hoped to draw from France in three, a man can hardly forbear thinking, that his blind attachment to the intereſt of France was for hidden deſigns which it was not time yet to diſcover. And if it is ſaid, he took money from France, only to be freed from the trouble of applying to his parliament, this does but confirm that he intended to render himſelf abſolute[b].

[1677-8] The king had not prolonged the adjournment of the parliament to the 28th of January in order to find expedients for a general peace, as the treaſurer told Montague in his letter of the 26th of January, but to have time to receive the news of a league with Holland, which was indeed ſigned the 16th of January. This league was very far from [a] The prince and princeſs were hurried out of town ſo faſt, (there being a ſecret deſign to invite them to an entertainment in the city by the country party, which the court did not like,) that they had ſcarce time to make proviſion for their journey. Being come to Canterbury, they repaired to an inn, where, through haſte, they came very meanly provided. Upon application to borrow money of the corporation, the mayor and his brethren, upon grave deliberation, were really afraid to lend them any. Dr. Tillotſon, then dean of Canterbury, hearing of this, immediately got together what plate and money he could, and went to the inn to Mr. Bentinck, with the offer of what he had. This was highly acceptable to the prince and princeſs, and the dean was carried to wait upon them. By this lucky accident, he began that acquaintance and correſpondence with the prince and Mr. Bentinck, as advanced him afterwards to the archbiſhoprick.

anſwering the deſires of the parliament. It was properly but defenſive, to prevent the king of France from purſuing his conqueſts in the Netherlands. Nay, it may be eaſily judged, conſidering the king's ſtrict union with France, and the ſecret correſpondence between the two courts, whether he had any great deſire to go to war with the king of France, in order to oblige him to reſtore what he had taken. He believed nevertheleſs, that this league would be capable to impoſe upon the parliament, and therefore had deferred their meeting to receive the news of its concluſion. Supported by this league, which according to him, was to produce wonderful effects, he made the following ſpeech to both houſes, the 28th of January.

My lords and gentlemen,

"WHEN we parted laſt, I told you, that before we met again, I would do that which ſhould be to your ſatisfaction. I have accordingly made ſuch alliances with Holland, as are for the preſervation of Flanders, and which cannot fail of that end, unleſs prevented either by the want of due aſſiſtances to ſupport thoſe alliances, or by the ſmall regard the Spaniards themſelves muſt have to their own preſervation. The firſt of theſe I cannot ſuſpect, by reaſon of your repeated engagements to maintain them; and I know you are ſo wiſe as to conſider, that a war which muſt be the neceſſary conſequence of them, ought neither to be proſecuted by halves, nor to want ſuch aſſurances of perſeverance as may give me encouragement to purſue it: beſides it will not be leſs neceſſary to let our enemies have ſuch a proſpect of our reſolutions, as may let them ſee certainly that we ſhall not be weary of our arms, till Chriſtendom be reſtored to ſuch a peace, as ſhall not be in the power of any prince alone to diſturb.

"I do acknowledge to you, that I have uſed all the means poſſible by a mediation, to have procured an honourable and ſafe peace for Chriſtendom; knowing how preferable ſuch a peace would have been to any war, and eſpecially to this kingdom, which muſt neceſſarily own the vaſt benefits it has received by peace, while its neighbours only have yet ſmarted by the war; but finding it no longer to be hoped for by fair means, it ſhall not be my fault if that be not obtained by force which cannot be had any other ways. For this reaſon, I have recalled my troops from France, and have conſidered, that although the Dutch ſhall do their parts, we cannot have leſs on ours than ninety ſail of capital ſhips conſtantly maintained, nor leſs than thirty or forty thouſand landmen (with their dependencies) to be employed upon our fleets and elſewhere. And becauſe there ſhall be no fear of miſ-employing what you ſhall give to theſe uſes, I am contented that ſuch money be appropriated to thoſe ends as ſtrictly as you can deſire. I have given teſtimony enough of my care in that kind, by the progreſs I have made in building the new ſhips; wherein, for the making them more uſeful, I have directed ſuch larger dimenſions as will coſt me above one hunded thouſand pounds more than the act allows. I have gone as far as I could in repairing the old fleet, and in buying neceſſary ſtores for the navy and ordnance: and in this and other proviſions for better ſecuring both my foreign plantations and the iſlands nearer home, I have expended a great deal more than the two hundred thouſand pounds you enabled me to borrow upon the exciſe, although I have not found ſuch credit as I expected upon that ſecurity. I have borne the charge both of a rebellion in Virginia, and a new war with Algiers: I ſtand engaged to the prince of Orange for my niece's portion, and I ſhall not be able to maintain my conſtant neceſſary eſtabliſhments, unleſs the new impoſts upon wine, &c. be continued to me, which would otherways turn only to their profit to whom we leaſt intend it.

"I hope theſe things will need little recommendation to you, when you conſider your promiſes in ſome, and the neceſſity of the reſt; and to let you ſee, that I have not only employed my time and treaſure for your ſafety, but done all I could to remove all ſorts of jealouſies, I have married my niece to the prince of Orange, by which I hope I have given full aſſurances, that I ſhall never ſuffer his intereſts to be ruined, if I can be aſſiſted, as I ought to be, to preſerve them. Having done all this, I expect from you a plentiful ſupply, ſuitable to ſuch great occaſions, whereon depends not only the honour, but for ought I know, the being of the Engliſh nation, which will not be ſaved by finding fault afterwards, but may be prevented by avoiding the chief fault of doing weakly and by halves, what can only be hoped from a vigorous and thorough proſecution of what we undertake. Theſe conſiderations are of the greateſt importance that ever concerned this kingdom, and therefore I would have you enter immediately upon them, without ſuffering any other buſineſs whatſoever to divert you from bringing them to good reſolutions."

It is very ſtrange, that Charles II. with more extraordinary ſupplies than were ever granted to any king of England, with a revenue much larger than that of any of his predeceſſors, (which, by the calculation of the commons, amounted to ſixteen hundred thouſand pounds) was nevertheleſs always in want and oppreſſed with debts, and in every ſpeech told his parliament, that he had expended for the public, more than was granted him. He had however been engaged but in two wars, which he might have avoided if he had pleaſed, and ſaved his ſubjects ſeveral millions, fruitleſsly conſumed in theſe wars. But this is not the only reflection which may be made upon this ſpeech; there is another of much greater importance.

The whole ſpeech was founded upon a ſuppoſition which naturally ought to have been true, but was not, namely, that his alliance with Holland could not fail to engage him in a war with France, though nothing was farther from his intention. His aim therefore was to repreſent his alliance with Holland and the war againſt France, as one and the ſame thing, or at leaſt the war as the neceſſary conſequence of this alliance, though he gave no poſitive hopes of the war. There was indeed a wide diſtance between the one and the other. For, if the parliament had granted the immenſe ſums he demanded, it is certain, he might have made peace when he pleaſed, without expending any of the money in preparations. He would only have had to declare againſt France, and peace would inſtantly have followed. For France was not in condition to reſiſt, if England had been ſincerely united with the reſt of her enemies. Herein the king threw the parliament into a great dilemma. For, either they were to grant him the large ſums he demanded, without having other hopes of a future war, than a conſequence not abſolutely neceſſary, or in refuſing the ſupply, they gave the king a plauſible pretence to ſay, it was not his fault, that England did not join with the enemies of France. But in the houſe of commons were men of ſufficient abilities to diſcover the king's artifices, and inſtruct their fellow members, wherein they ſucceeded the more eaſily, as above two thirds of the houſe were little inclined to truſt to the king's word.

It was therefore reſolved, after great debates, to preſent an addreſs to the king, the ſubſtance of which was.—— "That they beſought him not to admit of any treaty of peace, whereby the French king ſhould be left in poſſeſſion of any greater dominion or power, than was left him by the Pyrenean treaty: that no trade be admitted with France, or any goods ſuffered to be imported from thence, on pain of forfeiture, and when he ſhould be pleaſed to communicate his alliance to them in parliament, they would give ſuch ready aſſiſtance, on all occaſions, as might bring the war to a happy concluſion."

This addreſs threw the king, in his turn, into a great perplexity. He would have it believed, that he intended to make war upon France, though he had already reſolved againſt it. He could not therefore anſwer this addreſs without a direct aſſent or diſſent, and this is what he was willing to avoid. To extricate himſelf, he had recourſe to the ſame expedient he had formerly uſed. This was, to complain of the great invaſion of his prerogative, in thus preſcribing the methods he was to uſe, which at the ſame time he ſhewed to be ridiculous and impracticable. He ſaid, his ſpeech was to both houſes, and the return ought to be from both. That however, if, by their aſſiſtance, he was put into arms ſufficient for ſuch a work, he would never be weary, till Chriſtendom was reſtored to ſuch a peace, that it ſhould not be in the power of one prince to diſturb it: that the rights of making and managing war and peace, belonged ſolely to him, and they were miſtaken, if they thought he would ever depart from that right: that if the commons would encourage him to go further in alliances, they muſt conſider of raiſing ſpeedy ſupplies; for from the conſideration of thoſe he muſt take his meaſures.

The meaning of this anſwer was eaſily underſtood, namely, that the king ſtudiouſly avoided to ſay poſitively, he intended to declare war againſt France, though he wiſhed that conſequence to be drawn from his alliance with Holland: alliance, of which the contents were not known, and which was not yet imparted to the parliament. He pretended, however, that on his bare declaration or information of an alliance with Holland, the parliament ſhould enable him to maintain maintain ninety large ships, beſides thirty others, and forty thouſand land forces [c]. And yet, when the articles of this treaty, ſhortly after, came to be known, the commons voted, that it was not purſuant to their deſires. It is eaſy to ſee, wherein the difference between the king and the commons conſiſted. The king feared, or feigned to fear, that the parliament, after engaging him in a war with France, would leave him deſtitute of means to ſupport it. The commons really diſtruſted his ſincerity, and feared, that, after receiving the money, he would think no more of war, but ſuffer an unſafe peace to be concluded. Let the reader determine for one or other. I ſhall only ſay, that, if the reigns of Henry III. and Richard II. are excepted, England had never ſeen, till within the laſt ſixty years, ſuch mutual diſtruſt between her kings and parliaments. It muſt be imputed to this, that James I. Charles I. and Charles II. were no ſlaves to their word, and while they pretended to ſalve their ſincerity by generals, reſtrictions, obſcure or ambiguous expreſſions, they loſt entirely the confidence of their ſubjects. Every king of England is in danger of being very unhappy, when, by ſuch artifices, he renders ſuſpected the ſincerity of what he ſays in full parliament.

However this be, the commons reſolved to grant the king a ſupply, but with ſtrict limitations. At the beginning of this ſeſſion, they had granted him ſeventy thouſand pounds, for a ſolemn funeral of his father, whoſe body could not be found, though it was certainly known to be interred in Windſor chapel. I don't know whether it was ever diſcovered, or the intended obſequies performed [d].

The earl of Shaftſbury, after thirteen months confinement in the Tower, was at laſt diſcharged. But not till he had begged pardon on his knees at the bar of the lords houſe, as well for his fault as his obſtinacy in not acknowledging it [e].

While ſo much time was ſpent in England in deliberations about war, the king of France taking the field in February, made himſelf maſter of Ghent and Ipres in March, and then put his forces into quarters of refreſhment. Theſe conqueſts ſo alarmed the Dutch, that from this time they reſolved upon a ſeparate peace, though they durſt not publicly own it. Lewis XIV. who knew their intentions, and had nothing to fear from England, began to talk like a conqueror, and to form himſelf the plan of the peace he was willing to grant the allies, and which was different from that agreed on between Charles and the prince of Orange.

On the other hand, the commons of England alarmed at the progreſs of the French arms, made haſte to finiſh a bill for raiſing money by a poll tax. The 14th of March they reſolved upon an addreſs to the king, to pray him to declare war againſt France, to diſmiſs the embaſſador of that crown, and recall his own from Paris, with a promiſe of the neceſſary and plentiful ſupplies. This addreſs was ſent the next day to the lords for their concurrence: but before an anſwer was given, the king came to the houſe of lords the 20th of March, and after paſſing the poll bill [f], and ſome others, adjourned the parliament to the 11th of April.

It is remarkable that five days after, the lord treaſurer writ the ſecond of the forementioned letters to embaſſador Montague, concerning the ſecret negotiation of which I have ſpoken.

[1678] The parliament meeting the 11th of April was farther adjourned to the 29th, when the chancellor acquainted the two houſes, that the king had diſcovered that the Dutch were thinking of a ſeparate peace without his conſent or privity, and deſired their advice how to proceed. The commons gave their advice for an actual war with France, and at the ſame time voted, "That the late leagues made with the ſtates general of the United Provinces, were not purſuant to the addreſſes of the houſe, nor conſiſtent with the good and ſafety of the kingdom." The king returned an anſwer, which teſtified his reſentment of this vote. But the commons, not at all diſcouraged, preſented a ſecond addreſs, in which—— "They beſought him to communicate to them his reſolutions upon their advice."———They added, "That the inconveniences and dangers which the kingdom lay under, might have been totally, or in a great meaſure prevented, in caſe his majeſty had accepted of the advice by them given in their addreſs of the 26th of May laſt, and the 31ſt of January: they beſought him therefore, that he would be pleaſed to remove thoſe counſellors that adviſed him to give thoſe anſwers which he did to the ſaid addreſſes.———In fine, that he would be pleaſed to remove the duke of Lauderdale from his preſence and council."———The king immediately anſwered, "That he was much ſurprized at the extravagancy of their addreſs, and unwilling at preſent to give it ſuch a due anſwer as it deſerved." Two days after, namely, the 13th of May, he prorogued the parliament to the 23d of the ſame month. Thus the propoſal for a war with France never failed to produce either an adjournment or a prorogation. It muſt be remarked, that this was at the very time the ſeparate peace between France and Holland was negotiating, which the Dutch would never have reſolved, could they have believed that England would declare for a war. Nevertheleſs, the king would ſtill have it believed, he was diſpoſed to war, though hitherto he had not poſitively ſaid it. To this end, immediately after the poll bill had paſſed, he raiſed thirty thouſand men, who were completed in ſix weeks.

While theſe forces were raiſing, and before the prorogation of the parliament, the ſtates general ſent Van Lewen to the king, to acquaint him, that they were diſpoſed to a peace, becauſe they ſaw, there was no reliance on the uncertain meaſures of England. That however, if the king would immediately declare war againſt France, they would break off all negotiations, and vigorouſly proſecute the war purſuant to their alliances, and that his declaration was the only thing that could prevent a peace. This was declared to the king by ſir William Temple from the ſtates embaſſador. The king now finding that a poſitive anſwer was to be returned, which he had hitherto avoided, told ſir William Temple, "That ſince the Dutch would have a peace upon the French terms, and France offered money for his conſent to what he could not help, he did not know why he ſhould not get the money."

The weakneſs of this evaſion is manifeſt: for though the embaſſador of the ſtates had declared, there ſhould be no peace, if the king would really engage in a war, the king, ſuppreſſing this poſitive declaration, ſuppoſed that the ſtates were for a peace upon any terms. Upon this falſe ſuppoſition, he ordered ſir William Temple to treat with Barillon the French embaſſador; but ſir William wiſely declined ſuch a negotiation. What Temple refuſed was undertaken by others, and the ſame author ſays, that amongſt the articles propoſed by the embaſſador of France, for concluding a private treaty with the king, there was one article which was ſo offenſive, that the king aſſured him he would never forget it while he lived. He ſays no more, whether becauſe he was not informed of it, or did not think proper to divulge what he knew. But Dr. Swift, who publiſhed Sir William Temple's letters, acquaints us with that remarkable paſſage, namely, "That France, in order to break the force of the confederacy, and elude all juſt conditions of a general peace, reſolved by any means to enter into ſeparate meaſures with Holland, to which end it was abſolutely neceſſary to gain the good offices of the king of England, who was looked upon as the maſter of the peace whenever he pleaſed. The bargain was ſtruck for either three or four hundred thouſand pounds: but when all was agreed, Mr. Barillon, the French embaſſador, told the king, that he had orders from his maſter before payment to add a private article, by which his majeſty ſhould be engaged, never to keep above eight thouſand men of [c] In the debates about raiſing the land forces, ſir William Coventry was for hiring bodies of troops from the German princes, and for aſſiſting the Dutch with money. He thought, that which did more properly belong to England, was to ſet out a great fleet, and to cut off the French trade every where; for they were then very high in their manufactures and trade. Burnet, p. 411.

[d] The truth of the matter ſeems to be this; that the king, either had great occaſion for that ſum of money, or thought he could put it to a better uſe, than laying it out on a ſolemn funeral for his father; and ſo never ſent to enquire for the body. For that king Charles I. was actually buried at Windſor (though the lord Clarendon ſeems, at the end of his hiſtory, to doubt of it) and that his body might have been found without much difficulty, is plain from the following certificate, given by Mr. John Sewell, regiſter at Windſor caſtle.——"Anno 1696, Septemb. 21, the ſame vault in which king Charles I. was buried, was opened, to lay in a ſtill-born child of the then princeſs of Denmark, the late queen Anne. On the king's coffin the velvet pall was ſtrong and ſound, and there was about the coffin a leaden band, with this inſcription cut through it, KING CHARLES, 1648.——— When the body of king Charles I. lay in ſtate in the dean's hall, the duke of Richmond had the coffin opened, and was ſatisfied that it was the king's body. This ſeveral people have declared they knew to be true, who were alive, and then preſent, as Mr. Randolph of New Windſor, and others." Echard, tom. II. p. 649.

[e] He had, it ſeems, had recourſe to the king's bench, whither he was brought by a habeas corpus: but the judges denied his redreſs. This application to an inferior court was ſoon taken notice of by the lords, who voted it a breach of privilege, for which the earl was to anſwer his contempt at the bar of the houſe. He was accordingly brought to the bar, where he offered to acknowledge his aſſerting the diſſolution of the parliament to be an unadviſed action, and to beg their lordſhips pardon for his offence, in bringing his habeas corpus. Which being done in a form preſcribed by the houſe, he was releaſed. Idem. p. 442.

ſtanding troops in his three kingdoms. This unexpected propoſal put the king in a rage, and made him ſay, God's fiſh! Does my brother of France think to ſerve me thus? Are all his promiſes to make me abſolute maſter of my realms come to this? Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thouſand men?

Hence it evidently appears, for what the thirty thouſand men the king was raiſing were intended. They could not be levied for a war againſt France, though the king uſed that pretence, ſince he had already made his bargain with that crown for four millions of livres. Nothing elſe therefore can be thought, but that the king ſeeing the peace upon the point of concluſion, which he only could, but would not prevent, imagined that after the peace, the king of France would aſſiſt him to become abſolute maſter in his kingdoms, and furniſh him with money to maintain the thirty thouſand men without his applying to the parliament. If this be not ſo, what account can be given of his conduct in raiſing an army, at a time when all his proceedings ſhewed, he had not the leaſt deſire to make war upon France?

The king was deceived by the promiſes of Lewis XIV. who artfully took advantage of the eager deſire of Charles and the duke his brother to eſtabliſh an abſolute government in England, to engage them in all the meaſures they had taken during the whole war, and which were ſo directly contrary to the intereſts of the kingdom. But when he ſaw himſelf ſecure of a peace with the Dutch, and, by a neceſſary conſequence, of a general peace with all Europe, he made a jeſt of his promiſe to his friend. He thought, doubtleſs, it was not for the intereſt of France, that the king of England ſhould be abſolute, or rather, he feared to engage, for the ſole intereſts of the king of England, in an undertaking capable of kindling a new war, in which all Europe might be concerned.

I know not whether the king conſented to Lewis's demands, and am only ſure, that he continued his levies, whether with intention to execute his deſigns without the aſſiſtance of France, or in the hope of obtaining better conditions from Lewis, by terrifying him with the apprehenſion of his joining with the allies, which might ſtill be practicable. By degrees, he ſpoke more gently of war, and ſufficiently declared his inclination for peace. In all appearance, he had adjuſted matters with France.

Affairs were in this ſituation when the parliament met the 23d of May, after a prorogation of ten days. The king opened the ſeventeenth ſeſſion of this long parliament with a ſpeech, the ſubſtance of which was as follows:

"——— I am reſolved, as far as I am able, to ſave Flanders, either by a war or a peace, which way ſoever I ſhall find moſt conducing towards it.———If I were able I would keep up my army and my navy at ſea for ſome time; but I leave it to you to conſider of ſupplies for their continuance or diſbanding; and in either caſe not to diſcourage ſo many worthy and brave gentlemen, who have offered their lives and ſervice to their country, and in purſuit of your own advices and reſolutions. I muſt tell you, that a branch of my revenue is now expiring, and another part of it is cut off by a clauſe in the poll bill; that I have borrowed two hundred thouſand pounds upon the exciſe at your requeſt, of all which you are to conſider. I never had any intentions but of good to you and my people, nor ever ſhall; therefore I deſire you will not drive me into extremities, which muſt end ill both for you and me, and (which is worſt) for the nation. I deſire to prevent all diſorders or miſchief that may befal by our diſagreement; but in caſe there do, I leave it to God Almighty to judge who is the occaſion of it. One thing more I have to add, and that is, that I will never more ſuffer the courſe and method of paſſing laws to be changed, by tacking together ſeveral matters in one bill. The reſt I leave to the lord chancellor."

The chancellor's ſpeech, according to cuſtom, tended to excuſe the king's meaſures. As he only enlarged upon what the king had ſaid more ſuccinctly, I think it needleſs to inſert the ſpeech, which offered nothing new or material.

The houſe of commons having adjourned themſelves for three days, met again the 27th of May, and came to the following reſolution: "That the houſe taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, and the expence occaſioned by the army, were humbly of opinion, that if his majeſty pleaſed to think fit to enter into the war againſt the French king, the houſe was, and would be always ready to aſſiſt him in that war; but if otherwiſe, they would proceed to the conſideration of providing for the ſpeedy diſbanding of the army."

The houſe further ordered, that the members of his majeſty's privy council ſhould acquaint the king with this vote, and pray his ſpeedy anſwer. The king replied, "That the French king had made ſuch offers of a ceſſation till the 27th of July, that he believed they would not only be accepted, but end in a general peace: yet, as that was uncertain, it would not be prudent to diſmiſs either fleet or army before that time." Upon this anſwer the houſe voted, "That all forces raiſed ſince the 29th of September laſt (except thoſe tranſported to foreign plantations) be forthwith paid off and diſbanded, and that they would conſider of a ſupply for that purpoſe." Accordingly the 4th of June the houſe voted two hundred thouſand pounds for the diſbanding of the army by the end of the month, and the next day they voted the ſame ſum towards defraying the expences of the fleet.

Upon theſe votes the king, by a meſſage, told the houſe, that his mind was ſtill the ſame, that the army and fleet ought to be kept up till the expected peace ſhould be concluded; and he further recommended to their conſideration, "Whether it were not diſhonourable for him to recall his forces in Flanders from thoſe towns which he had taken into his protection, before they could provide themſelves of other ſuccours." Upon this conſideration the commons extended the time, as to the forces in Flanders, to the 27th day of July.

The 15th of June, the houſe reſolved, that, "after the Tueſday following, no motions ſhould be made for any new ſupplies of money, till after the next receſs." As hitherto the houſe had experienced, that the king only amuſed them, and intended to have the money before he poſitively declared himſelf, they reſolved to put him under a neceſſity of declaring, within three days, for fear he ſhould continue to amuſe them, till it was too late. Accordingly, on that very Tueſday the king came to the houſe of peers, and, ſending for the commons, told both houſes, "That the peace between France, Spain, and Holland, was almoſt concluded, in which his part would be not only that of mediator, but alſo to give his warrants in it. That Spain writes word, that unleſs England bears the charge of maintaining Flanders, even after the peace, they will not be in a condition to ſupport it long. Therefore to that end it was neceſſary to keep up the navy at ſea; and not only ſo, but to give the world ſome aſſurance of being well united at home: that though the houſe of commons might think ſuch a peace as ill a bargain as a war, becauſe it would coſt them money, yet if they ſeriouſly conſider, that Flanders had been loſt, and perhaps by this time, he believed they would give much greater ſums than that would coſt, rather than the ſingle town of Oſtend ſhould be in French hands, and forty of their men of war in ſo good a haven, over againſt the river's mouth." Then he inſinuated to them, "That they could not but be pleaſed to underſtand the reputation England had gained abroad, by having in forty days, raiſed an army of thirty thouſand men, and prepared a navy of ninety men of war; therefore, if they deſired to keep up the honour of the crown at home, and look to the ſafety of the balance of affairs abroad; if they deſired he ſhould paſs any part of his life in quiet, and all the reſt in confidence and kindneſs with them, and other future parliaments, they muſt find a way not only to ſettle for his life his revenue as at Chriſtmas laſt, but alſo to add a new fund of three hundred thouſand pounds per annum, upon which he would paſs an act to ſettle fifty thouſand pounds upon the navy and ordnance, and ſhould be likewiſe ready to conſent to all ſuch laws as they ſhould propoſe for the good of the nation." He laſtly reminded them, "to enable him to keep his word with the prince of Orange in the payment of his niece's portion, which was forty thouſand pounds; the firſt payment being now due and demanded by him."

Would not one think at reading this ſpeech, that the king had hitherto kept the balance of Europe perfectly even, and was thereby entitled to demand, that he ſhould be enabled to preſerve it? Would not one think, that he had done the nation ſome important ſervice, which deſerved an augmentation to his revenue of three hundred thouſand pounds a year? But the commons were ſo uſed to ſuch ſpeeches, that they made no impreſſion upon them. If their diſtruſt of the king had been hitherto great, it may be affirmed, it conſiderably increaſed, when they ſaw a peace concluded, which diminiſhed not the great power of France, but left Europe expoſed to her mercy. It was evident, the king might, if he had pleaſed, have procured a more advantageous peace. After this, it is not ſtrange, that his ſtrict union with France, was ſuſpected to conceal deſigns which were not for the good of the nation. Accordingly, when the commons came to debate on the additional revenue demanded by the king, it was unanimouſly rejected [g]. Moreover, the houſe refuſed to give a compenſation for the loſs ſuſtained by the king in the prohibition of French commodities. In ſhort, the lords having paſſed the bill for diſbanding the army, with an enlargement of the time prefixed for one month longer, the commons abſolutely refuſed their conſent to the amendment.

The king perceiving by this, what he was to expect from the commons, came to the parliament the 15th of July, and paſſed ſeveral bills, of which theſe were the principal.

1. An act for granting a ſupply of ſix hundred and nineteen thouſand, three hundred and eighty pounds, for diſbanding the army, and other uſes therein mentioned. 2. An act for granting an additional duty to his majeſty upon wines for three years. 3. An act for burying in woollen. This act, which is ſtill in force, is very ſerviceable to the flannel manufacture, and conſequently makes a great conſumption of wool.

Theſe acts being paſſed, the chancellor acquainted both houſes, that the king thought proper to prorogue them to the firſt of Auguſt, and ſo to keep them in call, by ſhort prorogations, but that his intention was, they ſhould not meet till winter, unleſs there was occaſion for their aſſembling ſooner. Thus ended the ſeventeenth ſeſſion of this parliament. And thus England ſaw herſelf engaged in an expence of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to pay an army and fleet, which certainly had not been prepared to make war with France, or for the ſecurity of England.

While the parliament was ſitting, the ſtates general ſeeing that nothing was to be hoped for from England, treated with France, both for themſelves and Spain, with regard to the Netherlands. At laſt, every thing being ſettled, and the king of France promiſing to reſtore to the Spaniards, Ghent, Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburgh, the ſtates ordered their plenipotentiaries at Nimeguen to ſign the peace the laſt of June. It was univerſally expected, that the peace would be ſigned that day. But as the time for this reſtitution had been neglected to be fixed, (the Spaniards and Dutch not doubting but it was to be immediately after the exchange of the ratifications) the Spaniſh embaſſador happened the day before, to aſk the French plenipotentiaries, when they would reſtore the towns? To this they poſitively anſwered, that it would not be till after the reſtitution of the towns taken from the king of Sweden, by the allies in the north [h]. This unexpected pretenſion put a ſtop to the ſigning of the peace, and the Dutch plenipotentiaries received expreſs orders from their maſters not to ſign, unleſs France would engage to reſtore the ſix places, upon the ratification of the treaty. But the French were immoveable, and appeared reſolute to continue the war, unleſs Sweden was ſatisfied.

Charles being informed of this new difficulty, and told moreover by the French embaſſador, that it was his maſter's intention, immediately ſent ſir William Temple to Holland, with full power to ſign a league with the ſtates, by which they ſhould be mutually bound to continue the war, in caſe France ſhould not agree to evacuate the ſix towns within ſuch a time. This league was really concluded and ſigned the 26th of July, to the great ſatisfaction of the prince of Orange, and thoſe who thought the peace very diſadvantageous.

The readineſs with which this reſolution was taken by the king, much ſurpriſed thoſe who from his former proceedings had no great opinion of his ſincerity. But when it was ſeen that the League was concluded, and France continued obſtinate, it was hoped, the war would be renewed with more vigour than ever, and that England would incline the balance to the ſide of the allies. It is difficult to diſcover the motive of the king's vigorous reſolution. Some have believed, he was really offended at the contempt France ſeemed to ſhew of his mediation, in ſtarting ſuch an incident. Others have thought, that foreſeeing France would at laſt comply, notwithſtanding her ſeeming reſolution, he had a mind to redeem his credit by his vigour with the Engliſh, who till then ſtrongly ſuſpected him of too cloſe a correſpondence with that crown. Others have judged, that he took this reſolution, in order to obtain a large ſupply from the parliament, not doubting but he ſhould be afterwards able to procure a peace.

However this be, it appeared ſhortly after, that the king repented of what he had done, and feared that his league would rekindle the war. At the time that the Dutch were preparing to improve this happy juncture to break off the negotiation with France, and to riſe in their demands, one du Croſs, an agent of Sweden at London brought an expreſs order from the king for ſir William Temple to repair immediately to Nimeguen, and uſe his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the plenipotentiaries of Sweden to conſent to the evacuation of the ſix towns within a limited time. The king ordered him likewiſe to aſſure them, that after the peace he would uſe the moſt effectual endeavours he could, for the reſtitution of all the territories the Swedes had loſt in the war. It was not difficult for ſir William Temple to infer from hence, that the king had no inclination to quarrel with France. But he was ſtill more fully convinced, when he was informed from penſionary Fagel, that du Croſs had been with the ſtates deputies, and acquainted them with the order he had brought; that he had alſo ſaid, the terms of the peace were abſolutely agreed between the kings of France and England, and from ſome expreſſions he had heard the king uſe, intimated, it would be in vain to pretend to prevent it. As ſir William and the penſionary could not doubt that du Croſs was ſent by the king, they concluded, either the king had changed his mind, or had never deſigned to enter into a war with France. Wherefore the ſtates, inſtead of forming new ſchemes, were contented with the plan already agreed on, with a reſolution however not to ſign the treaty till the reſtitution of the ſix towns was aſſured within ſuch a time [i].

Since the league had been concluded at the Hague, the king of France, to whom it was communicated, had uſed all poſſible artifices to elude, and bring it to a negotiation, with an offer to treat upon it, either at St. Quintin or Ghent. But the ſtates, on the contrary, had expreſsly ordered their embaſſadors to break off the negotiation, if the peace was not ſigned by ſuch a day, with the article of the evacuation of the towns in a limited time. Sir William Temple came to Nimeguen but three days before the expiration of the time fixed by the ſtates. On his arrival he found very little diſpoſition on either ſide towards ſigning the peace; the French and Dutch appeared equally inflexible, and the latter would not hear either of any negotiation or delay. At laſt came the critical day, the 11th of Auguſt, fixed by the treaty at the Hague, in the morning of which the French embaſſadors deſiſted from their pretenſions, and the peace was ſigned before twelve that night. This gave France the deſired ſatisfaction of making a ſeparate peace with Holland, which was immediately followed by a peace between France and Spain, and ſome months after with all the confederate powers, except the duke of Lorrain, who could never obtain his re-eſtabliſhment. It may be affirmed with great truth, that the king of England might have procured Europe a more advantageous peace, ſince the parliament would have granted him the neceſſary ſupplies, if he had pleaſed to act agreeably to the intereſt of Europe in general, and of England in particular. His conduct can only be aſcribed to his deſire of executing the project of rendering himſelf abſolute, and introducing the popiſh religion in England, which he thought could not be accompliſhed without the aſſiſtance of France.

The league concluded between England and Holland, the 26th of July, had, as I ſaid, fixed the 11th of Auguſt for ſigning the peace. In this interval the king of France had by his general the duke of Luxemburgh blocked up Mons. All his artifices to draw the affair of the evacuation into a negotiation, were only to gain time for Luxemburgh to become maſter of Mons before the peace was ſigned. But the Dutch being bent not to enter into treaty upon that affair, the French general had not time to make any great progreſs before that place. Mean while the prince of Orange being informed that peace was upon the point of being ſigned, and deſiring to diſtinguiſh himſelf by ſome great action, marched directly to the duke of Luxemburgh, ſurpriſed him, and gave him a conſiderable check [k]. This battle, called afterwards the battle at St. Denys, being fought the 14th of Auguſt, three days after the peace was ſigned, gave various opinions concerning this action of the prince of Orange. Some ſaid he knew not the peace was ſigned. Others pretended, the news was brought him by an expreſs, but not from the ſtates, and therefore he might improve the preſent advantages. However, with this action ended a war which had laſted ſix years, and was at firſt ſo fatal to Holland, that the republic ſaw itſelf on the brink of deſtruction.

We are now come to the diſcovery of the famous conſpiracy known in England by the name of the popiſh plot, which makes one of the principal periods of this reign, and has given occaſion to many politicians, to exerciſe their talents, ſome in ſupporting the reality, others in expoſing the falſity of it. What I have been ſaying is ſufficient to demonſtrate the impoſſibility for any hiſtorian whatever, to pleaſe two ſorts of men, whoſe ſentiments are diametrically oppoſite, and who, through prejudice, religion, paſſion, and party intereſt, are previouſly diſpoſed to believe or diſbelieve the popiſh plot. An hiſtorian is in vain impartial, if his readers are not ſo. The courſe of this hiſtory engages me to ſpeak of this famous conſpiracy, on which depend all the events of the reſt of this reign. It may well be judged, that I do not expect to ſatisfy all the world: this I take to be an impoſſible thing. What therefore I propoſe is, to inform the reader of the conſpiracy itſelf, whether true or falſe, of the reaſons and proofs alledged in maintenance of the reality or falſhood, and to have the inward ſatisfaction of ſaying nothing but what I believe to be true.

But before I proceed to the particulars, it is abſolutely neceſſary to clear ſome ambiguities which I have obſerved in the writers of both ſides, that the reader may be the better prepared to be upon his guard.

1. The word Plot in Engliſh, and Conſpiration in French, are always taken in a bad ſenſe. Their general ſignification is, a deſign, but an unlawful deſign to attempt ſomething againſt the perſon of the king or his miniſters, againſt the conſtitution of the government, againſt the eſtabliſhed religion, in ſhort a deſign bad in itſelf, wherein the public is concerned, and for the execution whereof means and inſtruments are already prepared. But if any one maintains, there is nothing unlawful in a deſign to change a bad religion eſtabliſhed, in order to introduce a better; or if on ſuppoſition that a government was eſtabliſhed by force and violence, it is affirmed, there is nothing ill or unlawful in a deſign to reſtore it to its antient ſtate, it is plain, this will only be a diſpute about words. Thus the fact or deſign in itſelf may be allowed, which by ſome will be termed a plot, whilſt others will not give it that name. This has been the caſe with ſome authors who have ſpoken of the popiſh plot. They own there was a deſign to alter the form of the government, and ſubvert the proteſtant religion, and yet deny there was a plot.

2. This plot, true or falſe, contained three particular deſigns. 1. To kill the king. 2. To ſubvert the government. 3. To extirpate the proteſtant religion, and eſtabliſh popery [l]. Moſt of the writers inſtead of conſidering theſe three articles, as branches of one and the ſame plot, have affected to ſeparate them. Some have chiefly inſiſted upon the deſign of killing the king, and ſlightly touched upon the other two. They believed themſelves able to prove the falſhood of this deſign, and therefore concluded that there was no real plot. Others meeting with ſome improbabilities in the depoſitions of the witneſſes concerning the deſign of killing the king, have chiefly endeavoured to prove the two laſt articles, from whence they have inferred, there was a true and real plot. The reader muſt be upon his guard againſt theſe artifices which entirely alter the ſtate of the queſtion, and always remember, that the plot did not conſiſt in the ſingle deſign to kill the king, or in the ſingle deſign to ſubvert the government, or in that to change religion, but in all theſe three deſigns united together, and making but one and the ſame conſpiracy.

3. Thoſe who aſſert the reality of the plot, pretend, that the king, the duke of York, and ſome of the miniſters were the heads and contrivers, and give many proofs, ſome of which have already appeared in the tranſactions of this reign. The oppoſite party object, that it is a manifeſt contradiction to make the king author of a plot to take away his own life: that, beſides, conſpiracies of ſubjects againſt their ſovereigns have been common, but to accuſe a prince of a plot againſt his ſubjects is a thing never heard of. To theſe objections it is anſwered, that though the plot contained three articles, the two laſt only were eſſential, and of theſe the king was the head and contriver: that the article of killing the king, though placed firſt, was only conſequent to, and depending upon, the two others. That this was only the attempt of ſome of the conſpirators, who believed, there was no readier way to execute the plot, than by ſetting the duke of York on the throne, who was leſs timorous and more active and daring than his brother. That therefore there is no contradiction in the ſuppoſition, that the king was the head and author of the two deſigns, of ſubverting the government, and changing religion; and that the other was carried on by ſome perſons without his privity, in order to advance the progreſs of the plot. That therefore the difficulty of this objection proceeds from the prepoſterous joining the three articles when they ought to be ſeparated, as on other occaſions they are ſeparated where they ought to be joined. As to the ſecond objection, that it is impoſſible a king ſhould plot againſt his ſubjects, it is drawn from the word plot, which is very rarely applicable to a ſovereign. But it is by no means impoſſible for a king of England, whoſe power is limited by law, to form a deſign of eſtabliſhing an arbitrary and deſpotic government, as appears in the examples of Edward II. Richard II. James I. and Charles I. Now a man may refuſe, if he pleaſes, to give to ſuch a deſign the name of a plot, provided he does but own the reality of the thing.

4. Laſtly, it will be proper to premiſe, that there are three opinions concerning the reality or falſhood of this plot. The firſt is of thoſe who believe it true in all its branches and circumſtances. The ſecond, of thoſe who believe it abſolutely falſe, and invented on purpoſe to exaſperate the people againſt the king and the duke of York. The third, of thoſe who believe it true with regard to the deſign of rendering the king abſolute, and altering religion, but doubtful with reſpect to the deſign of killing the king, and who after duly weighing the pro and con, think they ought to ſuſpend their judgment on this article. I thought it neceſſary to arm my readers with theſe few obſervations againſt the prejudices they may have received in reading other hiſtorians, who ſcruple not to diſguiſe and curtail the facts, to paſs over in ſilence ſuch as are diſadvantageous to them, to inſiſt and lay great ſtreſs upon others; to inſert in their relations many ſtories admitted by their party, but ſupported with no authority; to add numberleſs inſinuations founded only on their prejudices: in a word to ſuppoſe continually what they have undertaken to prove. This would evidently appear in a diſputation in form, but is very eaſy to be done in a continued narrative, where the writer inſerts whatever he thinks proper.

The 12th of Auguſt, (the day after the ſigning of the treaty of Nimeguen) Dr. Ezrael Tonge, a London divine, applied himſelf to one Chriſtopher Kirkby [m], who had ſome intereſt at court, to tell the king there was a plot againſt his perſon. Kirkby diſcharging his commiſſion the next day, whilſt the king was walking in St. James's Park, the king ordered him to bring Tonge to him at eight that evening. Tonge came to Whitehall at the appointed hour, and delivered to the king a writing or narrative, which in forty three articles, contained the particulars of a plot. The king, after looking over it ſuperficially, told Tonge, he was going to Windſor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the lord treaſurer, Danby, on whom he ordered him to wait the next morning.

Accordingly on the 14th of Auguſt, Tonge waited on the treaſurer, who aſked him if the paper left with the king, was an original or copy. Tonge anſwered, it was a copy of a writing which had been thrown into his houſe without his knowledge: but fancied it was by a certain perſon who had often entertained him upon ſubjects of the like nature. Some days after Tonge returned to the treaſurer, and told him, he knew the man, who had even put into his hands another narrative larger than the former, which he delivered to the treaſurer. After the earl had looked over the paper, he aſked Tonge, whether he knew the two him that was juſt going to ſhoot him in the head. The duke of Monmouth, with ſome Engliſh and Scotch regiments, was in that battle. Upon news of the peace next day, the duke of Luxemburgh, with a great compliment, deſired an interview with the prince; and they met in the field. Baſnage, tom. II. p. 941.

[l] The chief promoters and authors of this plot, were pope Innocent XI. cardinal Howard; Johannes Paulus de Oliva, general of the Jeſuits at Rome; Pedro Jeronymo de Corduba, provincial of the Jeſuits in New-Caſtile; la Chaiſe, confeſſor to Lewis XIV. the provincial of the Jeſuits in England; the Benedictine monks at the Savoy; the Jeſuits and ſeminary prieſts in England, who were then in number about eighteen hundred; the lords Petre, Powis, Bellaſis, Arundel of Wardour, Stafford, and ſeveral perſons of quality. [m] Alchemiſt, that was ſometimes in the king's laboratory. He men ſpoken of in the narrative, as the perſons deſigned to kill the king, and went by the name of Honeſt William, and Pickering. Tonge anſwered, he knew them, that they walked frequently in the park, and if a truſty perſon was appointed to go with him, he doubted not but he ſhould have an opportunity of giving him a ſight of them in a very ſhort time. The treaſurer aſked, if he knew where they lodged, that they might be ſecured. Tonge anſwered he did not, but would endeavour to inform himſelf.

The treaſurer having given the king an account of what he had learned from Tonge, and of the contents of the two narratives, deſired him at the ſame time, that a warrant might be ſent for apprehending Honeſt William[n], and Pickering, and ſome other members of the council be informed of an affair which concerned his majeſty's life. But the king would neither ſuffer the two men to be apprehended, nor permit the earl to ſpeak of it to any perſon living, and particularly to the duke of York.

Some days after, Tonge ſent word to the lord treaſurer, that he knew where Honeſt William and Pickering lodged: he ſaid moreover, ſome of the intended aſſaſſins were to go within two days to Windſor; but that he would give notice of the time fixed for their journey, that they might be arreſted at their arrival. But ſome days after, he pretended, the journey had been prevented by an accident to one of their horſes. The king from thence concluded the whole to be a fiction, and though the truth might eaſily have been diſcovered, by apprehending the two men whoſe lodgings were known, he would never permit, either that they ſhould be apprehended, or the affair communicated to any member of the council, ſaying, "He ſhould alarm all England, and put thoughts of killing him into people's heads who had no ſuch thoughts before."

This reaſon being, as appears, very weak, it can only be inferred from the king's conduct, that he believed not the plot, or had ſome intereſt to ſhew he did not believe it.

Three days after, Tonge writ to the earl of Danby, that a packet of letters was to go to the poſt-houſe in Windſor, directed to one Bedingfield a prieſt[o]. The packet came indeed, and Bedingfield, after reading the letters, carried them to the duke of York, telling him, "He feared ſome ill was intended him by the ſaid packet, becauſe the letters therein ſeemed to be of a dangerous nature, and that he was ſure they were not the hand writing of the perſons whoſe names were ſubſcribed to the letters[p]. The king being more confirmed in the belief that there was nothing real in the pretended plot, ſeemed reſolved not to permit the papers or informations received from Tonge to be produced. But the duke of York was ſo very earneſt to have the letters, directed to Bedingfield, examined by the council, that the king at laſt conſented, and gave the treaſurer leave to declare at the ſame time the intelligence received from Tonge, and ſo the affair became public.

I have not hitherto mentioned the famous Titus Oates, principal actor in this play, becauſe having reſolved to advance nothing but what I believe exactly true, I did not think proper to adopt whatever has been ſaid concerning him and his ſecret conferences with Dr. Tonge, of which not a ſingle voucher is produced. However, I think myſelf obliged briefly to relate, what has been advanced by others, though with no other certainty than their own teſtimony.

"Titus Oates was the ſon of a ribbon weaver, who afterwards turning anabaptiſt preacher, and being chaplain to a regiment of Cromwell's forces in Scotland, was there clapt up in priſon upon Overton's plot againſt that uſurper; but having the fortune to eſcape upon the king's reſtoration, he conformed to the church, and got the living of Haſtings in Suſſex; where he continued till he thought fit to return again to his former anabaptiſtical ſtation. This ſon of his had his firſt education in Merchant Taylor's ſchool in London, and next in the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was ſtudent in two colleges, Caius's and St. John's, and where he left no reputation behind him for his parts or learning; though he ſeemed diſtinguiſhed for a tenacious memory; a plodding induſtry, and an unparallelled aſſurance, beſides a particular canting way that appeared in his academical exerciſes. Removing from thence he ſlipt into orders, and for a while officiated as curate to his father; after which he enjoyed a ſmall vicarage in Kent[q], from whence he removed to another in Suſſex, and after that for ſome time got into the duke of Norfolk's family, when he particularly ſided with the ſocinians at London: ſo that he became very uncertain as to his principles and religion, and infamous as to his morals[r]. In the laſt year, 1677, being abandoned and deſtitute of common neceſſaries, he fell into the acquaintance of Dr. Ezrael Tonge, a city divine, a man of letters, and a prolific head, filled with all the Romiſh plots and conſpiracies ſince the reformation[s]. This man was remarkable for his parts and great reading, but of a reſtleſs and humourous temper, full of variety of projects, and ſcarce ever without a pen in his hand, and a plot in his head. At firſt he ſeemed to entertain Oates out of charity, who then went by the name of Ambroſe; and complaining that he knew not where to get bread, the doctor took him to his houſe, gave him cloaths, lodging and diet, and told him he would put him in a way. After which, finding him a bold undertaker, he perſuaded him to inſinuate himſelf among the papiſts, and get particular acquaintance with them: which being effected, he let him underſtand, that there had been ſeveral plots in England to bring in popery, and if he would go beyond ſea among the jeſuits, and ſtrictly obſerve their ways, it was poſſible there might be one at preſent; and if he could make that out, it would be his preferment for ever: but however, if he could get their names, and ſome informations from the papiſts, it would be eaſy to rouze people with the fears of popery."

Purſuant to this advice, Oates reconciled himſelf to the church of Rome, and moreover, according to ſome, entered into the ſociety of the jeſuits. In April 1677, he was ſent to Valladolid in Spain, where he remained ſix months, and then returned to England. After a month's ſtay he was ſent to St. Omer's, the Engliſh ſeminary, for farther diſcoveries.

In ſhort, the latter end of June the ſame year, he returned to England, and repaired to his friend Tonge, furniſhed with materials picked up at St. Omer's. Out of theſe materials Tonge and Oates, at ſeveral conferences together either at London, or in a hired houſe at Lambeth[t], framed the papers or narratives delivered by Tonge to the king and the lord treaſurer Danby, as copies of what Oates had written with his own hand.

I omit many circumſtances of what is ſaid to paſs between Tonge and Oates, which ſeem to ſuppoſe, either there was ſome third perſon who related all theſe particulars, or elſe, that one of the two diſcovered them before his death. The intent of this recital is, as may eaſily be ſeen, to ſhew, that Tonge and Oates were the inventors of the plot, which made ſo much noiſe afterwards, and never exiſted but in their heads. It muſt be owned, that if this was well proved, it would be a ſufficient evidence, that the plot diſcovered by Oates was a fiction. In the recital appears Tonge a divine, who (having a prolific head filled with all the Romiſh plots and conſpiracies ſince the reformation) fancies it poſſible there may be one now on foot. He perſuades Oates to inſinuate himſelf amongſt the papiſts, turn catholic, and be entered into the ſociety of the jeſuits, in order to have opportunity to make diſcoveries. Oates complies, returns from St. Omer's, freighted with materials, out of which theſe two men draw up a narrative of a horrid plot againſt the perſon of the king, the government, and the proteſtant religion, and Tonge undertakes to deliver it to the king. If all this be true, there is need of no other proofs: this alone is ſufficient to demonſtrate that the plot was a fiction, and a chimera. Wherefore, if ever there is reaſon to give the readers ſome aſſurance of what is advanced, with ſo many circumſtances, it is in ſuch a caſe as this, which alone decides the queſtion. But I muſt warn the reader, that thoſe who have advanced theſe facts, have not vouchſafed to give the leaſt proof. They have not ſaid, that they were received from ſuch or ſuch perſons then living. They have cited no authors before them, nor, in ſhort, produced one voucher of what they have advanced concerning facts, which naturally could come to their knowledge, but by ſome extraordinary means. It is a deſign managed between Tonge and Oates alone, without the intervention of any third perſon. It is certain, neither Oates nor Tonge revealed theſe pretended particulars before their death, or ever retracted their informations. It was therefore juſtly wiſhed, that thoſe who have reported their ſecret conferences with ſuch particular circumſtances, had produced ſome authority for what they have advanced.

Here follows the ſubſtance of the writing delivered by Tonge to the king, in form of a depoſition. Titus Oates was the ſpeaker, though he had not ſigned it, and though his name did not appear in it.

" That in April 1677, the ſaid deponent was employed by Strange, the then provincial, Keins, Fenwick, Harcourt, and other jeſuits in London, to carry their letters to one father Suiman, an Iriſh jeſuit, at Madrid in Spain: that in his journey he broke open the ſaid letters, and found therein, an account given of what jeſuits they had ſent into Scotland, to encourage the preſbyterians to rebel; and that they feared not ſucceſs in their deſigns, by reaſon of the king's being ſo addicted to his pleaſures, and their intereſt in the duke of York, &c. That he ſaw ſeveral ſtudents ſent out of England to Valladolid, who were obliged by the jeſuits of the college to renounce their allegiance to his majeſty of great Britain; and that one Armſtrong, in a ſermon to the ſtudents there, did affirm, that Charles Stewart, the king of England, is no lawful king, but comes of a ſpurious race, and that his father was a black Scotchman, and not king Charles the firſt; with ſeveral other traiterous words and correſpondencies which he there diſcovered. Being returned to England, where he made farther diſcoveries; about the beginning of December, the ſaid deponent was ſent with another treaſonable letter, written by Strange, and ſeveral other jeſuits, to St. Omer's, wherein was expreſly mentioned their deſign to ſtab or poiſon the king; and that they had received ten thouſand pounds from la Chaiſe, which was in the hands of one Worſley a goldſmith in London. There was likewiſe incloſed a letter of thanks to father la Chaiſe, which the deponent carried to him from St. Omer's to Paris. During this his journey, and being abroad, he ſaw and read many other letters, all tending to the ſame end of cutting off the king, ſubverting the preſent government of England, and reſtoring the Romiſh religion; and they were ſo confident as in ſome of them to ſay, that his majeſty of England was brought to that paſs, [that is, ſo poſſeſſed of their fidelity] that if any malecontents among them ſhould not prove true, but offer to diſcover, he would never believe them."

But one of the principal things he tells us in this narrative, was, " That April 1678, he came over from St. Omer's with more jeſuits, to the grand conſult which was held in May, by about fifty jeſuits, at the Whitehorſe tavern in the Strand, where they met and plotted their deſigns for their ſociety: from whence they diſperſed into ſeveral clubs, five or ſix in a company, where they ſigned a reſolve for the death of the king, with the manner how it was to be done, which the deponent, as a meſſenger, carried from one company to another to be ſigned. Very ſhortly after he returned to St. Omer's, and towards the end of June came back to England; where he ſoon became privy to the treaty with Wakeman to poiſon, and Honeſt William and Pickering to ſhoot, the king; and that he heard Keins a jeſuit preach a ſermon to twelve perſons of quality in diſguiſe; wherein he aſſerted, That proteſtant and other heretical princes were ipſo facto depoſed, becauſe ſuch, and that it was as lawful to deſtroy them, as an Oliver Cromwell, or any other uſurper, &c."

Beſides theſe new diſcoveries, he tells us, that he learnt ſeveral other remarkable particulars from them, as, " That the late wars, and many other miſchiefs were brought about by them; but more particularly the dreadful fire in 1666, which was principally managed by Strange the provincial; in which their ſociety employed eighty, or eighty ſix men, he could not tell which, and ſpent ſeven hundred fire-balls, and, over and above all their vaſt expence, they were fourteen thouſand pounds gainers by the plunder, amongſt which was a box of jewels, conſiſting of a thouſand caracts of diamonds. He farther learnt, that the fire in Southwark in the year 1676, was brought about by the like means; and though in that they were at the expence of a thouſand pounds, they made a ſhift to get two thouſand clear into their own pockets."

This depoſition, as I ſaid, was at laſt communicated to the council by the king's permiſſion. Probably, the king ſo managed that the council took no great notice of the affair, and looked upon the diſcovery as a forgery. After that, the lord treaſurer ſeeing he was clear of the buſineſs, ſince it was imparted to the council, would no longer hearken to Tonge, but when he came, diſmiſſed him, either unheard, or with injurious language. This made Tonge and Oates reſolve to bring the affair before the parliament. But as they had cauſe to fear, that the court would find means to ſuppreſs this depoſition, or repreſent it as a writing without name and authority, they applied to ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, a juſtice of peace in St. Martin's pariſh, and Oates requeſted him to receive his oath, that the paper which he put into his hands, contained matters of treaſon and other high crimes. Godfrey was unwilling to grant their requeſt, and the rather, becauſe he was not ſuffered to read the particulars. But at laſt, Tonge depoſing upon oath, that the ſame had been communicated to the king, Oates was ſworn, and a certificate given him. This was the 6th of September.

Some time after, the king being returned to Whitehall, whether the council had been informed of the reſolution of Tonge and Oates, or feared to be accuſed of negligence, in an affair which concerned the king and the public, or from ſome other motive, they reſolved to examine into the bottom of the matter. For this purpoſe, the 27th of September, ſix weeks after the king had received the firſt information, Tonge was ſent for by the council, but not coming till the council was riſen, he was ordered to attend the next day. In this interval, Tonge took another copy of Oates's depoſition, and, it is pretended, inſerted ſeveral articles which were not in the firſt, but theſe new informations are not ſpecified. However, this was the copy which was afterwards publiſhed under the title of Oates's narrative. This copy being finiſhed, Tonge and Kirkby carried it to ſir Edmundbury Godfrey the juſtice, and left it in his hands[u].

On the morrow, the council examined Tonge and Kirkby, and then ordered Oates to be called in. After their examination, Tonge and Oates had lodgings aſſigned them in Whitehall, by order of the council, with a guard for their ſecurity, and a weekly ſalary for their ſubſiſtence. And now the privy council for above a week, ſat twice a day on this affair, and employed Oates, as he was the firſt diſcoverer of the plot, three days and nights to ſearch after and ſeize the perſons of the conſpirators, and ſecure their papers. By his means, and upon his depoſitions, were arreſted, ſir George Wakeman, the queen's phyſician, Mr. Edward Coleman, the duke of York's ſecretary, Mr. Richard Langhorn, Thomas Whitebread, John Gawen, Anthony Turner, William Ireland, William Marſhal, William Rumley, James Corker, Thomas Pickering, and many others. The eight laſt were Romiſh prieſts or jeſuits. In Coleman's houſe were found letters which greatly confirmed Oates's teſtimony, and will be hereafter remembered[w].

Though no particulars of the plot had yet been publiſhed, the people were informed in general, that the deſign of it was to kill the king, ſubvert the government, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. The impriſonment of ſo great a number of Roman catholics, ſuggeſted that they were at leaſt ſuſpected of being concerned. This was ſufficient to make them believed the ſole authors of the plot. But an accident, a few days after, ſo confirmed this belief, that nothing was able to ſhake it. This was, that ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, who had ſworn Oates to his narrative, after having been miſſing four days, was found dead in a ditch about a mile out of London[x], with his ſword through his body, his cane and gloves by him, rings upon his fingers, and money in his pocket[y]. The coroners inqueſt ſat upon the body, but meeting with ſome difficulties adjourned to the day following, when, upon the declaration of the ſurgeons, they gave up their verdict, " That he was murdered by certain perſons unknown to the jurors, and that his death proceeded from ſuffocation and ſtrangling [z]; and that his ſword had been thruſt through his body ſome time after his death, and when he was quite cold, becauſe not the leaſt ſign of blood was ſeen upon his ſhirt, or his cloths, or the place where he was found." Though it was poſſible, this murder might not have been committed by the papiſts, they were ſo readily and publicly accuſed, that it was not ſafe to deny it, and that the people drew from it an invincible proof of the plot, and the aſſurance of the papiſts being the authors. It was not conceived, what intereſt the proteſtants could have to murder this juſtice, but it was obvious that the papiſts might do it in revenge for his ſwearing Oates to his narrative. The catholics were then in a ſituation not to dare to vindicate themſelves. The people were univerſally incenſed againſt them, and the court would not openly protect them. It paſſed therefore for certain, that the papiſts were Godfrey's murderers. Of this will hereafter appear poſitive evidence. But as, a few years after, the face of affairs was changed, the papiſts and friends of the court found means to give another turn to this murder. Firſt, they raiſed ſtrong objections to invalidate the depoſitions of the witneſſes. Secondly, they obſerved, that the death of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey could be of no great advantage to them, ſince he only ſwore Oates to his narrative, and from that time to his death meddled no more. Thirdly, they inſinuated, that Godfrey had murdered himſelf, out of fear of being hanged for not diſcovering ſooner what he knew. Fourthly, and upon this they chiefly inſiſted, they pretended that Godfrey had been murdered by the proteſtants, in order to throw the odium of his death upon the papiſts. Now as the papiſts had no intereſt to publiſh this murder, it is pretended, that his death was concealed till the body was found, and then publiſhed by thoſe who committed the deed, in order to charge the catholics with it. But though it were true, that the whole city was filled with the rumour of Godfrey's murder the day after he diſappeared, it ſeems to me, that the conſequence drawn from thence would not be neceſſary. Thus much is certain, Godfrey was murdered, and the papiſts were charged with the deed, as long as the proteſtant party prevailed; but when the face of affairs was altered, the court party did, and ſtill do, accuſe the proteſtants of it [a].

However this be, the king, who was then at Newmarket, returning to London to hold the parliament, publiſhed a proclamation, with the promiſe of five hundred pounds reward to the diſcoverer of the murderers of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey. But as this proclamation had but little effect, becauſe it was ſuggeſted that the diſcoverers would be in danger of an aſſaſſination; the king publiſhed a ſecond, with an aſſurance of his protection to thoſe who ſhould make the diſcovery [b].

Mean time, the king was extremely perplexed. He had at firſt endeavoured to ſtifle the noiſe of this conſpiracy, by concealing it from his very council; but was forced at laſt to conſent it ſhould be communicated to them: and the precautions taken by Tonge and Oates, in putting the depoſition into the hands of a juſtice, had obliged the council to take precautions alſo for their own ſakes, in cauſing many perſons to be arreſted. The murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey happening upon this, and the whole kingdom being alarmed at it, there was no poſſibility of ſtifling the noiſe of the plot, which had now reached the moſt diſtant parts. The king therefore reſolved to take the only courſe left, which was to prevent, if poſſible, this affair from coming before the parliament. He was not ignorant of the diſaffection of the commons. The tranſactions of the laſt ſummer ſhewed, that he was ſuſpected of deſigns prejudicial to church and ſtate, and all his proceedings had given but too juſt cauſe for this ſuſpicion. He therefore feared very juſtly, that the parliament would examine into the bottom of the plot; and, under a pretence of taking care of his perſon, diſcover many things which were yet to be concealed. For, as I have remarked, the plot contained three articles, namely, the three deſigns, of killing the king; ſubverting the government; and changing the eſtabliſhed religion. In all appearance, the king believed not the firſt, but could not be ignorant of the two laſt. Nay, his whole conduct had made this ſo clear, that all the kingdom was in a manner convinced of it. To avoid therefore ſo dangerous a diſcuſſion; he reſolved to take from the parliament the examination of the plot. For that purpoſe, he expreſsly commanded the earl of Danby, his prime miniſter, not to acquaint the two houſes with what had paſſed through his hands, and reſolved ſo to order it, that every thing concerning the plot ſhould be left to the law, in the belief that it would be much eaſier for him to manage the judges than the parliament.

The 21ſt of October, the king opened the 18th ſeſſion of this parliament with the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have thought the time very long ſince we parted laſt, and would not have deferred your meeting by ſo many prorogations, if I could well have met you ſooner. The part which I had this ſummer in the preſervation of our neighbours, and the well ſecuring what was left of Flanders, is ſufficiently known, and acknowledged by all that are abroad. And though for this cauſe I have been obliged to keep up my troops, without which our neighbours had abſolutely deſpaired; yet both the honour and the intereſt of the nation have been ſo far improved by it, that I am confident no man here would repine at it, or think the money raiſed for their diſbanding, to have been ill employed in their continuance; and I do aſſure you, I am ſo much more out of purſe for that ſervice, that I expect you ſhould ſupply it. How far it may be neceſſary, conſidering the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom, to reduce the land and ſea forces, or to what degree, is worthy of all our ſerious conſiderations.

"I now intend to acquaint you (as I ſhall always do with any thing that concerns me) that I have been informed of a deſign againſt my perſon by the jeſuits, of which I ſhall forbear any opinion, leſt I may ſeem to ſay too much or too little: but I will leave the matter to the law, and in the mean time will take as much care as I can, to prevent all manner of practices by that ſort of men, and of others too, who have been tampering in a high degree by foreigners, and contriving how to introduce popery amongſt us. I ſhall conclude with recommending to you my other concerns. I have been under great diſappointments by the defect of the poll bill. My revenue is under great anticipations, and at beſt was never equal to the conſtant and neceſſary expence of the government, whereof I intend to have the whole ſtate laid before you, and require you to look into it, and conſider of it, with that duty and affection which I am ſure I ſhall ever find from you. The reſt I leave to the lord chancellor."

The king had hoped by his precautions to prevent the parliament from taking cognizance of the plot. But the earl of Danby broke all his meaſures, by communicating the very firſt day, Oates's narrative to the commons. It was believed, he was either afraid of being called to an account, if he concealed from the parliament an affair of ſuch importance, which had paſſed through his hands, or was willing to ingratiate himſelf with that houſe, in which he had many powerful enemies. The king was highly provoked with a procedure ſo contrary to his orders and deſigns, and gave him a ſevere reprimand; but the thing was without remedy.

The commons having communicated theſe informations to the lords, laboured inceſſantly upon the affair of the plot. For ſome days they ſat from morning till late at night, and took extreme care to keep the minutes and votes of the houſe from being divulged. The lords were no leſs diligent; ſo that in two or three days, both houſes preſented three addreſſes to the king. The firſt was to pray him to appoint a faſt. The ſecond to require the removal of all popiſh recuſants out of London. The third to pray the king's order to the lord chamberlain, that no unknown perſon might have acceſs to his majeſty.

It muſt be obſerved, theſe three addreſſes were all founded upon the diſcovery of the plot, and that both houſes did not confine it to the ſingle deſign of killing the king, but expreſsly added the two others, of ſubverting the govern-

[a] Dr. Lloyd and Dr. Burnet went to view the body; and, beſides the circumſtances abovementioned, obſerved, that his ſhoes were clean. A mark round his neck an inch broad. His breaſt all over bruiſed, and his neck broken. There were many drops of white wax lights on his breeches, which he never uſed himſelf. And ſince only perſons of quality or prieſts uſe thoſe lights, this made all people conclude in whoſe hands he muſt have been, p. 249.

[b] Sir Edmundbury's corps being embalmed, was kept till October 31, when it was carried, in a very ſolemn manner, from Bridewell hoſpital, of which he was one of the governors, to the church of St. Martin's in the fields, where he was buried. The pall was ſupported by eight knights, all juſtices of the peace. All the aldermen of the city attended the funeral. Seventy two London miniſters marched two and two before the body. And great multitudes followed after, in the ſame order. An excellent ſermon, ſuitable to the occaſion, was preached, on 2 Sam. c. iii. v. 34. by dr. William Lloyd, vicar of St. Martin's. ment, ment, and changing the eſtabliſhed religion. This is a remark which is to ſerve for the whole proceſs of the affair. For never did the two houſes ſeparate theſe three articles, a clear evidence that they believed the plot was not confined to the deſign of killing the king, as ſome would inſinuate.

The ſame day that the third addreſs was preſented, namely the 24th of October, three days after the opening of the ſeſſion, Oates was examined in the houſe of commons ſix or ſeven hours. After his examination, he was ſeveral times interrogated, according to cuſtom, "Whether he knew any thing more of the plot, or any other perſons concerned in it, than what he had already mentioned;" to which he ſolemnly anſwered, "He did not." And yet, he afterwards added ſeveral things to this depoſition. As this is one of the objections againſt Oates's evidence, it will not be improper to inform the reader of what has been ſaid pro and con.

Firſt, it is ſaid, that Oates having been examined upon oath by the houſe of commons, and having affirmed, he knew no more of the plot, could not afterwards add new depoſitions againſt other perſons, without perjury. To improve this objection, it is ſaid, he was ſolemnly interrogated, whether he knew any thing more; and that he anſwered as ſolemnly, he did not. But this word ſolemnly is only uſed to aggravate the imputation of perjury. For it is eaſy to perceive, that a witneſs, at his firſt hearing, is not aſked whether he knows any thing more, with greater ſolemnity than the other queſtions, upon which he has depoſed. It is beſides replied to this objection, that the oath taken by Oates before he was interrogated, properly reached only to the facts which he was to depoſe, and not to the queſtion after his depoſition, whether he knew any thing more of the plot? So the charge of perjury vaniſhes, unleſs it be proved, that he was again ſworn upon the laſt queſtion.

It is anſwered in the ſecond place, that this objection being made to Oates on another occaſion, he ſaid, that having been three days and three nights without ſleep when he was examined by the commons, and the examination laſting above ſix hours, it was not ſtrange, that at the firſt hearing he ſhould not recollect all he knew. I leave to the reader to conſider the objection and anſwer.

I cannot forbear obſerving here a fallacy put upon his readers by a celebrated hiſtorian, in ſaying, "That he began ſo much to abound with new diſcoveries, that ſome began to ſuſpect his veracity. Therefore, adds the hiſtorian, to put an end to all ſuch doubtings, on the 31ſt of October, the commons reſolved, nemine contradicente, That upon the evidence that has already appeared to this houſe, this houſe is of opinion, that there is, and hath been a damnable and helliſh plot contrived and carried on by popiſh recuſants, for aſſaſſinating and murdering the king, for ſubverting the government, and rooting out and deſtroying the proteſtant religion."

Beſides, that this author, in aſcribing for ſole motive to the commons the deſire of putting an end to all doubtings of Oates's veracity, boldly accuſes them of not acting uprightly, it may be demonſtratively proved, that this could not be their motive, ſince the witneſs added nothing to his firſt depoſition in the ſix days between his examination and the vote of the commons. I was willing to make this remark, to ſhew, with what caution the hiſtorians who have writ of the affairs of that time, muſt be read.

The vote having paſſed in the houſe of commons, nemine contradicente, they ordered, "That this vote be communicated to the lords at a conference, and that the lords be deſired to join with this houſe, in providing remedies for the preſervation of his majeſty's perſon and government, and the proteſtant religion." Two days after in a conference between the two houſes, upon the ſubject of the laſt vote of the commons, this report was made, "The lords have conſidered the vote of the houſe of commons communicated to them at the conference, and have moſt readily and unanimouſly concurred with them in it, nemine contradicente; and their lordſhips are very glad to ſee that zeal which the commons have ſhewed upon this occaſion, and do fully concur with them, that the moſt ſpeedy and ſerious conſiderations of both houſes are neceſſary for prevention of the imminent dangers. In order whereunto their lordſhips have reſolved to ſit de die in diem, forenoon and afternoon, and deſire that the houſe of commons will do the ſame."

If this proves not the plot to be real, it proves at leaſt, that both houſes believed it ſo, ſince there was not the leaſt diviſion upon this article. To deny therefore that the plot was real, it muſt be ſaid, either that all the members of both houſes were groſsly miſtaken, or that they acted in a ſpirit of prejudice and party, to trouble the court. But why ſhould it be thought to trouble the court, if the king was not ſuſpected to have been the principal author of the plot, though doubtleſs, he was not concerned in the firſt article relating to the attempt upon his life, which, as I have ſaid, was only an appendix of the plot, or at leaſt was conſidered as ſuch.

The ſame day that the commons examined Oates, they ſent for the lord chief juſtice Scroggs, who took his examination upon oath, and in the houſe ſealed twenty-ſix warrants for apprehending ſo many perſons whom he had ſworn againſt, among whom were the lords Powis, Stafford, Arundel of Wardour, Petre, Bellaſis, and ſir Henry Tichbourn baronet, all papiſts, who were ſent to the Tower, and the reſt to ſeveral priſons.

The king was ſo perſuaded of his being ſuſpected, that he thought himſelf obliged to ſeem equally convinced with the parliament of the danger. To remove therefore this ſuſpicion, he publiſhed a proclamation in theſe words: "The lords and commons having taken into their ſerious conſideration, the bloody and traiterous deſigns of popiſh recuſants, againſt his majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, and the proteſtant religion; therefore he commanded them all, except ſettled houſe keepers that would take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, to depart the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and all places within ten miles diſtant from the ſame."

The papiſts accordingly departed out of London; though for ſo ſhort a ſpace, that in leſs than a fortnight they returned again, whether they had leave from their leaders to take the oaths, or knew ſuch proclamations were never ſtrictly executed.

Beſides this, the king knowing, that among his foot and horſe guards, there were many papiſts and new converts to the Romiſh religion, declared in council, and publiſhed an order, with a promiſe of twenty pounds ſterling, to whoever ſhould make diſcovery of any officer or ſoldier in his horſe or foot guards, who having taken the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and the late teſt, had ſince been perverted to the Romiſh religion.

The commons not ſatisfied with theſe ſlight precautions, prepared a bill to prevent the danger from ſo many papiſts ſitting in parliament, and particularly in the houſe of lords.

But this was only a preparative for the more eaſy prevention of the danger with which religion was threatened, from the hopes conceived by the papiſts of ſeeing the duke of York on the throne after his brother, who neither had, nor expected to have, any legitimate iſſue. This danger cauſed ſeveral members of the commons, to form the project of a bill for excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion to the crown: but this was done by degrees. On the 4th of November, a debate was ſuffered to ariſe in the houſe, for an addreſs to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to remove the duke of York from his perſon and counſels. But this debate was adjourned to the 8th, and afterwards to the 12th of the month.

The king perceiving the intent of the commons, came to the parliament the 9th of November, and ſending for the commons, made this ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I am ſo very ſenſible of the great and extraordinary care you have already taken, and ſtill continue to ſhew, for the ſafety and preſervation of my perſon in theſe times of danger, that I could not ſatisfy myſelf without coming hither on purpoſe to give you all my moſt hearty thanks for it. Nor do I think it enough to give you my thanks only, but I hold myſelf obliged to let you ſee withal, that I do as much ſtudy your preſervation too, as I can poſſibly; and that I am as ready to join with you, in all the ways and means that may eſtabliſh a firm ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, as your own hearts can wiſh: and this not only during my time, (of which I am ſure you have no fear) but in future ages, even to the end of the world. And therefore I am come to aſſure you that whatever reaſonable bills you ſhall preſent to be paſſed into laws, to make you ſafe in the reign of any ſucceſſor, (ſo as they tend not to impeach the right of ſucceſſion, nor the deſcent of the crown in the true line, and ſo as they reſtrain not my power, nor the juſt rights of any proteſtant ſucceſſor) ſhall find from me a ready concurrence. And I deſire you withal, to think of ſome more effectual means for the conviction of popiſh recuſants, and to expedite your councounſels as faſt as you can, that the world may ſee our unanimity, and that I may have the opportunity of ſhewing you, how ready I am to do any thing that may give comfort and ſatisfaction to ſuch dutiful and loyal ſubjects."

During theſe tranſactions, one William Bedloe who took upon him the title of captain Bedloe, becauſe he had ſerved in the Low Countries [c], going from London to Briſtol, writ to ſecretary Coventry from Newbury, that he had many ſecrets to diſcover, and therefore deſired that he might be arreſted on his arrival at Briſtol, and ſent to London. If I do not inſert every thing ſaid againſt Bedloe by certain hiſtorians, it is their fault, becauſe they have given no authority for what they advanced, nor do I think myſelf obliged to copy implicitly from authors who writ forty years after the events, and have not thought proper to alledge the leaſt proof of what they aſſert. I ſhall however briefly ſay, that they ſpeak of Bedloe as of the greateſt villain that ever lived.

Bedloe was apprehended at Briſtol, according to his deſire, and brought to London the 6th of November, when the parliament was very buſy upon the affair of the plot. A guard was immediately aſſigned him for his ſecurity, and a penſion for his ſubſiſtence, with a lodging at Whitehall. The king was preſent at his examination before the two ſecretaries of ſtate. He declared he had been bred a proteſtant of the church of England, but within two years perſuaded to turn catholic by the jeſuits. He ſaid, he knew that ſir Edmundbury Godfrey was murdered in Somerſet-houſe, but it is pretended, he ſolemnly declared upon oath, his ignorance of the plot then in queſtion. But as I ſaid, facts ſupported by no authority deſerve little credit [d]. It is added, that the very next day, being examined by the houſe of lords, he thought fit upon new encouragement, to be more open, and launch out into the depths of the plot, with a new and ſupplemental evidence. It is eaſy to perceive the tendency of ſuch inſinuations deſtitute of authority.

However this be, Bedloe declared to the lords, that Walſh and le Phaire, two jeſuits concerned in the murder of Godfrey, informed him, "That the lord Bellaſis had a commiſſion to command forces in the north, the earl of Powis in South Wales, and the lord Arundel of Wardour had a commiſſion from the pope to grant commiſſions to whom he pleaſed: that Coleman had been a great agitator in the deſign againſt the king." He was aſked, if he knew Oates, and he poſitively denied it, but pretended afterwards, he knew him by the name of Ambroſe.

The next day, the two houſes obtained from the king a proclamation againſt Walſh, le Phaire, Conyers, Simmonds, Pritchard, and Caſtaway, but none of them could be found.

The 12th of November, Bedloe was examined a ſecond time in the houſe of lords. The ſubſtance of what he ſaid was, "That the monks of Doway firſt told him the deſign; and, after four ſacraments of ſecrecy, they ſent him to Harcourt, a jeſuit in Duke-ſtreet, London, who provided for him, and ſent him to Paris, &c. That le Phaire, Walſh, Pritchard, and Lewis, told him what lords were to govern, what men were to be raiſed; particularly forty thouſand to be ready in London: what ſuccours were to be expected, namely, ten thouſand from Flanders, twenty or thirty thouſand religious men and pilgrims from St. Jago in Spain; that Hull was to be ſurpriſed; and that, juſt in the critical time that the plot was diſcovered; that le Phaire gave him a ſacrament of ſecrecy; and they told him, who and who were to be killed, and the men that were to do the work. Le Phaire ſaid further, that Conyers was my lord Bellaſis's confeſſor, and communicated his orders; and that they were reſolved, if any plotters were taken, to diſpatch them before they could be brought to tryal, or to burn the priſon. That le Phaire, Pritchard, Lewis, Keins, and Walſh, and others, had often told him, that there was not a Roman catholic in England of any quality or credit, but was acquainted with this deſign of the papiſts, and had received the ſacrament from their father confeſſors, to be ſecret and aſſiſtant in the carrying of it on: that the part aſſigned him, was to bring and carry orders and councils, and all other intelligences from one army to another upon all occaſions, he knowing every part and road of England and Wales."

After this depoſition, the lords having conjured Bedloe to ſpeak nothing but the truth, he did in the preſence of God, as he ſhould anſwer it, at the day of judgment, aſſure all to be true he had depoſed.

Bedloe's depoſition, which was communicated to the commons, was very apt to fill the parliament and people with fears. Accordingly the effect of it was ſuch, that the king, to avoid being ſuſpected of having any hand in the plot, publiſhed a proclamation the 12th of November, "Whereby all Romiſh recuſants, and ſuch reputed, were enjoined under the penalty of the laws, to repair to their own houſes, and not to remove more than five miles from thence without licence." But the commons did not think this proclamation ſufficient to free them from their fears. The ſame day they preſented an addreſs to the king, praying, "That a ſpecial commiſſion may be iſſued forth, for tendering the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy to all the ſervants of his majeſty, and his royal highneſs, and to all other perſons, (excepting her majeſty's Portugal ſervants) reſiding within the palaces of Whitehall, St. James's, and Somerſet-houſe, and all other his majeſty's houſes; and that there may be likewiſe ſpecial commiſſions iſſued forth, for tendering the ſaid oaths to all perſons reſiding within the two ſerjeants-inns, all the inns of court, and inns of Chancery." The king returned an anſwer in writing, that he granted their requeſt, with exception of the menial ſervants of the queen and ducheſs, who were ſo very inconſiderable in their number, and within the articles of marriage. He added, "That he could not but take notice, that in a late addreſs from the houſe of peers, the menial ſervants of the queen and ducheſs were excepted, and that he hoped the commons would proceed with the ſame moderation as to that particular." This anſwer was not ſatisfactory, and therefore they inſiſted in a ſecond addreſs, "That the perſons excepted in his majeſty's meſſage, might be comprehended in the ſame commiſſion, for which they gave ſome reaſons." But before the king had anſwered this addreſs, there happened an accident which put the commons much out of temper.

The 18th of November they were informed, that ſeveral commiſſions had been granted to popiſh recuſants, and warrants alſo, that they ſhould be muſtered, notwithſtanding they had not taken the oaths, and ſubſcribed the declaration according to the act of parliament, and that they were counterſigned by ſir Joſeph Williamſon, ſecretary of ſtate. Upon this information, Williamſon, as a member of their houſe, was immediately ſent to the Tower. This much offended the king, who the next day ſent for the commons to attend him in the Banqueting-houſe in Whitehall, where in a ſpeech he told them plainly, "That though they had committed his ſervant, without acquainting him; yet he intended to deal more freely with them, and acquaint them with his intention to releaſe his ſecretary;" which accordingly he did that very day. Upon this the commons preſented an addreſs to the king, with the reaſons of their proceedings in the commitment of his ſecretary. They ſaid, 1. That divers commiſſions were granted to popiſh officers, and counterſigned by the ſaid ſir Joſeph Williamſon, and delivered out in October laſt, ſince the meeting of this houſe, and the diſcovery of the preſent popiſh conſpiracy.

"2. Divers warrants have alſo been produced before us of diſpenſations, contrary to law, for popiſh officers to continue their commands, and to be paſſed in muſter, notwithſtanding they have not taken the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and received the bleſſed ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, according to the late act of parliament in that behalf: all which ſaid warrants were likewiſe counterſigned by the ſaid Williamſon; which being complained of to us, and confeſſed by the ſaid ſir Joſeph Williamſon, we your majeſty's moſt dutiful ſubjects, having the immediate conſideration before us, of the imminent danger of your majeſty's perſon, the ſafety whereof is above all things moſt dear to us, and likewiſe the dangers from popiſh plots ſo nearly threatening the peace and ſafety of your majeſty's government, and the proteſtant religion; we humbly are of opinion, we could not diſcharge our duty to your majeſty, and the whole kingdom, without committing the ſaid ſir Joſeph

[c] He had formerly been a ſervant to the lord Bellaſis, afterwards an enſign in Flanders. About Michaelmaſs 1674, he was ſent for over by Harcourt, recommended by the Engliſh abbeſs at Dunkirk, and ſo by degrees became acquainted with the jeſuits, and was at laſt generally employed as an agent for them, and ſent frequently with letters into foreign parts. Hiſt. of the plot, p. 127.——Burnet ſays, Bedloe had led a very vicious life. He had gone by many falſe names, by which he had cheated many perſons. He had gone over many parts of France, and Spain, as a man of quality. And he had made a ſhift to live on his wits, or rather by his cheats, p. 432.

[d] Burnet ſays, he declared, he had only heard that forty thouſand men were to come over from Spain, who were to meet at St. Jago's as pilgrims: But knew nothing of any fleet to bring them over, p. 452.

Williamſon; and therefore moſt humbly deſire, that he may be diſcharged by your majeſty. And we do further moſt humbly deſire your majeſty, to recall all commiſſions granted to all papiſts within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, or any other of your majeſty's dominions and territories."

To this the king anſwered, "That he had releaſed Mr. ſecretary Williamſon before their addreſs came, and promiſed to recall all his commiſſions whatſoever given to papiſts, or reputed papiſts."

Had not the king had ſome ſecret deſign, it muſt be owned, he ill timed theſe commiſſions while the popiſh plot made ſo much noiſe, and the parliament was employed in examining into it. But this is a myſtery which is not yet cleared. However the affair was carried no farther.

About this time, the bill to diſable papiſts to ſit in parliament, paſſed the commons, and afterwards the lords, though with more difficulty[e]. The king likewiſe publiſhed a proclamation, offering a reward to any one who ſhould diſcover or apprehend a Romiſh prieſt or jeſuit.

Mean while, the king finding the commons delayed to grant him money, came to the parliament, and after a repetition of ſome things delivered in his firſt ſpeech, he deſired them, either to grant him money to continue his forces in Flanders, or to diſband them. Whereupon the commons, who ſaw with uneaſineſs, ſo formidable an army on foot in ſuch a juncture, reſolved, nemine contradicente, "That all the forces raiſed ſince the 29th of September 1677, ſhould be diſbanded: To which purpoſe they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty.

At the ſame time, the commons had before them a bill, "For raiſing a third part of the militia to be in conſtant arms for a time," which with amendments was ſent up to the lords, and paſſed their houſe.

The 30th of November the king gave the royal aſſent to the bill, "For diſabling papiſts from ſitting in either houſe of parliament," and ſhewed himſelf very willing to recall his forces from Flanders. But the militia bill he abſolutely rejected, alledging, "That it was to put the militia out of his power, which thing he would not do, no not for one hour; but if the commons would aſſiſt him with money for that purpoſe, he would take care to raiſe ſuch a part of the militia as ſhould ſecure the peace of the government and his own perſon." But the parliament thought not fit to accept his offer.

Since the king had ſeen the unanimity of the two houſes concerning the reality of the plot, he had thought proper to feign a no leſs fear of the danger the church and ſtate were in. And this is what father Orleans can hardly forgive him, ſaying his diſſimulation was made uſe of to the committing of much injuſtice. But the king found himſelf in no condition to oppoſe the torrent, which ran ſo violently againſt the papiſts. His whole policy was confined to his endeavours to remove the ſuſpicion of his being concerned in the plot, which he ſaw both houſes were too apt to believe. So, without unſeaſonably affecting an indiſcreet zeal for a religion which he publicly diſowned, he calmly left the papiſts expoſed to the reſentment of the parliament, for fear of his own ruin by an oppoſite conduct. For this reaſon it was that he ſuffered the conſpirators to be brought to their trials[f].

Edward Coleman, ſecretary to the duke of York was firſt tried, the 27th of November, at the King's-Bench bar, before the lord chief juſtice Scroggs. The witneſſes produced againſt him were Oates and Bedloe. The firſt depoſed,

"1. That in November 1677, being brought acquainted with the priſoner by father John Keins, then the deponent's confeſſor, who lodged at Mr. Coleman's houſe, he carried ſome letters from him to St. Omer's, which he ſaw opened when he came there. In them were treaſonable expreſſions againſt the king, calling him tyrant, &c. And a letter in Latin encloſed to father la Chaiſe, to whom Oates carried it from St. Omer's to Paris; in which there were thanks returned for the ten thouſand pounds by him remitted to England, for the propagation of the catholic religion, and promiſing it ſhould be employed for no other purpoſe, but that for which it was ſent, namely, to cut off the king of England, as appeared by the letter of la Chaiſe, to which all this was an anſwer, and which Oates ſaw and read.

"2. That Coleman was concerned in the deſign of killing the king; for when, at the jeſuits great conſult, on the 24th of April, which afterwards divided into ſeveral clubs, it was reſolved that Pickering and Grove ſhould take off his majeſty by ſhooting, or other means; this reſolve was communicated to Coleman, in Oates's hearing at Wild-houſe, who did approve thereof, and ſaid, it is well contrived.

"3. That in Auguſt 1678, Coleman was preſent at a conſult with the jeſuits and Benedictine monks at the Savoy, for raiſing a rebellion in Ireland, for which forty thouſand black bills as arms were provided; and was very forward to have Dr. Fogarthy ſent over to poiſon the duke of Ormond: and at another time, being in Fenwick's chamber, in Drury-lane, Coleman ſaid to him in Oates's hearing, That he had found a way to tranſmit two hundred thouſand pounds to carry on the rebellion in Ireland.

"4. That in the month of Auguſt, Coleman knew of the four Iriſh ruffians ſent to kill the king at Windſor; and in Oates's hearing, aſked father Harcourt at Wild-houſe, what care was taken for thoſe gentlemen that went laſt night to Windſor? Who replied, that eighty pounds was ordered them, which he ſaw there on the table, moſt of it in guineas; and that Coleman was ſo zealous that he gave a guinea to the meſſenger who was to carry the money, to expedite the buſineſs.

"5. That in July 1678, Coleman was privy to the inſtructions brought by Aſhley, rector of St. Omer's, from father Whitebread, to impower the conſultors to propoſe ten thouſand pounds to ſir George Wakeman to poiſon the king, provided Pickering and Grove failed to do the work: that Coleman had read and copied thoſe inſtructions, and tranſmitted them to ſeveral others of the conſpirators, who were gathering contributions about the kingdom, who would be more encouraged to give largely, both becauſe they were aſſured the buſineſs would ſoon be diſpatched, and that they might ſee they had aſſiſtance from beyond ſeas; and that Coleman was ſo far from diſappointing this treaſon, that he ſaid, it was too little, and thought it neceſſary to give five thouſand pounds more, to make the buſineſs ſure.

"6. That in April 1678, Oates ſaw Coleman's patent or commiſſion to be ſecretary of ſtate, from Paulus de Oliva, general of the ſociety of jeſuits, by virtue of a brief from the pope, and he knew the hand perfectly well; and in Fenwick's chamber he ſaw Coleman open it, and heard him ſay, It was a good exchange. Laſt of all Oates being aſked how many came over in April to the grand conſult, and how many prieſts and jeſuits had been in England at one time? he ſaid, he could not exactly remember their numbers, but to his knowledge, there had been in England at the ſame time, a hundred and ſixty ſecular prieſts, eighty jeſuits, and by name in the catalogue above three hundred.

Bedloe depoſed,

"1. That he knew not of any commiſſion to Mr. Coleman: but that ſir Henry Tichbourn had told him, that he brought a commiſſion for him to be principal ſecretary of ſtate, when he brought over the reſt of the commiſſions for the lords and others, from the principal jeſuits at Rome, by order of the pope.

"2. That in April 1675, he carried over a large packet of letters from Coleman to father la Chaiſe, about carrying on the plot, and brought back an anſwer: and on May the 24th or 25th, 1677, he received another packet of Coleman's, to carry to Paris to the Engliſh monks; and that he had received money to carry on the deſign to ſubvert the government of England, to free England from damnation and ignorance, and to free all catholics from the hard tyranny and oppreſſion of heretics.

[e] Kennet ſays, the commons were ſo zealous for this bill, that they voted it to be a bill, "upon which the ſafety of the king and kingdom, and the proteſtant religion, did entirely depend." And when it was like to ſtick in the houſe of lords, the commons deſired them, by a meſſage, to proceed ſpeedily on it; elſe, they would think themſelves unable to prepare any effectual remedies, to prevent the evils that hung over them, p. 357. Echard, on the other hand, ſays, the bill paſſed the houſe of lords with ſome little amendments, and a particular clauſe in favour of the duke of York. But the greateſt ſtruggle about it was chiefly in the houſe of commons when it was ſent back, though it was paſſed there alſo with the ſaid alterations. In the debate, ſir Jonathan Trelawny and Mr. Aſh being violently heated, and opprobrious words paſſing between them, ſir Jonathan gave Aſh a box on the ear, which being returned by Aſh with a flap on the face, they both began to draw. Whereupon ſir Jonathan was ſent to the Tower, and Aſh publicly reprimanded by the ſpeaker, tom. III. p. 480. This bill conſiſted of a teſt againſt popery, in which tranſubſtantiation was not only renounced, but the worſhip of the virgin Mary and the ſaints, as practiſed in the church of Rome, was declared to be idolatrous. Gunning, biſhop of Ely, maintained the church of Rome was not idolatrous. He was anſwered by Barlow, biſhop of Lincoln. However, Gunning took the teſt. The duke ſpoke on the clauſe for excepting himſelf, with tears in his eyes, proteſting, that whatever his religion might be, it ſhould only be a private thing between God and his own ſoul, and no effect of it ſhould ever appear in the government. Burnet, p. 435.

[f] On November 21. William Stayley, goldſmith, was tried for treaſonable words againſt the king, and executed November 26. State trials, tom II. p. 652.

" 3. That upon Bedloe's return with anſwers to the laſt letters, which were delivered to Coleman by Harcourt, he heard the priſoner, at his houſe behind Weſtminſter Abbey, at the foot of the ſtair-caſe, ſay, if he had a hundred lives, and a ſea of blood to carry on the cauſe, he would ſpend it all to eſtabliſh the church of Rome in England; and if there were an hundred heretical kings to be depoſed, he would ſee them all deſtroyed. Upon this ſaying, Mr. Coleman aſked him this queſtion, Did I ever ſee you in my life? Yes, ſaid the other, in the ſtone gallery in Somerſet-houſe, when you came from a conſult, where were great perſons, which I am not to name here; that would make the bottom of your plot tremble: you ſaw me then."

The third evidence againſt Coleman was his own letters, found in his lodgings when he was arreſted. But it muſt be obſerved that only thoſe of the years 1674, and 1675, were found in a drawer under the table[g]. The general opinion was, that he had received notice of his being accuſed by Oates in the council, and ſo had time to burn or convey away thoſe of the two laſt years, with the book in which they were entered. However this be, the following extracts are taken from ſome of his letters writ with his own hand, and allowed to be authentic.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Coleman to father la Chaiſe, the 29th of June, 1674.

" I am commanded to tell you, that his royal highneſs, my maſter, is very ſenſible of the friendſhip of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, which he will endeavour to cultivate very carefully, and to give him all poſſible aſſurances of it, to take away all jealouſies that his enemies would raiſe to the contrary. That his royal highneſs has done nothing in any manner whatſoever, nor in any place, againſt the intereſt of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, but hath rendered him all the good offices he hath been capable of. That as for recalling the parliament, and touching my lord Arlington, his highneſs is altogether of opinion of his majeſty, that neither one or other is uſeful, but quite contrary, very dangerous as well for England as France; and that his moſt chriſtian majeſty is in great danger of loſing the neutrality of England, at the next ſeſſion, (if the parliament meet) as he loſt its alliance by the peace of Holland at laſt; becauſe the lower houſe and their friends (as the furious proteſtants, and the malecontents in the houſe of lords) have a deſign to leſſen his royal highneſs, and root out the catholic religion; and they think they cannot make uſe of any other fitter means to attain their ends, than to raiſe the Dutch, and to perplex his moſt chriſtian majeſty, as much as lies in their power. That his highneſs doubts not, but it is abſolutely neceſſary for the intereſt of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, and his royal highneſs, to uſe all endeavours to hinder the meeting of the parliament, by perſuading his Britannic majeſty, that his greatneſs, his honour, and his quiet, are no leſs concerned therein than theirs: ſo that if his moſt chriſtian majeſty would write freely his thoughts thereupon to his Britannic majeſty, to forewarn him of the danger he apprehends from thence, and would withal think fit to make him the ſame generous offers of his purſe, to perſuade him to diſſolve the preſent parliament, as he hath done to his highneſs, for the election of another, perhaps he would ſucceed therein by the aſſiſtance we would give him here. As for another parliament, it would be eaſy enough to get ſuch a one as we wiſh for; the conſtitutions of our parliaments being of ſuch a nature, that as there is nothing to be hoped for by the king from an old one, ſo there is nothing to be feared from a new one; becauſe ſuch a one, at their firſt meeting, muſt needs aſſiſt his majeſty, ſo far as to enable him to acknowledge his obligations both to his moſt chriſtian majeſty and to all the world."———

There was in the year 1674, a prorogation of the parliament, which laſted fourteen months: it appears in this letter, that the intereſts of the king of France and the popiſh religion were the true cauſe of this long prorogation.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Coleman to father la Chaiſe, September 25, 1674.

" FOR the firſt point of your letter, his royal highneſs has commanded me to tell you, that he will govern himſelf according to your advice, and treat of nothing concerning the catholic religion with monſieur Rouvigny, nor with any other perſon than yourſelf; but that he will communicate to you all things he ſhall find neceſſary for the good of the catholics, and ſhall be very well pleaſed to receive advices from you thereupon. For the reſt his royal highneſs does a little wonder, that he hears nothing from monſieur Rouvigny touching the ſecond point of your letter, ſince you have written ſo poſitively that he had orders to confirm, and procure execution of what his moſt chriſtian majeſty propoſed to him the ſecond of June laſt, by your mediation.—His moſt chriſtian majeſty made a very generous offer to his royal highneſs of the aſſiſtance of his purſe, to enable him to defend them both from the evils that threatened them, and by good luck his royal highneſs has laboured with ſo much diligence and ſucceſs, that the dangers which they apprehended are a little put off: but one thing more is neceſſary for the perfect ſecuring their affairs; and without making one ſtep more, all that he has already done will ſignify nothing. For that the aſſiſtance of his moſt chriſtian majeſty is no leſs neceſſary at preſent than heretofore, to ſubdue entirely thoſe, who being exaſperated againſt his moſt chriſtian majeſty, as much as againſt his royal highneſs, and are angry with his royal highneſs, only becauſe he is ſo unalterably addicted to the intereſt of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, will exerciſe their malice and their rage with more brutality than ever, if they find occaſion for it hereafter. If you can therefore, by your credit, obtain from his moſt chriſtian majeſty the accompliſhment of the offer of his purſe, for raiſing the reputation of his royal highneſs in the opinion of his Britannic majeſty, and for putting him in condition to reſiſt the ſharpeſt batteries of the adverſaries of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, and royal highneſs, to wit, the poſſibility they pretend to get money from the parliament, and the impoſſibility of having any elſewhere, by which they often keep the mind of his Britannic majeſty in ſuſpence, and wherein they place the hope they have to conquer him at laſt: there will nothing more remain, to be feared by his moſt chriſtian majeſty, or his royal highneſs, but his royal highneſs will be able to diſſolve the parliament with eaſe, and afterwards, in recompence of the ſaid aſſiſtance, will perform on his part, all that his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhall aſk of him, and will proceed with ſincerity, upon the word of a prince, (that no man can reproach him for violation of) for the intereſt of his moſt chriſtian majeſty."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Coleman to the pope's nuncio at Bruſſels, September 4, 1674.

" ———THAT the duke's principal deſign is, to uſe the pope's interpoſition, and by that means to eſtabliſh himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his eſtate, through the aſſiſtance of France and Spain, and to turn all their cares for the eaſe of the pope's friends, and particularly for the catholics of the church, againſt their enemies; and aſſures him he will find, that the pope never had an occaſion ſo favourable as at this hour, to enrich thoſe of his family, and to augment the number of his friends; and if he lets it ſlip, he never will find the like; ſo that if ever they propoſe to make uſe of the treaſure of the church, it is now they ought to do it; for they can demand nothing that the duke will not be capable to do for the pope's friends:—on the other ſide, without their aid, he will run great hazard of being loſt, both himſelf and his aſſociates."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Coleman to the ſame nuncio, written October 23, 1674.

" YOU agree with me, that money is the only means of bringing the king into the duke's intereſt, and of diſengaging him from the parliament; and you muſt alſo agree with me, that nothing can more promote the intereſt of the catholic party, which is the principal object of the duke's care and affection, and of the hatred of the parliament, and which muſt hope, or fear, according as the one or the other of them increaſe in power.———Nothing in the world is more certain, than that the king has a good inclination towards the duke, and the catholics, and would join himſelf willingly and inſeparably to their intereſts, if he did not apprehend ſome danger from ſuch a union; which, however, he would not have cauſe to fear, if he found their intereſt, and conſequently their power, ſo far advanced above that of their adverſaries, that they ſhould neither have the power nor the boldneſs to conteſt any thing with them; which the king could ſee in a very little time, if we could perſuade him to do two or three things: ——— And I am certain money could not fail of perſuading him to it; for there is nothing it cannot make him do, though it were as much to his prejudice, as this we endeavour to perſuade him to will be to his advantage."———

In another letter, Coleman poſitively ſaid, "That it was by the credit of the catholics, that the parliament was prorogued till the 13th day of April 1675."

Extract from a letter of Mr. Coleman, to father la Chaiſe.

"——— OUR prevailing in theſe things will give the greateſt blow to the proteſtant religion here, that ever it received ſince its birth."

In another.

"WE have here a mighty work upon our hands, no leſs than the converſion of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the ſubduing of a peſtilent hereſy, which has domineered over great part of this northern world a long time; there were never ſuch hopes of ſucceſs ſince the death of queen Mary, as now in our days."

In the ſame letter.

"———THE oppoſition we are ſure to meet with is alſo like to be great; ſo that it imports us to get all the aid and aſſiſtance we can, for the harveſt is great, and the labourers but few."

After the reading of theſe letters, Coleman alledged in his defence.

"1. That Oates, who now pretended ſuch acquaintance with him, declared before the king and council, That he never ſaw him before, or did not know him."

To which the other anſwered, "That it being candle-light, and his ſight weak, and Coleman altered in habit and wig, he did at firſt ſay, he could not ſwear that was the man, or that he had ever ſeen him before; but as ſoon as he heard him ſpeak, he knew him well, and could have then ſworn it, had it been demanded."

"2. That had the things now alledged by Oates been true, he would have charged the ſame before the council: but then he only charged him with the ſending of one letter, and ſuch ſlender matters, that the council was ready to let him go at large: and therefore all the reſt muſt be invented ſince."

To this Oates replied, "That he was then ſo weak and weary, he could not tell well what he ſaid; beſides, his deſign was then to lay no more to his charge, than might ſerve for information, &c."

"3. Whereas Oates charged him with conſenting to Wakeman's poiſoning of the king, and that it was conſulted by him in Auguſt, and, as he remembered, about the 21ſt day, Coleman alledged, that he was then in Warwickſhire, and one of his men and he were there all Auguſt, as he thought, but was not ſure of it; and after conviction, he offered a book that would ſhew he was out of town from the 18th, to the 31ſt of Auguſt." But this was no evidence in itſelf, and offered too late, ſo it did not contradict Oates, who was not poſitive to a day, but only to the month. As to what was ſworn by Bedloe, he made no other anſwer than a ſolemn aſſeveration, that he never ſaw the man in his life. But as to his papers, which he did not deny, he alledged, "There was no treaſon in them, though very extravagant expreſſions; and that it would plainly appear from them, that his deſign was ſo far from killing the king, that it was only to make the king and duke as great as could be."

1. It is proper to remark upon this laſt anſwer, that according to Oates's depoſition, the reſolution to kill the king was taken but the 24th of April 1678, and theſe letters were of the years 1674, and 1675; conſequently they could not mention the deſign of killing the king, neither were they produced in proof of that article.

2. Oates had accuſed Coleman of being concerned in the plot, before his letters were found. How then, if he did not know Coleman, could he gueſs ſo right, as to lay things to his charge, which were found in letters under his own hand?

3. Coleman owned, that his intention was to make the king and duke of York as great as was poſſible. This was a neceſſary conſequence of the projected change of religion. For it was not poſſible to ſubvert religion, without a ſubverſion of the government, nor to render the king abſolute, without a deſign of altering religion, ſince the king and duke were both catholics. One of theſe articles proved, neceſſarily proves the other.

In the concluſion of his defence, he uſed theſe words; "Poſitively I ſay, and upon my ſalvation: I never ſaw theſe witneſſes, Oates but once, and Bedloe never before."

The jury, who were all gentlemen of the county of Middleſex, againſt whom Coleman had made no exceptions, withdrawing, in a little time brought him in guilty of high treaſon. The day after he received ſentence of death, and the 3d of December was hanged and quartered according to cuſtom. He perſiſted to the laſt moment in the denial of the crimes for which he was condemned. But as his letters ſeemed at leaſt to prove a deſign of extirpating the proteſtant religion, he declared his ſole intention was to procure liberty of conſcience for the papiſts. Probably it will not be univerſally agreed, that this is the natural ſenſe of the expreſſions in his letters. It is true, a report was ſpread in London, that he was promiſed a pardon, in caſe he made no confeſſion; but ſuch rumours are not much to be credited [b].

The ſame day that Coleman was tried, the king at the requeſt of the lords, publiſhed a proclamation, promiſing, "That if any perſon or perſons ſhall before the 25th day of December next, make any farther diſcovery of the late horrid deſign againſt his majeſty's perſon and government, he or they ——— ſhall not only receive from his majeſty for every ſuch diſcovery, the reward of two hundred pounds; but if he or they were a principal or principals in the ſaid deſign, they ſhall have his majeſty's gracious pardon."

Whether through a deſire of having this reward, or that they believed to have a good foundation, Oates and Bedloe had the boldneſs before the king and council to accuſe the queen herſelf, of conſenting to the death of the king, and of being in the deſign to poiſon him by means of Wakeman. But, beſides that their depoſitions contained only certain ſigns which were far from proofs, the king ſtopped this affair by his authority. But he could not prevent an addreſs from the commons, to deſire the immediate removal of the queen and her family from the court at Whitehall. The king was ſo offended at Oates's inſolence, that he ordered a ſtricter guard upon him than ever. But the day after, the commons addreſſed him, "That Oates be freed from his reſtraint, attended by his own ſervants, and that a competent allowance be appointed for his maintenance." At the ſame time they reſolved, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that all papiſts and ſuſpected papiſts within the ſeveral counties of England may be ſecured.

The 6th of December, they impeached the five lords in the Tower, at the bar of the houſe of peers. But they had not time to exhibit the articles againſt them, and the affair was reſumed by another houſe of commons.

The 17th of December were arraigned at the Old Bailey five of thoſe arreſted for the plot, namely, William Ireland, and Thomas Pickering, both prieſts; John Grove a lay brother, Thomas Whitebread provincial of the jeſuits, and John Fenwick a jeſuit alſo. But in the courſe of the evidence, there not appearing ſufficient proof againſt the two [b] He declared before the committee, that he had acted by order in all he had done. And he believed the king knew of his employment, particularly that at Bruſſels. But though he ſeemed willing to be queſtioned about the king, the committee did not think fit to do it, nor to report what he ſaid concerning it: only in general, they reported that, he ſpoke of another matter, about which they did not think fit to interrogate him, nor to mention it. Littleton, one of the committee, gave Dr. Burnet an account of all that paſſed that very night. And he found his behaviour made great impreſſions on them all: it was given out, to make the duke more odious, that Coleman was kept up from making confeſſion, by the hopes the duke ſent of a pardon at Tyburn. But he could not be ſo ignorant, as not to know, that at that time it was not in the king's power to pardon him, while the tide ran ſo high. Burnet, p. 437.

laſt, they were reſerved for another time. So, the three firſt only were tried that day. The ſum of Oates's evidence againſt them was:

"1. That at the grand conſults of April the 24th, at the White Horſe in the Strand, whereof Ireland was one; it was reſolved, that Pickering and Grove, as having been formerly engaged, ſhould go on in their deſign and attempt to aſſaſſinate the king; and that Grove being a layman, ſhould have fifteen hundred pounds for his reward; and Pickering being a prieſt, thirty thouſand maſſes, which at twelve pence a maſs, amounted to that ſum.

"2. That this reſolve was the ſame day drawn up in writing by one Mico, that was ſecretary to the ſociety, and companion to provincial Whitebread, at the ſaid Whitebread's chamber, who having ſigned it, it was carried by the deponent Oates, as being a meſſenger to the conſult, to be ſigned by the reſt of the colloquies; and that Ireland in his own chamber did ſign it in his preſence.

"3. That Pickering and Grove conſented to ſuch reſolve, accepted the terms, and alſo ſigned it the ſame day in Whitebread's chamber, at Mrs. Sanders's at Wild-houſe, where, in a little chapel, they, and about forty or fifty of the conſultors heard maſs, and received the ſacrament, adminiſtered by one Barton, a jeſuit, and thereupon took an oath of ſecrecy upon a maſs book, which Mico held, while Whitebread pronounced the words.

"4. That in purſuance of this reſolve, the deponent did ſeveral times ſee Pickering and Grove walk in the Park together, with ſcrewed piſtols, longer than ordinary piſtols, and ſhorter than ſome carbines: that they had ſilver bullets champt, to render the wound incurable, and that he ſaw Grove's bullets in May, and Pickering's in Auguſt: Moreover,

"5. That before the conſult, in the month of March, Pickering had a fair opportunity to ſhoot the king; but the flint of his piſtol happened to be looſe, and he durſt not venture to give fire; and becauſe by their negligence this opportunity was miſſed, Pickering underwent penance, and had twenty or thirty ſtrokes of diſcipline, and Grove was chidden for his careleſneſs, as the deponent had ſeen in Whitebread's letters.

"6. That Grove did go about with one Smith, to gather Peter pence, either to carry on the deſign, or to ſend to Rome: that he ſaw the book wherein it was entered, and heard the ſaid Grove ſay, he had been gathering it."

Bedloe the ſecond witneſs ſwore,

"1. That he was employed for the ſpace of five years as a meſſenger, by the conſpirators, for carrying their letters to the confederates beyond ſeas, and bringing others back, all, or moſt of them relating to the plot; for he had a way to open and read them, by which he fully informed himſelf of thoſe matters: and of the nature of the plot; he heard ſome of the conſpirators ſay, That they would not leave any member of any heretic in England, that ſhould ſurvive to tell hereafter, that there ever was any ſuch religion in England, as the proteſtant. And to confirm his intimacy with them, he ſwore the manner of his firſt coming to be employed by them; by means of a lady abbeſs of the Engliſh nunnery of Dunkirk, who having kept him ſix weeks in her convent, recommended him to ſir John Warner, as a proper inſtrument, who afterwards ſent him to father Harcourt to be inſtructed." And as a further confirmation, he brought his brother James Bedloe, who ſwore he knew nothing of the plot, but did teſtify, "That he had heard the priſoners often named as being of his brother's acquaintance; and that he had, on his brother's behalf, received ſeveral ſums of money from prieſts and jeſuits, as fifty or ſixty pounds at a time.

"2. That about the latter end of Auguſt, this year, at Mr. Harcourt's chamber, he met the priſoners, Ireland, Pickering and Grove, with ſome others, where he heard them diſcourſe, that ſince the four Iriſh ruffians had miſſed killing the king at Windſor, Pickering and Grove ſhould go on with their deſign, and that one Conyers, a Benedictine monk, was to be joined with them; and that they ſhould endeavour to aſſaſſinate his majeſty in his morning walks at Newmarket; that they were very eager upon it; and Mr. Grove, more forward than the reſt, ſaid, ſince it could not be done clandeſtinely, it ſhould be attempted openly; and that thoſe who ſhould fall in the attempt, had the glory to die in a good cauſe: but if they were diſcovered, the diſcovery could never come to that height, but their party would be ſtrong enough to bring it to paſs.

"3. He ſwore that Harcourt told him, Grove was to have fifteen hundred pounds, and Pickering as many maſſes, at twelve pence a maſs, as came to the like ſum.

"4. That at the ſame time, when the diſcourſe about killing the king was at Harcourt's chamber, there was likewiſe a deſign concerted amongſt them of killing ſeveral noble perſons, and the particular parts aſſigned to every one; as Knight, to kill the earl of Shaftſbury; Prichard, the duke of Buckingham; Oneil, the earl of Oſſory: Obrian, the duke of Ormond, &c.

The defence made by the priſoners conſiſted in:

"1. A peremptory denial of the whole. Grove particularly ſaid, as I have a ſoul to ſave, I know nothing of this matter charged upon me. Pickering affirmed, that he never ſhot off a piſtol in his life. And Whitebread, who was there during the trial, declared before Almighty God, that Oates had not ſpoken three words of truth.

"2. A particular denial of their knowledge of, or acquaintance with, the witneſſes. Ireland denied that he ever ſaw Bedloe, before that time in the court; and challenged him to produce one witneſs that he had ever ſpoken to him. Pickering affirmed, that he never ſaw Oates before; and offered to ſwear that he never was in Bedloe's company. And Grove affirmed, that he had ſcarce any acquaintance with Oates. Whereupon Oates gave him a remarkable token, viz. that in December laſt, when he was with him, he owned, that he and three Iriſhmen had fired Southwark; and that they had a thouſand pounds given them for it; whereof he had four hundred pounds, and the others two hundred pounds a-piece.

"3. Ireland againſt Bedloe's evidence, affirmed, he was not in London the whole month of Auguſt, and part of September; and offered to prove it by twenty witneſſes, that he was in Staffordſhire and Cheſhire all that time: and urged Bedloe to name the place, and the company wherever they met together. But not only Bedloe ſwore the contrary, but likewiſe Oates himſelf; but what ſeemed more important, one Sarah Pain, formerly a ſervant to Grove, ſwore that ſhe ſaw Mr. Ireland at a ſcrivener's door in Fetter-Lane, about the 12th or 13th of Auguſt.

"4. Ireland, as well as Whitebread, objected againſt the grand conſult of April the 24th, that hundreds could prove that Oates was at St. Omer's all the months of April and May; and offered to produce a certificate from thence, under the ſeal of the college." But ſuch certificate was not allowed as evidence by the law of England. Laſtly, they endeavoured to blaſt the reputation of doctor Oates, and prove him perjured, ſince he had ſaid before the council, that he knew no more than what he had already depoſed, and yet had ſince added other teſtimonies. As I have ſpoken of this objection, I ſhall not repeat here what has been ſaid.

In concluſion, all three were found guilty, and ſentenced to be drawn, hanged and quartered. But the execution of Ireland and Grove was deferred till the 24th of January following, and that of Pickering to the 9th of May. They perſiſted all three to their laſt breath, to proteſt they were as innocent of the crimes for which they were condemned, as the child unborn. As all the papiſts that ſuffered for this conſpiracy made uſe of the ſame manner of expreſſion, to declare their innocence, it was believed, there was ſome equivocation in theſe words, though it could not be ſaid wherein it conſiſted.

If it is conſidered, that the evidence of Oates and Bedloe upon oath was poſitive, and that the priſoners alledged in their defence only bare negations, the jury will be eaſily juſtified in their verdict. For why ſhould they credit the aſſeverations and oaths of the accuſed, more than the depoſitions of the two witneſſes? And yet, it was afterwards, and ſtill is, pretended by many, that the condemned perſons were innocent. 1. Becauſe they aſſerted their innocence with their dying breath. 2. Becauſe it is taken for granted that Oates and Bedloe were great villains. 3. But the ſtrongeſt proof, according to thoſe who are of this opinion, is, that it was upon the trial of theſe three men that Oates in the reign of king James II. was convicted of perjury upon the depoſitions of twenty-two witneſſes from St. Omer's, who ſwore that Oates was at St. Omer's, in the juſuits college, the whole months of April and May, without ever ſtirring from thence. Moreover, above forty witneſſes from the counties of Stafford and Cheſter, depoſed upon oath, that father Ireland was in thoſe counties all Auguſt, and part of September.

To aſſiſt the reader to judge of this affair, I think it neceſſary to make ſome remarks, and the rather, as the diſpute upon this ſubject is not yet ended.

1. The defence by the alibi [i] is liable to great inconveniences, ſince, there being two contradictory evidences, it leaves the judges doubtful what to reſolve. Generally if they come to a determination, it is not becauſe there is reaſon to believe one of the evidences more than the other, but becauſe equity requires that they incline rather to clemency than rigour. In the preſent trial, there were no depoſitions in favour of the alibi, but only a bare allegation of the priſoners, and an offer of proof by abſent witneſſes. So, even ſuppoſing the innocence of the three accuſed perſons, the jury could not but find them guilty, unleſs they preferred the bare aſſeveration of the priſoners, to the oaths of the witneſſes, which is never practiſed. But in the trial of Oates, the proof of the alibi was made uſe of to convict him of perjury, and ſentence him for it to a very rigorous puniſhment. It belongs to the lawyers to decide, whether this be exactly regular.

2. If the circumſtances of the times of theſe two trials are conſidered, it will be found, there is as much reaſon to believe, in reſpect of one as of the other, that prejudice and paſſion bore a great ſway. When the three jeſuits were condemned, the whole kingdom was alarmed with the noiſe of a plot, formed by that ſociety againſt the king, the government, and the proteſtant religion. The two houſes of parliament had ſupported the reality of this plot, by the unanimity of their votes, and the king himſelf ſuppoſed it in all his proclamations. It ſhould not therefore be ſtrange, that the judges and jury were prejudiced, and thereby inclined blindly to believe what Oates and Bedloe depoſed. But on the other hand, when Oates was convicted of perjury, the face of things was entirely changed. A very zealous catholic king was on the throne, and it was now dangerous to affirm, there was a popiſh plot in 1678. The papiſts had now the ſame ſuperiority over the proteſtants, as the proteſtants had in 1678 over the catholics, and the judges were entirely devoted to the king. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that Jefferies was his judge, who forgot nothing which he thought capable to prejudice the jury againſt the priſoner. In ſhort, Oates was condemned upon the evidence of twenty two witneſſes from St. Omer's, all ſcholars or dependents of the jeſuits, and upon that of forty other witneſſes from the counties of Cheſter and Stafford, amongſt whom it is only ſaid there were ſeveral proteſtants. Moreover, the queſtion was not only, whether Ireland was in thoſe counties during the months of Auguſt and September, but whether he had never ſtirred from thence in that time [k]. Now it is hard to conceive that ſuch a negative propoſition can be proved by forty witneſſes.

Having thus repreſented what is urged on both ſides, I leave the reader to his own judgment. The affair of the conſpiracy muſt now be interrupted for ſome time, in order to proceed to another which made a great noiſe at this time. But it is neceſſary to look back a little on the ſituation of the Engliſh court.

The earl of Danby, lord treaſurer, was conſidered as the king's prime miniſter. He had a great genius, and a ſolid judgment, and as he diſapproved of the principles of the cabal, endeavoured to diſengage the king from the methods he had been led into by their counſels. This drew upon him the enmity of the duke of York, and all the French faction, with whom joined the lord Ruſſel, and other malecontents in the houſe of commons; and among the peers, the earls of Eſſex and Shaftſbury, whilſt the duke of Monmouth, and the ducheſs of Portſmouth did their utmoſt to leſſen his credit with the king. In a word, a ſtrong party was formed againſt him, who were bent to ruin him at any rate. Theſe enemies were alſo joined by another, who had been his moſt intimate friend. This was Mr. Montague embaſſador in France, who aſpiring to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, took it very ill that the treaſurer had engaged to bring in ſir William Temple. Mr. Montague was the treaſurer's moſt dangerous enemy, becauſe he had private letters in his hands from that miniſter, and though he could not divulge them without great injury to the king, this gave him no uneaſineſs, becauſe reſolving to throw himſelf into the party againſt the court, which was moſt prevalent in the parliament, he knew he ſhould be protected, even againſt the king himſelf. To this end, he got himſelf elected member for Northampton, and ſuddenly leaving Paris, without the king's conſent or knowledge, came to London, and took his ſeat in the houſe. The king offended at ſo ſtrange a proceeding, and being alſo informed by the Swediſh embaſſador of the deſign of the treaſurer's enemies, and their intention to make uſe of his letters, ſent the 19th of December the following meſſage to the houſe of commons,—"That upon information that Mr. Montague, a member of that houſe, and late embaſſador in France, had held ſeveral conferences with the pope's nuntio there, without any directions or inſtructions from his majeſty; his majeſty to the end that he might know the truth of that matter, had given orders for the ſeizing of Mr. Montague's papers [l]." The leaders of the oppoſite party to the king, made great objections to this meſſage, pretending, it ought to be firſt known, whether the information had been given upon oath and what was the nature of Mr. Montague's crime, before they could conſent to the ſeizure of his papers. Upon this Mr. Montague acquainted the houſe, "That he had in his cuſtody ſome papers, which, as he conceived, might tend very much to the ſafety of the king's perſon, and the preſervation of the government." A committee was immediately appointed to bring the writings to the houſe, which being accordingly done, and Mr. Montague ordered to ſelect ſuch of them as he thought for the ſervice of the houſe, and diſpoſe of the reſt as he pleaſed, he produced two letters out of many others, both ſubſcribed, Danby, and ſent to him at Paris, on the negotiation of the money which his majeſty expected from the king of France, at the bottom of one of which were theſe words, This letter is writ by my order, C. R. [m]. Theſe letters diſcovering to the houſe, from whence had proceeded the king's delays with regard to the war againſt France, they immediately reſolved, "That there was ſufficient matter of impeachment againſt Thomas earl of Danby, lord treaſurer of England," and within two days, by the help of Mr. Montague, the articles of impeachment were drawn up, and ſent to the houſe of lords. But this impeachment was rather againſt the king himſelf, than the earl of Danby, who had only acted by his expreſs orders. For, though in the impeachment were inſerted ſeveral articles which only concerned the earl, it was not in thoſe that the ſtrength of the impeachment conſiſted, but in thoſe relating to the negotiation with France, concerning the king's penſion, on pretence that the lord treaſurer had acted without order, though the contrary was not doubted [n]. But the intention was to oblige the earl for his own ſafety to plead the king's orders for what he had done. This perplexed him extremely, for he could not juſtify himſelf without accuſing the king, and he could not accuſe the king, without entirely forfeiting his favour. Eſpecially as the king had earneſtly deſired him not to divulge his ſecrets, offering him letters of pardon to ſcreen him from the parliament. He therefore reſolved to conceal the king's private orders upon this affair, but however could not help ſending two of Montague's letters to the commons, which diſcovered him to be the principal author of this negotiation. Theſe letters alſo ſhewed, that the court of France conſidered the lord treaſurer as their great enemy, whoſe ruin was to be effected, in order to have the king of England at their diſpoſal. But the commons were ſo enraged againſt the earl, that they would not ſuffer theſe letters to be read. On the other hand, when the articles of his impeachment were read in the houſe of lords, he in a ſpeech

[k] A woman ſwore ſhe ſaw Ireland in London, about the middle of Auguſt. Burnet, p. 443.

[l] Burnet ſays, the earl of Danby having broke with Montague, was apprehenſive Montague might accuſe him, ſo reſolved to prevent him. Jenkins, then at Nimeguen, writ over, according to a direction ſent him, as was believed, that he underſtood Montague had been in a ſecret correſpondence with the pope's nuntio at Paris (Montague, it ſeems, had made uſe of him, and given him money, which he loved, for ſuch ſecrets as he could draw from him.) Upon Jenkins's letter, the king ſent the above meſſage to the commons. This was a device of the lord Danby's to find his own letters and deſtroy them, and then to let the proſecution drop. But Montague had put a box, in which the letters were, in ſure hands out of the way. Whilſt the debate about the meſſage was in hand, the box was brought to him, which he opened, and took out two of the lord Danby's letters, that contained inſtructions to him to treat with the king of France for three hundred thouſand pounds a year, for three years, if a peace ſucceeded; ſince it would not be convenient for the king to meet a parliament in all that time, and he was charged to mention no part of this to the ſecretary of ſtate. Theſe laſt words made very much for ſecretary Coventry, ſince now it appeared, that he was not truſted with theſe ill practices, p. 440, 442.

[m] The firſt was dated January 17, 1677-8, and the ſecond March 25, 1678.

[n] The ſubſtance of the articles againſt him, was, 1. That he had treated with foreign princes and embaſſadors, without the privity of the ſecretary of ſtate. 2. Endeavoured to ſubvert the antient form of government; and deſigned to raiſe and keep up a ſtanding army. 3. Attempted to hinder the meeting of parliaments. 4. Concealed and ſuppreſſed the evidence for the popiſh plot. 5. Had waſted the king's treaſure, and iſſued out great ſums of money for unneceſſary penſions, and ſecret ſervices to the value of two hundred and thirty one thouſand, ſix hundred and two pounds, in two years. 6. Procured for himſelf conſiderable gifts and grants. Kennet, p. 358. He frequently inſinuated, that he could make ſuch a defence, as would admit of no reply[o]. Every one knew what he meant, but it is certain, he was not ſo much aimed at as the king himſelf, and that it was intended by this means, more than by the plot itſelf, to ſhew the public, that the king and the duke of York were the real authors of all the evils of the kingdom, and in a word, the heads of the conſpiracy to ſubvert the government and proteſtant religion. The king eaſily perceived the deſign of the earl of Danby's impeachment, and therefore, before the lords could reſolve, whether the earl of Danby ſhould be ſent to the Tower, came to the parliament the 30th of December, and prorogued it to the 4th of February, after paſſing a ſingle act againſt the papiſts.

Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, ſir Joſeph Williamſon ſecretary of ſtate, reſigned the ſeals into the hands of the king, who appointed Robert Spencer earl of Sunderland in his room, though he had given hopes of the place to ſir William Temple, then embaſſador in Holland, and had called him over for that purpoſe. But Temple at his arrival found the poſt filled, the earl of Sunderland having paid Williamſon ſix thouſand pounds, and five hundred guineas, which Temple was not able or willing to give. Shortly after, the king diſmiſſed the earl of Danby, and put the treaſury into commiſſion[p].

[1678-9.] After the prorogation, the king was extremely embarraſſed, not only by reaſon of the earl of Danby's impeachment, which properly fell upon him, but alſo by freſh diſcoveries, both of the plot and Godfrey's murder. The 21ſt of December, Miles Prance, a goldſmith of London, a papiſt, who had ſometimes worked for the queen in her chapel of Somerſet-houſe, was taken up by a warrant from the council, upon the information of one Wren, a lodger in his houſe, that he was concerned in the murder of Godfrey. Though it was very poſſible for Godfrey to have been murdered by perſons not in the plot, yet it was generally believed, the murder was committed by papiſts, and that if the authors could be diſcovered, it would be a great means to unravel the plot. Wherefore the two houſes had appointed a committee, of which the earl of Shaftſbury was chairman, to enquire after the authors of the murder.

In this affair as in that of the plot there are, among the hiſtorians, two parties directly oppoſite, one aſſerting the murder was committed by papiſts, and the other maintaining the contrary. Theſe, in ſupport of their opinion, relate numberleſs facts, with ſo many circumſtances, that they would be more than capable of proving what they advance, could their faithfulneſs and alſo the certainty of the facts be entirely relied on. But it is very ſurpriſing, to ſee continually the truth of their opinion ſuppoſed, without any other proof than a great many unwarranted facts. This may paſs when we write only for one of the parties, ever ready to believe what is advanced by an hiſtorian of their own ſide; but as I write for foreigners, to whom the actors and the authors are equally unknown, I am not to ſuppoſe true, facts of which I ſee no proof. I do not hereby pretend to inſinuate to my readers, that all theſe facts are falſe, but only that I have not ſufficient reaſons to believe them true, and conſequently ought not to form any ſuppoſition upon them.

As for Prance the goldſmith, it is readily ſuppoſed, he was maliciouſly accuſed by Wren, becauſe Prance had forced him to pay fourteen months rent, due to him for lodging, and that having at firſt with execrations denied the murder, he was at laſt compelled by threats and ill treatment to confeſs that he knew the whole matter, and to give a particular account of all the circumſtances. If this ſuppoſition was well proved, or at leaſt ſupported by the teſtimony of any cotemporary perſon of reputation known in London, there would be no occaſion to ſeek for other proofs. But, as I have ſaid, theſe facts are declared as undeniable, without any warrant. For my part, who ſeek not to impoſe upon my readers, I ſhall only inform them of the facts univerſally acknowledged, adding alſo ſuch as are doubtful and advanced without proof, that the reader may know what he is to adhere to.

Prance being arreſted, as I ſaid, was carried to Weſtminſter to be examined before a committee of the lords.

Here a deciſive fact is begun to be advanced without any authors, namely, that Prance was firſt carried into a little room, where ſeveral perſons went to ſee him, and among others Bedloe, who knowing him not, privately enquired which was the priſoner? When he was informed, he withdrew to an eating-houſe, in the neighbourhood, where Prance was brought ſome time after, till he ſhould be called to his examination. As ſoon as Bedloe, who was purpoſely planted in the ſame room, had caſt his eyes upon him, he cried out, "This is one of the rogues that I ſaw with a dark lanthorn about the body of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey; but he was then in a perriwig."

If any care had been taken to prove that Bedloe had aſked which was Prance, and that he purpoſely waited for him in the eating-houſe, where he knew he was to be brought, there would be no need of other proof, and the caſe would be decided. But this fact entirely reſts upon the authority of the hiſtorian who relates it[q].

Prance being carried to the committee of lords, Bedloe directly charged him with the murder of Godfrey, and Wren with being out of the houſe while the body was miſſing. Prance denied all with imprecations upon himſelf. But as the bare denial of a priſoner ought not to carry it againſt the teſtimony of two witneſſes, the lords thought fit to ſend him to Newgate, where he was put in the condemned hole, loaded with heavy irons, and, ſays my author, left all night to conſider what further anſwers to make, and whether he would venture his ſoul or his body.

Herein manifeſtly appears the prejudice of the hiſtorian, who cannot have known, that the intention of the lords was to leave Prance to conſider, whether he would venture his ſoul or his body. He ſhould ſay this but by virtue of his ſyſtem, which ſuppoſes, that the committee was reſolved at any rate, to make Prance an evidence to the murder of Godfrey.

But here is another fact ſtill more important, advanced with the ſame aſſurance without any authority.

The next morning early, a man entered the condemned hole, where Prance was; and laying down a paper upon a form juſt by him, retired; ſoon after came in another with a candle, who ſet it down and left him. By that light he read the paper, wherein he found brief hints to what he was to ſwear when he ſhould be called to his ſecond examination, with a menace of being hanged if he did not confeſs what was expected of him. Prance, ſays the author, preſently imagined this to be a contrivance of the lord Shaftſbury.

A fact of this nature (which paſſed in a dungeon where there is but one man, and where two others, at ſeveral times, only go in and out, without ſaying a word, one to bring a paper, the other a candle) can only be known by Prance's own confeſſion. Now it is certain, Prance never owned any ſuch thing; if he had, it would aſſuredly have been ſaid, how and upon what occaſion. But if this be ſo, how can it be ſaid that Prance imagined this to be a contrivance of the earl of Shaftſbury? Is it a thing ſo common, to know what paſſes in a man's private thoughts, that it is not worth the while to ſay how this knowledge was attained?

I proceed to other facts which are not conteſted. Prance after he had continued in priſon all night, and part of the next day, told captain Richardſon, maſter of Newgate, that he had matters of great moment to communicate to the earl of Shaftſbury, chairman of the committee. He was, according to his requeſt, carried the ſame night to the earl, who, in preſence of three other perſons, examined him five or ſix hours. It is pretended that the earl abuſed and menaced him, telling him, "That there were great ones concerned, and he muſt diſcover them too; for the little ones ſhould not ſerve his turn," bidding him, "not ſpare the king himſelf." It does not however appear that theſe menaces made much impreſſion upon Prance, ſince his depoſitions reached only perſons of low condition. However, he diſcovered part of what he ſaid he knew, with a promiſe of a more ample confeſſion if he might have his pardon. He ſigned his depoſition, and was returned to priſon. Upon this the lords obtained for him from his majeſty a full and general pardon. Then a committee of the lords was ſent to Newgate to acquaint him with it, and to examine him. The commons likewiſe ordered him to be examined by a committee of ſecrecy. Theſe two examinations being made with great ſtrictneſs, Prance was carried the next day to Whitehall, to be examined before the king and council.

[o] He affirmed, that he had never done any thing of great moment, for which he had not always had his majeſty's command.

[p] The commiſſioners were, Arthur Capel earl of Eſſex, Lawrence Hyde the earl of Clarendon's brother, ſir John Ernle, ſir Edward Deering, and Sidney Godolphin. Kennet, p. 357.———This year died Henry Oldenburgh, ſecretary to the royal ſociety, firſt publiſher of the philoſophical tranſactions; and Andrew Marvel.

[q] Our author means Echard. Burnet ſays, Prance being taken up on Wren's information, was carried to Weſtminſter, Bedloe accidentally paſſed by, not knowing any thing concerning him: and at firſt ſight, he charged ſomebody to ſeize on him: for he was one of thoſe, whom he ſaw about Godfrey's body, p. 445.

In

In this examination he accuſed five perſons, as actually preſent at the murder; namely, Girald and Kelley, two Iriſh prieſts; Robert Green, cuſhion man to the queen's chapel; Laurence Hill, ſervant to dr. Godden treaſurer of the chapel; and Henry Berry, porter of Somerſet-houſe. Being aſked, "Why he gave ſo different a relation to the committee of lords from what he now ſo freely confeſſed?" He anſwered, "That he was not then ſure of his pardon." Being further aſked, "Why he came not in upon the proclamation and reward thereof?" He ſaid, "He was afraid to truſt it." As he had been very particular concerning the circumſtances of the time, place, and manner of the murder, the king to be aſſured of the truth, appointed the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Oſſory, and the vice-chamberlain, to go with Prance to Somerſet-houſe, and make him ſhew them the places where the things were acted. The author ſo often mentioned, adds what deſerves to be remembered. Prance, ſays he, was very punctual in naming and ſhewing ſome of the rooms, but ſo uncertain and dubious in ſome particulars, eſpecially about the chief room, that when the duke of Monmouth privately aſked the earl of Oſſory, "what he thought on it?" The Earl anſwered, "It was all a cheat[r]." I purpoſely take notice of this particular, becauſe it is directly contrary to the report made to the council, as will preſently appear.

In the afternoon, Prance, in the preſence of the council, was confronted with Green, Berry, and Hill, who denied every ſyllable of the charge, and Prance ſtood as ſtoutly to every point of the accuſation. After which he was ſent back to Newgate for four or five days.

The ſame author ſays here, that his irons were ſome times off and ſometimes on, according as he was in a diſcovering temper. That is to ſay, the jailor by the ſecret orders of the committee, treated him well or ill, as he was diſpoſed to retract or adhere to his depoſition. Another particular is likewiſe added, that he was often viſited by members of both houſes, who ſometimes ſeverely threatened him when his evidence did not agree with Bedloe's, and particularly becauſe he would not own the perriwig which Bedloe had firſt mentioned. But theſe particulars tending to ſhew that Prance was forced to depoſe what he knew not, are ſupported by no author, no evidence, no authority. There are no other vouchers but the hiſtorians who report theſe particulars, without vouchſafing to inform their readers from whence they received them.

After Prance had remained four or five days in Newgate, he was once more carried to be examined before the king in council. But he made it his requeſt that he might firſt wait upon the king himſelf. Upon this Richardſon had orders to carry him to Mr. Chiffinch's lodgings, where the king came. The king taking Prance into a room by himſelf, after ſome time, opened the door, and bad Chiffinch and Richardſon take notice of what Prance ſaid; who being called to ſpeak out plainly, he declared, "That the men he had ſworn againſt were all innocent, and that all he had ſworn againſt them was falſe," which he affirmed (ſays one) with great paſſion and aſſeveration. Upon which the king aſked him, "Upon your ſalvation is it ſo?" He replied, "Upon my ſalvation the whole accuſation is falſe." He was then carried before the council, where he declared to the ſame effect, and was aſked, "What inducement he had to his former ſtory———who put him upon it?" He ſaid, "No body prompted him; he only knew the men he ſwore againſt: he never ſaw Bedloe before he was taken up; he knew nothing of the plot nor of the murder:———and could not reſt for the ſtory he had told. But Wren owed him money, and threatened him becauſe he dunned him for it, and ſo haired him into it." He was then remanded to priſon.

After ſo ſerious an aſſeveration, no man of ſenſe can imagine, that catholics, or courtiers had gained Prance to retract his firſt depoſition. For this would be only to alledge a bare ſuſpicion without proof. But to have it believed, that the committee, and ſeveral members of both houſes, had threatened Prance, in caſe his depoſition agreed not with Bedloe's, there is no need of proof, and the bare relation of an hiſtorian who writ above thirty years after, is more than ſufficient for that.

Unhappily Prance retracted once more. But this ſignifies nothing, becauſe he denied what he had lately ſaid before the king and council, by reaſon of the exceſſive torments he was made to ſuffer, till he had promiſed to depoſe whatever was deſired. Let us hear what a famous hiſtorian[s] ſays on this occaſion[t].

"Prance, excepting juſt after his return, ſtood firm and immoveable in his denial, againſt all terrors and temptations for above twelve days, from the 29th of December to the 11th of this preſent January. During which ſpace of time, his uſage was barbarous, and more like the Romiſh inquiſition, than the methods of a free nation. For nine days at leaſt his caſe was deplorable; and what with the deadly cold and naſtineſs of the place, the diſtreſs of his condition, the agony of his thoughts, under the horror of bringing new guilt upon his conſcience, and the galling weight of his irons, he lay in ſuch torments both of body and mind, that he ſpent his hours in roaring and groaning, frequently and pitifully crying out, Not guilty, not guilty! No murder, no murder! He uſed the ſame outcries, or clamours, at leaſt, to that effect, ſo often, that the impoſers had no way to cover the ſcandal, and the inhumanity of their treatment, but either by imputing the anguiſh of a wounded conſcience to the ravings of a diſtempered brain: or by converting the marks of a true repentance into the ſtory of a counterfeit madneſs. But when things were at the worſt, Prance was now and then, as the good humour prevailed, eaſed of his irons, comforted with good words and promiſes, and no artifice omitted to bring him to a proper underſtanding. The keepers were then under the ſole direction of a certain ambulatory committee, when and what degree to ſqueeze, to pinch, to eaſe, to ſhackle, to comfort, or to torment their priſoners; and moſt things were done according to the particular orders of that cabal. It would be too tedious to recite all the ſufferings of this unfortunate man, who being unable to hold out as Coral had done, and finding his life in the ſame danger with thoſe he had accuſed, he at length ſubmitted to the temptation, and upon a new aſſurance of pardon, he promiſed to ſtand by his former evidence. Immediately upon this, on the 11th of January, his irons were knocked off, and he was removed from hard boards, and a diſmal cold room, to a fine lodging and a curious bed, with variety of the beſt meats and drink. Here having pen, ink and paper, and the aſſiſtance of his friend one Mr. Boyce, he finiſhed his ſtory, and prepared for being a compleat evidence againſt Green, Berry, and Hill, who were ſhortly after to come upon their trials."

As the author of this paſſage is not content with inſinuating, that Prance was compelled by torments to ſupport his ſecond depoſition, but openly undertakes to prove it by facts which are entirely deciſive, it is abſolutely neceſſary for the reader's inſtruction to make ſome remarks on this ſubject.

1. When in a controverted matter, an hiſtorian reports facts to which he was not an eye witneſs, and which however are capable of deciding for or againſt, the reader has a right to expect from him ſome teſtimony, or ſome author; in a word, to be informed, how he came to the knowledge of ſuch facts. But here, we ſee neither teſtimony nor author, in the text or margin.

2. It appears from this very relation, that all the ill uſage of Prance, conſiſted in keeping him nine days in irons. If this is like a Romiſh inquiſition, it may be affirmed, England has a conſtant inquiſition, ſince priſoners committed for murder, or other great crimes are never treated otherwiſe. Beſides, it will be ſeen hereafter, that Prance denied his ever receiving any ill uſage in priſon, or his wanting any thing. As to the torments of his mind, and his roarings and groaning, ſuppoſing them true, only Prance himſelf could know the motives, and it muſt be ſurpriſing to hear an author talk of what paſſed in Prance's mind, as if he had been his confident.

3. He ought to have explained what was this ambulatory committee, from whom the keepers received directions; for it is well known, that during the prorogation of the parliament (and all this paſſed at the time of the prorogation) the keeper of Newgate could obey no orders but thoſe of the king, or at leaſt of the courts of juſtice.

4. Laſtly, in proof of a fact ſo remarkable and deciſive,

[r] In an account of the plot printed in 1680, it is ſaid, That Prance gave ſuch an exact account of the very ſpot upon which the murder was committed: where he himſelf, where Berry ſtood; as alſo the door, ſtairs, dark entry, &c. mentioned in his narrative, that his majeſty's commiſſioners returned very well ſatisfied with the truth of his relation and confeſſion, p. 68.

[s] Echard, who has borrowed the following paragraph, as well as ſeveral others from ſir Roger l'Eſtrange, without naming his author.

[t] Burnet ſays, after Prance had declared before the king and council, that his firſt confeſſion was all a fiction, he was carried back to priſon, but immediately ſent the keeper of Newgate to the king, to tell him, that all he had ſworn was true, but that the horror and confuſion he was in, put him on denying it. Yet he went off from this again, and denied every thing. Dr. Lloyd was upon this ſent to talk with him. At firſt he denied every thing to him. But dr. Lloyd told me, that he was almoſt dead through the diſorder of his mind, and with cold in his body. But after that dr. Lloyd had made a fire, and cauſed him to be put in a bed, and began to diſcourſe the matter with him, he returned to his confeſſion; which he did in ſuch a manner, that dr. Lloyd ſaid to me, it was not poſſible for him to doubt of his ſincerity in it, p. 446.

Our

we have only the bare aſſeveration of the author, whoſe exaggeration is kept up with expreſſions the ſtrongeſt and moſt capable to give the readers terrible ideas of the torments endured by Prance, which, however, amount to a nine days impriſonment in irons. Beſides, the author poſitively ſays, that Prance was gained without telling us by whom, or how, or giving the leaſt warrant for what he advances. I do not ſay that all this is falſe, for I know nothing of it. But as it is not forbid to rely on the faithfulneſs of the author, or of thoſe from whom he has received his informations; ſo neither is it forbid to doubt of it, and to believe that he might be prejudiced by party ſtories, which are implicitly ſwallowed or rejected, according as they are advantageous or prejudicial to the ſide eſpouſed by thoſe who hear them.

Bedloe had given but a very imperfect information of the murder of Godfrey. He ſaid indeed, it was committed in Somerſet-houſe, and that he had ſeen the dead body. But as to the other circumſtances, he only ſpoke of them as received from perſons who had abſented themſelves; whereas Prance delivered in writing a more regular and full account, which contained preciſely his depoſition before the king in council, and was to this effect:

"Girald, Kelly, Green, Berry, Hill and Prance, with the approbation of ſome others, after ſeveral conſultations [u], had reſolved to murder ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, as being a bitter perſecutor of the catholics, an active diſcoverer of their deſigns, and a particular enemy to the queen's ſervants. Thus determined, on Saturday the 12th of October, Hill went to ſir Edmundbury Godfrey's houſe in the morning, and talked with him in private [w]. Then taking his leave, he went to Girald, and Green, and with them ſtaid hard by, waiting for the gentleman's coming out, which he did about ten or eleven, all alone as uſually. They dogged him to ſeveral places, till about ſix or ſeven in the evening, when Green went to Prance's houſe, and told him, they had ſet him near St. Clement's; and that Prance muſt make all haſte to the water-gate, at Somerſet-houſe, where he ſhould find Kelly and Berry, which he did; and they three waited there till about nine o'clock: when of a ſudden Hill came running and ſaid, He was coming, and they muſt pretend a quarrel, and he would fetch him in. While Kelly and Berry were in a ſeeming ſcuffle, Hill, at the gate, ſtopped ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, and entreated him for God's ſake to come in, for two men were a quarrelling, and he was afraid there would be bloodſhed. The gentleman being a magiſtrate, did at laſt conſent, and Hill entered the gate, firſt, to ſhew him the perſons; and after them followed Girald and Green; while Prance watched the water-gate, and Berry was to ſecure the paſſage by the chapel. But firſt, he and Kelly, the pretended combatants, ſtood about the end of the rail by the queen's ſtables; and as ſir Edmundbury went down towards them, Green ſuddenly threw a twiſted handkerchief about his neck, and immediately all four pulled him down and ſtrangled him, ſo as he could make no noiſe; after which they threw him behind the rail, and gave him ſome violent punches on the breaſt with their knees, and Green with all his force rung his neck almoſt round. Prance and Berry being come to them, when he was quite dead, they all helped to carry the body into Dr. Godden's lodgings, where Hill lived, and where they brought him up five or ſix ſteps, into a little room on the right hand, and there left him that night, and Sunday all day and night. On Monday night, Hill and ſome others removed him into a room in the upper court, where Prance was ſhewn the body by the light of a dark lanthorn, and where Bedloe ſwore he ſaw Prance. On Tueſday night, they carried him to another room in the long entry, over againſt Dr. Godden's lodgings; and on Wedneſday night they removed it to the little room where it was firſt laid. Having kept the body above four days and nights, Girald and Kelly adviſed to have it carried into the fields, and leave him run through with his own ſword, that he might be ſuppoſed to have murdered himſelf; and therefore his money, rings, &c. were all to be left with him. This being agreed, they reſolved to carry him out that night; and accordingly Hill procured a ſedan, or chair, into which they put the body about twelve o'clock. Berry the porter, having invited the centinels into his houſe, opened the gate, and Prance and Girald carried out the ſedan [x]. Thus, ſometimes they two, and ſometimes Kelly and Green, carried it up towards Soho-fields, hard by the Grecians church; and there Hill attending with a horſe, they ſet the body up before him, and left the ſedan in ſome unfiniſhed buildings in that place; whereupon Girald ſaid, I wiſh we had a hundred ſuch rogues as ſecure as this. Then Prance being a houſekeeper, returned home; and the other four went on, one leading the horſe, Hill riding and holding the body [y], and the other two walking by. They carried him to a place called Primroſe-hill, about two miles out of town, where they left him in a ditch, with his own ſword run through his body by Girald himſelf, in the exact poſture of one that had murdered himſelf."

This depoſition, which was immediately publiſhed, met with an entire belief from the people. But afterwards, when the popiſh party prevailed, ſeveral authors endeavoured to find many miſtakes and inconſiſtencies in it, and even maintained, that it was not penned by Prance, but by ſome abler hand. As at firſt it was dangerous to ſay, that Prance was a falſe witneſs, it was afterwards no leſs dangerous to maintain, he had ſpoke the truth. Hence ſome adhere to this depoſition, and others to the writings afterwards publiſhed againſt it, to demonſtrate its falſhood.

While theſe things were tranſacted, the king was by no means at eaſe. The plot (of which he was ſuſpected to be the author, at leaſt in what concerned the government and religion) and the impeachment againſt the earl of Danby, which entirely reflected upon him, could not but greatly perplex him. To divert a little theſe ſuſpicions, he publiſhed, the beginning of January, ſeveral proclamations againſt the papiſts, who, immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, were returned to London and Weſtminſter. By another proclamation, he recalled all his ſubjects from the foreign ſeminaries; but theſe were remedies little capable of curing the people's ſuſpicions and fears.

About this time was diſcovered a college of jeſuits at Lower-Come in Herefordſhire. Moreover, a freſh witneſs appeared, one Stephen Dugdale, who pretended to make new diſcoveries in the plot, and accuſed five jeſuits, and one prieſt [z]. This obliged the king to publiſh a new proclamation againſt Evers, Gawen, Vavaſor alias Gifford, Leviſon, jeſuits, and Broadſtreet a prieſt, with a promiſe of a hundred pounds to any that ſhould apprehend Evers, and fifty pounds for each of the reſt [a].

Mean while, as the time for the meeting of the parliament approached, the king perceiving that in the preſent diſpoſition of the commons, he ſhould receive no advantage from them, but rather new mortifications, on the 24th of January diſſolved the parliament by proclamation [b], promiſing withal, to iſſue out writs for the calling of a new parliament the 6th of March following. Thus ended the long parliament, which had continued almoſt eighteen years, and had been for twelve years ſo favourable to the king. Never parliament had been ſo liberal to any king, or carried the prerogative higher. If Charles II. had not purſued methods ſo contrary to the intereſts of the kingdom, he would never have loſt the affection of this parliament, which ſtudied only to pleaſe him, and give him the moſt effectual proofs of their zeal. But when, in proceſs of time, they diſcovered, that the king had ill deſigns againſt the go-

[z] Burnet gives the following account of this Dugdale and his evidence. He had been the lord Aſton's baily, and was a man of ſenſe and temper. He behaved himſelf decently, and had ſomewhat in his air and deportment that diſpoſed people to believe him: ſo that the king himſelf began to think there was ſomewhat in the plot, though he had little regard to Oates or Bedloe. He made a diſcovery of a correſpondence that Evers held with the jeſuits in London, who had writ to Evers of the deſign of killing the king, and deſired him to find out proper men for executing it. Three other jeſuits preſſed Dugdale to undertake it, promiſing he ſhould be canonized for it, and the lord Stafford offered him five hundred pounds, if he would ſet about it. Dugdale's evidence was confirmed by one circumſtance. He had talked in the country of a juſtice of peace in Weſtminſter that was killed, on the Tueſday after Godfrey was miſſed; ſo that the news of this muſt have been writ from London on the Saturday night's poſt. He did not think it a ſecret, ſo talked of it as news in an alehouſe. The two perſons, he ſaid he ſpoke to, remembered nothing of it, but ſeveral others ſwore they had heard it. He ſaid moreover, that the duke had ſent to Coleman when in Newgate, to perſuade him to diſcover nothing, and deſired to know whether he had ever diſcovered their deſigns to any other perſon; and that Coleman ſent anſwer, that he had ſpoke of them to Godfrey, but to no other man, upon which the duke gave order to kill him. p. 445.

[b] Some think, this parliament was diſſolved, on purpoſe to protect the popiſh lords in the Tower, and divert, if poſſible, the noiſe of the popiſh plot: or elſe to cover the duke of York from the reſentment of the commons, and the general indignation of the people. Kennet, p. 356.

vernment and the eſtabliſhed religion, which he had ſufficiently ſhewn by his two wars againſt Holland, and his intimate union with France, they began to conſider him as an enemy to the ſtate, whoſe deſigns and meaſures were to be broken. The letters, produced by Mr. Montague in the parliament, fully convinced the moſt incredulous, that the king was a penſioner of France, and ſacrificed the intereſt of England to that crown. It is therefore no wonder, that the parliament credited the diſcovery of a plot, which was ſo natural a conſequence of the king's deſigns, now entirely believed. Indeed, the firſt article of the plot, concerning the killing of the king, might be doubtful and uncertain; wherefore the parliament willingly left it to the deciſion of the courts of juſtice. But the two laſt, relating to render the king abſolute, and ſubverting the eſtabliſhed religion, needed no other proof than thoſe the king had given. Beſides, the duke of York being a profeſſed papiſt, and having a great influence in the king's councils, it was not difficult to conceive, that he being ſuch a zealot for his religion, would loſe no occaſion of promoting it: and this his ſecretary's letters plainly demonſtrated. Indeed, the parliament was compoſed chiefly of rigid epiſcopalians, who perhaps cannot be vindicated in their perſecution of the preſbyterians. But however they were not willing to ſacrifice the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of the nation, to their paſſion againſt preſbyterianiſm. From hence flowed the quarrels between the king and the parliament, the mortifications ſo frequently given him, and his diſſolution of it at laſt, though he had in it ſo many creatures, purchaſed either with money or penſions. At firſt, this trade was ſecretly carried on, but after Clifford's advancement to the treaſury, it was practiſed ſo openly, that every man's name and price were publicly known. Notwithſtanding all this, when once the conduct of the king and court was conſidered, it was not poſſible for the king to obtain a majority in the houſe of commons, becauſe thoſe who were ready to ſacrifice the nation's money to the king, would not ſacriſice to him their liberties and religion. Another cauſe alſo ſtopped the the king in his career, namely, that as ſoon as the people were diſſatisfied with the court, vacancies in the parliament were filled with men of quite contrary principles to the king and duke of York, ſo that in time the parliament became very different from what it was at the beginning. It is not therefore ſtrange, that the king ſhould deſire to be rid of a parliament, from which he could expect no farther benefit. But he flattered himſelf in vain, with having another more favourable, as will hereafter appear.

Upon the 25th of January, the king iſſued out writs for the new election, which put the whole nation into a ferment. It happened to the king, on this occaſion, as it had happened to his father. The people being diſcontented with the court, and full of ſuſpicions and fears, affected to chooſe repreſentatives the moſt averſe to popery and arbitrary government. And as the high church men had been for ſeveral years a little too ſtrongly attached to the king; and had, in the laſt parliament, paſſed acts to raiſe the royal power higher than ever, the people in general were not for truſting their intereſts in ſuch hands. On the other ſide the preſbyterians, though long oppreſſed, were ſtill numerous in the corporations, ſo that by the ſuperiority of their votes, they commonly carried the elections in favour of their own party, or at leaſt of men, who had only outwardly conformed to the church of England. In a word, when the returns were made, it was found, that moſt of the repreſentatives were men very oppoſite to the principles and deſigns of the court. The king, to prevent theſe impreſſions, affected an extraordinary ſeverity againſt the papiſts, and by proclamation, on complaint of the neglects of the proſecution of recuſants, ordered the chancellor to put out of commiſſion, all juſtices of peace, who were remiſs in their duty. But this was too frequent an artifice, to be capable to perſuade the people, that the king was truly zealous for the proteſtant religion.

While all were engaged in the new elections, three of the five, accuſed of Godfrey's murder, namely, Green, Berry, and Hill, were tried at the King's Bench bar, before the lord chief juſtice Scroggs, the 10th of February.

Oates depoſed, That he had heard Godfrey ſay, a little before his death, "That he went in fear of his life by the popiſh party, and had been dogged ſeveral days."

One Robinſon teſtified, That he heard him ſay, "That he believed he ſhould be the firſt martyr."

Prance's evidence was the ſame with what he had before depoſed. The priſoners objected to him, that he had recanted, and denied all before the king and council. The court made for him the anſwer which he had before given to the council, "That all that was nothing but an unuſual fear, and a want of a full aſſurance of his pardon[c]." Some repreſent this as a great partiality in the judge. But it muſt be obſerved, that judges ſit upon the trial of criminals, not to condemn or acquit: the jury decide the caſe, and find the priſoners guilty or not guilty. When therefore any material difficulties offer, it is the office of the judge to direct the jury, and ſhew them what they are, and what they are not to mind, with the reaſons of their opinion. So I doubt, that on this occaſion the court did not exceed the bounds of their duty, though I will affirm nothing.

Hill's wife aſked Prance, whether he had not been tortured in Newgate, ſince ſeveral had heard him cry out in that place? He anſwered, "That he had not——That captain Richardſon had uſed him as civilly as any man in England; and that all the time he was there he wanted for nothing." This anſwer, as we ſee, is very contradictory to the aggravated recital of his torments; though even in that recital, nothing is ſaid which tends to ſhew, that he was put to the torture. However, the author of the recital, better informed than Prance himſelf, ſcruples not to ſay, "That the poor man, to ſupport the credit of his evidence, was forced to diſown all his barbarous uſage."

Bedloe had already depoſed before the lords, "That le Phaire, Walſh, Pritchard, Keins, &c. had wheedled ſir Edmundbury Godfrey into Somerſet-houſe court, under pretence of taking ſome plotters, and after a turn or two, and the pretence of ſending for a conſtable, they ſhewed him to a room, preſented a piſtol to him, threatening to kill him, if he made any noiſe, but would do him no hurt, if he would ſend for his examinations; which he refuſing to do, they ſtifled him between two pillows, and after that, upon finding ſome life in him, they ſtrangled him with a long cravat."

Some have remarked, that this firſt evidence of Bedloe, was directly contrary to Prance's. Others have obſerved, that Bedloe never ſaid that he was preſent at the murder, but only depoſed what he heard from others; conſequently, that there was no real contradiction between the two witneſſes.

In the preſent trial Bedloe depoſed, "That about a fortnight before the murder, le Phaire, Pritchard, Keins, and ſome other Romiſh prieſts, all unknown to Prance, diſcourſed Bedloe about killing a certain gentleman, not named; and then ſet him to inſinuate himſelf into ſir Edmundbury Godfrey's acquaintance, which he did under ſeveral pretences. That on the very day of the murder, le Phaire told him, there was a gentleman to be put out of the way that night, and would have him to aſſiſt, and that there would be four thouſand pounds reward from the lord Bellaſis, &c. and therefore deſired him to meet in the cloyſter at Somerſet-houſe that evening, for thereabouts it was to be done; which he promiſed to do, but wilfully failed them, becauſe he would not have his hands in blood. On the Monday after, le Phaire meeting him, charged him with breach of promiſe, and appointed him to come to Somerſet-houſe at nine that night, where he told the witneſs, That he had done ill, that he did not help in the buſineſs; but if he would help to carry him off, he ſhould ſtill have half the reward; and told him he was actually murdered. The witneſs aſked, if he might ſee him; upon which le Phaire led him through a dark entry, into a room where were ſeveral people, and Prance amongſt them, and only by the light of a dark lanthorn he ſaw the face of the murdered perſon, and knew him to be ſir Edmundbury Godfrey. The witneſs adviſed to tie weights about him, and throw him into the Thames; but they did not approve of that, but ſaid, they would put it upon himſelf, and carry him out in a chair, by the help of the porter Berry, at twelve that night. The witneſs promiſed, upon the ſacrament, which he had taken the Thurſday before, to come again and help them; but being got from them, his conſcience would not permit him to go any farther, though he had been promiſed two thouſand pounds for his labour, but he rather choſe to diſco-

[c] To this Richardſon, keeper of Newgate, anſwered, "That Prance had told him, it was fear that made him recant; and he [Prance] gave a full ſatisfaction, that it was only out of an apprehenſion that his life was not ſecure; that his trade would be loſt among the Roman catholics; and in caſe he had his pardon, and was ſaved, he ſhould have been in danger of being murdered by them." He ſaid himſelf afterwards, that it was for fear of loſing his employment from the queen, and the catholics, which was the moſt of his buſineſs, and becauſe he had not his pardon. State trials, tom. II. p. 765, 780.

ver the villany to the king and council, and accept of a quarter of the ſum in an honeſt way."

What appears moſt ſtrange in this depoſition, is not its contrariety to the firſt, in which he only ſpoke by hearſay; but that Bedloe did not relate theſe circumſtances to the lords, having only ſaid, that he had ſeen Godfrey's body in Somerſet-houſe, and Prance in the ſame room.

The conſtable that viewed the body in the ditch, gave an account, "That the ſword was ſticking through him, but no blood appeared upon the ground, and he found gold and ſilver in his pockets." Two ſurgeons ſwore, "that they verily believed the ſword was run through him after he was dead and cold: but that he died by reaſon of the ſuffocation, and breaking of his neck, and bruiſes on his breaſt."

Sir Robert Southwell depoſed, "That Prance having related the matter to the council; and being ſent with the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Oſſory to ſhew the places he mentioned, did readily go to them all, and they appeared all to be ſuch as he had deſcribed them; only as to the room in the upper court, where the body was laid one night, having never been there but once, he ſaid he could not poſitively aſſign it, but pointing to ſome rooms, and ſaid, he was ſure it was thereabouts."

As to the priſoners defence, Hill brought ſeveral witneſſes to prove, "That he never was out of his lodgings after eight o'clock at night, during the whole time of this tranſaction."

Some have pretended, that theſe depoſitions were not regarded, becauſe the witneſſes were papiſts. But no ſuch thing is ſaid in the printed trial, and it is difficult to know the thoughts of the jury, who were the ſole judges of theſe evidences.

Beſides, Hill ſhewed, "That when he heard of Prance's being taken up for the murder, he had full leiſure to make his eſcape, which he never endeavouring, was a great preſumption of his innocence." It is to be preſumed, the jury took but little notice of this proof.

Green proved by two witneſſes, James Warrier and his wife, "That he was at their houſe in the Strand from between ſeven and eight till after ten, on that very night and time that ſir Edmundbury Godfrey was ſaid to be murdered in Somerſet-houſe." But unhappily, Warrier willing to corroborate his evidence, added, "That Green's being apprehended a month after the murder of Godfrey, recalled to his mind, that the ſaid Green had been with him on Saturday the 12th of October, from eight to ten in the evening." But, beſides that Green was not arreſted till the 24th of December, that is to ſay, two months and twelve days after Godfrey's murder, he was not taken up for this murder, but for refuſing the oaths, which could not cauſe Warrier to remember, that Green had been with him the day Godfrey was murdered. Green added, "That when Prance was taken up, he ſhewed ſuch a deteſtation of the fact, that he ſaid, Rather than he ſhould eſcape, if he were guilty, he would be the executioner himſelf." In all likelihood, this proof appeared not very material to the jury. In behalf of Berry the porter, the ſoldiers that were placed centinels at the gate, teſtified, "That no ſedan went out of the gate that night that the body was ſaid to be carried off, though one did come in, and that they could not be miſtaken in ſo plain a matter." And Berry's maid declared, "That her maſter was in bed by twelve o'clock that night, and never ſtirred out, which made it impoſſible for him to be upon the whole expedition."

They all endeavoured likewiſe to invalidate Prance's evidence; but the court obſerved, "That it was impoſſible that Mr. Prance, a man of that mean capacity, ſhould invent a ſtory with ſo many conſiſting circumſtances, if there was no truth in the bottom of it:" but adds the hiſtorian whom I have often quoted, others obſerved, "That the ſtory was invented by ſomebody elſe of a greater capacity." This inſinuation is ſupported only upon his ſyſtem. But beſides, had the penner of this narrative been ſo able as is ſuppoſed, it would not have been difficult to give it a perfect agreement with Bedloe's firſt depoſition, whereas it was different in many reſpects. For when a man is only to invent, and has falſe witneſſes ready to ſupport the invention, he need not be much puzzled about the facts.

In concluſion, the jury brought them all in guilty of the murder. Whereupon, the lord chief juſtice Scroggs ſaid, "They had found the ſame verdict that he would have found, if he had been one with them."

They all three inſiſted upon their innocence to the laſt moment of their lives. Berry owned, "That he was a proteſtant in his heart, but had for ſome time diſſembled his religion for his private advantage."

Hill, to perſuade the ordinary of Newgate of his innocence, gave him this notable proof of it; "That he had wronged one in a twelve-penny matter, which had ſo troubled his conſcience, that he had made reſtitution ſince his condemnation, though he was in extreme want of preſent neceſſaries:" and therefore he thus argued with him, "If I have taken ſhame upon myſelf, in confeſſing my crime in the caſe of a trifle; can you think I would deny the murder to maintain my reputation?"

Green and Hill were executed the 21ſt of February; but Berry was reprieved till the 28th of May.

The time for the meeting of the parliament drawing near, the king, after examining the elections, foreſaw a ſtorm gathering againſt the duke of York. Wherefore, to prevent it, and perſuade the new parliament that his counſels were not influenced by his brother, he reſolved to ſend him away[d], and for that purpoſe, the 28th of February, writ him the following letter:

"I have already given you my reſolves at large, why I think it fit that you ſhould abſent yourſelf for ſome time beyond the ſeas: as I am truly ſorry for the occaſion, ſo may you be ſure, I ſhall never deſire it longer than it will be abſolutely neceſſary for your good, and my ſervice. In the mean time, I think it proper to give it you under my hand, That I expect this compliance from you, and deſire it may be as ſoon as conveniently you can. You may eaſily believe with what trouble I write; there being nothing I am more ſenſible of, than the conſtant kindneſs you have ever had for me. I hope you are as juſt to me, to be aſſured, that no abſence, nor any thing elſe, can ever change me from being truly and kindly yours,"

C. R.

The duke immediately obeyed, and the 3d of March departed for Holland, with his ducheſs, and the princeſs Anne his daughter, from whence he went and reſided at Bruſſels.

Mean time, the king fearing that the new parliament would impeach the earl of Danby, and that the earl, in prevention of his own danger, would be obliged to reveal ſecrets, which he wiſhed to be concealed, granted him, under the great ſeal, as full and compleat a pardon as could be drawn.

The new parliament meeting the 6th of March, the king made a ſpeech, tending to ſhew how well affected he was to the laws of the land, and the proteſtant religion. He ſpoke of his care in puniſhing, as well thoſe concerned in the plot, as the murderers of ſir Edmunbury Godfrey, and forgot not to mention the removal of the duke of York. Laſtly, he demanded money for diſbanding the army, and for paying the fleet. The chancellor enlarged upon all theſe points with great exaggerations, according to his cuſtom.

The parliament began with a warm diſpute between the king and the commons, about the choice of a ſpeaker. The commons having choſen Mr. Edward Seymour[e], the king, who knew Seymour was a particular enemy of the earl of Danby, refuſed his approbation, and ordered the commons to proceed to a new choice. The houſe was extremely diſpleaſed with the refuſal, alledging, "That it was never known that a perſon ſhould be excepted againſt, and no reaſon at all given, and that the the thing itſelf, of preſenting a ſpeaker to the king, was but a bare compliment." The king, on his ſide, inſiſted on his approbation or refuſal of a ſpeaker when preſented to him, as a branch of his prerogative[f]. During a ſix days diſpute, the commons made ſeveral repreſentations to the king, to which he gave very ſhort anſwers. At laſt, as the commons would not deſiſt from what they thought their right, the king went to the parliament, and prorogued it from the 13th to the 15th; that is, for one day's interval between the two ſeſſions. The parliament meeting the 15th, the king ordered the commons to proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker. Then to avoid a revival of the diſpute, they choſe Mr. William Gregory ſerjeant at law, who was approved by the king[g].

The commons began with appointing a committee to examine controverted elections, threeſcore petitions having been already preſented.

The

This affair being put into a way of determination, the commons appeared reſolved to purſue the matters which the late parliament had left undecided. For this purpoſe, the 20th of March they appointed a ſecret committee, to take informations, prepare evidence, and draw up articles againſt the lords that were impeached, and to take ſuch further informations as ſhall be given, relating to the plot againſt his majeſty and the government, and the murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey. At the ſame time they deſired the lords, by an expreſs meſſage, to remember the impeachment of high treaſon exhibited againſt Thomas earl of Danby, in the name of the commons of England, and to commit him to ſafe cuſtody. They reſolved alſo, that it ſhould be referred to the committee of ſecrecy, to draw up further articles againſt him. The earl of Danby was greatly embarraſſed; for he could not make his defence, without producing the letters writ by his majeſty's particular order, and other papers which the king was willing to conceal. Wherefore he reſolved to adhere to the benefit of his pardon.

The next day, the 21ſt of March, Dr. Tonge, Oates, Bedloe, and a Scotchman, one Edmund Everard, a new diſcoverer, were called before the commons, to give in their informations concerning the plot. Bedloe having delivered in his information, the houſe reſolved, "That an humble addreſs be made to his majeſty, that the five hundred pounds promiſed by his proclamation for the diſcovery of the murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, may be paid to Mr. Bedloe, and that he would further be pleaſed to order, that the twenty pounds reward for the diſcovery of every prieſt, may be effectually paid to the diſcoverers."

By another addreſs, they deſired, "That the care of Mr. Bedloe's ſafety might be recommended to the duke of Monmouth." The king anſwered, "That he would take immediate care for the payment of the five hundred pounds, and the twenty pounds they deſired: that he had hitherto taken all the care he could of Mr. Bedloe: that he knew how conſiderable his evidence was: that he would ſee hereafter, that he ſhould want for nothing, but that he could not be anſwerable for him when he went abroad."

Upon the whole, the commons came to a vote ſomething like that in the laſt parliament, namely, "That the houſe doth declare, that they are fully ſatisfied that there now is, and for divers years laſt paſt hath been, a horrid and treaſonable plot and conſpiracy, contrived and carried on by thoſe of the popiſh religion, for the murdering his majeſty's ſacred perſon, and for ſubverting the proteſtant religion, and the antient and well-eſtabliſhed government of this kingdom." The lords concurred to this vote without heſitation, as alſo to an addreſs to be preſented jointly by both houſes to the king, to pray him to appoint a ſolemn day of humiliation and faſting throughout the whole kingdom. The king granted their requeſt, and the 11th of April was appointed to be kept as a public faſt day.

The 22d of March, the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to ſecure the king and kingdom againſt the danger and growth of popery.

The ſame day the king going to the parliament, ſpoke to both houſes in favour of the earl of Danby. But the commons, unmoved with this ſpeech, were no ſooner returned to their houſe, than they ſent a meſſage to the lords, to demand that the earl might be forthwith committed to ſafe cuſtody. The lords ſeeing the paſſion of the commons, offered them in a conference, the draught of a bill, by which the earl of Danby ſhould be for ever incapable of coming to his majeſty's preſence, and of all offices and employments, and of receiving any gifts or grants from the crown, and of ſitting in the houſe of peers. But the commons were not ſatisfied with ſuch a bill, probably, for two reaſons. The firſt was, that the earl of Danby had implacable enemies among the leading commons. The ſecond, that purpoſing to diſcover the king's ſecrets, by a ſtrict examination of the earl of Danby's affairs, they ſaw that this bill was only an artifice, to conceal what they wiſhed to know and divulge.

Mean time, the commons hearing that the king had ſigned a pardon for the earl of Danby, appointed a committee to repair to the chancellor, and enquire how this pardon was ſealed, and at whoſe ſuit. The chancellor anſwered, "That it was done very privately, the king having ordered him to bring the ſeal into his cloſet, and lay it upon the table; that his majeſty commanded the ſeal to be taken out of the bag, and ordered the perſon who uſually carried the purſe, to affix it to the pardon." The chancellor added in his juſtification, "That at the very time of affixing the ſeal to the parchment, he did not look upon himſelf to have the cuſtody of the ſeal: that the pardon was paſſed with the utmoſt privacy, at the deſire of the earl, who gave this reaſon for it, that he did not intend to make uſe of it, but to ſtand upon his innocence, except falſe witneſſes ſhould be produced againſt him; and then he would make uſe of it at the laſt extremity: that notwithſtanding this reaſon, he adviſed the earl to let the pardon paſs in the regular courſe; but after conſulting with the king, his majeſty declared, he was reſolved to let it paſs with all privacy.[h]"

The houſe, upon hearing this report, were inflamed againſt the earl, and one of the members[i], naming the earl of Danby, proceeded thus:

"———The perſon to whom we owe the dangers and fears of the French king againſt us; the perſon to whom we owe the threats and ſevere anſwers to thoſe humble addreſſes we made the laſt ſeſſion of parliament: the perſon to whom we owe the ruin of this nation, and exhauſting the king's revenue: the perſon to whom we owe the expence of two hundred thouſand pounds a year, unaccounted for: the perſon to whom we owe the raiſing of a ſtanding army, to be kept up by the receipt of ſix millions of livres yearly, for three years, to enſlave us, and our religion: the perſon to whom we owe the late bone that was thrown in on the fitting of the laſt parliament, to hinder the good iſſue that might have come by their proceedings; who is now laying down his ſtaff, and making up his accounts in the treaſury, as he pleaſes, to enrich himſelf out of the ſpoils of the people, and ſo depart."

I have often ſaid, that the people in general were perſuaded, not only of the reality of the plot, at leaſt with regard to the government and religion, but that even the king and the duke of York were the true authors of it. This ſpeech plainly ſhews, it was at leaſt the opinion of the ſpeaker, and when a member of the commons advances ſuch propoſitions, without a reprimand, one may be ſure he ſpeaks the general ſenſe of the houſe. Beſides, the removal of the duke of York was a demonſtration, that the king was not ignorant of his being ſuſpected to ſubmit too much to the counſels of his brother. It is therefore hard to conceive, why ſo many ſenſible men obſtinately labour to ſhew, there was no real plot, becauſe the article concerning the deſign of killing the king, may be doubtful. For, the truth of the two other branches, concerning the government and religion, flows from ſo many circumſtances, that one muſt be wilfully blind not to ſee it. Perhaps the word plot offends ſome perſons, who cannot comprehend how a king can plot againſt his ſubjects. But if this is all, there is a way to be ſoon agreed. Inſtead of ſaying there was a plot to ſubvert the government, and the proteſtant religion, let it be ſaid, there was a project or deſign on foot, headed by the king and the duke of York, to render the king abſolute, and introduce popery. But this is preciſely what is meant by the plot. For the deſign of killing the king was only an appendix to the plot, ſuppoſing it real, and an effect of the furious zeal of ſome private perſons, who thought to accompliſh the plot better by placing the duke of York on the throne.

[1679] I ſhall not inſert here the earl of Shaftſbury's ſpeech in the houſe of lords, becauſe ſo much pains has been taken to repreſent him as the great enemy of the king, and the firſt mover of the whole party, that whatever came from him muſt be ſuſpected. I ſhall produce, however, one paſſage of this ſpeech: "Popery, ſays he, and ſlavery, like two ſiſters, go hand in hand; ſometimes one goes firſt, ſometimes the other; but whereſoever the one enters, the other is always following cloſe at hand. In England, popery was to have brought in ſlavery; in Scotland, ſlavery went before, and popery was to follow." Thus much is certain, that his obſervation on the ſlavery of Scotland was exactly true, and that the duke of Lauderdale, ſupported by the court, exerciſed among the Scots a tyranny unknown to their forefathers. What therefore could the Engliſh imagine, when they ſaw a neighbouring kingdom, inveſted with no leſs privileges than England, governed in ſo abſolute a manner, under the ſame king and the ſame miniſtry? Could they expect that the ſame principles would not be followed in England, if it could be done with the ſame eaſe?

[h] The king, in his ſpeech for the earl, ſaid, he had done nothing but by his order, and therefore he had pardoned him; and if there was any defect in his pardon, he would paſs it over and over again, until it ſhould be legal. Upon this a great debate was raiſed; ſome queſtioned whether the king's pardon, eſpecially when paſſed in bar to an impeachment, was good in law: this would encourage ill miniſters, who would be always ſure of a pardon. The king's pardon did indeed ſecure one againſt all proſecution at his ſuit; but as in caſe of murder an appeal lay, from which the king's pardon did not cover the perſon, ſince the king could no more pardon the injuries done his people, than he could forgive the debts that were owing to them; ſo from a parity of reaſon it was inferred, that ſince the offences of miniſters of ſtate were injuries done the public, the king's pardon could not hinder a proſecution of parliament, which ſeemed to be one of the chief ſecurities, and moſt eſſential parts of our conſtitution.——When the bill of baniſhment, which paſſed in the houſe of lords, was ſent down to the commons, Winnington fell on it in a moſt furious manner, and inflamed the houſe ſo, that though it was offered that the earl ſhould be degraded of his peerage as well as baniſhed, and that no pardon for the future ſhould be pleaded in bar to an impeachment, the bill was thrown out by the commons, and a bill of attainder brought in, as will be ſeen hereafter. Burnet, p. 453.

[i] Mr. Powle, afterwards one of the new council.

The ſame day, the lords ſent a meſſage to acquaint the houſe of commons, that the earl of Danby had withdrawn, and could not be found. Whereupon the commons ordered, "That a bill be brought in to ſummon Thomas earl of Danby, to render himſelf to juſtice by a day to be therein limited, or in default thereof, to attaint him." The 3d of April, articles of Impeachment againſt the five lords in the Tower were drawn up by the commons, and carried to the houſe of lords, as well as the bill to fix a day for the earl of Danby to render himſelf to juſtice. The lords having ſent back this laſt bill with ſome amendments, the commons were diſſatisfied, becauſe the lords were not of opinion, in caſe the earl refuſed to ſurrender himſelf, to proceed againſt him by bill of attainder, but to content themſelves with inflicting other penalties. The two houſes had ſeveral conferences upon this ſubject, in which the commons continued immoveable, without any diminution of their rigour againſt the earl. At laſt the lords paſſed the bill, and appointed the 23d of April for the earl's ſurrendering himſelf to trial. The earl ſeeing that his abſence could not hinder the bill of attainder from paſſing againſt him, reſolved at laſt to ſurrender himſelf to the uſher of the black rod, and the ſame day he was ſent to the Tower. The king then found himſelf involved in greater difficulties than he had ever ſtruggled with before, as he ſaw, the earl of Danby could not make his defence without divulging his ſecrets.

If the king would have altered his maxims and principles, he might have been eaſily freed from theſe troubles. He had only to break his union with France, diſmiſs thoſe of his miniſters who were unacceptable to the parliament, and act with ſincerity for the intereſt of the kingdom, and of the proteſtant religion, abandoning all the projects he had hitherto formed. But he could not reſolve to make this ſacrifice, both becauſe he believed his honour concerned, and his deſign was only to gain time, and amuſe the parliament. It was with this view, that by the advice of ſir William Temple, he reſolved to eſtabliſh a new council, into which were admitted ſome lords moſt oppoſite to him, as the earls of Shaftſbury and Eſſex. This council conſiſted of thirty members[k], fifteen of whom were ever to be the preſent chief officers of his crown and houſhold. Ten were to be taken out of the nobility, and five out of the commons. But he took care in this model of his council, to have a majority of ſuch as were devoted to him. The earl of Shaftſbury was made preſident of this council, though no man was more hated by the king. His aim was to perſuade the public and the parliament, that he was reſolved entirely to change his manner of governing, and be guided in all affairs whatſoever, by the advice of the new council. But this was only to amuſe the public. For as it was not poſſible for the king to depart from his principles, concerning religion or government, ſo moſt of his new councillors were not for ſacrificing the royal authority to the will of the parliament. The earl of Shaftſbury would have been extremely pleaſed with being preſident of the council, if his authority had been proportionable to his office. But he quickly perceived, he was there only for ſhow: and to be ſubſervient to the king's deſigns, whilſt others had his confidence. There were chiefly four who had the direction of affairs committed to them, namely, the earls of Sunderland and Eſſex, the lord Hallifax, and ſir William Temple. Theſe digeſted and prepared what was to be propoſed to the council or the parliament.

The king had no ſooner made this alteration, than he came to the parliament to acquaint them with it. But though the city of London, and the reſt of the kingdom reſounded with joyful acclamations, and were perſuaded that things were going to change for the better, the houſe of commons received the news with great coldneſs. They had not ſufficient confidence in the king, to believe he really intended to govern otherwiſe than he had hitherto done, but thought this was ſome new artifice, which would ſoon produce its effects. So, by this change the king gained not much ground in the houſe of commons. I am ſenſible, the diſtruſt of the commons is aſcribed to Shaftſbury's intrigues, and ſir William Temple even inſinuates it in ſeveral places. But it is not eaſy to comprehend how a ſingle man ſhould have had credit enough in the country party, to direct them as he pleaſed, if that party had not otherwiſe known what Shaftſbury laboured to make them believe. For inſtance, this earl inſinuated that the nation could not be ſecured againſt the duke of York, and that when he ſhould once poſſeſs the crown, all proviſions againſt him would vaniſh. Was he in the wrong? And was there need of ſo great a credit to convince the country party of a thing they were but too well convinced of before? It is therefore a mere artifice ſolely to impute the animoſity of the commons to the earl of Shaftſbury, as if it had no other foundation than his credit and intrigues, in order to remove thereby the juſt and real occaſions of complaint againſt the king's government. The meaſures purſued by the court in the foregoing years, both againſt the eſtabliſhed government and religion had been ſeen. What had the king done to cauſe them to be forgot? He had iſſued out proclamations againſt the papiſts, but they were ſo ill executed, that they were not apt to inſpire the parliament with confidence. The king, under colour that he might be engaged in a war againſt France, had levied thirty thouſand men, and at the ſame time was negotiating a yearly penſion with that crown of ſix millions of livres for their maintenance, as plainly appeared from the letters in parliament. What had the king done to remove the fears occaſioned by this army? He had applied to their maintenance the money granted by the parliament for their diſbanding, and if he had conſented to their being diſmiſſed, it was becauſe he applied to another uſe the money received from France. In ſhort, was it poſſible to forget the tranſactions of the cabal, the king's indolence with regard to the intereſts of England and of all Europe, the frequent prorogations of parliament at critical times, when vigorous reſolutions were taking againſt France grown too powerful; his deſign, in conjunction with that crown, of utterly deſtroying the common-wealth of Holland; a deſign ſo directly oppoſite to the intereſts of England? Could it not be ſeen, that the king was without ligitimate children, and the duke of York his brother and preſumptive heir, not only a papiſt, but alſo a bigot to his religion? Could the tranſactions in Scotland be concealed, where arbitrary power was compleatly eſtabliſhed? I do but juſt mention ſome of the principal points, for it would be too tedious to relate all the cauſes of the nation's ſuſpicions and fears. After this, how is it poſſible to believe that Shaftſbury's intrigues and artifices were the ſole cauſe of the commons diſtruſt? I do not doubt that he contributed to them, and that being ſo well informed, as he was, of the king's ſecret deſigns, he opened the eyes of many people who perhaps would have been deceived by the artifices of the court. But this is not what is meant by aſcribing the people's fears and jealouſies to the intrigues of this earl. That he was actuated by a ſpirit of revenge, is no concern of mine, but the event too plainly ſhewed, how agreeable were his advices to the intereſt of the kingdom.

While the alterations the new council was to bring in the affairs of the government, were impatiently expected, the commons were ſuddenly alarmed by an information of a freſh deſign of the papiſts to burn London a ſecond time. The houſe of one Bird in Fetter-lane being ſet on fire, his ſervant, Elizabeth Oxley, was ſuſpected of firing it on purpoſe, and ſent to priſon. She confeſſed the fact, and declared, ſhe had been employed to do it by one Stubbs a papiſt, who had promiſed her five pounds. Stubbs being taken up confeſſed, he perſuaded her to it, and that father Gifford, his confeſſor put him upon it, telling him, "it was no ſin to burn all the houſes of heretics." He added, that he had frequent conferences on the affair with Gifford and two Iriſhmen. Moreover, Stubbs and the maid ſervant declared, the papiſts were to make an inſurrection, and expected an army of ſixty thouſand men from France. The commons obtained a pardon for Stubbs and the ſervant, in conſideration of their ready confeſſion. But it was generally inferred from this incident, that it was not Gifford's fault that the city of London was not burnt as in the year 1666.

This accident produced an addreſs from the commons to the king, for the execution of Pickering the jeſuit, and the other condemned prieſts.

But the commons ſtopped not there. The ſame day they reſolved to ſit on the morrow, though Sunday, to conſider of means for the preſervation of the king's perſon, and the proteſtant religion, againſt the attempts of the papiſts, both in the reign of the preſent king, and his ſucceſſors. Accordingly the next morning they firſt ordered a bill to be brought in to baniſh all papiſts, or reputed papiſts, within London and Weſtminſter, twenty miles from the ſame, for ſix months; and then they voted, nemine contradicente, "That the duke of York being a papiſt, the hopes of his coming ſuch to the crown, has given the greateſt countenance and encouragement to the preſent conſpiracies and deſigns of the papiſts againſt the king and the proteſtant religion." This vote was ſent to the lords for their concurrence[1].

The 25th of April the earl of Danby appeared at the bar of the houſe of lords, and there produced the king's pardon for all crimes and offences whatſoever committed before the 28th day of February laſt. After which he was ſent back to the Tower. The lords having given notice of this to the commons, they appointed a committee of ſecreſy to examine the nature of the earl's plea, who made their report, "That there was no precedent, of a pardon granted to any perſon impeached by the commons of high treaſon, or other high crimes depending in the impeachment." After this report, the commons deſired the lords to demand of the earl of Danby, "Whether he would rely upon, and abide by the plea of his pardon." This was the next day, and the earl praying time to anſwer, the lords allowed him four days.

The ſame day, the king returned this anſwer to the commons addreſs for the execution of Pickering and other prieſts: "Gentlemen, I have always been tender in matters of blood, which my ſubjects have no reaſon to take exception at: but this is a matter of great weight, I ſhall therefore conſider of it, and return you an anſwer."

The vote of the commons concerning the duke of York touched the king very ſenſibly, for he ſaw, they did not intend to ſtop there. He therefore went to the parliament the 30th of April, and in a ſhort ſpeech recommended to both houſes the diſpatch of three affairs: 1. The proſecution of the plot. 2. The diſbanding of the army. 3. The providing a fleet for the common ſecurity. Then to give them a proof of his care to preſerve their religion for the future, he told them, "That he had commanded his chancellor to mention ſeveral particulars, which he hoped would be an evidence, that in all things that concerned the public ſecurity, he ſhould not follow their zeal but lead it."

Accordingly, the chancellor made the following ſpeech.

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

"THAT royal care which his majeſty hath taken for the general quiet and ſatisfaction of all his ſubjects, is now more evident by theſe new and freſh inſtances of it, which I have in command to open to you. His majeſty hath conſidered with himſelf, that it is not enough that your religion and liberty is ſecure during his own reign, but he thinks he owes it to his people to do all that in him lies, that theſe bleſſings may be tranſmitted to your poſterity, and ſo well ſecured to them, that no ſucceſſion in after ages may be able to work the leaſt alteration. And therefore his majeſty, who hath often ſaid in this place, That he is ready to conſent to any laws of this kind, ſo as the ſame extend not to alter the deſcent of the crown in the right line, nor to defeat the ſucceſſion, hath now commanded this to be further explained.

"And to the end it may never be in the power of any papiſt, if the crown deſcend upon him, to make any change either in church or ſtate; I am commanded to tell you, That his majeſty is willing, that proviſion may be made, firſt to diſtinguiſh a popiſh from a proteſtant ſucceſſor; then ſo to limit and circumſcribe the authority of a popiſh ſucceſſor, in theſe caſes following, that he may be diſabled to do any harm: Firſt, in reference to the church; his majeſty is content that care be taken, that all eccleſiaſtical and ſpiritual benefices and promotions in gift of the crown, may be conferred in ſuch a manner, that we may be ſure the incumbents ſhall always be of the moſt pious and learned proteſtants: and that no popiſh ſucceſſor, while he continues ſo, may have any power to controul ſuch preſentments. In reference to the ſtate, and civil part of the government, as it is already provided, That no papiſt can ſit in either houſe of parliament; ſo the king is pleaſed that it be provided too, that there may never want a parliament, when the king ſhall happen to die, but that the parliament then in being may continue indiſſolvable for a competent time; or if there be no parliament in being, then the laſt parliament which was in being before that time, may re-aſſemble and ſit a competent time, without any new ſummons, or elections. And as no papiſt can by law hold any place of truſt, ſo the king is content that it may be further provided, That no lords or others of the privy council, no judges of the common law, or in chancery, ſhall at any time, during the reign of any popiſh ſucceſſor, be put in or diſplaced, but by the authority of parliament: and that care alſo be taken, that none but ſincere proteſtants may be juſtices of the peace. In reference to the military part, the king is willing, that no lord lieutenant, or deputy lieutenant, nor no officer in the navy, during the reign of any popiſh ſucceſſor, be put in, or removed, but either by authority of parliament, or of ſuch perſons as the parliament ſhall intruſt with ſuch authority.

"It is hard to invent another reſtraint to be put upon a popiſh ſucceſſor, conſidering how much the revenue of the ſucceſſor will depend upon conſent of parliament, and how impoſſible it is to raiſe money without ſuch conſent. But yet, if any thing elſe can occur to the wiſdom of the parliament, which may further ſecure religion and liberty againſt a popiſh ſucceſſor, without defeating the right of ſucceſſion itſelf, his majeſty will moſt readily conſent to it. Thus watchful is the king for all your ſafeties; and if he could think of any thing elſe, that you do either want or wiſh to make you happy, he would make it his buſineſs to effect it for you. God Almighty long continue this bleſſed union between the king, and his parliament, and people."

Theſe propoſals were not received by the houſe of commons with that applauſe, the king had expected. The commons diſtruſt was too great for their fears and ſuſpicions to be removed by ſuch offers. Though ſome authors call this an infatuation in the houſe of commons, I think myſelf obliged to remark, that the king offered indeed his conſent to acts of parliament, but ſuggeſted no means to ſecure the execution. It was an artifice of the court of England, begun in the reign of James I. and continued under Charles I. and II. to repreſent the laws as the impregnable bulwark of the nation's liberties. And yet theſe three kings had, on ſeveral occaſions, tranſgreſſed them. I ſhall give here ſome inſtances, to which many more might be added. Were the laws enacted for the preſervation of religion under James I. punctually executed? Of what benefit could laws made for the ſecurity of their liberties be to the ſubjects, ſince James I. laid down for principle, that though, in conſcience and honour, the king ought to govern his ſubjects with equity, he might nevertheleſs by the extent of his power, govern in an abſolute manner, without any controul? Did the petition of right reſtrain Charles I. from levying ſhip money? Did the laws hinder the ſame king from governing twelve years without a parliament, and from raiſing money in that interval by an abſolute authority? Had Charles II. been more ſcrupulous? Was it in virtue of the laws that he ſhut up the exchequer, and ſeized the money there without the conſent of the proprietors? Was it for the better execution of the laws, which ſeem to ſecure the liberties of the ſubject, that he received annually from France a penſion of ſix millions of livres? Of what uſe therefore are laws, the execution whereof no human power can warrant, when the intereſts of the prince and people are diametrically oppoſite, which could not fail to happen in the reign of a popiſh ſucceſſor? This ſuffices to demonſtrate, that the king's offer of his aſſent to the acts he propoſed, was incapable of diſpelling the fears of the people, becauſe not only no expedient was propoſed to ſecure the execution, but it was not even in his power to give any ſecurity. But it will be aſked, what other expedient was there for ſecuring the religion and liberties of the nation, conſiſtent with the right of ſucceſſion? I confeſs there was none, and affirm withal, that thoſe offered by the king were inſufficient. But to whom was this impoſſibility owing? To the duke of York alone, who had openly declared himſelf a papiſt, and from that time inceſſantly excited both England and France to promote the intereſts of his religion, as the letters of his ſecretary Coleman manifeſtly ſhew. To enable the reader to judge of this matter, being the moſt material of this reign, I ſhall here propoſe ſome queſtions which are neceſſary to be decided before he can determine in favour of the king or parliament.

Queſtion the firſt. Whether there was any danger to England in admitting a popiſh ſucceſſor?

This the king himſelf did not deny, ſince he propoſed expedients to prevent the danger?

[1] By William lord Ruſſel, for which he paid dearly afterwards.

Par-

Second queſtion, Whether the expedients propoſed by the king, were capable of preventing the danger?

This is what no perſon can either poſitively affirm or deny. For if, on one hand, it may be ſuppoſed, that a popiſh ſucceſſor would have ſincerely complied with the acts propoſed by the king, it may, on the other hand, with equal juſtice be ſuppoſed, that the duke of York, the immediate ſucceſſor, conſidering his principles, his humour, his temper, his zeal for his religion, would never have patiently ſuffered himſelf to be reſtrained by theſe acts of parliament. But this was a contingency which God alone could foreknow.

Third queſtion. The commons not believing the expedients offered by the king ſufficient to prevent the danger, and the king believing the contrary, who was to yield, the king, or the people repreſented by the commons?

This is what I ſhall not pretend to decide.

Fourth queſtion. Which evil was greateſt, that of breaking the lineal ſucceſſion in the excluſion of the duke of York, or that of expoſing the eſtabliſhed religion to ruin?

This queſtion ſuppoſes, that the kings of England ſucceed by a right purely hereditary. But this ſuppoſition is greatly conteſted. It may at leaſt be affirmed, that ſeveral parliaments have decided the contrary [m]. As to the queſtion in itſelf, it may at leaſt be averred, that in France, in a parallel caſe, upon the death of Henry III. the intereſts of the catholic religion were, without heſitation, preferred to thoſe of Henry IV. who was a proteſtant, and the next heir: but many pretended, that as the French did ill, ſo the Engliſh parliament was to blame to imitate them.

Fifth queſtion. The two evils, namely the breach in the ſucceſſion, and the expoſing of the proteſtant religion, being ſuppoſed perfectly equal, which was to ſuffer the rights of the duke, or the religion of the nation?

Some pretend, that the right of ſucceſſion is not to be violated upon any conſideration, and that the intereſts of religion extend not ſo far as to authoriſe ſuch a violation. Others on the contrary maintain, That when things were reduced to ſuch a ſtate, that the duke or the people muſt ſuffer, the duke ought to be the ſufferer, ſince it was he who had brought matters to that ſtate.

The reader ought to determine theſe queſtions, before he gives a definitive ſentence upon this affair.

The day after the king's and the chancellor's ſpeeches to both houſes, the commons, without taking any great notice of his majeſty's propoſals about the ſucceſſion, proceeded on the bill for preventing the dangers ariſing from popery, as well in his reign, as his ſucceſſor's.

They alſo read the firſt time a bill, "for better prevention of illegal exaction of money from the ſubject," and ordered another to be brought in, "That when any member of the houſe was preferred to any office or place of profit, a new writ ſhould immediately iſſue out for electing a member to ſerve in his ſtead."

The 5th of May they reſolved, "That the pardon pleaded by the earl of Danby was illegal and void," and the ſpeaker, with the whole houſe, went up to the lords bar, and demanded judgment againſt him.

Shortly after they drew up an addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, in the ſtrongeſt terms that could be uſed, which was carried in a full body to the king. But it ſeems the king could not then part with this miniſter, the laſt of the cabal, and therefore he coldly anſwered, "That he would conſider of it, and return an anſwer."

In the mean time, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons by the lord Ruſſel, who acquainted the houſe, "That his majeſty commanded him to let the houſe know, that he was willing to comply with their requeſt concerning Pickering, and that the law ſhould paſs upon him accordingly: that as to the condemned prieſts, the houſe of peers had ſent for them, in order, as his majeſty conceived, to ſome examinations. That he repeated his inſtances to them for putting the fleet in a good poſture, for diſpatching the diſcovery of the plot, the trial of the lords, and the bill for the ſecurity of religion."

After this meſſage, the commons finiſhed the money bill for diſbanding the army, which the king paſſed the 9th of May. By this act a ſupply was granted to the king of two hundred and ſix thouſand, four hundred ſixty-two pounds, ſeventeen ſhillings and threepence, for paying off and diſbanding the forces raiſed ſince the 29th of September 1677. The act had a clauſe in it, that for the future, "ſoldiers ſhould not be quartered in any perſon's houſe againſt their conſent."

At the ſame time the lords informed the commons, that the earl of Danby reſolved to adhere to the plea of his pardon; and that the commons having demanded judgment againſt him, as conceiving his pardon illegal and null, the tenth inſtant was appointed for hearing the earl of Danby to make good his plea. The lords likewiſe acquainted the commons, that they had reſolved, the five lords in the Tower ſhould be brought to their trials the 14th inſtant.

The part of the meſſage concerning the earl of Danby ſo offended the commons, that they reſolved, "That no commoner whatſoever ſhould preſume to maintain the validity of the pardon pleaded by the earl of Danby, without the conſent of the houſe firſt had, and that the perſons ſo doing, ſhould be accounted betrayers of the liberties of the commons of England." This vote was poſted up in ſeveral places, that no perſon might be ignorant of it. The true reaſon of theſe proceedings was, that by the examination of the ſeveral articles of the earl's impeachment, the commons hoped to diſcover the king's ſecret practices with the court of France; whereas the king by his pardon had put the affair in ſuch a ſtate, that there would have been no occaſion to examine the earl of Danby's anſwers to the articles exhibited againſt him.

The vote of the commons much inflamed the differences that were already begun between the two houſes, about the manner of proceeding againſt the five lords in the Tower. For the lords had addreſſed the king to appoint a lord high ſteward to preſide in the trials; but the commons, thinking it unneceſſary, propoſed, "That a committee of both houſes might be nominated to conſider of the moſt proper ways and methods of proceeding upon impeachments." And this is what the lords refuſed, which occaſioned a warm diſpute; but at laſt the lords agreed to the nomination of the committee.

The ſame day the lords communicated to the houſe of commons a petition from the earl of Danby, in which he ſet forth, "That he met with informations ſeverally from his council, that he durſt not appear to argue the validity of his pardon, by reaſon of the vote of the houſe of commons." "Their lordſhips therefore deſired to know, Whether there was any ſuch vote as was alledged in the petition?"

It appears plainly in the proceedings of the commons, that they only ſought occaſion to drive things to extremity. With this view, they preſented an addreſs to the king, taking notice, "That multitudes of jeſuits, popiſh prieſts, and popiſh recuſants, reſorted to the cities of London and Weſtminſter, in contempt of his majeſty's laws and royal proclamations. Wherefore they humbly beſought his majeſty, that the militia of London, Weſtminſter, Southwark, the Tower hamlets, of Middleſex and Surry, might immediately be raiſed, and put in a poſture of defence." The next day, though a Sunday, they ordered a bill to be brought in, (purſuant to their reſolve that day fortnight) "To diſable the duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of England [n]" Immediately after they reſolved nemine contradicente, "That in defence of the king's perſon, and the proteſtant religion they would ſtand by his majeſty with their lives and fortunes; and that if his majeſty ſhould come by any violent death, they would revenge it to the utmoſt upon the papiſts." This was ſoon after put into the form of an addreſs, and preſented to the king, who thanked them, and ſaid, "That he would do what in him lay to ſecure the proteſtant religion, and was willing to do all ſuch things as might be to the good and benefit of his ſubjects."

In the mean time, he ſent them a meſſage the 14th of May, to remind them of what he had ſaid concerning the fleet; but the conſideration of this meſſage, was adjourned till the next Monday ſeven-night.

The committee of both houſes meeting to conſider of the way and method of trying the impeached lords, there was a warm diſpute between the two houſes, concerning the biſhops; the commons pretending, that the biſhops could not ſit upon the trial of the impeached lords, becauſe it was a caſe of blood. The peers on the other hand maintained, "That the lords ſpiritual have a right to ſtay and ſit in court, till the court proceed to the vote of guilty, or not guilty." This affair made a great noiſe, and occaſioned ſeveral books to be writ on both ſides [o].

[m] Particularly an act paſſed in queen Elizabeth's reign, aſſerting the power of the parliament to limit the ſucceſſion of the crown.

[n] This bill was ordered to be drawn up by Mr. Bennet, Mr. Trenchard, ſir Nicholas Carew, ſir Robert Peyton, ſir Thomas Player, Mr. Vaughan, ſir Francis Winnington, Mr. Boſcawen, Mr. Williams, Mr. Hampden, colonel Birch, Mr. Sacheverell, and Mr. Swinſen. Echard, tom. III. p. 546.

[o] The lords Nottingham and Roberts argued for the biſhops voting. But the lords Eſſex, Shaftſbury, and Holles were againſt it. Upon a debate it was carried by the majority that the biſhops had a right to vote. Whereupon the commons declared they would not proceed, unleſs the biſhops were obliged to withdraw during the whole trial. Upon this breach the parliament was prorogued, and ſoon after diſſolved. And the blame was caſt chiefly on

At laſt, on the 15th of May, the commons read the firſt time their bill, "to diſable the duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown of England," now called the "excluſion bill." After the particulars of the conſpiracy againſt the king, the eſtabliſhed government, and the proteſtant religion, the bill ſet forth:

"That the emiſſaries, prieſts, and agents for the pope, had traiterouſly ſeduced James duke of York, preſumptive heir to theſe crowns, to the communion of the church of Rome; and had induced him to enter into ſeveral negotiations with the pope, his cardinals, and nuncios, for promoting the Romiſh church and intereſts: and by his means and procurement had advanced the power and greatneſs of the French king to the manifeſt hazard of theſe kingdoms, that by the deſcent of theſe crowns upon a papiſt, and by foreign alliance and aſſiſtance, they might be able to ſucceed in their wicked and villainous deſigns."—Then after another preamble, it was enacted to this effect:

"1. That the ſaid James duke of York, Albany, and Ulſter, ſhould be incapable of inheriting the ſaid crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their dependencies; and of enjoying any of the titles, rights, prerogatives, and revenues, belonging to the ſaid crowns. 2. That in caſe his majeſty ſhould happen to die, or reſign his dominions, they ſhould devolve to the perſon next in ſucceſſion, in the ſame manner as if the ſaid duke were dead. 3. That all acts of ſovereignty and royalty that prince might then happen to perform, were not only declared void, but to be high treaſon, and puniſhable as ſuch. 4. That if any one, at any time whatſoever, ſhould endeavour to bring the ſaid duke into any of the forementioned dominions, or correſpond with him, in order to make him inherit, he ſhould be guilty of high treaſon. 5. That if the duke himſelf ever returned into any of theſe dominions, conſidering the miſchiefs that muſt enſue, he ſhould be looked upon as guilty of the ſame offence; and all perſons were authoriſed and required to ſeize upon and impriſon him, and in caſe of reſiſtance made by him and his adherents, to ſubdue them by force of arms."

Five days after, this bill was read a ſecond time, upon which the queſtion being put, whether the bill ſhould be committed, it was carried by a majority of ſeventy-nine [p].

This affair being begun, the commons proceeded to an enquiry after the penſioners in the laſt parliament. By means of ſir Stephen Fox, eighteen were diſcovered who had received annual penſions from the king, two of one thouſand pounds [q], ſix of five hundred pounds [r], two of four hundred pounds [s], four of three hundred pounds [t], four of two hundred pounds [u]. Beſides, there were ſix others who had received certain ſums at one time: three more were brought in for ſums received upon account; and five for uncertain ſums. Though this number appears not very conſiderable, it is ſo however, if it is conſidered, that in the houſe of commons, there are members, who are ſo able, and of ſuch credit, that they diſpoſe of ſeveral votes beſides their own, ſome more, ſome leſs, and that thirty members who receive penſions, may have it in their power, upon many occaſions, to turn the reſolutions of the houſe in favour of the court.

In the mean time, the king being highly offended with the commons, and hearing moreover, that they intended to preſent to him a remonſtrance, much like that preſented to the king his father in 1641, and of which the deſign was to inflame the nation againſt him, reſolved to prorogue the parliament. For this purpoſe he went to the houſe of lords the 27th of May, and ſending for the commons, paſſed ſome bills, and particularly one for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, called the Habeas Corpus act, and then prorogued the parliament to the 14th of Auguſt. By this the excluſion bill was defeated for a time.

The news of the proceedings of the Engliſh parliament had ſo raiſed the hopes of the Scotch malecontents, that they thought the time was come to be revenged of their perſecutors. Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, was the moſt hated of their enemies. If doctor Burnet, in the hiſtory of his own times, is to be credited, Sharp, had abundantly merited the hatred of the preſbyterians. For pretending an extraordinary zeal for their party, he had prevailed to be deputed to London after the reſtoration, to take care of their intereſts, but had baſely betrayed them. This raiſed him to the archbiſhopric of St. Andrews, and from that time he became their moſt violent perſecutor. Whether Burnet's account of Sharp be exactly true, or aggravated, it is however not to be denied, that the Scotch preſbyterians were extremely incenſed againſt Sharp, and conſidered him as a betrayer. Wherefore in this juncture, when they expected great alterations, twelve of them reſolved to begin their revenge upon their enemies with the archbiſhop. For this purpoſe they waited for him about two miles from St. Andrews, where he was going in a coach and ſix, and moſt inhumanly and barbarouſly murdered him, calling him, "apoſtate, betrayer of the godly, and perſecutor of Chriſt's church." This murder was committed the 2d of May [w]. In the end of the ſame month, eighty preſbyterians appeared in arms, and in a few days their number increaſed to fifteen hundred. They ſeized Glaſcow, and ſome other towns in the neighbourhood, and committed great outrages.

The king hearing of this rebellion, and that it daily gathered ſtrength, ſent the duke of Monmouth at the head of ſome Engliſh forces, who were joined by ſome Scotch regiments. The duke diſcharged his commiſſion with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that the 22d of June he entirely defeated the rebels at Bothwell bridge, killed eight hundred, and took about twelve hundred priſoners. Several were hanged, and the reſt were tranſported.

Shortly after the prorogation of the parliament, the five jeſuits, Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gawen, and Turner, were tried. The 13th of June they were brought to the Old Baily, where their indictment was read, and the witneſſes heard.

Oates's evidence was. "1. That the great conſult of the 24th of April 1678, was by order of Whitebread the provincial, and that he, Fenwick, Harcourt, and Turner, did all in his preſence ſign the reſolve for the king's death. 2. That Whitebread, after his return to St. Omer's, did ſay, he hoped to ſee the black fool's head at Whitehall, laid faſt enough; and if his brother ſhould appear to follow his footſteps, his paſſport ſhould be made too.

"3. That in July, Aſhby a prieſt, brought over inſtructions from Whitebread, to offer ſir George Wakeman ten thouſand pounds to poiſon the king; and alſo a commiſſion to ſir John Gage to be an officer in the army they deſigned to raiſe, which the witneſs delivered to ſir John.

"4. As for Gawen, though he could not poſitively ſay, he ſaw him at the conſult, yet he ſaw his hand ſubſcribed to the reſolve: and that in July 1678, he gave them in London, an account how proſperous their affairs were in Staffordſhire and Shropſhire; that the lord Stafford was very diligent, and that there was two or three thouſand on the biſhops. It ſeems they deſired to withdraw, but the king would not ſuffer it. He was ſo ſet on maintaining the pardon, that he would not venture ſuch a point on the votes of the temporal lords. He told the biſhops they muſt ſtick to him and his prerogative, as they would expect that he ſhould ſtick to them if they came to be puſht at. By this means they were expoſed to the popular fury, and every where cenſured as a ſet of men that, for their own ends, would expoſe the nation and proteſtant religion to ruin. And in revenge many began to declare openly in favour of the con-conformiſts, who upon this behaved very indecently, and fell very ſeverely on the body of the clergy. On the other hand, the biſhops and clergy ſet themſelves to write againſt the late times, and to draw a parallel between them and the preſent times: which was not managed decently enough by thoſe who undertook the argument, and who were believed to be ſet on and paid by the court. Particularly ſir Roger l'Eſtrange for four years publiſhed three or four ſheets a week under the title of the Obſervator, all tending to defame the contrary party, and make the clergy apprehend their ruin was deſigned. Upon this the greateſt part of the clergy delivered themſelves up to much heat and indiſcretion, which was vented both in their pulpits and common converſation. They ſeemed now to lay down all fears of popery; and nothing was ſo common in their mouths as the year forty-one, which, as they hinted, was near being acted over again. Both city and country were full of many indecencies that broke out on this occaſion. Among the worthy and eminent men, whoſe labours did in great meaſure reſcue the church from thoſe reproaches, that the follies of others drew upon her, were Tillotſon, Tenniſon, Sharp, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Calamy, Claget, Cudworth, the two Mores, Williams, &c. Burnet ſays, as a party of furious men were riding through a moor near St. Andrew's [without any deſign then upon Sharp] they ſaw the archbiſhop's coach appear. He was coming from a council day, and was driving home, having ſent ſome of his ſervants before to let them know he was coming, and others he had ſent off on compliments; ſo that there were no horſemen about the coach. They ſeeing this, concluded, according to their frantic enthuſiaſtic notions, that God had now delivered up their greateſt enemy into their hands. Seven of them made up to the coach, and one fired a piſtol at him, which burnt his coat and gown, but did not touch his body. Upon this they drew him out of his coach, and murdered him barbarouſly, p. 471.

pounds ready there to carry on the deſign; all which he afterwards heard him declare in father Ireland's chamber."

Stephen Dugdale, a new witneſs, depoſed, " 1. Againſt Whitebread, that he ſaw a letter under his hand to father Evers a jeſuit, and confeſſor to the witneſs; in which he ordered him to be ſure to chuſe men that were hardy and truſty, no matter whether they were gentlemen: and he ſwore what they were to do; that the words under his hand were in expreſs terms,———For killing the king.

" 2. Againſt Gawen he ſwore, that he entertained the witneſs to be of the conſpiracy to murder the king, as one of the reſolute fellows deſcribed by Whitebread: and for that end they had ſeveral conſultations in the country; as at Boſcobel, and at Tixall in September 1678. And he heard them talk in one of thoſe conſults, that it was the opinion of the monks at Paris, who were to aſſiſt in the conſpiracy, That as ſoon as the deed was done, they ſhould lay it on the preſbyterians, and ſo provoke the other proteſtants to cut their throats. That he had intercepted and read above a hundred letters to the ſame purpoſe, to be delivered by private marks known to father Evers.

" 3. That the witneſs himſelf was ſo zealous in the cauſe, that he had given them four hundred pounds for carrying on the deſign, which Gawen had made him believe was not only lawful, but meritorious; and that he was to be ſent up to London by Harcourt, there to be inſtructed about killing the king.

" 4. That the ſame Harcourt did write word to father Evers, of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey's being diſpatched, that very night it was done; ſo that they knew of it in Staffordſhire ſeveral days before it was commonly known in London[x]. And to confirm this teſtimony, he produced Mr. Chetwin, a gentleman, who ſwore, he did hear it reported as from Mr. Dugdale; and that he was not in town when the murderers of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey were tried, or elſe he then would have witneſſed the ſame.

5. Againſt Turner he ſwore, " 1. That he ſaw him with others, at Evers's chamber: where they conſulted together to carry on this deſign, of bringing in popery by killing the king."

Prance depoſed, " 1. That Harcourt one day paying him for an image of the Virgin Mary, told him, there was a deſign of killing the king: 2. And that Fenwick told him in Ireland's chamber, that there ſhould be fifty thouſand men in arms, in a readineſs to ſettle their religion, and that they ſhould be commanded by the lords Bellaſis, Powis, and Arundel of Warder."

Bedloe depoſed, " 1. That he had ſeen Whitebread and Fenwick at ſeveral conſults about the plot; and that he had heard Whitebread at Harcourt's chamber, tell Coleman, the manner of ſending the four ruffians to Windſor to kill the king.

" 2. That he ſaw Harcourt take out of a cabinet about fourſcore or a hundred pounds, to give to a meſſenger, to be carried to the ſaid ruffians, with a guinea to the meſſenger, to drink Mr. Coleman's health.

" 3. That Whitebread told him, that Pickering was to have a great number of maſſes, and Grove fifteen hundred pounds for killing the king.

" 4. That Harcourt employed him three ſeveral times to carry their conſults beyond the ſeas; and that in Harcourt's preſence, he received Coleman's thanks for his fidelity, and that Harcourt recommended him to the lord Arundel, who promiſed him great favour when the times were turned: alſo that he ſaw Harcourt give Wakeman a bill to receive two thouſand pounds, in part of a greater ſum; and heard ſir George ſay, fifteen thouſand pounds was a ſmall reward for the ſettling of religion, and preſerving the three kingdoms from ruin."

Beſides the evidences, there was a letter found amongſt Harcourt's papers, from one Petre a jeſuit, which named a meeting deſigned on the 24th of April 1678. This letter ſerved to fortify Oates's evidence of the grand conſult. But this was explained by the priſoners to ſignify a triennial meeting about the choice of a procurator to be ſent to Rome, though not to the full ſatisfaction of the court, which looked upon it as an evaſion.

The defence made by the priſoners was various and long. Beſides their frequent aſſeverations and proteſtations of their innocence[y], and their ignorance of any deſigns againſt the king, they much argued againſt the witneſſes, inſiſting: " That to the making of a credible witneſs, there muſt be integrity of life, truth of teſtimony, and probability of matter; but the witneſſes againſt them, Oates, Bedloe, Prance, and Dugdale, were men of deſperate fortunes, and flagitious perſons, and that falſe ſwearing was their livelihood."

I cannot forbear remarking here by the way, that if this maxim, " That to make a credible witneſs, there muſt be integrity of life," was received without reſtriction, it would be almoſt impoſſible to prove ſuch plots as this, becauſe commonly, only villains engage in them, and they are diſcovered by accomplices.

" They alledged particularly the great improbability of truſting Oates with ſecrets of the higheſt importance, when he was turned away from St. Omer's for his miſdemeanours and immoralities, which were ſo great, that he was denied the ſacrament. They charged him with contradictions, with relation to his former evidences."

Theſe contradictions conſiſted, in that Oates had ſaid before the council, that he knew no more, and yet added many things afterwards. I ſhall not repeat here what I have ſaid elſewhere.

They produced about ſixteen witneſſes to prove, " that Oates had been all April, May, and till the latter end of June 1678, at St. Omer's; and that they ſaw him every day, and converſed and dined with him, and that he was never out of the college, except two days and one night he was at Watton, and two or three he was in the infirmary, &c. and conſequently he could not be at the conſult of the 24th of April.

And further they proved, " That ſir John Warner, and ſir Thomas Preſton, whom Oates had ſworn to come over with him to the conſult, were all that time beyond the ſeas, one at Watton, the other at Liege.

And moreover to ſhew that Oates was not a man to be credited, they produced eleven witneſſes to prove, " That father Ireland, who was executed, was not at London, and made it appear directly contrary to what he had ſworn upon his trial." They added, that if the evidence of their ſide ſhould be rejected becauſe they were Roman catholics, all commerce with ſeveral countries would be deſtroyed."

The chief juſtice replied, that they had no room to complain of the witneſſes being rejected by the court, ſince, on the contrary, their depoſitions were received without any ſcruple, and that it belonged to the jury to determine upon their evidence, as they ſaw cauſe.

In anſwer to theſe accuſations, Oates alledged, " That his coming to London to the conſult was very private; yet he produced ſix witneſſes to teſtify they ſaw him there about that time, but in a ſort of a diſguiſe[z]." But none ſpoke very home but Mr. Smith a Schoolmaſter of Iſlington, who afterwards, in the reign of king James II. retracted all that he had ſaid.

As to Ireland's being in London, Oates produced one witneſs, who did affirm to have ſeen him there at that time.

Gawen offered to undergo the ordeal, or fiery trial over red hot plow-ſhares, as a teſt of his innocence. But, beſides that this way of proving an accuſed perſon's innocence had been aboliſhed ſix hundred years, and conſequently was not to be allowed by the court, it is certain that when the trial by ordeal was practiſed, it was never admitted but where evidences failed, which could not be ſaid of Gawen.

Harcourt urged in his defence, with regard to the letter ſaid to be writ by him to Evers concerning Godfrey's death, that he muſt have been mad to ſend ſuch a letter by the poſt.

The jury, after a ſhort conſideration, returned, and brought in all the five priſoners guilty of high treaſon; but ſentence was reſpited till the next day, on which came on the trial of Richard Langhorn a popiſh counſellor at law of the Temple, and much employed by the papiſts. Being brought to the ſame place with the five jeſuits, and before the ſame perſons, with a new jury, Oates appeared and ſwore:

" 1. That the priſoner held correſpondence with la Chaiſe and others, and that the witneſſes carried ſeveral letters to perſons beyond the ſeas; in one of which he ſaw under [x] Harcourt's letter was received the Monday next after the Saturday, on which the murder was committed; that is, three days before the body was found. State trials, tom. II. p. 838.

[y] Gawen made this ſolemn proteſtation; " I do as truly believe there is a God, an heaven, and a hell, as any one here does: as I hope for ſalvation, as I hope to ſee God in heaven, I never ſaw Mr. Oates before the day in January, when he ſays, I had the perriwig on, and he did not know me: and as for July, I call God to witneſs, I never ſaw him then. State trials, tom. II. p. 835.

his own hand, words to this purpoſe, that the parliament began to flag in promoting the proteſtant religion, and now they had a fair opportunity to begin and give the blow, with other expreſſions plain enough concerning the plot.

" 2. That he had orders from the provincial Whitebread, to give Mr. Langhorn an account of the reſolve of the great conſult, April the 24th 1678, and upon acquainting him with it, Langhorn lifted up his hands and eyes, and prayed to God to give it good ſucceſs.

" 3. That he ſaw in his chamber certain commiſſions which they called patents; and that he permitted the witneſs to peruſe ſeveral of them; one was to the lord Arundel of Warder, to be lord chancellor, another to the lord Powis, to be treaſurer, and one to the priſoner, to be advocate of the army; all ſigned Johannes Paulus de Oliva, by virtue of a brief from the pope.

" 4. That being employed as a ſolicitor for ſeveral of the fathers of the ſociety, the priſoner prevailed upon the Benedictine monks, to raiſe ſix thouſand pounds for carrying on the cauſe; and ſaid in his hearing, that he would do his utmoſt for procuring the money.

" 5. That he was diſguſted, that ſir George Wakeman was not contented with ten thouſand pounds to poiſon the king, and called him, a narrow ſpirited, and narrow ſouled phyſician; who, for ſo public a cauſe, ought to have done it for nothing.

6. An inſtrument being produced, ſigned Paulus de Oliva, found in Langhorn's chamber; Oates ſwore, " That the forementioned commiſſions were ſigned by the ſame hand; but they were all conveyed away, and this being only an eccleſiaſtical buſineſs, and not dangerous as they thought, was left behind."

In the next place Bedloe ſwore, " 1. That going with Coleman to the priſoner's chamber, the former gave him his letters to father la Chaiſe, the pope's nuncio, and others, open, to read, and regiſter in a book kept by him for that purpoſe; and that ſome of the expreſſions in theſe letters were, to let la Chaiſe know, they waited only now for his anſwer, how far he had proceeded with the French king, for the ſending of money; for they only wanted money, all other things being in readineſs. That the catholics of England were in ſafety; that places and offices had been diſpoſed to them, and that all garriſons either were, or ſuddenly would be, in their hands; and now they had a fair opportunity, having a king that was ſo eaſy to believe what was dictated to him by the catholic party.

" That he brought other letters from Harcourt to Langhorn to be regiſtered; of which letters, one was for the rector of the Iriſh college at Salamanca, which ſpecified, that the lord Bellafis, and the reſt of the lords concerned ſhould be in readineſs, for that they had ſent ſome Iriſh caſhiered ſoldiers, with many lay brothers, under the notion of pilgrims from St. Jago, who were to take ſhipping at the Groyn, and to land at Milford haven, and there to join with the lord Powis."

Mr. Langhorn in his defence, beſides the ſolemn proteſtations of his innocence, alledged, " That Oates and Bedloe, the witneſſes againſt him, were parties in the crime, and deſired to know, whether they had their pardons." Upon underſtanding that Bedloe had three, and Oates had two under the broad ſeal; he inſiſted, " That they were ſtill approvers in the eyes of the law, and therefore not to be heard; and deſired to know, if they expected any rewards for their diſcoveries." Oates replied upon oath, " That he had been rewarded by expending ſix or ſeven hundred pounds out of his own pocket, without knowing if he ſhould ever ſee it again." Langhorn then alledged, " He had heard Bedloe had received five hundred pounds;" but he was anſwered, " That that was for the diſcovery of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey's murder, and not for the plot." And Bedloe ſwore, " That he was ſo far from having any benefit for that diſcovery, that he was ſeven hundred pounds out of pocket." When the priſoner inſiſted upon the improbability of their aſſertions, by reaſon of their great neceſſities and poverty, when they firſt made their diſcoveries, he was told, " That ſuch enquiries were foreign to the matter in hand." And ſo he proceeded to prove Oates to be perjured, with reſpect to the conſult in April 24, and to the buſineſs of father Ireland, by the ſame witneſſes that had been uſed by the five jeſuits the day before. Whereupon the chief juſtice told him, that a witneſs could not be rejected as perjured, unleſs he was declared ſo upon a trial, and therefore his allegation could not be of any ſervice to him.

As Oates had formerly ſworn, that he lay at Grove's houſe about the time of the conſult, he brought Mrs. Grove to teſtify, that he never was there about that time; which was confirmed by her maid: and both affirmed, that the houſe was taken up, and that there was no room to lodge him. The court thereupon ſaid, that being diſguiſed he might lodge there without being known.

While this trial was depending, Roger Palmer earl of Caſtlemain came into the hall, and told the judges, that the mob uſed violence to the witneſſes who had depoſed in favour of the priſoners, and that they were in danger of their lives; upon this the court ordered immediate enquiry to be made after the authors of theſe violences, in order to puniſh them according to their deſert.

In concluſion, the jury brought in Langhorn guilty, and he received ſentence, together with the five jeſuits, who had been tried the day before.

On the 20th of June, the five jeſuits were executed, proteſting their innocence. Whitebread in particular, declared, " That he renounced from his heart all manner of abſolutions, diſpenſations for ſwearing, &c. which ſome had been pleaſed to lay to the jeſuits charge, thinking them unjuſtifiable, and unlawful." Langhorn was reprieved for a month[z]. He was executed the 14th of July, and died, proteſting his innocence of the crimes for which he was condemned. It was the wonder of many, that ſo able a lawyer, if he was innocent, had made ſo weak a defence.

As the death of theſe five jeſuits, and of the three before executed, made a great noiſe; and as to this day they are believed innocent by ſome, and guilty by others, I cannot forbear to make a few reflections upon this ſubject, to aſſiſt the reader to judge impartially.

1. The truth will never be diſcovered, if men ſuffer themſelves to be ſwayed by religious prejudices. If we believe an accuſed perſon guilty, becauſe he is a papiſt or jeſuit, or if for the ſame reaſon we believe him innocent, all examination is vain. The prejudiced perſon always finds reaſon and juſtice in one or other of theſe two opinions, and therefore he muſt, if poſſible, diveſt himſelf of his prejudices.

2. The condemned jeſuits were accuſed of three things; of a deſign to kill the king; to ſubvert the government; to root out the proteſtant religion. And yet, moſt of the evidences againſt them ran only upon the firſt of theſe three articles, the two others being ſuppoſed. It is nevertheleſs upon this ſuppoſition, that the accuſation of deſigning to kill the king is built, becauſe it is pretended, that the aim of the conſpirators was to place the duke of York on the throne, as more proper to advance their deſigns than the king his brother. But this pretenſion is not proved, nor does it appear in the evidences produced againſt them, that this was their aim.

3. But on the other hand, it can hardly be denied, that throughout this whole reign, there was a ſettled deſign to render the king abſolute, and introduce the popiſh religion. This muſt be the meaning of theſe expreſſions, " To ſubvert the government, and deſtroy the proteſtant religion." This being ſuppoſed, it is not improbable, that the papiſts and jeſuits might believe, that their project would be ſooner executed if the king was removed, and the duke of York placed on the throne.

4. It is therefore upon this probability, that the jeſuits have been accuſed of projecting to kill the king. It is ſuppoſed, that being concerned in the general deſign, or the plot, they believed the king's death a proper means to haſten the execution, and here the witneſſes were very poſitive.

5. The defences of the priſoners conſiſted chiefly, 1. In aſſeverations and proteſtations of their innocence. 2. In the depoſitions of the witneſſes from St. Omer's, and Staffordſhire, who proved, that Oates was not at London the 24th of April 1678. 3. In the improbabilities in the evidence given by Oates and Bedloe. Upon theſe three heads I propoſe to make ſome reflections.

1. The proteſtations and aſſeverations of the accuſed during their trial are not to be regarded. But when they are carried to the point of death, they ought to be conſidered. If they are not a poſitive proof, they form at leaſt a preſumption, becauſe papiſts are not leſs convinced than proteſtants, that lying is not the way to eſcape the juſt judgment of God, before whom they are ſhortly to appear; and that, beſides, theſe proteſtations never prevail for a reverſal of the ſentence. I am aware that the jeſuits are accuſed of approving equivocations and mental reſervations. But, without examining how far this charge may be proved, it is certain, that father Whitebread, upon the ladder, teſtified an abhorrence of this doctrine, and renounced all pardons and diſpenſations from the pope, or any other power, for ſwearing or ſpeaking againſt the truth [a]. It is not therefore impoſſible, that without there was paſſion or prejudice in the judges and juries, the jeſuits, though innocent, would have been condemned upon falſe evidence. Accordingly, this is what many pretend: but there are others who carry the thing further, and maintain, that the accuſed might have been acquitted, if the paſſion and prejudice of the judges and juries had not prevented it. This we ſhall examine in the next article.

2. I have elſewhere ſpoken of the defence, founded upon the proof of the alibi, which obliges the judge to render juſtice by chance, ſince, there being a direct contrariety between the evidence, the judges cannot be ſatisfied on which ſide the truth lies. Oates depoſed, that he had aſſiſted at the grand conſult at London, April 1678. He produced ſeven witneſſes, who affirmed, that they ſaw him in London at that time. The jeſuits on their ſide produced ſixteen witneſſes, who affirmed, that Oates was at St. Omer's at the ſame time. It muſt be therefore, either that Oates and his witneſſes, or thoſe of the jeſuits, were falſe. Now, that which probably determined the jury to bring in the jeſuits guilty was: firſt, the priſoners objected only a bare denial to the teſtimonies of Prance, Dugdale, and Bedloe, which could not but breed a diſadvantageous prejudice againſt them. Secondly, the witneſſes from St. Omer's were all ſcholars, or perſons depending upon the jeſuits college, another confideration capable to prepoſſeſs the jury. Laſtly, the queſtion was to examine a plot contrived by papiſts, as ſuch, and in favour of their religion, and not as private perſons, incited by other paſſions. In this caſe, it is not very ſtrange, that the evidences given by papiſts appeared ſuſpicious. For it is certain, at that time, the opinion, ſupported by the votes of two ſeveral parliaments, that there was a real plot to ſubvert the proteſtant religion, was generally embraced throughout the whole kingdom.

As to the ſuperiority of ſixteen witneſſes againſt ſeven, this could occaſion no difficulty. For ſeven witneſſes diſperſed in London, who had only accidently ſeen Oates, were as credible as the ſixteen ſhut up in one houſe at St. Omer's [b]. And though there had been but two from St. Omer's, yet, all other circumſtances being equal, they would have been as credible as the ſeven witneſſes of London.

3. I proceed now to the improbabilities in the depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe. Firſt, it is difficult to conceive the neceſſity of reſolving the king's death in an aſſembly of fifty jeſuits. Secondly, it may with reaſon be ſuppoſed, that an affair of ſuch importance as the aſſaſſination of a king, paſſes through the hands of thoſe only who are moſt diſtinguiſhed in the ſociety, either by their poſts or capacity. But it is hardly credible, that fifty ſuch could be found in England or at St. Omer's. Thirdly, I know not that any perſon, to this day, has poſitively affirmed that Oates was a jeſuit. And yet he not only appears in the grand conſult of the 24th of April, but has an office in it of great truſt and importance, namely, to carry the reſolution of killing the king, to the ſeveral companies into which the aſſembly was divided. Fourthly, it is not ſaid, at what time Oates turned papiſt; but it is only ſeen, he was firſt employed in 1677, to carry letters to Spain. He returned about the end of the ſame year, and ſhortly after was ſent to St. Omer's, where he continued but three or four months. Now it is not probable, that this ſhort ſtay at St. Omer's could have acquired him the confidence of the heads of the ſociety, to ſuch a degree, as to be ſent to London to aſſiſt in a grand conſult, where the king's murder was to be reſolved. Fifthly, why was Bedloe to be admitted into ſo great a ſecret, he who was to have no ſhare in the execution? And yet he ſpeaks of it as a thing with which he was perfectly acquainted, not only from letters which he might have opened, but it appears even by his depoſitions, that the heads of the conſpiracy, Ireland, Whitebread, Harcourt, Coleman, Langhorn, uſed no caution with him; from whence it may be inferred, that they themſelves imparted to him the ſecret. He is at Harcourt's chamber, when the money is ordering for the four Iriſhmen who were to kill the king. He is at the ſame chamber when the queen's phyſician receives a note of two thouſand pounds ſterling, without any apparent neceſſity of his preſence in an affair of that nature, Sixthly, Oates and Bedloe were men of mean birth, who had been only employed as letter carriers. They were beſides little diſtinguiſhed for their capacity, or talents, and yet they are admitted into all the moſt important ſecrets of the plot. Laſtly, it appears in the depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe, that the conſpirators talked together, and writ to one another, concerning the king's murder, as if it had been but a trifle, and without even taking the uſual precautions on ſuch occaſions, of diſguiſing their thoughts in ambiguous expreſſions.

Theſe are improbabilities which give but too much occaſion to ſuſpect the credit of theſe two witneſſes. It will perhaps be ſaid, that a thing is not falſe becauſe it is improbable; and that God ſometimes permits the moſt wary villains to ruin themſelves by a too great confidence in others. This may be, and it may alſo be, that this was not the preſent caſe. At leaſt it may be affirmed, that the jeſuits are not wont to proceed with ſo little caution.

Theſe are the improbabilities that have induced many people, though perſuaded of the reality of the plot, as far as it concerned the government and religion, to ſuſpend their judgment with regard to the king's murder. The ſame improbabilities likewiſe have furniſhed others with a pretence for denying the whole plot, becauſe they are pleaſed to confine it to that ſingle article, in which they impoſe upon themſelves, or elſe are deſirous to impoſe upon their readers.

The 10th of July the king, contrary to the advice of his new council, which he ſeemed to have reſolved to follow with an entire deference, diſſolved the parliament, and ſummoned another to meet the 17th of October. He hoped to find the next more tractable, but was very much deceived. The people, who no longer regarded what came from the court, affected to ſend ſuch members as were of the country party, as being the moſt proper to oppoſe the deſigns of the king. The earl of Shaftſbury was at the head of this party, and without doubt greatly contributed to inflame the paſſions of the people. But it is perhaps ſaying too much, to charge this lord with all the king's late mortifications. If it could be proved, that the king had never given any occaſion of diſcontent to his people, we ſhould be obliged to recur to ſome extraordinary cauſe of the parliament's ill humour, as the intrigues, cabals, and artifices of ſome powerful and popular perſon. But what need is there to ſeek for an extraordinary cauſe, when one ſo naturally offers in the whole conduct of the king, who had hitherto ſhewn, that his intereſts and thoſe of his people were entirely different?

The 18th of June, ſir George Wakeman the queen's phyſician was brought to his trial, together with James Corker, William Marſhal, two Benedictine monks, and William Rumley, a lay brother of that order. Oates and Bedloe were the witneſſes againſt them; but, beſides that their depoſitions were imperfect, and the greateſt part upon hearſay, and could paſs for proofs only on the ſuppoſition of the deſign to poiſon the king, which was not well proved, the jury doubtleſs conſidered, that a perſon of ſir George Wakeman's ſenſe, would never truſt ſuch a ſecret to Bedloe, whom he ſcarce knew. Nay, he ſwore that he never ſaw Bedloe before in his life. However this be, the priſoners were acquitted, to the great mortification of the two witneſſes, ſince it was eaſy to ſee, that Oates and Bedloe were evidences capable of ſwearing to things of which they had no perfect knowledge [c].

About the end of Auguſt, the king being at Windſor, was ſeized with three violent fits of an intermitting fever, which gave great apprehenſion. The earl of Eſſex and the lord Hallifax, two of the four counſellors which then managed the king's affairs, fearing, if the king died, to fall into the hands of the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Shaftſbury, adviſed the king to ſend for the duke of York, which was done with all poſſible ſpeed and ſecrecy; for [a] Rapin ſeems not to have taken notice of a paſſage in Burnet on this occaſion. One Serjeant, a ſecular prieſt, a zealous papiſt in his way, ſome months after theſe executions, appeared before the council upon ſecurity given him, and averred, that Gawen the jeſuit, who died proteſting he had never thought it lawful to murder kings, but had always deteſted it; had, at his laſt being in Flanders, ſaid to a very devout perſon, from whom Serjeant had it, that he thought the queen might lawfully take away the king's life for the injuries he had done her, but much more becauſe he was a heretic. Upon that Serjeant ran out into many particulars, to ſhew how little credit was due to the proteſtations made by the jeſuits, even at their death, p. 466.

[b] See note above, concerning the Dominican friar.

[c] The lord chief juſtice Scroggs, who had been very violent againſt the priſoners hitherto, was obſerved, far contrary to his former practice, to turn againſt the witneſſes in this trial. The Portugal embaſſador went next day with great ſtate to thank Scroggs for his behaviour in Wakeman's trial. By which the chief juſtice was expoſed to much cenſure. This was looked on, it ſeems, as the queen's trial as well as Wakeman's. For Oates and Bedloe had both depoſed, that ſhe was to aſſiſt him in poiſoning the king. Burnet, p. 468.

In

the duke was at Windſor the 2d of September. But the king, being then out of danger, pretended a ſurpriſe at his arrival. But this diſſimulation was not capable to deceive the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Shaftſbury. On the other hand, the earl of Eſſex and the lord Halifax, finding that they had made Monmouth and Shaftſbury their irreconcileable enemies, joined with the duke of York for their deſtruction. They ſucceeded ſo well, that the king removed the duke of Monmouth from his poſt of captain general, and ſent him into Holland, to the great ſurprize of the whole court, for the duke of Monmouth was in the height of the king's favour before the duke of York's arrival [d]. Shortly after, Shaftſbury alſo was turned out from being preſident of the council [e]. Thus the court had a new face, and the duke of York was more powerful than ever. He improved this happy juncture to obtain the king's leave to retire to Scotland, repreſenting to him the danger of his being in the Low Countries, in caſe of his majeſty's death. Accordingly, he returned to Bruſſels, to bring home his ducheſs and the princeſs Anne, and arriving ſhortly after at London, departed for Scotland. If dr. Burnet is believed in the hiſtory of his own times, he governed Scotland in an arbitrary manner, and gave manifeſt tokens of his cruelty and inveterate hatred to the Preſbyterians.

Every one impatiently expected, where would end the late alterations at court, and it was not long before it appeared. The 15th of October the king ſummoning his council, after a little pauſe, told them, "That upon many conſiderations, which he could not at preſent acquaint them with, he found it neceſſary to make a longer prorogation of the parliament than he intended: that he had conſidered all the conſequences ſo far as to be abſolutely reſolved, and not to hear any thing that ſhould be ſaid againſt it: that he would have the meeting put off, till that time twelve month." The counſellors, ſurprized at this reſolution, and ſtill more at the manner of propoſing it, were moſt of them ſilent. Some, however, offering to repreſent to the king the dangerous conſequences of this reſolution, were injoined ſilence. But ſir William Temple, more bold than the reſt, ſtood up, and with great freedom told his majeſty, "That as to the reſolution he had taken, he would ſay nothing, becauſe he was reſolved to hear no reaſoning upon it: therefore, he would only preſume to offer him his humble advice as to the courſe of his future proceedings; which was, that his majeſty in his affairs would pleaſe to make uſe of ſome council or other, and allow freedom to their debates and advices; after hearing which his majeſty might yet reſolve as he pleaſed. That if he did not think the perſons or number of this preſent council ſuited with his affairs, it was in his power to diſſolve them, and conſtitute another of any number he pleaſed, and to alter them again when he would: But, to make counſellors that ſhould not counſel, he doubted whether it was in his majeſty's power or not, becauſe it implied a contradiction: and ſo far as he had obſerved, either of former ages, or the preſent, he queſtioned, whether it was a thing ever practiſed in England by his majeſty's predeceſſors, or were ſo now by any of the preſent princes in chriſtendom: therefore he humbly adviſed him to conſtitute ſome ſuch council, as he would think fit to make uſe of, in the direction of his great and public affairs."

This proceeding cauſed ſeveral counſellors to ſurrender their commiſſions to the king, and others to abſent themſelves from the council [f], not thinking proper to encourage by their preſence the king's ſecret reſolutions, and give occaſion to believe, they approved them. The earl of Eſſex reſigned his place of firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. The lord Hallifax, Sir William Temple, and ſome others, retired into the country. Thus the council which the king had appointed to amuſe the people, was almoſt diſſolved, and the direction of the public affairs remained in the hands of the earl of Sunderland, mr. Laurence Hyde, and mr. Sidney Godolphin [g], or rather the duke of York, whoſe intereſts they had embraced; and who, though abſent, directed their reſolutions.

In the latter end of October, about a fortnight after the prorogation of the parliament, a ſham plot was diſcovered, contrived by the papiſts to bring an odium upon the preſbyterians and the heads of the country party. This project had been formed the beginning of Auguſt, by the counteſs of Powis, Elizabeth Cellier a midwife, the earl of Caſtlemain, and the five lords in the Tower. The deſign was to make uſe of falſe witneſſes to accuſe Oates of perjury and ſodomy; to aſſaſſinate the earl of Shaftſbury; and to charge the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Eſſex, the duke of Monmouth, the lord Hallifax, and ſeveral conſiderable citizens of London, with being concerned in a plot againſt the king. One Dangerfield was to be the principal actor in this ſcene [h]. He received his inſtructions from the lady Powis, and the lords in the Tower, with a liſt of the perſons whom he was to accuſe [i]. Moreover the lady Powis gave him a model of the plot, which he was to convey into the houſe of ſome pretended conſpirator, and there cauſe it to be found.

Dangerfield furniſhed with theſe inſtructions and papers, informed the duke of York of it, after his arrival from Bruſſels. The duke of York made him a preſent of twenty guineas, and introduced him to the king, who, after hearing him, gave him forty more. Then he made ſome attempts to aſſaſſinate the earl of Shaftſbury, but was prevented by ſeveral accidents. At laſt, on pretence of ſeeing ſome rooms, which he ſaid he intended to hire, he went to colonel Manſel's lodgings [k], and found means to pin ſome dangerous papers behind his bed's head. This done, he informed two officers of the cuſtom-houſe, that there were in thoſe lodgings prohibited goods to the value of two thouſand pounds. The officers repairing thither the 22d of October, ſearched every where in hopes of finding their prey; but as they did not think to ſearch behind the bed, Dangerfield himſelf found the papers. The officers carrying theſe papers to their ſuperiors, had orders to return them to Manſel. Four or five days after, the colonel meeting Dangerfield in the ſtreet, carried him directly to Whitehall, and brought him before the King and council. He was ſtrictly examined, and, after a full hearing, his contrivance being detected, he was ſent to Newgate the 27th of October.

Two days after, ſir William Waller, a magiſtrate of London, ſearching Cellier's houſe, found the plan of the pretended plot, writ very fair in a paper book tied with ribbands, and hid in a meal tub, which gave it the name of the meal tub plot. Dangerfield perceiving himſelf ruined if he perſiſted in a thing which he could not ſupport, applied himſelf to the lord mayor of London, and gave him in writing a large confeſſion upon oath, with a diſcovery of the perſons by whom he was employed. This confeſſion being tranſmitted to the council, ſeveral perſons were apprehended [l], and amongſt the reſt Roger Palmer earl of Caſtlemain. The lady Powis, accuſed by others beſides Dangerfield, of conſpiring the death of the king, was ſent to the Tower, and ordered to be proſecuted for high treaſon. This affair greatly contributed to the reſolution taken by the earl of Eſſex and the lord Hallifax, to retire from court, becauſe they obſerved, that though they were mentioned in the plot, they were left out of the ſecret examinations about it.

The famous philoſopher Thomas Hobbes died this year, in the 91ſt year of his age. His writings are unhappily but too well known, to need any farther notice [m].

[m] To be a little more large upon the character of this philoſopher. He was the ſon of a clergyman, born at Malmeſbury in Wiltſhire, and called from this place of his birth Malmſburienſis. He went out batchelor of arts at Magdalen hall in Oxford, and from thence was taken very young into the earl of Devonſhire's family. With the ſon of that nobleman he travelled into France and Italy, and made an acquaintance with Gaſſendus, and ſome of the greateſt men of the age. In his 63d year he ſettled in England for the remainder of his days, and in the healthful air of Chatſworth, in Derbyſhire, held it out to the 91ſt year of his age. The king having learned mathematics of him abroad, allowed him a penſion of one hundred pounds a year. His genius was vaſt and extenſive. But notwithſtanding his pretences to philoſophy and the mathematics, young Wallis of Oxford convinced the world, that his ſelf ſufficiency was much greater than his real abilities. He likewiſe aimed at a reputation in poetry, tranſlated Homer, and writ ſome other little things, which have only ranked him againſt our Ogilby's in ſuch a ſituation, that the king had need of all his patience, and addreſs. There were viſibly two parties in the kingdom, that of the court, and that of the country. To the endeavours of the court to gain proſelytes, the country party oppoſed ſwarms of libels to inflame the people, by repreſenting the miſchiefs with which England was threatened, if the deſigns of the court and papiſts were not prevented[n]. For no ſcruple was made of affirming in theſe libels, that the papiſts were countenanced by the court. The year forty one ſeemed to be returning, and it was even probable, that the contrary party to the king had no better intentions againſt him, than the enemies of Charles I. had in 1640. It was a melancholy thing to ſee the kingdom thus divided by the oppoſite intereſts of the king and the ſubject. But when it was known, that the king had reſolved to prorogue the parliament till November, not only anonymous libels were publiſhed, but petitions flowed from all parts, for the ſitting of the parliament the 26th of January, according to the laſt prorogation. The king received theſe petitions with great trouble, and failed not to return a diſobliging anſwer to thoſe who had the boldneſs to preſent them. Nay, he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations againſt theſe petitions, uſing the ſame reaſons that James I. and Charles I. had alledged on the like occaſions. He ſaid, "He was the head of the government, and the only judge of what was fit to be done in ſuch caſes, and that he would do what he thought moſt for the good of himſelf and his people, deſiring they would not meddle with a matter, that was ſo eſſential a part of his prerogative[o]." All this is very true in the ordinary courſe of the government. But when the people believe the ſovereign is uſing, to the deſtruction of the kingdom, a prerogative intended for their welfare, the bare allegation of the royal prerogative is not capable to ſatisfy them. Whatever colour is given to it, the Engliſh would never be convinced, that it ought to turn to their ruin. Accordingly, the proclamations were not able to put a ſtop to the petitions, as on the other hand, the petitions obliged not the king to alter his meaſures.

However, the king reſolved to meet the parliament the 26th of Jauuary, but it was only to tell both houſes, that the unſettled condition of the nation, rendered a long interval of the parliament abſolutely neceſſary, for compoſing and quieting of men's minds. That nevertheleſs he would only prorogue them to April, in order to meet them again in that month, if the condition of his allies abroad demanded their aſſiſtance. After this ſhort ſpeech, the chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued the parliament to the 15th of April.

Two days after, the king declared in council, "That he had ſent for his royal highneſs, not having found ſuch an effect from his abſence, as ſhould incline him to keep him longer from him, when queſtions were ſtarted of ſuch a nature, as made it reaſonable that he ſhould be preſent at the next ſeſſion." Upon this invitation the duke of York appeared at court the 24th of February, where he was received with great pomp and ſatisfaction by the king his brother.

The Duke's arrival, and the king's late firmneſs in proroguing the parliament, notwithſtanding the clamours of the malecontents, greatly encouraged the court party, ſo that multitudes of addreſſes were preſented to him, teſtifying an abhorrence of the liberty taken by ſome men to require him to hold the parliament[p], and in that from Norfolk he was thanked for recalling the duke of York. Though it is certain the general ſenſe of the people for or againſt the court, is ſeldom to be known by theſe petitions, it is no leſs certain, they are, for the moſt part, the work of a few popular men, who by intrigue and cabal, procure ſubſcriptions to theſe addreſſes, from thoſe with whom they have intereſt, and who often ſign them without examining the contents. Accordingly theſe addreſſes are uſually not to be regarded, moſt of the ſubſcribers being ready to ſign the contrary, if they think it for their private advantage. They are however urged as a proof of the people's being of this or that ſentiment, though in the main, it is a very dubious proof. On the preſent occaſion, petitions had been preſented to the king for the ſitting of the parliament. As ſoon as the parliament was prorogued, and the duke of York at court, many addreſſes were preſented in abhorrence of the former, ſo that two parties were formed, called the petitioners and abhorrers; and as the animoſity between the two parties gradually increaſed, they beſtowed upon each other names of reproach, and from hence aroſe the ſo much famed diſtinction of whig and tory. The petitioners looking upon their adverſaries as entirely devoted to the court and the popiſh faction, gave them the name of tories, a title given to the Iriſh robbers, villains, and cut-throats, ſince called rapparees. Thus the name of tories, ſerves only now to diſtinguiſh one of the two factions which ſtill divide England. The abhorrers on their ſide, conſidering the petitioners, as men entirely in the principles of the parliament of 1640, and as preſbyterians, gave them the name of whig, or ſour milk, formerly appropriated to the Scotch preſbyterians, and rigid covenanters. Theſe two denominations are too well remembered at this time.

[1680.] The whigs were directed by the earl of Shaftsbury, who looking upon the duke of York not only as his own, but alſo as the mortal enemy of his party, believed there was no medium between periſhing, or ruining that prince. To this end, he had made it his buſineſs to extol the duke of Monmouth, and render him the darling of the people, imagining, that when he had the people on his ſide, the ſupplanting the duke of York would not be impracticable. With this view it was, at leaſt as it is pretended, that the earl of Shaftſbury found means to ſpread a rumour, that the king was lawfully married to Mrs. Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother, and that the marriage contract was in a black box, in the cuſtody of ſir Gilbert Gerard. The king and the duke of York, eaſily perceived the tendency of this rumour, and therefore omitted nothing to undeceive the people. To this end the king called an extraordinary council the 26th of April, in which he declared, "That the report was altogether falſe, and that he thought himſelf obliged in honour and conſcience to have the matter thoroughly examined and ſearched into." Gerard appearing before the council, declared upon oath. "That he never had any ſuch writing, as was reported, committed to his charge, nor did he ever ſee or know of ſuch writing." In ſhort, after many fruitleſs enquiries after the author of the report, the king was forced to content himſelf with publiſhing, the 3d of June, a declaration, to confirm one made January the 6th, and another made March the 3d, which was entered in the council-books, and ſigned by ſixteen privy councillors, wherein he ſaid, "That to avoid any diſpute which might happen in time to come, concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, he did declare in the preſence of Almighty God, that he never gave, nor made any contract of marriage, nor was married to Mrs. Barlow, alias Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother, nor to any other woman whatſoever, but to his preſent wife queen Katherine, then living[q]."

This ſummer were ſeveral proſecutions and trials, and the 23d of June, Roger Palmer earl of Caſtlemain, a papiſt, huſband to Barbara Villiers ducheſs of Cleveland, the king's miſtreſs, was brought to his trial and acquitted. Cellier the midwife, who had aſſiſted the lady Powis in the ſham plot, was likewiſe acquitted. Shortly after, ſhe publiſhed a narrative of her trial, with ſevere reflections upon ſome perſons, then in credit, for which ſhe was tried a ſecond time, and ſentenced to ſtand three times in the pillory, and pay a thouſand pounds fine. The grand jury found not the bill againſt the counteſs of Powis. Thus all the perſons concerned in the meal tub plot were acquitted. The torrent did not then run in favour of the party againſt the court.

Bedloe, the famous witneſs of the popiſh plot, died at Briſtol the 20th of Auguſt. Three or four days before his death, the lord chief juſtice North then on his circuit, viſiting him, Bedloe in his preſence ſigned the following depoſition:

"That the duke of York hath been ſo far engaged in the plot, as he hath ſeen by letters in cardinal Barbarini's

Ogilby's in this part of learning. He certainly writ Latin with great purity, and his verſion of Thucydides ſhews him a maſter of his own language. It is ſaid that his years improved his fears of death, and that he did not leave the world with the decency and reſignation of a philoſopher.—This year alſo died Mathew Poole, the compiler of the Synopſis Criticorum on the bible.

[n] Of the libels then publiſhed, that which made moſt noiſe, was an appeal from the country to the city.

[o] Theſe words were not in the king's proclamations, but in his anſwers to the London and Wiltſhire petitions.

[p] The firſt addreſs of this ſort came from the city of Weſtminſter, and was preſented by Francis Withons, Eſq; who was knighted for it. Kennet, p. 370.

[q] Kennet ſays that the late maſter of the Charter houſe, who was long in the ſervice of king Charles II. abroad, and had the care of mrs. Barlow, and buried her at Paris, ſaid poſitively, the king had never any intention to marry her, and that indeed ſhe did not deſerve it, being a very ill woman, p. 366. Note b.

ſecretary's ſtudy, that no part that hath been proved againſt any man already, that hath ſuffered, but that to the full thoſe letters have made him guilty of it; all but what tended to the king's death. And at Rome I aſked father Anderton and father Lodge, two jeſuits, what would the duke do with his brother when he was king? And they anſwered me, they would find a means for that; they would give him no trouble about it. Then I told them, I believed the duke loved his brother ſo well, he would ſuffer no violence to be done to him. They ſaid, no: if the duke could be brought to that, as he had been religiouſly to every thing elſe, they might do their work; their other buſineſs was ready, and they might do it preſently. But they knew they could not bring him to that point; but they would take care for that themſelves: they had not begun with him to leave him in ſuch ſcruples as that. But they would ſet him into his throne; and there he ſhould reign blindfold three or four days; for they had ſettled ſome they ſhould pitch the action upon, ſhould clear their party. And then he ſhould fly upon them with the ſword of revenge."

And this examinant doth further add, "That the queen is not, to this examinant's knowledge, nor by any thing he could ever find out, any way concerned in the murder of the king; but barely, by her letters, conſenting and promiſing to contribute what money ſhe could to the introducing the catholic religion. Nay, it was a great while, and it made her weep, before ſhe could be brought to that."

He alſo declared to the lord chief juſtice, "That he looked upon himſelf as a dying man, and found within himſelf, that he could not laſt long, but muſt ſhortly appear before the Lord of hoſts, to give an account of all his actions. And becauſe many perſons had made it their buſineſs to baffle and deride the plot, he did, for the ſatisfaction of the world there declare, upon the faith of a dying man, as he hoped for ſalvation, That whatever he had teſtified concerning the plot was true: and that he had wronged no man by his teſtimony, but had teſtified rather under than over what was truth;———and, that he had other things to diſcover, which were of great importance to the king and the country," with other matters of the like nature. In concluſion, his lordſhip was "deſired to repreſent to his majeſty his condition, and that his ſickneſs was very chargeable, and move his majeſty in his behalf for ſome ſupply of money for his ſubſiſtence."

This depoſition deſerves ſome remarks. The firſt, that it comes from a dying man, and who indeed died three days after. If the proteſtations of thoſe who had been condemned, either for the plot, or Godfrey's murder, may form a preſumption in their favour, I do not ſee why this of dying Bedloe ſhould not form the like, unleſs the point in queſtion is taken for granted, namely, that the condemned perſons were innocent, and Bedloe a villain for ſwearing againſt them. 2. Bedloe diſtinguiſhes perfectly the ſeveral articles of the plot, in that he accuſes the duke of York of being engaged in the plot, but acquits him from deſigning the king's murder. Now the plot, with regard to the government and religion, is ſo evident, and the part the duke of York had in it ſo clear from Coleman's letters, that nothing can better agree with Bedloe's depoſition. Thirdly, it is really improbable, that two jeſuits at Rome, directors of ſo important an affair, ſhould ſpeak ſo openly to Bedloe. But on the other hand, the manner of the king's death three or four years after Bedloe's, gives but too juſt cauſe to ſuſpect, there was foul play, and cauſes this improbability to vaniſh in part. Laſtly, Bedloe declared in his depoſition, "That whatever he had teſtified concerning the plot was true," and this laſt depoſition, far from giving room to ſuſpect it of falſhood, may rather create a belief, that it was not an invention, ſince, being ſo near death, he could have no inducement to acquit the duke of York upon one article, and accuſe him upon others, or even to trouble the chief juſtice with any depoſition at all.

This depoſition a little perplexes a famous hiſtorian, who in this part of his hiſtory undertakes to prove the plot to be a fiction. To free himſelf from this difficulty, he ſcruples not to oppoſe his own authority to Bedloe's depoſition. "We know not, ſays he, how to ſpeak ſoftly of the dying words of one hardened by many years villanies; but muſt expreſly declare, that as to his public oaths he did not only ſwear to the moſt ſhocking improbabilities, but ſometimes changed, and other times contradicted his own evidence." After this authority no man, doubtleſs, will regard this laſt depoſition of Bedloe, otherwiſe than as a continuation of the crimes he had been guilty of, in falſly ſwearing there was a plot, when in reality there was none.

The city of London was then in the country party, which gave it great reputation. The choice, on Midſummer day, for ſheriffs, fell upon two famous preſbyterians, by a majority of voices, both accounted fanatics by the contrary party[r]. Theſe were Slingſby Bethel, and Henry Corniſh, who took care to qualify themſelves by receiving the ſacrament in the church of England, abjuring the covenant, and doing every thing as appointed by act of parliament. While this election was depending, it was pretended, that Bethel's party had committed ſome violence againſt the other, which obliged the king to order a commiſſion of oyer and terminer to be iſſued out for the trial of the riot. Mean while, the two ſheriffs contrary to the king being choſen, Thomas Papillon, eſq; preſented an addreſs to the lord mayor, in the name of the city, wherein, after diſowning all tumultuous and diſorderly proceedings, and teſtifying an inviolable fidelity to the king, they deſired his lordſhip, "That he would in their names, humbly beſeech his majeſty, that the parliament might ſpeedily aſſemble." Whether the addreſs produced any effect, or the king had already taken his reſolution, a few days after, it was made known by a public proclamation, that the parliament ſhould ſit on the 21ſt of October.

While the time of the meeting of the parliament was yet remote and uncertain, the court party had ſome advantage, but, as it approached, the country party gained the ſuperiority. The duke of Monmouth was returned from Holland without leave[s], and inſtead of going to court, made ſeveral progreſſes in the kingdom to encourage his friends, and increaſe their number. This party were reſolved to run all hazards, and ruin themſelves or the duke of York, the next ſeſſion of parliament. To this end, the earl of Shaftſbury, attended by twelve lords and gentlemen of note, went publicly to Weſtminſter-hall, and at the king's bench bar, by a bill in form, preſented the duke of York as a popiſh recuſant[t]. The thing was but too true, and the whole kingdom was ſenſible of it. But till this time no man had dared to take ſuch a ſtep, which was conſidered as a formal deſign to break all meaſures with the duke. This action ſo ſurpriſed the three principal miniſters, that they concluded the contrary party muſt neceſſarily be aſſured beforehand of the reſolutions of the parliament. Wherefore, to ingratiate the king with the parliament, they adviſed him to ſend the duke of York into Scotland, believing it would not be in his power to ſupport him, if he left him in England, during the ſeſſion of the parliament. The king approving their reaſons, obliged the duke to return to Scotland, after repeated aſſurances, that he would never forſake him. So the duke departed the day before the meeting of the parliament, to the great ſatisfaction of his enemies, who hoped to ruin him more eaſily in his abſence.

At laſt, the parliament met the 21ſt of October, as the king had promiſed in his proclamation. In his ſpeech at the opening, he acquainted both houſes, "That he had made and perfected an alliance with the crown of Spain, ſuitable to that which he had before with the ſtates of the United Provinces, conſiſting of mutual obligations of ſuccour and defence. He aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to give them the fulleſt ſatisfaction their hearts could wiſh, for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, conſiſtent with preſerving the ſucceſſion of the crown in its due and legal courſe of deſcent. In order to this, he recommended to them to purſue the further examination of the plot, with a ſtrict and impartial enquiry; neither thinking himſelf nor them ſafe till that matter was gone through with, and therefore it would be neceſſary that the lords in the Tower ſhould be brought to their ſpeedy trial, that juſtice might be done.———He told them, it would be impoſſible without their ſupport to preſerve Tangier, and therefore deſired their advice and aſſiſtance.———In concluſion, he recommended to them a perfect union with himſelf, and one another, as the only thing which could reſtore the kingdom to its antient ſtrength and vigour, and raiſe it up again to that conſideration which England had uſually had."

During this whole reign, the king's religion was ſo great

[r] The court was very jealous of this election, and underſtood it to be done on deſign to pack juries. Burnet, p. 481.

[s] He begged the king's leave to return; but when he ſaw no hope of obtaining it, he came over without leave. The king upon that would not ſee him, and required him to go back. But the earl of Shaftſbury adviſed him to make the progreſſes here mentioned, Burnet, p. 477.

[t] They that atteſted the bill were the earls of Huntington and Shaftſbury; the lords Grey of Werk, Brandon Gerard, Ruſſel and Cavendiſh; ſir Gilbert Gerard, ſir Edward Hungerford, ſir Scroop How, ſir William Cooper, ſir Thomas Wharton, John Trenchard, Thomas Thynne, and William Forreſter, eſquires. By the ſudden diſmiſſion of the grand jury, the matter had no conſequence in the forms of the court. Echard, t. III. p. 87[illegible] William a ſecret, that very few were acquainted with it. And therefore the king more boldly proteſted his zeal for the proteſtant religion, and on all occaſions declared, he would maintain it againſt the attempts of the papiſts. Theſe proteſtations might then have ſome effect, ſince it is very natural for a king to favour his own religion. But ſince it has been certainly known, that Charles II. was a papiſt, had abjured the proteſtant religion before his reſtoration, and profeſſed, though ſecretly, the popiſh religion, theſe ſo ſolemn and ſo frequent proteſtations muſt be thought very ſtrange, being intended only to deceive his ſubjects.

After the ſpeaker [u] was choſen, and approved by the king, the houſe of commons immediately diſcovered what was to be expected from them, by expelling ſome of their members, for having been abhorrers. But not content with puniſhing their own members, they ordered an addreſs to be preſented to the king, to remove from all public offices ſir George Jefferies, ſerjeant at law, recorder of London, and chief juſtice of Cheſter, as guilty of the ſame crime, and a betrayer of the rights of the ſubject.

As this was a new parliament, and as the affair of the plot was to be reſumed at the king's own deſire, the witneſſes who had already depoſed, laid before the houſe their informations, and were joined by Dangerfield, Jennifon, Dugdale, and one Turberville, a new evidence. Some likewiſe came from Ireland. Upon a report made to the houſe, that Dr. Tonge, who had firſt diſcovered the plot to the king, had received no gratuity, he was now recommended to his majeſty for the firſt good eccleſiaſtical preferment that fell in his gift. But the doctor was diſappointed of the benefit of this recommendation, by leaving the world not long after. The king on this occaſion diſcovered no leſs zeal than the commons, and iſſued out a proclamation, with a promiſe of his pardon to any perſon who ſhould, within two months, give farther information and evidence concerning the horrid and execrable popiſh plot.

But this diſſimulation was not capable of deceiving the commons. Five days after the opening of the parliament, the 26th of October, the lord Ruſſel moved, "That they might in the firſt place take into conſideration how to ſuppreſs popery, and prevent a popiſh ſucceſſor." He was ſeconded by ſir Henry Capel, brother to the earl of Eſſex, who, in a long ſpeech, related what had been done to the prejudice of the kingdom during the preſent reign. He aſcribed the whole to popiſh counſels. He ſpoke of the firſt Dutch war; of the diviſion of the fleet; of the affair of Chatham; of the fire of London; of the diſcharge of the priſoners concerned in that wicked act, without trial; of the violation of the triple league; of the ſeizing the Dutch Smyrna fleet before war was proclaimed; of the ſecond Dutch war; of the permiſſion to the Iriſh papiſts to wear arms; of the alteration of the government of Scotland, by lodging it in a commiſſioner and a council, beſides an army of twenty thouſand men. He ſaid, the papiſts were emboldened to act any thing, by the hopes of having the duke of York for king: that they were moreover encouraged by the French embaſſador, who by his frequency at court, ſeemed to be rather one of the family, and of this king's houſhold, than a foreign embaſſador; and by his free recourſe to his majeſty, rather a prime miniſter of ſtate of this kingdom, than a counſellor to another prince: that ſince all theſe irregularities and enormities proceeded from the popiſh party, ſupported by the duke of York, it was high time to think of ſome effectual expedient to prevent popery and a popiſh ſucceſſor.

Several other members ſpoke to the ſame effect, ſome more, ſome leſs; and no man offered to vindicate the duke, or ſpeak in his behalf, till the houſe came to the two following reſolves, upon the 2d of November.

"1. That the duke of York's being a papiſt, and the hopes of his coming ſuch to the crown, hath given the greateſt countenance and encouragement to the preſent deſigns and conſpiracies againſt the king and the proteſtant religion.

"2. That in defence of the king's perſon and government, and proteſtant religion, this houſe doth declare, that they will ſtand by his majeſty with their lives and fortunes, and that if his majeſty ſhould come to any violent death, which God forbid, they will revenge it to the utmoſt of their power on the papiſts."

Upon theſe two votes, the lord Ruſſel moved for a committee to bring in a bill to diſable the duke of York from inheriting the crown. This affair was now debated with great ſpirit in ſeveral eloquent ſpeeches on both ſides the queſtion. The ſubſtance of what was urged for the bill was, that the evils which the kingdom had felt, and ſtill laboured under, proceeded from popiſh counſels, begun and headed by the duke of York: That the danger muſt be extreme, ſhould he ever enjoy the crown. That it might be read in ſcripture, "That one man ought to die for a nation, but not that three nations ſhould die for one man." The oppoſers of the bill offered not to ſhew there was no danger in a popiſh king. This they were willing to ſuppoſe, but pretended that there were other expedients to prevent this danger than that of excluſion. That beſides, it could not be expected that the duke of York, and many others would ſubmit to this law, the conſequence whereof would be a civil war, in which the duke of York would be ſupported by all the princes of Europe.

To this objection it was anſwered, that no expedient could be thought of to ſecure the proteſtant religion under a popiſh prince, who would have a popiſh council, popiſh judges, popiſh magiſtrates and deputy-lieutenants, popiſh commanders at ſea and land, nay, and popiſh biſhops too. That the excluding the duke from the ſucceſſion, was no depriving him of his right to the crown, of which he had rendered himſelf incapable, by embracing a religion contrary to that of the kingdom. For a popiſh king and proteſtant ſubjects were irreconcileable.

The others replied, there was no law which, for a difference of opinion in religion, deprived any man of his right.

In concluſion, it was reſolved, "That a bill be brought in to diſable the duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of this realm."

Hitherto the court party had only ſkirmiſhed, as I may ſay, in hopes that an engagement might be avoided. But when this vote had paſſed, and the bill was read the firſt time, ſir Leoline Jenkins, ſecretary of ſtate, ſtood up and argued directly againſt it, by alledging:

"1. That it was contrary to natural juſtice, to condemn any man before the conviction, or the hearing of him.

"2. It was contrary to the principles of our religion, to diſpoſſeſs a man of his right, becauſe he differs in point of faith.

"3. He was of opinion, that the kings of England had their right from God alone, and that no power on earth could deprive them of it.

"4. It was againſt the oath of allegiance, taken in its own ſenſe, without jeſuitical evaſions; which binding all perſons to the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, the duke, as preſumptive heir, muſt be underſtood."

The advocates for the bill anſwered to the firſt objection; that not only the duke of York's intereſts were concerned, but thoſe of the whole kingdom; and that if the duke of York had withdrawn at the time the parliament was going to meet, his abſence ought not to prevent their providing for the good of the kingdom. To the ſecond objection it was anſwered, that in eſtabliſhing for principle, that difference of opinion in religion ought to be no cauſe for diſpoſſeſſing any man of his right, all the acts of parliament made ſince the reformation againſt papiſts and ſectaries were condemned, who, as ſubjects, had rights in common with the reſt, of which nevertheleſs it was thought expedient to deprive them, on account of the dangers to which the kingdom would be expoſed, if they were left in the enjoyment of them. That this was a maxim generally received in all ſtates, proteſtant or popiſh. That it was very true, the ſubjects of a different religion might be injured by being deprived of their rights; but that this injury proceeded not from the government's having no right to take this precaution, but from taking it unſeaſonably and groundleſly, through prejudice, pride, paſſion, revenge and hatred. To the third objection it was anſwered, That allowing the principle, that the kings of England had their right from God alone, it ſhould at leaſt have been ſpecified wherein conſiſted this right, and it would never be proved, that the kings of England were inveſted with power from God, to alter the conſtitution, or introduce a new religion at pleaſure. But, if by this right was underſtood only that of the ſucceſſion, the principle was falſe, as might be proved by many inſtances in the Engliſh ſucceſſion; for all the kings and queens ſince Henry VII. mounted the throne by virtue of an act of parliament, which had ſettled the ſucceſſion upon the poſterity of that prince, and had ſince been confirmed by others. It was replied to the fourth objection, that the oath of allegiance, which bound the ſubject to the king's heirs and ſucceſſors, was to be underſtood, when thoſe heirs and ſucceſſors were on the throne, and not while they were yet ſubjects. But ſuppoſing even the oath to be meant of an engagement to acknowledge for king the next heir, it certainly became void, if that heir rendered himſelf incapable of ſucceeding by his ill conduct. That the laws which impoſed oaths had always in view a certain conſtitution of government, which they ſuppoſed conſtant and unalterable, becauſe all caſes that might happen could not be foreſeen. But that it could not be denied, there were poſſible caſes in which theſe oaths would become entirely null; as for example, if the preſumptive heir ſhould declare openly againſt the conſtitution of the ſtate, and clearly diſcover, that he intended to alter it when on the throne. And if in that caſe it was pretended, the ſubject was ſtill bound by his oath of allegiance to this ſucceſſor, the plain meaning of the oath would be, that the ſubjects bound themſelves to ſlavery, whenever the prince ſhould think fit to impoſe it, which was abſurd. In fine, that the parliament was the ſole judge of ſuch caſes.

But the advocates for the bill, not contented with replying to Jenkins's objections, added likewiſe other reaſons to demonſtrate the legality, the expedience, the neceſſity, of the excluſion of the duke of York. They proved the firſt point by precedents taken from the hiſtory of England, by which they demonſtrated, that, on ſeveral occaſions, the parliament had really diſpoſed of the crown in a different manner from the uſual cuſtom. Edward III. was acknowledged king in his father's life time, and Henry IV. while Richard II. was ſtill living. The parliament moreover granted the crown to Henry IV. and ſettled the ſucceſſion in his poſterity, contrary to the known and natural right of the earl of March, who was next heir to Richard II. Then they ſettled the crown upon the duke of York, and his poſterity, after the death of Henry VI. though Henry had a legitimate ſon living. After the houſe of York had enjoyed the crown for three ſucceſſive reigns, though that houſe had a numerous iſſue, the parliament transferred the crown to Henry VII. and his poſterity. They gave a power to Henry VIII. to name his ſucceſſors, and ſettle the ſucceſſion as he ſhould think proper. Laſtly, on the ſucceſſion of James I. to the crown, though no act was demanded by him to confirm his right, the parliament however made one, in order not to loſe their own. As to the objection, that theſe princes were poſſeſſed of the crown when theſe acts were made, it ought to be obſerved, that though they had the power in their hands, and were in poſſeſſion, they thought fit to demand the parliament's confirmation as a thing abſolutely neceſſary to juſtify their right. In fine, it was impoſſible for the parliament, conſidered as conſiſting of king, lords, and commons, to act any thing contrary to the laws, ſince their power of repealing old, and enacting new, laws could not be diſputed. That the ſupreme and abſolute authority reſides in the parliament compoſed of king and both houſes. For what is the parliament but a body conſiſting of all the members of the ſtate, to which no power on earth hath a right to preſcribe? To ſay therefore, that the parliament can act unjuſtly againſt the laws, is to ſay, that all the members of the ſame body may act unjuſtly to themſelves, and be reſponſible for this injuſtice, which is an abſurdity not to be defended.

As to the fitneſs and benefit of the bill, it was not neceſſary to uſe many arguments to ſhew, that it was expedient and fit, that the government and religion ſhould be ſecured, and the people delivered from their fears and ſuſpicions. It could not even be denied, that the excluſion of the duke of York would be attended with theſe advantages. But as it could not be ſuppoſed, that the duke of York and his adherents, would ſubmit to the bill, which might occaſion a civil war, wherein the duke might be ſupported by foreign aid, to this objection it was anſwered, that it was better to hazard ſuch a war, than be expoſed to a more certain danger, namely, of ſeeing the laws and religion invaded by a popiſh prince.

But it was principally to demonſtrate the neceſſity of the excluſion bill, that the advocates for it diſplayed all their wit and eloquence. They maintained, that all precautions to limit the power of a popiſh prince, would be fruitleſs, becauſe his promiſes and oaths could not be relied on, from which the pope, through a motive of religion, could abſolve him. That before the reformation, the reign of Henry VII. furniſhed very remarkable inſtances, and it did not appear, that popes, ſince the reformation, had relinquiſhed their principles. That beſides, the duke of York's zeal for his religion and his principles concerning the government were well known, ſince the letters of his ſecretary and his intimate union with France had clearly ſhewn, he was not only diſpoſed to undertake any thing to ſupport the intereſts of his religion, but had even, for that end, engaged in meaſures very prejudicial to the ſtate. That it was to popiſh counſels and to the duke in particular, that the two Dutch wars, ſo contrary to the intereſts of England, were to be aſcribed.

That to him were owing the non-execution of the laws made againſt popiſh recuſants, the pernicious deſigns of the cabal, and that Coleman's letters made it as clear as the ſun, that he was the chief author of the frequent adjournments and prorogations of the parliament, at the very time they were employed in ſeeking expedients to ſave Europe, and the proteſtant religion from certain ruin. Other arguments were alſo alledged to prove, that all the precautions which could be taken, would be to no purpoſe, when the duke ſhould be on the throne. Firſt, it was ſaid, that his union with France would ſupply him with money, without his being obliged to apply to the parliament. That he might thereby maintain what forces he pleaſed, and having an army at his command, would be maſter of the kingdom, and free to perform or not perform the conditions on which he ſhould be raiſed to the throne. That with this army he might influence the elections, and procure ſuch a parliament as would ſubvert all poſſible precautions. That there was too much reaſon to believe, that the late army had been raiſed with this deſign, ſince, being certain, that it was not intended againſt France, it could only be deſigned againſt the ſubjects. Nay, it was likely, this was the intent of the expedient propoſed, that when the king ſhould happen to die, the parliament then in being, or the laſt that was in being, ſhould aſſemble and fit a competent time, without any new ſummons or elections, ſo that after the expiration of this competent time, the kingdom would fall into the inconvenience juſt mentioned. That if the tranſactions ſince the king's reſtoration were conſidered, it would be found, that nothing had been done with relation to the government, but what tended to ſubvert it and introduce popery. That the duke of York's influence in the king's counſels was well known: That tho' he was abſent, his adherents and creatures enjoyed the principal places in the court and kingdom, and that from him proceeded all the evils wherewith England was afflicted, and all the dangers the nation had to fear. That if after ſo manifeſt a diſcovery of his deſigns, after the laſt teſtimony of Bedloe on his death-bed, after all the evidence of an execrable plot againſt the ſtate and religion, the duke's ſincerity and flattering promiſes were to be truſted, the conſequence would be a too late and fruitleſs repentance. From theſe reaſons, and many others, it was inferred, that the excluſion bill was abſolutely neceſſary, and that the people juſtly expected from their repreſentatives this extraordinary precaution, to free them from their fears.

The court party were extremely embarraſſed. There were facts alledged againſt the duke which could not be anſwered, and there were others which they durſt not directly deny, for fear of farther diſputes, at a time when the torrent ran ſo high againſt the duke. Nay, very few ventured to appear openly for him. Amongſt theſe were ſir Leoline Jenkins ſecretary of ſtate, Mr. Hyde a privy counſellor, and one of the three who then managed the duke's affairs, Mr. Seymour, and one more. Sir Leoline Jenkins deſired the houſe to conſider, "That the duke of York was the king's brother, and ſon of Charles I. for whoſe memory the nation had a great veneration: that the duke was enriched with excellent endowments, which he had employed in the ſervice of the nation, by fighting their battles, and defending them from the oppreſſion of their enemies, and was only guilty of this one crime, which he hoped, upon a mature deliberation, would not deſerve ſo great a condemnation.———He remembered them, that there were laws already for the puniſhment of the crimes he was accuſed of, and therefore humbly conceived, they ought not to chaſtiſe him, by making a new law before any hearing." Mr. Hyde added———"I do not know that any of the king's murderers were condemned without being heard; and muſt we deal thus with the brother of our king?———It would conſiſt much better with the juſtice of the houſe, to impeach him, and try him, in a formal way, and then cut off his head, if he deſerve it. I will not, continued he, diſpute the power of parliaments; but I queſtion whether this law, if made, would be good in itſelf.———For aught I know, when you have made this law, it may have a flaw in it; if not, I am confident there are a loyal party, which will never obey, but will think themſelves bound by their oath of allegiance and duty, to pay obedience to the duke, if ever he ſhould come to be king, which muſt occaſion a civil war."—In the courſe of the debates on the bill, ſir Francis

Win-

Winnington alledged, "That an act of the thirteenth of Elizabeth made it treaſon for any man to ſay, that the parliament could not alter the ſucceſſion." To which Mr. Finch replied, "I will not ſay that acts of parliament cannot diſpoſe of the ſucceſſion, becauſe it was made treaſon by a ſtatute in the 13th of Elizabeth. But I will deny that the kings of England rule by virtue of any ſtatute law, as was ſuggeſted; for their right is by ſo antient a preſcription, as that it may juſtly be ſaid to be from God alone, and that no power on earth ought to diſpute it."

Though this queſtion was only accidentally raiſed and carried no farther, I think it ought not to paſs unregarded, becauſe it ſerves to diſcover the two opinions among the Engliſh, concerning the ſucceſſion. Some believe, that in extraordinary caſes the parliament has power to diſpoſe of the ſucceſſion, becauſe the parliament is ſuppoſed to include the whole nation, from the king to the meaneſt ſubject, and it is abſurd to diſpute the power of the whole nation united in one body, to order what is for their well being. Others maintain, that the ſucceſſion is unalterable, and admits not of any change, either by the nation in a body, or by the parliament. That if this is done, it is unjuſtly, and the parties concerned are not obliged to ſubmit to the parliament's deciſions. That ſuch changes were never made without cauſing troubles and civil wars in the kingdom; becauſe, as it is not in the power of the king to deprive the nation or the parliament of their rights, ſo neither is it in the power of the parliament to deprive the next heir of the ſucceſſion to which he is intitled by nature and birth. This queſtion has never been unanimouſly decided, but each party maintain their opinion, and determine according to the ſtrength of their reaſons. In all appearance, this diſpute will be ſtill long continued.

At laſt, after ſeveral days debates, the excluſion bill paſſed the houſe by a great majority. This bill was much the ſame with the other brought in during the laſt parliament, only it had this additional clauſe, "That, during the life of James duke of York, the act ſhould be given in charge at every aſſizes and general ſeſſions, and read openly in every cathedral, pariſh-church and chapel, twice every year immediately after divine ſervice, that is to ſay, on the 25th of December, and upon Eaſter day."

While the commons were proceeding on this bill, the king endeavoured to interrupt their debates by two meſſages. By the firſt he deſired them to expedite ſuch matters as were depending before them, relating to popery and the plot; aſſuring them, that all remedies they could tender to him, conducing to theſe ends, ſhould be very acceptable to him, providing they were ſuch as might conſiſt with preſerving the ſucceſſion of the crown in the legal courſe of deſcent.

Upon this meſſage an addreſs was preſented to the king by the houſe, in which they ſaid, "That though the time of their ſitting had not much exceeded a fortnight, yet they had in that time not only made a conſiderable progreſs in ſome things abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon, the effectual ſuppreſſion of popery, and the ſecurity of the religion, lives, and eſtates, of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects; but even in relation to the trials of the five lords impeached in parliament, they had ſo far proceeded, as they ſhould in a ſhort time be ready for the ſame. But they could not (without being unfaithful to his majeſty and their country) omit humbly to inform his majeſty, that their difficulties, even as to thoſe trials, were much increaſed, by the evil and deſtructive counſels of thoſe perſons who adviſed his majeſty, firſt to the prorogation, and then to the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, at a time when the commons were prepared for thoſe trials; as likewiſe by the many and long prorogations of the preſent parliament, before the ſame was permitted to ſit. That a principal evidence was unfortunately dead, between the calling and the ſitting of the parliament. That others had been taken off, or diſcouraged from giving their evidence. To prevent the like inconveniences for the future, they made it their humble requeſt to his majeſty, that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be prevailed upon by the like counſels, to do any thing which might occaſion either the deferring a full diſcovery of the the plot, or the preventing the conſpirators from being brought to ſpeedy and exemplary juſtice and puniſhment."——

The king's other meſſage was concerning Tangier, to recommend to the commons the preſervation of that place. But the houſe not being diſpoſed to content the king, inſtead of offering him money for the relief of Tangier, beſieged by the king of Morocco, took occaſion from the meſſage to conſider ſome of the court's proceedings in this reign. It was argued, "That they were indeed afraid of Tangier, but more afraid of a popiſh ſucceſſor:——they were unwilling to give any money, becauſe they remembered, when eleven hundred thouſand pounds were given for the building of ſhips, not one ſhip was built; and above two millions given to ſupport the triple league, when it was ſoon employed for the breaking of it; and twelve hundred thouſand pounds given for a war with France, when at the ſame time we were under private obligations for peace." Theſe were facts to which the friends of the court had nothing to reply, becauſe they were publicly known. They contented themſelves with demonſtrating the importance of Tangier to the Levant trade, and repreſenting, that the two millions expended on the Mole would be entirely loſt. In ſhort, as the commons had always in mind the excluſion bill, they took occaſion from this meſſage to preſent to the king a long addreſs, or rather remonſtrance, ſetting forth, in eighteen articles, the dangerous ſtate of the kingdom, with regard to popery. But it was not ſo much to acquaint the king with theſe dangers, as to repreſent them to the people, that they might think the excluſion bill leſs ſtrange. The ſubſtance of theſe eighteen articles was as follows:

"1. That Tangier had been ſeveral times under the command of popiſh governors; that the ſupplies ſent thither, had been in great part made up of popiſh officers and ſoldiers, and that the Iriſh papiſts had been moſt countenanced and encouraged.

"2. That here at home the endeavours and attempts of the popiſh party had been ſo bold and ſucceſsful, that it was a matter of admiration to them, and which they could only aſcribe to an over-ruling providence, that his majeſty's reign was ſtill continued over them, and that they were yet aſſembled to conſult the means of their preſervation.

"3. That this bloody and reſtleſs party had found countenance and protection from the laws made againſt them: that they had found means to diſgrace their oppoſers; and if they were judges, juſtices of the peace, or other magiſtrates, to have them turned out of commiſſion: ſo that after ſome time, they became able to influence matters of ſtate and government; and thereby to deſtroy thoſe that they could not corrupt.

"4. The continuance and prorogation of parliaments, had been accommodated to ſerve the purpoſes of that party.

"5. Money raiſed upon the people to ſupply his majeſty's extraordinary occaſions, had, by the prevalence of popiſh counſels, been employed to make war upon a proteſtant ſtate, and to advance and augment the dreadful power of the French king.

"6. That great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects were ſent into, and continued in the ſervice of that king: and even the miniſters of England were made inſtruments, to preſs the ſtates of Holland to accept of a demand from the French king, of admitting the public exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion.

"7. That if ever any command were given for thoſe laws to be put in execution againſt papiſts, even from hence they gained advantage to their party, while the edge of thoſe laws was turned againſt proteſtant diſſenters, and the papiſts eſcaped in a manner untouched.

"8. That the teſt act had little effect; for the papiſts, either by diſpenſations obtained from Rome, ſubmitted to thoſe teſts, and held their offices themſelves; or thoſe put in their places were ſo favourable to their intereſts, that popery itſelf had rather gained than loſt ground ſince that act.

"9. That a popiſh ſecretary, ſince executed for his treaſons, had maintained a correſpondence at Rome, and in the courts of other foreign princes, for the ſubduing (to uſe their own words) that peſtilent hereſy which had ſo long domineered over this northern world.

"10. That out of theſe counſels and correſpondencies, was hatched that damnable and helliſh plot, by the good providence of God brought to light about two years ſince.

"11. That when this accurſed conſpiracy was firſt diſcovered, the papiſts began to ſmother it, with the barbarous murder of a juſtice of the peace, within one of his majeſty's own palaces.

"12. That amidſt theſe diſtractions and fears, popiſh officers for the command of forces were allowed upon the muſters, upon ſpecial orders counterſigned by a ſecretary of ſtate: and in like manner, about fifty new commiſſions were granted about the ſame time to known papiſts.

" 13. That when, in the next parliament, the houſe of commons were prepared to bring to a legal trial the principal conſpirators in this plot, that parliament was firſt prorogued, and then diſſolved: and the interval between the calling and ſitting of this parliament had been ſo long, that the papiſts had gained time and advantage of covering their paſt crimes, and practiſing them more effectually.

" 14. That witneſſes had been corrupted, not only by promiſes of reward, but of the favour of his majeſty's brother.

" 15. That divers of the moſt conſiderable of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects had crimes of the higheſt nature forged againſt them, the charge to be ſupported by ſubornation and perjury, that they might be deſtroyed by forms of law and juſtice.

" 16. That a preſentment being prepared for the grand jury of Middleſex, againſt the duke of York, the grand jury were, in an unprecedented and illegal manner, diſcharged; and that with ſo much haſte and fear, leſt they ſhould finiſh that preſentment, that they were prevented from delivering many other indictments, by them at that time found againſt other popiſh recuſants.

" 17. That becauſe a pamphlet came out weekly, called, The weekly packet of advice from Rome, expoſing popery, as ridiculous, to the people, as it deſerved, a new and arbitrary rule of court, was made in the King's Bench (rather like a ſtar chamber than a court of law) that the ſame ſhould not for the future be printed by any perſon whatſoever.

" 18. That notwithſtanding all the proclamations for the baniſhing papiſts from about this great city, and reſidence from his majeſty's court, and the parliament; yet great numbers of them, and that of the moſt dangerous ſort, did daily reſort hither, and abide here."

" For all which reaſons, the commons intreated his majeſty, that none but perſons of ſincere affection to the proteſtant religion, might be put into any employment civil or military, that whilſt they gave a ſupply to Tangier, they might be aſſured they did not augment the ſtrength of their popiſh adverſaries, nor increaſe their own dangers. But that if his majeſty ſhould vouchſafe to grant their deſires, they ſhould not only be ready to aſſiſt him in defence of Tangier, but do whatſoever elſe ſhould be in their power to enable him to protect the proteſtant religion and intereſt at home and abroad."

Two days after this mortifying addreſs, on the 15th of November [x], the excluſion bill was ſent up to the houſe of lords [y]. It paſſed only by two voices upon the firſt reading. But on the ſecond reading it was thrown out by a ſuperiority of ſixty three, againſt thirty. Of fourteen biſhops that day in the houſe, three only gave their votes for, and eleven againſt the bill [z]. The king was preſent at the whole debate, which laſted till near midnight.

It was a great mortification to the commons, to ſee their favourite bill thus thrown out by the lords. They grew ſo ſullen and out of humour, that they fell upon ſeveral members of their own houſe, expelling ſome, and impeaching and impriſoning others, as well as upon perſons not of their houſe [a] for being abhorrers, or for having adviſed and aſſiſted in drawing up the proclamation againſt petitioning for the ſitting of the parliament. But this ſerved only to diſcover their rage at their diſappointment concerning the excluſion bill [b].

On the 30th of November, a new ſcene was opened, namely, the trial of William Howard, lord viſcount Stafford, one of the five popiſh lords in the Tower, who were accuſed of being concerned in the plot. He was tried before the lords in Weſtminſter-hall, the chancellor being appointed by the king to perform the office of high ſteward. The managers for the commons began with the plot in general, and laid open the malice, wickedneſs, and horror, of ſo dreadful, bloody, and helliſh a deſign: They ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the expreſs poſitive oaths of the witneſſes, upon whom the credit of the plot depended: they expatiated on Coleman's letters and others, clearly proving the deſigns, and activity of the writers: they preſſed home the execrable murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, charged upon the papiſts, as well by the oaths of ſelf-acknowledged partners in the fact, as by a letter ſent from London to Tixall, intimating this very murder, the third day after it was committed: they fully diſplayed the ſham plots, and counter contrivances, whereby the papiſts would have ſuborned the king's evidence, and turned all the guilt upon his majeſty's loyal ſubjects: they urged the firing the city, the burning the navy, the calling in French armies, wild Iriſh, Spaniſh pilgrims, &c. They recapitulated the ſeveral trials of Ireland, Whitebread, Langhorn, &c. and alledged the votes of both houſes of parliament, declaring the plot. To corroborate all which, they repeated the cruelties of queen Mary, the French and Iriſh maſſacres, the powder plot, &c. And they anatomiſed the wicked principles and practices of murdering, lying, equivocating, forſwearing, faithbreaking, &c. imputed to the papiſts, as held by them lawful and meritorious. In fine, they produced witneſſes to prove the plot in general, but chiefly three appeared againſt the accuſed lord, namely, Dugdale, Oates, and Turberville.

1. Dugdale ſwore, "That at a certain meeting held at Tixall in Staffordſhire, about the end of Auguſt, or beginning of September 1678, the lord Stafford, with lord Aſton, and others, did in the preſence of the witneſſes, give his full conſent, to take away the king's life, and introduce the popiſh religion. And that on the 20th, or 21ſt of September, in the forenoon, the lord Stafford ſent for the witneſs to his chamber, while he was dreſſing; and, turning his ſervant out, offered him five hundred pounds for his charges and encouragement, to take away the king's life; and further told him, he ſhould have free pardon of all his ſins, and be ſainted; for the king had been excommunicated, and was likewiſe a traytor, and a rebel, and an enemy to Jeſus Chriſt."

Oates ſwore, "That in the year 1678, both in Spain and at St. Omer's, he ſaw ſeveral letters, ſigned Stafford, wherein his lordſhip aſſured the jeſuits of his fidelity and zeal, in promoting the catholic cauſe; that in 1678, being in London, his lordſhip came to the chamber of father Fenwich, ſince executed; and there, in his preſence received a commiſſion from him, to be paymaſter general to the Army: whereupon his lordſhip ſaid, he muſt of neceſſity go down into the country to take account how affairs ſtood there; and did not doubt, but at his return, Grove ſhould do the buſineſs. And, ſpeaking of the king, he further added, he hath deceived us a great while, and we can bear no longer."

Turberville gave an account of "diſobliging his friends, by leaving his friar's habit at Doway; and thereupon went into France, in the year 1675, where at Paris, getting acquaintance with his lordſhip, he propoſed to the witneſs, a way, both to retrieve his reputation with his friends, and make himſelf happy; and this was by taking away the life of the king of England, who was a heretic, and a rebel againſt God Almighty. That when he took leave of him, his lordſhip appointed to meet him at London; but he ſoon after returned into France, not being willing to undertake the propoſals, and was diſcountenanced by his friends, and reduced to poverty."

The accuſed lord, in his defence, alledged many things to invalidate the credit of the plot, and particularly, the reputation of theſe three witneſſes.

Againſt Dugdale he produced evidence, "That he was a perſon of an infamous life; that he had cheated the lord Aſton, his maſter, and defrauded the workmen and ſervants of their wages; that by his extravagancies and miſdemeanours, he had run himſelf into ſeveral hundred pounds debt, for which he was thrown into goal, and deſpaired of ever getting out from thence, otherwiſe than by making the pretended diſcoveries. In the next place, that he had directly perjured himſelf, in divers parts and circumſtances,

They alſo voted to proceed for high crimes and miſdemeanours againſt ſir Francis North chief juſtice of the common pleas, ſir Thomas Jones one of the judges of the king's bench, and ſir Richard Weſton one of the barons of the exchequer: and to impeach the lord chief juſtice Scroggs of high treaſon. In the houſe of lords the earls of Eſſex and Shaftſbury argued moſt for it: and the earl of Halifax (who was for limitations) was the champion on the other ſide. For which, when the bill was thrown out, the commons voted an addreſs to the king to remove lord Halifax from his counſels and preſence for ever, pretending it was for his adviſing the diſſolution of the laſt parliament. Burnet, p. 482.

as to the time and place, in this and other depoſitions." And further he proved, "That he had endeavoured to ſuborn divers perſons to make falſe oaths, and ſo to ſtrengthen his own by other men's perjury."

Againſt Oates he enlarged upon the great improbabilities, "That ſo many great and rich conſpirators, who had truſted him with their greateſt ſecrets, and whoſe lives were at his mercy, ſhould ſuffer him to be reduced to ſuch a wretched degree of beggary, as he was acknowledged to be in when he made his firſt diſcoveries. He likewiſe inſiſted upon his omiſſions, additions, and contradictions, that plainly appeared in his ſeveral depoſitions about the plot, and alſo upon his villainous feigning himſelf to be of another religion, by ſolemn renunciations of his faith, and by ſuch ſacraments on one ſide, and ſuch abjurations and execrations on the other, as rendered him unfit to be admitted for an evidence againſt any man living."

As to Turberville, he urged, "That he was perjured in this, and many other of his depoſitions; and that his narrative had many miſtakes and blunders in it. He denied that he or any of his ſervants, ever ſaw him at Paris; and made ſome remarks upon his poverty and want, his looſe manner of living, his ſhameful curſing and ſwearing, and particularly his uſing theſe words, God damn me! There is no trade good now, but that of a diſcoverer."

This defence, as is eaſily ſeen, could not well be more weak, and yet it laſted a whole week, and the account of this trial makes a ſmall volume in folio, containing in ſubſtance only what I have ſaid. The accuſations and depoſitions were expreſs, and the priſoner's defence conſiſted, 1. In an abſolute denial of the crime for which he was impeached. But this denial could be of no ſervice to him, as it is not what the judges go by. 2. In ſeveral allegations againſt the witneſſes. But bare allegations without proofs, are not wont to juſtify the accuſed. 3. In an improbability alledged againſt Oates, that if he had been ſo well acquainted with the ſecrets of ſo many rich men, they would never have ſuffered him to be reduced to ſuch want. To this the lords doubtleſs paid the regard, they thought it deſerved. But, methinks, ſuch an improbability cannot be ſaid to make a convincing proof in favour of the priſoner. 4. In a witneſs who depoſed, that Dugdale was a perſon of an infamous life, and guilty of ſeveral cheats. On which, I cannot forbear repeating what I ſaid on a like occaſion, that if in a plot againſt the king or the ſtate, only witneſſes of honeſty and reputation were to be allowed, there would be danger of always wanting evidence, becauſe ſuch plots are commonly diſcovered by the accomplices, and ſeldom any but villains are concerned.

However this be, after the lord Stafford had made a long and pathetic ſpeech, and in the preſence of God proteſted his innocence, he was found guilty by fifty-five votes againſt thirty-one. The lord high ſteward aſked him, "What he could ſay for himſelf, why judgment of death ſhould not paſs upon him, according to law?" He replied, "My lord, I have very little to ſay; I confeſs, I am ſurprized at it, for I did not expect it. But God's will be done; I will not murmur at it. God forgive thoſe that have falſely ſworn againſt me."

Sentence being paſſed upon him, ſeveral of his relations and acquaintances were urgent with him to make diſcoveries of all he knew, as the only means to ſave his life; to which he anſwered, that he was willing, out of a meer ſenſe of duty, without any temporal view, to diſcover the utmoſt of what he knew. Whereupon, he was brought to the bar of the lords, where he declared things known to all the world, but ſaid nothing of what was wiſhed to be known.

He ſaid, "That he thought it no crime for any man to wiſh his neighbour might be of the ſame religion, wherein he himſelf hoped to be ſaved; nay, to ſeek and promote it by ſuch ways as the laws of God and the nation allow. That there had been, on ſeveral occaſions, endeavours uſed to obtain an abrogation, or at leaſt a mitigation of ſeverities againſt the catholics; but no otherwiſe than by legal and parliamentary means. That he himſelf at Breda propounded a hundred thouſand pounds to the king, for the taking off the penal laws againſt them. That a bill had been brought into the houſe of lords in their favour, but was quaſhed by chancellor Hyde. That the earl of Briſtol had made ſome propoſals with no better ſucceſs. That he had offered ſome propoſals to the duke of York, the chancellor, and the earl of Shaftſbury, which laſt ſaid, He doubted not but that there would come great advantages to the king by it." But this pretended confeſſion not giving ſatisfaction to the lords, he was ſent back to the Tower.

The 29th of December he was beheaded, being ſixty eight years of age: He proteſted his innocence to his laſt moment.

The 15th of December, the king came to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, made a ſpeech to both houſes, which properly was but a repetition of that made at the opening of this ſeſſion, relating to his alliances with Spain and Holland for the repoſe of Chriſtendom, and concerning Tangier. After which he renewed his promiſe of concurring with them in any remedies for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, which might conſiſt with preſerving the ſucceſſion of the crown in its due and legal courſe of deſcent.

The commons returning to their houſe, inſtead of taking the king's ſpeech into conſideration, reſolved themſelves into a grand committee how to ſecure the kingdom againſt popery and arbitrary government. After a warm debate, they reſolved:

"That a bill be brought in immediately, to baniſh all the conſiderable papiſts out of the kingdom." And upon a farther debate on the miſchiefs and dangers of popery, they reſolved, "That it is the opinion of the committee, that as long as the papiſts have any hopes of the duke York's ſucceeding the king in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominions thereunto belonging; the king's perſon, the proteſtant religion, and the lives, liberties, and properties of all his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, are in apparent danger of being deſtroyed." Then upon reference made to an act of queen Elizabeth for an aſſociation; they came to a like reſolution: "That a bill be brought in for an aſſociation of all his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, for the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon, the defence of the proteſtant religion, and the preſervation of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, againſt all invaſions and oppoſitions; and for preventing the duke of York, or any other papiſt, from ſucceeding to the crown."

The houſe ſtopped not there. After conſidering of ways and means to ſecure the kingdom againſt popery and arbitrary government, they came to theſe three reſolves. 1. That it is the opinion of this houſe, that a bill be brought in, "For the more effectual ſecuring of the meetings and ſittings of parliament." 2 That it is the opinion of the houſe, that a bill be brought in, "that the judges may hold their places and ſalaries, Quam diu ſe bene geſſerint." 3. That it is the opinion of the houſe, that a bill be brought in, "againſt illegal exaction of money from the people, to make it high treaſon."

After theſe reſolves, each of which diſcovered their extreme diſtruſt of the court, they thought fit to conſider the king's ſpeech. Many ſevere reflections were made upon the French embaſſador, the French women, the duke, and his creatures, and indirectly even upon the king himſelf. At laſt they reſolved upon an addreſs to the king, by way of anſwer to his ſpeech, in which they repreſented:

"That this proteſtant kingdom can never be ſafe, while there is any hopes or expectation of a popiſh ſucceſſor; and they beſeech his majeſty, in his great wiſdom, to conſider, whether in caſe the imperial crown of this proteſtant kingdom ſhould deſcend to the duke of York, the oppoſition which may poſſibly be made to his poſſeſſing it, may not only endanger the further deſcent in the royal line, but even monarchy itſelf? They therefore become humble petitioners to his ſacred majeſty, that in tender commiſeration of his poor proteſtant people, his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to depart from the reſervation in the ſaid ſpeech; and when a bill ſhall be tendered to his majeſty in a parliamentary way, to diſable the duke of York from inheriting the crown, his majeſty will give his aſſent thereunto; as alſo to another act whereby his proteſtant ſubjects may be enabled to aſſociate themſelves for the defence of his majeſty's perſon, the proteſtant religion, and the ſecurity of his kingdom.—And as ſome farther means for the preſervation both of their religion and property, they are humble ſuitors to his majeſty, that from henceforth ſuch perſons only may be judges, as are men of ability, integrity, and known affection to the proteſtant religion, and that they may hold both their offices and ſalaries, Quam diu ſe bene geſſerint. That no one may bear the office of a lord lieutenant, but who is a perſon of integrity and known affection to the proteſtant religion. The deputy lieutenants, and juſtices of the peace, may be alſo ſo qualified, and men of ability, of eſtates, and intereſt in their country. That none may be employed as military officers, but men of known experience, courage, and affection to the proteſtant religion. And theſe their humble requeſts being obtained, they ſhall, on their part, be ready to aſſiſt his majeſty for the preſervation of Tangier, and for putting his majeſty's fleet into ſuch a condition, as it may preſerve his majeſty's ſovereignty of the ſeas, and be for the defence of the nation." The king king gave no anſwer to this addreſs till about a fortnight after.

While the king and the parliament were united, it was the intereſt of the papiſts to promote a toleration of the non-conformiſts, that they themſelves might enjoy the benefit under that general denomination. But ſince the king and the parliament were at variance, the perſecution fell upon the papiſts alone, who were accuſed of intending to introduce their religion by force. Wherefore, it was their intereſt to incenſe the church of England againſt the preſbyterians, and thereby cauſe a diverſion. It cannot be denied, that many of the biſhops and clergy fell into this ſnare, and were pleaſed to ſee the court, which always favoured the papiſts, inclined to perſecute the preſbyterians. Encouraged by the court, the moſt zealous of the epiſcopal way failed not to diſcover their hatred of the preſbyterians, ſo that at the very time, the papiſts were accuſed by the parliament as the authors of all the miſchiefs of the kingdom, the preſbyterians were attacked, as if it was intended to throw the blame upon them. By this the clergy of the church of England were cenſured for appearing to favour the deſigns of the papiſts. Beſides, it is certain, that during the conteſts between the king and the parliament, the clergy in general were attached to the court, and the intereſts of the duke of York. This was ſufficient to revive the complaints of the preſbyterians againſt the church of England, and to charge her with being popiſhly inclined. Moreover, in the diſpoſition of the court in favour of the papiſts, ever ſince the beginning of this reign, or at leaſt ſince the earl of Clarendon's diſgrace, it may eaſily be imagined, that care had been taken to introduce among the clergy, men of a doubtful religion, and from whom the court had nothing to fear.

Upon all theſe accounts, the commons thought it highly ſeaſonable at this juncture, to ſcreen the preſbyterians from perſecution. They found themſelves moreover concerned, in that, for the reaſon before intimated, there were many preſbyterians in the houſe, who to qualify themſelves for their election, had taken the oaths, and received the ſacrament in the church of England, but who were not for that the leſs preſbyterians. So, the 21ſt of December, a bill was read the firſt time, for uniting the king's proteſtant ſubjects. Whilſt the rigid epiſcopalians prevailed in the ſecond parliament of this reign, they had carefully avoided to diſtinguiſh the proteſtant non-conformiſts from the others, becauſe it was advantageous to them, to make them but one body under the ſame name. But this parliament which had other views, neglected not to make ſo natural a diſtinction. This bill, which perhaps was too indulgent to the preſbyterians, meeting with ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe, was relinquiſhed for one leſs advantageous, which exempted the proteſtant diſſenters from the penalty impoſed on the papiſts by the act of the 35th of Elizabeth. This bill paſſed both houſes, but was ſecretly conveyed away, when it was to be offered to the king for his aſſent [c].

The commons concluded the year with this vote, "That no member of the houſe ſhould accept of any office or place of profit from the crown, without leave of the houſe; nor any promiſe of any ſuch office or place of profit during ſuch time as he ſhould continue a member of the houſe [d]."

The king found himſelf very much at a loſs what anſwer to return to the commons addreſs. His council was divided. Some adviſed him to return no anſwer, and to uſe this pretence, that as he had addreſſed his ſpeech to both houſes, he could not conſider the particular addreſs of one houſe as an anſwer to his ſpeech. Others were of opinion, that the king ſhould return a poſitive anſwer, becauſe they little cared to keep any meaſures with the parliament, but on the contrary, (knowing their management of the king's affairs, would never be forgiven by the commons) they were indirectly doing all they could to engage him to diſſolve the parliament, and call no more for the future. Of this opinion were the four principal directors of the king's affairs, namely, Sunderland, Hallifax, Mr. Hyde, and Mr. Godolphin. When it is conſidered, that from the beginning of this reign, or at leaſt from the earl of Clarendon's diſgrace, there were not only men of theſe principles always in the council, but that alſo they were generally the chief miniſters, it can hardly be doubted, that the king himſelf was likewiſe of the ſame principles, though there ſhould be no other proof. It is therefore certain, that the fears of the commons were not groundleſs. It muſt be farther remarked, that though the council was divided concerning the manner of anſwering the commons addreſs, they were agreed as to the thing itſelf, not one privy councillor being of opinion, that the king ſhould conſent to the excluſion of the duke of York.

Though the king at firſt ſeemed to approve of the former of theſe two opinions, he ſuffered himſelf to be influenced by the latter, namely, to return a poſitive anſwer to the commons, which he did in the following manner:

"His majeſty received the addreſs of this houſe, with all the diſpoſition they could wiſh to comply with their reaſonable deſires, but upon peruſing it, he is ſorry to ſee their thoughts ſo wholly fixed upon the bill of excluſion, as to determine, that all other remedies for the ſuppreſſing of popery, will be ineffectual: his majeſty is confirmed in his opinion againſt that bill, by the judgment of the houſe of lords, who rejected it. He therefore thinks, there remains nothing more for him to ſay, in anſwer to the addreſs of this houſe, but to recommend to them the conſideration of all other means for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, in which they have no reaſon to doubt of his concurrence, whenever they ſhall be preſented to him in a parliamentary way: and that they would conſider the preſent ſtate of the kingdom, as well as the condition of Chriſtendom, in ſuch a manner as may enable him to preſerve Tangier, and ſecure his alliances abroad, and the peace and ſettlement at home. [e]"

This anſwer was not read in the houſe till three days after, becauſe the commons were employed in drawing up an impeachment againſt chief juſtice Scroggs, who was accuſed of endeavouring to ſtifle the belief of the plot, diſcouraging the king's evidences, diſmiſſing the grand jury, that ſhould have preſented the duke of York, and of unjuſtly proſecuting ſeveral writers and publiſhers of pamphlets. In this interval the lords ſent to the commons the following vote, "That they declared, and were fully ſatisfied, that there now was, and for divers years laſt had been a horrid and treaſonable plot, continued and carried on by the Iriſh papiſts, for maſſacring the Engliſh, and ſubverting the proteſtant religion, and the ancient eſtabliſhed government of that kingdom." The commons readily concurred to this vote, and added, "That the duke of York's being a papiſt, and the expectation of his coming to the crown, had given the greateſt countenance and encouragement thereto, as well as to the horrid popiſh plot in the kingdom of England."

When the king's anſwer was read in the houſe of commons, it raiſed great heats and complaints againſt the lords, for throwing out the bill of excluſion, in complaiſance to the king, or becauſe they were awed by his preſence. At laſt, after great debates, they came to theſe three reſolutions:

"1. That it is the opinion of this houſe, that there is no ſecurity nor ſafety for the proteſtant religion, the king's life, or government of this nation, without paſſing a bill for diſabling James duke of York, to inherit the imperial crown of this realm, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging: and to rely upon any other means and remedies, without ſuch a bill, is not only inſufficient but dangerous.

"2. That his majeſty, in his laſt meſſage, having aſſured this houſe, of his readineſs to concur in all other means for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, this houſe doth declare, that until a bill be likewiſe paſſed for excluding the duke of York, this houſe cannot give any ſupply to his majeſty, without danger to his majeſty's perſon, extreme hazard of the proteſtant religion, and unfaithfulneſs to thoſe by whom the houſe is intruſted.

"3. That all perſons who adviſed his majeſty, in his laſt meſſage to this houſe, to inſiſt upon an opinion againſt the bill for excluding the duke of York, have given pernicious counſel to his majeſty, and are promoters of popery, and enemies to the king and kingdom."

In purſuance of this laſt vote, the houſe came to a reſolution of preſenting to the king, an addreſs, to remove from his perſon and counſels, George earl of Halifax, Laurence Hyde, eſq. Henry Somerſet marquis of Worceſter, Henry Hyde earl of Clarendon, and Lewis Duras earl of Feverſham. Moreover they voted, That whoſoever ſhould hereafter lend, or cauſe to be lent, by way of advance, any money upon the [c] On the day of the prorogation, when the bill for repealing the act of the 35th of Elizabeth ought to have been offered to the king, the clerk of the crown, by the king's particular order, withdrew the ſaid bill. The king had no mind openly to deny it: but he had leſs mind to paſs it. So this indirect method was taken, which was a high offence in the clerk of the crown. Burnet, p. 395.

The

branches of the king's revenue arising by cuſtom, exciſe, or hearth money, ſhould be judged a hinderer of the ſitting of parliaments, and be reſponſible for the ſame in parliament. —And that whoſoever ſhould accept or buy any tally, or anticipation, upon any part of the king's revenue, ſhould be be adjudged as before.

The houſe of commons could hardly carry things any further, and ſeemed to intend to engage the king in ſome violent action, which might give an advantage againſt him. Thus had the parliament of 1640 behaved to Charles I. But Charles II. had one advantage wanted by his father, which was, that he had not, like him, deprived himſelf of the power to prorogue or diſſolve the parliament, and ſo could whenever he pleaſed, put an end to the mortifications which were given him. It is true, in ſuch a caſe he muſt have contented himſelf with his ordinary revenue, which, to a prince ſo prodigal as he, was not eaſy. It was this which made his enemies hope, he would come at laſt to their terms, and conſent to the excluſion bill. Indeed, if father Orleans may be credited, the ducheſs of Portſmouth threw herſelf at his feet, and prayed him not to ruin himſelf for the ſake of his brother [f]. Fagel, penſionary of Holland, ſent Mr. Sidney, the king's envoy at the Hague, a memorial repreſenting, that the king could not ſupport the duke of York, without relinquiſhing the intereſts of all Europe.

But this argument made no great impreſſion on the king's mind. On the contrary, theſe difficulties ſerved only to provoke him the more, ſo that he reſolved to prorogue the parliament. The commons having private notice of this, aſſembled more early than uſual, and, before the king came to the houſe of lords, the 10th of January, had time to paſs the following votes:

"1. That whoſoever adviſed his majeſty to prorogue the parliament, to any other purpoſe, than in order to paſſing a bill for the excluſion of James duke of York, is a betrayer of the king, the proteſtant religion, and of the kingdom of England, a promoter of the French intereſt, and a penſioner of France.

"2. That it is the opinion of this houſe, That the acts of parliament made in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and king James, againſt popiſh recuſants, ought not to be extended againſt proteſtant diſſenters.

"3. That it is the opinion of this houſe, That the proſecution of proteſtant diſſenters upon the penal laws, is at this time grievous to the ſubject, a weakening the proteſtant intereſt, an encouragement to popery, and dangerous to the peace of the kingdom."

Theſe votes were ſcarce paſſed, when the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, gave the royal aſſent to two or three acts of little importance [g], and then, the chancellor, by his order, prorogued the parliament to the 20th of January.

Three days after, the lord mayor and common council of London, preſented to the king an addreſs, for the ſitting of the parliament on the day appointed, that they might effect the great affairs before them. This addreſs ſerved only to exaſperate the king farther. Wherefore, by a proclamation, the 18th of January, he diſſolved the parliament. At the ſame time he ſummoned another to meet at Oxford the 21ſt of March, being offended with the city of London.

During theſe conteſts, the miniſters and privy councillors were not a little embarraſſed. They ſaw the houſe of commons ſo attached to the excluſion bill, that nothing elſe could ſatisfy them. On the other hand, they knew by experience, that on other important occaſions, the king had not ſhewn that firmneſs which his miniſters could have wiſhed, but had abandoned them, and come into the meaſures of the parliament. This made them fear, the ſame thing might happen on the preſent occaſion, and therefore, Robert Spencer earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate, went off the firſt, and, contrary to the king's expreſs order, voted for the excluſion bill in the houſe of lords. The earls of Eſſex and Saliſbury, privy councillors, did the ſame, and ſir William Temple ſufficiently teſtifies his fear of being expoſed to the houſe of commons. This conduct of ſome of the privy councillors, gave the country party hopes, that the king would at laſt comply if he was warmly preſſed.

But that party was diſappointed in their expectations. For, though the king had diſcovered no great firmneſs in all his difficulties, yet in the affair of his brother he was ever immoveable [h]. Immediately after the diſſolution of the parliament, he removed the earl of Sunderland from being ſecretary, and gave the place to the earl of Conway. He likewiſe ſtruck out of the council book, the names of the earls of Eſſex, Saliſbury, Sunderland, and ſir William Temple, and in their room put men whoſe principles were more agreeable to his own [i]. He likewiſe made ſome alteration among the judges. In a word, by the men whom he advanced, he ſufficiently diſcovered his intention to ſupport the duke of York his brother, let what would be the conſequence.

On the other hand, the contrary party to the court were not idle. The magiſtracy and common council of London, being of that party, haſtened the elections of members to ſerve in the enſuing parliament, and on the 4th of February re-choſe their old members [k]. The election was no ſooner over, than the new repreſentatives were preſented with a paper, in the name of the citizens of London then aſſembled in common hall, containing a "return of their moſt hearty thanks for their faithful and unwearied endeavours in the two laſt parliaments, to ſearch into and diſcover the depth of the popiſh plot; to preſerve his majeſty's royal perſon, the proteſtant religion, and the well eſtabliſhed government of this realm; to ſecure the meeting and ſitting of frequent parliaments; to aſſert their undoubted rights of petitioning, and to puniſh ſuch as have betrayed thoſe rights; to promote the long wiſhed for union of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects; to repeal the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the corporation act; and more eſpecially for their aſſiduous endeavours in promoting the bill of excluſion of James duke of York." In fine, they concluded, "That being confidently aſſured, that they, (the ſaid members for the city,) will never conſent to the granting any money ſupply, till they have effectually ſecured them againſt popery and arbitrary power, they reſolved, by God's aſſiſtance, to ſtand by their ſaid members with their lives and fortunes." The example of London was followed by moſt places in the kingdom, and not only the old members were re-elected [l], but papers of addreſſes, like that of London, were preſented to them. So, when the elections were over, the king with grief ſaw, he was going to meet the ſame parliament he had diſſolved.

Mean while, the king's precaution to call his new parliament at Oxford, gave great uneaſineſs to the country party. They were deſirous that the parliament ſhould ſit at Weſtminſter, where they were ſure of the aſſiſtance of the Londoners in caſe of need. And who knows, whether ſome did not propoſe to uſe, for paſſing the excluſion bill in the houſe of lords the ſame means formerly uſed to extort from the peers their conſent to the bill of attainder againſt the earl of Strafford? Be this as it will, they reſolved to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to have the place altered, and the parliament removed to Weſtminſter. For this purpoſe the earl of Eſſex, attended by fifteen lords [m], delivered a petition to the king, introducing it with the following ſpeech:

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

THE lords here preſent, together with divers other peers of the realm, taking notice, that by your late proclamation your majeſty had declared an intention of calling a parliament at Oxford; and obſerving from hiſtory and records, how unfortunate many aſſemblies have been, when called at a place remote from the capital city; as particularly the congreſs in [f] The true reaſon, according to Burnet, why the ducheſs of Portſmouth openly declared for the houſe of commons, and was ſo hearty for the excluſion was this: it was propoſed to her, that if ſhe could bring the king to the excluſion, the parliament would next preſs the king to declare the ſucceſſor to the crown; and as ſhe was abſolute miſtreſs of the king's ſpirit, ſhe might reckon the king would be prevailed on to declare her ſon his ſucceſſor. The duke of Monmouth, who had the ſame view, joined with her to carry on the excluſion; and they thought they were making tools of one another to ſerve their own ends, p. 487.

[h] He at firſt came in to the bill of excluſion, or ſeemed to do ſo. The ducheſs of Portſmouth and others perſuaded him to wave the duke of York's right, and accept of an act of parliament in his own favour, like that made in the reign of Henry VIII. by which he ſhould have a power veſted in him to diſpoſe of the crown at his death under ſuch reſtrictions and limitations as ſhould be agreed on. Whether ſuch act was really intended is hard to determine; but it is certain ſuch an offer was made to the king, with a promiſe of a conſiderable ſum of money, towards the ſupplying his preſſing wants. It is likewiſe certain, that king Charles ſeemed willing to accept of it, till the French court, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport the duke of York, ſtruck up a bargain with the king, to give him more money for refuſing, than had been offered him for conſenting to the bill of excluſion. [m] Namely the duke of Monmouth; the earls of Kent, Huntington, Bedford, Saliſbury, Clare, Stanford, Shaftſbury; the lords Mordaunt, Evers, Paget, Grey, Herbert, Howard, De la Mere. Kennet, p. 384.

Henry the ſecond's time at Clarendon; three ſeveral parliaments at Oxford in Henry the third's time, and at Coventry in Henry the ſixth's time; with divers others which have proved very fatal to thoſe kings, and have been followed with great miſchief on the whole kingdom: and conſidering the preſent poſture of affairs, the many jealouſies and diſcontents which are amongſt the people, we have great cauſe to apprehend, that the conſequences of a parliament now at Oxford, may be as fatal to your majeſty and the nation, as thoſe others mentioned have been to the then reigning kings. And therefore we do conceive, that we cannot anſwer it to God, to your majeſty, or the people, if we, being peers of the realm, ſhould not, on ſo important an occaſion, humbly offer our advice to your majeſty; that, if poſſible, your majeſty may be prevailed with to alter this (as we apprehend) unſeaſonable reſolution. The grounds and reaſons of our opinion are contained in this our petition, which we humbly preſent to your majeſty."

The petition contained in ſubſtance, an enumeration of the miſchiefs attending the many late adjournments, prorogations, and diſſolutions of parliament, at a time when his majeſty's perſon, and the whole nation were in ſuch imminent danger from the papiſts. "And now his majeſty had been prevailed to call another parliament at Oxford, where neither lords nor commons could be in ſafety, but daily would be expoſed to the ſword of the papiſts, and their adherents, of whom too many have crept into his majeſty's guards: the liberty of ſpeaking according to their conſciences, would be thereby deſtroyed, and the validity of their acts and proceedings left diſputable: the ſtraitneſs of the place no ways admitted of ſuch a concourſe of perſons, as now followed every parliament; and the witneſſes which were neceſſary to give evidence upon the commons impeachment, were unable to bear the charges of ſuch a journey, and unwilling to truſt themſelves under the protection of a parliament, that was itſelf evidently under the power of guards and ſoldiers. In concluſion, they prayed, that the parliament might, as uſually, ſit at Weſtminſter, where they might conſult, and act with ſafety and freedom."

To this addreſs the king returned no anſwer, but contented himſelf with frowning upon the lords who preſented it.

All this while the two parties were ſkirmiſhing in ſo hot, or rather ſo violent a manner, with their pens, that no meaſures were kept. Libels ſwarmed with impunity. Some pretend, this was a court artifice, to prevent the union of the proteſtants, and that ill language thrown out againſt the king and the duke of York, was patiently ſuffered, in order to caſt the blame on the preſbyterians, and give the epiſcopal party occaſion to return the imputation of being too much attached to the court. Thus much is certain, this diviſion, which was carefully fomented, turned to the king's advantage, as will hereafter appear. I ſhall relate upon this ſubject an affair which then made a great noiſe.

One Fitz Harris an Iriſh papiſt, who had free acceſs to the ducheſs of Portſmouth, and kept a correſpondence with her favourite woman mrs. Wall, and with the confeſſor of the French ambaſſador, having received ſeveral preſents, and particularly one of two hundred and fifty guineas, undertook to prevail with one Edmund Everard, to write a libel againſt the king. Everard feigned to conſent, and appointed a meeting to receive informations, by which his pamphlet was to be framed. But at the ſame time he communicated the affair to ſir William Waller, and mr. Smith, and cauſed them to be concealed in a place where they might hear what paſſed between Fitz Harris and him. The next day, being both together in a room, Fitz Harris told Everard, that he ſhould write a libel againſt the king upon the following heads.

That the king and royal family were papiſts, and arbitrarily affected from the beginning.

That Charles I. had a hand in the Iriſh rebellion, and that Charles II. did countenance the ſame, by preferring Fitz Gerald, Fitz Patrick, and Mount Garret, who were engaged in the ſaid rebellion.

That the act, forbidding to call the king a papiſt, was to ſtop mens mouths when he ſhould incline to favour popery; which appeared by his adhering ſo cloſely to the duke of York's intereſt, and hindering him from being proceeded againſt by the parliament, and hindering the officers put in by the duke, to be turned out; and for that the privy councillors and juſtices of the peace, who were for the proteſtant intereſt, were turned out of all places of truſt.

That it was as much in the power of the people to depoſe a popiſh poſſeſſor, as a popiſh ſucceſſor; and ſeeing there was no hopes that the Parliament, when they met at Oxford, could do any good, the people were bound to provide for themſelves.

Everard afterwards received theſe inſtructions in writing, and drew up his libel, which was injurious to the king, and full of ſedition [n]. This libel was to be diſperſed by the penny poſt to the proteſtant lords, and particularly to the leading preſbyterians, whoſe houſes were to be ſearched in order to find this libel, which was to ſerve as a proof of a conſpiracy formed by the preſbyterians againſt the government. This is what Everard affirmed, and that the whole came from the court. At laſt Waller having informed the king of the affair, the king ordered ſecretary Jenkins to iſſue out a warrant for apprehending Fitz Harris, and that Waller ſhould execute it. Yet he was no ſooner gone, but ſir William declared, he was informed by two worthy gentlemen, "That the king was highly offended with him, ſaying, he had broken all his meaſures." However, Waller arreſted Fitz Harris, and ſent him to Newgate [o].

Here, as in the former affair concerning the plot, it is pretended, that Fitz Harris was gained by promiſes or threats, to depoſe what has been ſeen [p]. But before this affair could be fully diſcovered, Fitz Harris was taken out of Newgate, and ſent to the Tower by the king's expreſs order. I ſhall enter no further into the particulars of this affair, but content myſelf with briefly ſaying, that ſhortly after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, when the court began to ſail with a proſperous gale, without being controlled by the parliament, Fitz Harris was brought to his trial; that the ducheſs of Portſmouth owned ſhe had given him money, but merely out of charity; that Fitz Harris continually inſinuated, that what he did was by the order of his ſuperiors, and that, after his death, his wife conſtantly affirmed that the libel was a court trick. In ſhort, he was condemned and executed, whilſt the public could not conceive for what reaſon an Iriſh papiſt had publiſhed a libel againſt the king, if it was not an artifice of the court. This affair began in February, and the laſt parliament had taken cognizance of it, ſo that the commons had ordered an impeachment againſt him, and when he was ſent to the Tower, declared, that for any inferior court to proceed againſt him or any other perſon lying under an impeachment of parliament, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament. He was nevertheleſs tried, condemned and executed, to the great diſappointment of the whigs, who hoped, by his means, to diſcover the artifices of the court. But the king and his party thought it for their advantage to be rid of a man, who might throw them into difficulties. He was not executed till June, after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament.

The meeting of this parliament was univerſally expected with the utmoſt impatience, and by the king, with great uneaſineſs, foreſeeing the ſtorm that was gathering. He repaired to Oxford ſeven or eight days before the opening, and as the ſuſpicions and fears of the whig party were then at the utmoſt height, it was thought the king went ſo ſoon to Oxford, on purpoſe to take meaſures beforehand, for rendering himſelf maſter of the parliament. Accordingly, the members manifeſtly ſhewed their fears of ſome violence, by going thither attended with armed retinues. Thoſe for the city of London in particular came with a numerous body of well armed horſe, having ribbands in their hats, with theſe words woven in them, No Popery! No Slavery! The parliament meeting the 21ſt of March, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes [q]

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE unwarrantable proceedings of the laſt houſe of commons, were the occaſion of my parting with the laſt parliament; for I, who will never uſe arbitrary government myſelf, am reſolved not to ſuffer it in others. I am unwilling to [n] It was intitled, The true Engliſhman ſpeaking plain Engliſh.

[o] Burnet ſays, Fitz Harris framed the libel himſelf, and only ſhewed it to Everard, who believing he intended to trepan him, placed witneſſes to overhear all that paſt; Fitz Harris having the libel with him, all writ with his own hand, Everard went with the paper and informed againſt him, p. 497.

[p] Cornith, one of the ſheriffs of London, going to ſee him, he deſired he would bring him a juſtice of the peace. Corniſh went and acquainted the king with it. Whereupon the ſecretaries and ſome privy councillors were ſent to examine Fitz Harris; to whom he gave a long relation of a deſign to kill the king, in which the duke of York was concerned, with many other particulars; but it was all a fiction. The ſecretaries came to examine him farther a ſecond time: he boldly ſtood to all he had ſaid, and deſired that ſome juſtices of the city might be brought to him. So Clayton and Treby came; to whom he made in all points the ſame pretended diſcovery over again. So that there was no colour for what was afterwards advanced, namely, that Clayton and Treby had practiſed on him. Idem. p. 498.

mention particulars, becauſe I am deſirous to forget faults; but whoſoever ſhall calmly conſider what offers I have formerly made, and what aſſurances I renewed to the laſt parliament; how I recommended nothing ſo much to them as the alliances I had made, for the preſervation of the general peace in Chriſtendom, and the further examination of the popiſh plot, and how I deſired their advice and aſſiſtance concerning the preſervation of Tangier; and ſhall then reflect upon the ſtrange unſuitable returns made to ſuch propoſitions, by men that were called together to conſult; perhaps may wonder more, that I had patience ſo long, than that at laſt I grew weary of their proceedings. I have thought it neceſſary to ſay thus much to you, that I may not have any new occaſion given me to remember more of the late miſcarriages: it is much my intereſt, and it ſhall be as much my care as yours, to preſerve the liberty of the ſubject, becauſe the crown can never be ſafe when that is in danger: and I would have you likewiſe be convinced, that neither your liberties nor properties can ſubſiſt long, when the juſt rights and prerogatives of the crown are invaded, or the honour of the government brought low, and into diſ-reputation.

"I let you ſee, by my calling this parliament ſo ſoon, that no irregularities in parliaments ſhall make me out of love with them; and by this means, offer you another opportunity of providing for our ſecurity here, by giving that countenance and protection to our neighbours and allies, which you cannot but know they expect from us, and extremely ſtand in need of at this inſtant; and at the ſame time give one evidence more, that I have not neglected my part, to give that general ſatisfaction and ſecurity, which, by the bleſſing of God, may be attained, if you, on your parts, bring ſuitable diſpoſitions towards it: and that the juſt care you ought to have of religion, be not ſo managed and improved into unneceſſary fears, as to be made a pretence for changing the foundation of the government. I hope the example of the ill ſucceſs of former heats, will diſpoſe you to a better temper; and not ſo much to inveigh againſt what is paſt, as to conſider what is beſt to be done in the preſent conjuncture, the further proſecution of the plot; the trial of the lords in the Tower; the providing a more ſpeedy conviction of recuſants; and, if it be practicable, the ridding ourſelves quite of that party, that have any conſiderable authority or intereſt among them, are things, though of the higheſt importance, that hardly need to be recommended to you, they are ſo obvious to every man's conſideration, and ſo neceſſary to our ſecurity. But I muſt needs deſire you, not to lay ſo much weight upon any one expedient againſt popery, as to determine, that all others are ineffectual; and among all your cares for religion, remember, that without the ſafety and dignity of the monarchy, neither religion nor property can be preſerved.

"What I have formerly and ſo often declared, touching the ſucceſſion, I cannot depart from. But to remove all reaſonable fears that may ariſe from the poſſibility of a popiſh ſucceſſor's coming to the crown, if means can be found, that in ſuch a caſe, the adminiſtration of the government may remain in proteſtant hands; I ſhall be ready to hearken to any ſuch expedient, by which the religion may be preſerved, and the monarchy not deſtroyed. I muſt therefore earneſtly recommend to you, to provide for the religion and the government together, with regard to one another, becauſe they ſupport each other: and let us be united at home, that we may recover the eſteem and conſideration we uſed to have abroad. I conclude with this one advice to you, that the rules and meaſures of all your votes may be the known and eſtabliſhed laws of the land; which neither can, or ought to be departed from, nor changed, but by act of parliament: and I may the more reaſonably require, that you make the laws of the land your rule, becauſe I am reſolved they ſhall be mine."

The commons returning to their houſe, choſe for ſpeaker, William Williams of Gray's-Inn, who had been ſpeaker the laſt parliament, and the king approved of the choice.

After the commons had ſpent three days in chuſing their ſpeaker, and taking the uſual oaths, a motion was made for printing the votes, and approved, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of ſecretary Jenkins. As the ſecret deſign of the commons was to let the people ſee the neceſſity of the excluſion bill, they were deſirous to acquaint them with their proceedings in that affair, that they might not be deceived by general accounts of it. For a contrary reaſon, the king was unwilling the people ſhould know all the circumſtances. But his party was not ſtrong enough to prevent it, and from that time the votes of the commons have been printed, to the great profit of the ſpeaker.

In the ſecond place, a motion was made to enquire into the miſcarriage of the bill for the repeal of the act of the 35th of Elizabeth, how it came to be ſlipt over in the late parliament, and not preſented for the royal aſſent? "Which, (ſaid the mover,) I look upon as a breach of the conſtitution of the government." But the farther debate of this matter was adjourned to the next day.

Thirdly, a motion was made to bring in a bill to exclude the duke of York from the ſucceſſion. Secretary Jenkins warmly oppoſed it, becauſe, as he ſaid, the king had given his vote againſt it. But he was anſwered, that the king had as ſtrongly declared, that he would never depart from his declaration for liberty of conſcience; and yet, upon reaſons given him by the houſe, he was perſuaded to revoke it. Though the debates upon this ſubject were very warm, the houſe came to that temper, as to agree, that in order to pay the king all the reſpect that might be, they would ſet apart a time to conſider of expedients, and accordingly they appointed Saturday the 26th for the debate of them.

Fourthly, they examined the affair of Fitz Harris, and his libel, and thought the matter ſo full of knavery and ſubtilty, and of that conſequence to the public, that they reſolved to impeach Fitz Harris of high treaſon, in order to diſcover the bottom of this myſtery, and lay open the artifices of the court. Secretary Jenkins, the king's man in that houſe, was ordered to carry up the impeachment to the lords. He refuſed at firſt, but being threatened by the houſe, he at laſt complied. At the ſame time it was ordered, that ſir William Waller ſhould have the thanks of the houſe for his diſcovery of Fitz Harris.

[1681] The 26th of March, the day fixed for examining the expedients which ſhould be propoſed to prevent the excluſion bill, a paper was read in the houſe, of which this is the ſubſtance[r].

"1. That the duke of York be baniſhed, during his life, five hundred miles from England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories to them belonging. 2. That the whole government both eccleſiaſtical and civil, ſhall, upon the demiſe of the king, be veſted in a regent, for ſuch time as the duke of York ſhall ſurvive. 3. That the regent be the princeſs of Orange; and in caſe of her deceaſe without iſſue, or with iſſue in minority, then the lady Ann. 4. That if the duke have a ſon educated a proteſtant, then the ſaid princeſſes reſpectively, ſhall ſucceed in the regency, during the minority of ſuch ſon, and no longer. 5. That the regent do nominate the privy council, and they to be, or not to be approved by parliament, as ſhall be judged ſafeſt, upon directing the drawing up of this intended act. 6. That notwithſtanding theſe kingdoms (out of reſpect to the royal family and monarchy itſelf) may be governed by the ſaid regent, in the name and ſtile of James the ſecond, &c. yet it ſhall be made capital for any to take up arms on his behalf, or by his commiſſion, not ſigned by the ſaid regent, or granted by lawful authority derived from, and under ſuch regent; or to maintain an opinion, that the retaining the ſaid name and ſtile, ſhall in this caſe purge the diſabilities impoſed by this act, or elude the force thereof. 7. That commiſſioners be forthwith ſent to the prince and princeſs of Orange, to take their oaths, that they will take upon them the execution of this act, and that their oaths be here recorded. 8. That all officers, civil or military, forthwith take oaths to obſerve this act, from time to time, as in the act for the teſt. 9. That his majeſty would graciouſly declare to call a parliament in Scotland, in order to paſſing the like act there, and recommending the ſame, and the like to be done in Ireland, if thought neceſſary. 10. That in caſe the ſaid duke ſhall come into any of theſe kingdoms, then ſhall he be ipſo facto excluded, and ſhall ſuffer as in the former bill, and the ſovereignty ſhall be forthwith inveſted in the regent, upon ſuch his coming into any of theſe kingdoms. 11. That all conſiderable papiſts be baniſhed by name. 12. That all their fraudulent conveyances be defeated. 13. That their children be educated in the proteſtant religion."

The houſe was ſo little inclined to the expedients to prevent the excluſion bill, that they found in them, however rigorous they were againſt the duke, more difficulties than in the bill itſelf. So, after divers fruitleſs debates, allowed only for form ſake, the houſe reſolved to adhere to the bill

[r] It is to be obſerved, that the duke and his party declared themſelves more againſt the limitations than againſt the excluſion itſelf. Burnet, p. 468.

The

of excluſion, which had paſſed the commons in the laſt parliament, and this bill was ordered to be brought in the next Monday.

The commons had ſcarce finiſhed this great affair, when they were told, the lords had rejected Fitz Harris's impeachment, and ordered that he ſhould be proſecuted at common law. Several members exclaimed againſt this pretended injuſtice, and its conſequences, and at laſt the houſe voted,

" 1. That it is the undoubted right of the commons in parliament aſſembled, to impeach before the lords in parliament, any peer or commoner, for treaſon, or any other crime or miſdemeanor. And that the refuſal of the lords to proceed in parliament upon ſuch impeachment, is a denial of juſtice, and a violation of the conſtitution of parliaments.

" 2. That in the caſe of Edward Fitz Harris, who by the commons had been impeached of high treaſon before the lords, with a declaration, that in convenient time, they would bring up the articles againſt him, for the lords to reſolve, that the ſaid Fitz Harris ſhall be proceeded with according to the courſe of common law, and not by way of impeachment at this time, is a denial of juſtice, and a violation of the conſtitution of parliaments, and an obſtruction to the farther diſcovery of the popiſh plot, and of great danger to his majeſty's perſon, and the proteſtant religion.

" 3. That for any inferior court to proceed againſt Edward Fitz Harris, or any other perſon lying under an impeachment in parliament, for the ſame crimes for which he or they ſtand impeached, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament[s]."

The 28th of March, the excluſion bill was brought into the houſe and read. After the reading, ſir Leoline Jenkins alone ſpoke againſt it. He repeated ſome of his former reaſons, as that this bill condemned a man unheard, was directly contrary to the wiſdom and juſtice of the nation, and tended to introduce a new form of government. " If (continued he) the duke will try to cut this law with his ſword, if he overcome, he will have the ſame power to ſet aſide all laws, both for religion and property; the power will be in the hands of the conqueror, &c." Some railleries paſſed upon him for not being ſeconded, after which the bill was ordered a ſecond reading.

The houſe of commons was reſuming the debate about Fitz Harris, when on a ſudden, the uſher of the black rod commanded their attendance in the houſe of lords, where they found the king in his robes, who told them—" He perceived there were great heats between the lords and commons, and their beginnings had been ſuch as he could expect no good ſucceſs of this parliament, and therefore thought fit to diſſolve them." Accordingly, the chancellor declared the parliament diſſolved.

The king, who was prepared beforehand for what he had done, immediately took coach, and drove with all ſpeed to Windſor, and the next morning to Whitehall, ſeeming extremely pleaſed that he had thus made his eſcape from the deſigns of the commons. This parliament, which ſat but ſeven days, was the fifth and laſt of this reign.

From this time, the king, during the reſt of his life, governed not only without a parliament, but with an abſolute power. When he ſaw himſelf out of the reach of the parliament, he entirely threw away the maſk of diſſimulation, and ſhewed, that the popiſh plot, the proſecution whereof he had lately recommended ſo earneſtly to the parliament, appeared to him but a mere chimera, or at leaſt, he did not think it near ſo dangerous as he would have had it believed. The four lords, priſoners in the Tower, whom he would have ſacrificed to the parliament, appeared innocent to him. But what was ſtill more remarkable, even to the end of this reign, was, that the king grew as ſanguinary, as he had hitherto appeared merciful, and that as ſoon as he had the power in his hands, he made his enemies feel the moſt terrible effects of his vengeance. In a word, he clearly diſcovered by his conduct, that he was entirely in the principles of deſpotic power, and had only diſſembled his ſentiments in his ſpeeches to his parliament, becauſe he judged ſuch diſſimulation proper to conduct him to the end propoſed to himſelf, from the firſt years of his reign.

The reader muſt be aſtoniſhed to ſee a king, who had received ſo many mortifications from his parliaments, who had been ſo often obliged to comply and feign opinions he had not, on a ſudden become abſolute maſter of his kingdom, without fleet, without army, without foreign aſſiſtance, without money, but that of his ordinary revenue, after many years fruitleſs labours to accompliſh his deſigns. It is therefore abſolutely neceſſary to unfold the cauſes of ſo ſurpriſing a revolution.

By the artifices of the court, and the natural inclination of many Engliſhmen, the kingdom was divided into whigs and tories. This diviſion was ſo carefully fomented by the court and the popiſh party, that at laſt it became very great. To render the two parties irreconcileable, it was inſinuated to the epiſcopalians, of whom the majority were tories, that both church and monarchy were in danger, and that the ſcene of forty-one was going to be revived. That the preſbyterians, under colour of providing for the preſervation of liberty, really intended the deſtruction of the church, and the introduction of preſbyterianiſm, in order to which, they were purſuing the ſame courſe they had taken in 1640, and the following years, by undermining the foundations of the monarchy, for the more eaſy ſubverſion of the church. Theſe inſinuations had the greater effect, as what had once happened, and whereof the memory was ſtill freſh, might happen again; and I know not, whether it may not juſtly be doubted, that ſome of the preſbyterians had ſuch a thing in view. This was ſufficient to awaken the old animoſities between the church of England and preſbyterianiſm. The epiſcopalians, terrified with the proſpect of falling into the ſame ſtate, from which they had been almoſt miraculouſly delivered, conſidered the introduction of popery, with which they were alarmed, as a diſtant and uncertain evil, and the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterianiſm, as certain and preſent. It is even very probable, that many, whoſe paſſions were violent, looked upon popery as the leſs evil. In this belief, they threw themſelves as it were deſperately into the court party, without conſidering, that the duke of York, whoſe cauſe they eſpouſed, was no better affected to them than to the preſbyterians. Paſſion made them forget the intereſt of the proteſtant religion, in order not to be once more under the preſbyterian yoke. On the other hand, the three laſt parliaments, compoſed, as I obſerved, of men well affected to preſbyterianiſm, proceeded with too little caution, and diſcovered too haſtily or too openly their deſigns with regard to religion. By that they gave the court party an opportunity of uniting with the epiſcopalians, and of joining together the intereſts of religion and the monarchy. From that time, the tories were ſo well pleaſed with this union, that they would never hear of ſeparating theſe two intereſts, but once, under James II. when there was no poſſibility of keeping them united, without endangering the conſtitution in church and ſtate. The whigs, on their ſide, having ſince perceived, what advantages the tories received from this union, ſeem to have moderated their pretenſions with reſpect to religion, contenting themſelves with procuring the preſbyterians a bare liberty of conſcience. But the tories not truſting to this moderation, conſider it as a ſnare and an artifice to ſeparate the intereſts of religion from thoſe of the ſtate; for in this union the ſtrength of the tory party wholly conſiſts. I have perhaps wandered a little too far from my ſubject, in ſpeaking of theſe two parties, with regard to what has happened ſince the reign of Charles II. But I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed with this general idea. I return now to the tranſactions after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament.

The proteſtants being thus divided, and the court ſtrengthened with the church, the tory party was compoſed of all the rigid epiſcopalians, mortal enemies of the preſbyterians, of all the papiſts, and thoſe to whom all religions were indifferent, and whoſe expectations were centered in the court. It may be affirmed, that the number of theſe laſt was never greater in England, the king having inceſſantly laboured to increaſe it, whether through inclination, or becauſe he depended on ſuch as his firmeſt friends. The whig party conſiſted of all the preſbyterians, and of ſome churchmen, who were more attached to the intereſts of the ſtate and the proteſtant religion in general, than to the church of England in particular. But the city of London was the chief ſtrength of this party, whoſe magiſtrates were entirely devoted to it. Things ſtanding thus, the king believed, he ſhould run no great hazard in diſſolving the Oxford parliament, reckoning, he had a party in the kingdom ſtrong enough to reſiſt, and even ſubdue his enemies, when they ſhould be no longer ſupported with the authority of a parliament. Mean while, not to alarm the nation by a too haſty diſcovery of his intentions as to his future government, he contented himſelf at preſent with publiſhing a declaration, containing his reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments. I ſhall not inſert the declaration here, becauſe every reader, who remembers what has been ſaid, will eaſily comprehend wherein conſiſted the king's complaints. I ſhall only ſay in a word, that the king ſuppoſed as undeniable, that he had no other aim than to procure the good of his people, and that the commons, actuated by a ſpirit of cabal and ſedition, only ſought to ſhake the foundations of the monarchy, and inveſt themſelves with arbitrary power, by all their proceedings, which he largely ſet forth. He poſitively declared, that no irregularities in parliaments ſhould ever make him out of love with them: and therefore he was reſolved to have frequent parliaments, and both in and out of parliament, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to extirpate popery [t].

[s] The commons, it ſeems, reſolving to take the management of Fitz Harris's affair out of the hands of the court, carried to the lord's bar an impeachment againſt him, which was rejected by the lords, on a pretence that the lord Nottingham furniſhed them with. It was this: Edward III. had got ſome commoners to be condemned by the lords. Of which when the houſe of commons complained, an order was made, that no ſuch thing ſhould be done for the future. Now that related only to proceedings at the king's ſuit: but it could not be meant, that an impeachment from the commons did not lie againſt a commoner. Judges, ſecretaries of ſtate, and the lord keeper, were often commoners: ſo, if this was good law, here was a certain method offered the court to be troubled no more with impeachments, by employing only commoners. In ſhort, the peers ſaw the deſign of the impeachment and were reſolved not to receive it. So they made uſe of this colour to reject it. Burnet, p. 498.

Several pamphlets appeared, as well againſt the diſſolution of the parliament, as againſt the declaration. It was ſaid upon the firſt, that though the king pretended, that he diſſolved the parliament on account of the votes paſſed the ſame day about Fitz Harris, yet the ducheſs of Mazarine publiſhed the news at St. James's many hours, before it was done. As to the declaration, it was ſaid to be of no validity, of French extract [u], and to have ſeveral manifeſt galliciſms in it, particularly that expreſſion [it was a matter extremely ſenſible to us] a form of ſpeech peculiar to the French, and unknown to any other nation. But the king little regarded ſuch libels [w].

The declaration having been publiſhed and read in the churches [x] by the king's order, addreſſes flowed from all parts, approving the diſſolution of the parliament, and in general, the king's whole conduct. Not content with thanking the king, theſe addreſſes were even filled with invectives againſt the late houſe of commons. One of theſe addreſſes [y] being preſented at the king's bench as a public libel, by the grand jury of Middleſex, the court took no notice of it. We may eaſily judge who preſented theſe addreſſes, by what has been ſaid. They became ſo much in vogue, that the ſmalleſt corporations feared the reſentment of the court, if they neglected to addreſs. The king received them all very graciouſly, and diſtinguiſhed thoſe that brought them with particular marks of his favour. But as ſome of the other party ventured to preſent addreſſes of a very different ſtile, the king either refuſed, or received them, with evident ſigns of his diſpleaſure. Some of the aldermen and common council of London preſenting an agreeable addreſs, were received very kindly. But the lord mayor, recorder, and ſome others of the common council, waiting on him at Windſor, with a very different petition, were denied admittance, and ordered to attend the council at Hampton-court, where they received a reprimand from the lord chancellor. It was however pretended, that theſe loyal addreſſes, as they were called, expreſſed the ſentiments of the people in general, though they came but from one of the parties. But what may make it preſumed, that the king did not much depend upon the people, notwithſtanding theſe numerous addreſſes which weekly filled the gazettes, is, that he never after dared to call a parliament to the end of his reign, a ſure ſign, that he feared the elections would not be favourable to him. For if theſe addreſſes had expreſſed the general ſenſe of the people, what could have hindered the king from calling a parliament, which, to judge by theſe addreſſes, muſt have been devoted to him.

The king was not ſatisfied with diſcouraging thoſe who would have preſented diſagreeable addreſſes to him, but alſo ſilenced and impriſoned the news-writers which were not of his party [z], while others had liberty to publiſh daily invectives againſt the whigs, and the late parliaments.

Shortly after the diſſolution of the parliament, the king made Charles Lenox duke of Richmond, his ſon by the ducheſs of Portſmouth, knight of the garter at nine years of age. Laurence Hyde, eſq. was created viſcount Hyde of Kennelworth: and lord chancellor Finch earl of Nottingham.

Notwithſtanding the vote of the commons on the account of Fitz Harris, he was indicted of high treaſon at the king's bench bar, tried, condemned, and executed. It is pretended, that he confeſſed to the chaplain of the Tower, that there was a deſign laid by the proteſtant party to ſeize the perſon of the king, and impriſon him, till he had conſented to what ſhould be deſired of him, and that he mentioned many particulars. Others pretend, this confeſſion was forged [a], or only made to ſave his life. Indeed it is not eaſy to imagine, that ſo many proteſtants, engaged, as was pretended, in this plot, would communicate their deſigns to an Iriſh papiſt. Nor is it leſs difficult to conceive, why his execution was haſtened, ſince he might have ſerved for evidence of the plot, about which, however, there was no farther inquiry.

The ſame day that Fitz Harris was executed, Oliver Plunket, the popiſh titular primate of Ireland, ſuffered the ſame puniſhment for contriving, with the court of France, to raiſe an inſurrection in Ireland. Some pretend, he was condemned unjuſtly, and upon falſe evidence [b]. I know not what there is in it, but from this time forward no agreement is to be expected amongſt the hiſtorians, in the relation of the ſame facts. It is always with ſome addition, which plainly diſcovers the party they eſpouſe.

Thus much is certain, that the king delayed not to be revenged of ſome of thoſe who had been againſt him. The earl of Shaftſbury was ſent to the Tower the beginning of July. He was now called the proteſtant earl, in deriſion of his having appeared more zealous than any other lord in ſupport of the proteſtant party, and from hence it may be eaſily judged, who gave him that name. The ſame day, the king alſo ſent to the Tower ſome perſons of a much inferior rank, as Rouſe, Hayns, White, and one Colledge a joyner of London, who had been very ſtrenuous for the whigs, while that party was ſupported by the parliament. He was alſo called the proteſtant joyner, for the name of proteſtant was become the nickname of thoſe who had moſt oppoſed the king and the papiſts. The adherents of the court, on the other hand, pretend, that the whig party in London, perceiving the court began to be revenged upon their enemies, had found means, with the aſſiſtance of Corniſh and Bethel, ſheriffs of London, and zealous whigs, to ſecure grand juries entirely at their devotion, ſo that, to defeat the efforts of the court, theſe juries were to return ignoramus upon all bills brought againſt any of the party, and therefore obtained the name of ignoramus. But we are not to require any proofs of this ſuppoſition. The hiſtorians of the court party content themſelves with affirming, as a thing beyond doubt, that the grand jury of London was reſolved to return ignoramus upon all bills againſt their friends, and we muſt take their word for it, though it ſeems to be ſupported only by the rumours of their own party.

However, the court began their revenge with Colledge the joyner, and for that purpoſe a bill of indictment of high [t] This declaration, however ſmooth and fair, was by no means popular. Some thought it nothing but a torrent of words. Others had a worſe opinion of it, as a ſtretch of prerogative, and a profeſſed inſult upon the late members of both houſes. Kennet, p. 389.

[u] Though the king did not communicate this declaration to the council till April 8, yet Mr. Barrillon, the French embaſſador, did not only read it to a gentleman the 5th of April, but adviſed with him about it, and demanded his opinion of it. Vindicat. &c. by ſir W. Jones, p. 394.

[w] The anſwer to the king's declaration, entitled, "A juſt and modeſt vindication of the proceedings of the two laſt parliaments," was writ with great ſpirit and true judgment. It was at firſt penned by Algernon Sidney: but a new draught was made by John Somers, Eſq. and corrected by ſir William Jones. Burnet, p. 500.

[x] When this declaration paſſed in council, the archbiſhop of Canterbury moved that an order ſhould be added to it, requiring the clergy to publiſh it in all the churches of England. Accordingly, ſuch an order came out, dated April 8. This was looked upon as a moſt pernicious precedent, by which the clergy were made the heralds to publiſh the king's declarations, which in ſome inſtances might come to be not only indecent but miſchievous. Burnet, p. 500.

[y] That from Norwich, which ran the higheſt for the prerogative.

[z] Particularly the publiſhers of the paper called domeſtic intelligence, &c. The other papers here mentioned, containing invectives againſt the whigs, were, L'Eſtrange's obſervators, and Heraclitus Ridens.

[a] Fitz Harris was prevailed upon, through the management of Dr. Hawkins miniſter of the Tower, to make this confeſſion. Hawkins was, for this good piece of ſervice done the court, rewarded with the deanery of Chicheſter. Burnet, p. 504.

[b] The witneſſes againſt him were brutal and profligate men, who had been cenſured by him for their lewdneſs. Burnet, p. 502.

treaſon againſt him was delivered to the grand jury of London, who, not finding it well grounded, threw it out with an ignoramus [c]. This cauſed an univerſal joy in London, and was looked upon as a ſort of triumph. But the court was reſolved to proceed againſt Colledge with the utmoſt ſeverity. For this purpoſe, on pretence of certain words ſaid to be ſpoken by Colledge at Oxford, he was ordered to be removed to that city, and there tried and condemned. But not to be diſappointed, as they had been at London, the king's council came to Oxford, and were ſhut up with the grand jury, till they had perſuaded them to find the bill. This is at leaſt a fact which has been often objected, and publicly and openly maintained, without having been denied. Be this as it will, Colledge was carried to Oxford, and tried at the aſſizes, upon the evidence of Dugdale and Turbeville, who had been the witneſſes in the trial of the lord Stafford. It is not poſſible to read the particulars of this trial, the partiality of the judges [d], and the depoſitions of the witneſſes, without diſcovering a ſettled deſign for the deſtruction of this man, who was condemned and executed as a traitor [e]. He died, proteſting his innocence and ignorance of any plot but the popiſh. The court's reſentment againſt this man ſhewed itſelf ſo manifeſtly, that he was conſidered as the firſt martyr for the proteſtant cauſe. The writers, even the moſt devoted to the court, dare not poſitively affirm, he was guilty. They content themſelves with leaving the thing doubtful, after endeavouring however, by the turn they give to their account, to inſinuate a belief that he was not innocent.

The ſame day that Colledge was executed, Dr. Oates was by order of council turned out of Whitehall, with a command not to come within the verge of the council chamber. Indeed, he was no longer wanted, at a time when not only the popiſh plot was ridiculed, but a deſign formed of being revenged on thoſe who had been moſt zealous to ſupport the belief of it, and of improving a new proteſtant plot.

The time for electing the ſheriffs of London being come, Thomas Pilkington and Samuel Shute, both whigs, were choſen in the room of Bethel and Corniſh, which was very diſagreeable to the court. But on Michaelmas day they had the ſatisfaction to ſee ſir John Moor an addreſſer, choſen lord mayor.

At the ſeſſions for London, Rouſe, one of thoſe ſent to the Tower by the king, was indicted of high treaſon, and the grand jury found the bill ignoramus.

It was the ſame with the earl of Shaftſbury. The king paſſionately wiſhed to be revenged of this lord, who, for ſome time, had ſhewn him little regard. To this end, he granted a ſpecial commiſſion of oyer and terminer to all the judges of the kingdom to ſit, the 24th of November, with the lord mayor and aldermen, at the Old Bailey, on the earl's trial. Eight witneſſes were heard againſt him, who depoſed upon oath many things from his own mouth, which diſcovered pernicious deſigns againſt the king's perſon. But the greateſt crime objected againſt him was, the copy of an aſſociation (found in his ſtudy) againſt the enemies of the king, of the proteſtant religion, and of their country [f]. But notwithſtanding the hopes conceived by the court, of being freed from this enemy, the grand jury, conſiſting of one and twenty of the principal citizens of London, conſidering that the paper, containing the aſſociation was only a copy, and not writ in the earl of Shaftſbury's hand, and obſerving very great improbabilities in the depoſitions of the witneſſes, found no ſufficient ground for the bill, and returned it ignoramus. Immediately the whole city teſtified their joy for the earl's deliverance, by bonfires in all the ſtreets, and other marks of ſatisfaction, and the witneſſes againſt him were in great danger of being torn in pieces by the mob [g].

Before we finiſh this year, it will be neceſſary to mention the tranſactions in Scotland, where the duke of York, as the king's high commiſſioner, had opened the parliament the 28th of July. This parliament, very different from the two laſt held in England, took a quite contrary courſe, and paſſed ſeveral acts ſuch as the king deſired.

By the firſt, they acknowledged, that the crown of Scotland is by inherent right, by the nature of monarchy, by the fundamental and unalterable laws of the kingdom, tranſmitted and devolved by lineal ſucceſſion, according to proximity of blood, and that no difference in religion, no law, no act of parliament, can alter or divert the right of ſucceſſion, and lineal deſcent of the crown to the neareſt and lawful heirs. This act made it high treaſon, either by word or writing, to endeavour to ſuſpend, or alter, the right of ſucceſſion.

By the ſecond act, "all former laws for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion preſently profeſſed in that realm, were ratified;" by which all the laws made by James I. Charles I. and Charles II. againſt popery, were confirmed. To this act was annexed a teſt and oath to be taken by all officers in church and ſtate [h]. This oath was drawn in ſuch a manner, that it impoſed a neceſſity of ſwearing directly againſt conſcience, or of being, as I may ſay, debarred the ſociety of men. Accordingly, it was refuſed by moſt of the miniſters, and a great number of the laity. But this was what the contrivers of the act wanted, in order to have opportunity to perſecute and deſtroy thoſe, who it was foreſeen, would obſtruct the deſigns of the court. Scotland was almoſt reduced to ſlavery, with regard to the government. Nothing was wanting, but the introduction of the popiſh religion, and for this the oath was intended, becauſe it was thereby hoped to have opportunity of diſabling the greateſt enemies of popery from oppoſing this deſign. Archibald Campbel earl of Argyle, ſon of him beheaded at Edinburgh, was one of the refuſers of this oath, unleſs he might take it with a reſerve of his own explanation [i]. But this the duke of York would never allow him. Indeed theſe ambiguities had been purpoſely inſerted to keep the rigid preſbyterians from taking it. At laſt, he was arreſted, impriſoned, and brought to a ſolemn trial, not only for refuſing the oath, but for having diſſuaded others from taking it; and for this new kind of treaſon, was condemed to loſe his head. It is pretended, the king would have pardoned him; but this can only be ſaid by conjecture. However, he found means to eſcape out of the caſtle of Edinburgh, and withdrew into Holland [k].

[1681-2] It appears from what has been ſaid, that the whig party moſtly conſiſted of profeſſed preſbyterians, or of men inclined to preſbytery, though they profeſſed the eſtabliſhed religion. That is to ſay, the times of James I. and Charles I. were returned, when every man who was not of the court party and a furious tory, was a preſbyterian. The king finding his authority ſufficiently eſtabliſhed ſince the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, reſolved entirely to ruin his enemies the whigs, and conſequently the preſbyterians. To this end, he ordered, that the non-conformiſts ſhould be rigorouſly proſecuted, which diſcovered his motive for conveying away in the houſe of lords the bill to repeal the act of the 35th of Elizabeth, at the very time it was going to paſs into a law. For if this bill had not vaniſhed, no advantage could have been taken againſt the preſbyterians. This order of the king occaſioned a violent perſecution againſt the diſſenters. Since the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, all the magiſtrates, judges, juſtices of the peace, governors, and lord lieutenants, had been changed, and the moſt violent tories put in their places. It may eaſily be imagined, with what joy and zeal theſe men executed the laws againſt

[c] Mr. Wilmore, the foreman, was, April 16, examined before the council, ſent to the Tower, and afterwards forced to fly beyond ſea. Kennet, p. 389. Hawles, p. 20.

[d] The judges were chief juſtice North, juſtice Jones, juſtice Raymond, and juſtice Levinz. Rapin ſays by miſtake, that Jefferies was one of the judges, but he was only one of the king's counſel.

[e] The greateſt hardſhip put upon him, was the taking away from him his memorandums, and inſtructions for his defence, juſt as he was coming to his trial. See his trial.

[f] This aſſociation was neither writ, nor marked in any place with the earl's hand. Burnet, p. 506.

[g] A medal was alſo ſtruck upon this occaſion, having on one ſide the earl's effigies; and on the reverſe, the ſun behind a cloud, darting his beams on the city of London. See Evelyn's numiſm. It was upon this occaſion that Dryden wrote his poem called, The Medal.

[h] And by all that ſhould be capable of electing, or being elected members of parliament. Burnet, p. 515. See this teſt in the life of king James II. 8vo. p. 53, and R. Coke, p. 276.

[i] See the caſe of the earl of Argyle in relation to the teſt or oath impoſed by the Scotch parliament, p. 151, &c. of ſtate tracts, vol. II. R. Coke, p. 276, and life of James II. p. 55.

[k] When the teſt was in debate, Argyle ſpoke zealouſly againſt the clauſe, whereby all the royal family were excepted out of it. He ſaid, the only danger we could apprehend as to popery was, if the royal family ſhould happen to be perverted; therefore he thought it was better to have no act at all than ſuch a clauſe in it. For this reaſon, when he came to explain himſelf concerning the taking the teſt in his own ſenſe, his words were conſtrued as a defaming and a ſpreading of lies of the proceedings of parliament, which was capital. Accordingly he was tried and condemned. No ſentence, ſays Burnet, in our age, was more univerſally cried out upon than this. All ſpoke of it, and the duke who drove it on, with horror. All that was ſaid to leſſen the horror was, that duke Lauderdale had reſtored the family with ſuch an extended juriſdiction, that he was really the maſter of all the highlands. This, as the duke wrote to the king, was all he intended by it, as lord Hallifax aſſured Burnet. Though a perſon of quality, whom lord Argyle never named, affirmed to him, on his honour, that he heard one in great favour ſay to the duke, the thing muſt be done, and that it would be eaſier to ſatisfy the king about it after it was done, than obtain his leave for doing it. For which reaſon lord Argyle made his eſcape out of the caſtle in a diſguiſe. Burnet, p. 516. 520, 521.

the preſbyterians, which had been ſuſpended for ſome years. The clergy particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves by ſhewing their attachment to the principles and maxims of the court. The pulpits reſounded with the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, which had been eſpouſed by a few in the reign of Charles I. but was now univerſally preached. The clergy ſeemed to make it their buſineſs to ſurrender to the king all the liberties and privileges of the ſubjects, and to leave them only an unlimited obedience. According to the principles publicly preached, no eaſtern monarch was more abſolute than the king of England. This doctrine was ſupported in the courts of juſtice, by all the judges and lawyers, to the utmoſt of their power. All this was followed with numberleſs petitions and addreſſes, wherein the aſſociation, and the principles from which it flowed, were utterly abhorred. This aſſociation which had occaſioned the perſecution againſt the diſſenters, was but a chimera, and entirely founded on the paper found in the earl of Shaftſbury's cloſet, without even a poſſibility of knowing whether it was an original or a copy. But any man's thinking of aſſociating the ſubjects againſt the king, was ſufficient, according to the current principles, to charge the whole whig party, as guilty of the greateſt crime imaginable. I ſhall not tranſcribe theſe addreſſes. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that they ſuppoſed the king of England as abſolute as it is poſſible to deviſe. Thus the violent tories who then prevailed in the corporations, were not ſatisfied with perſecuting the preſbyterians, but alſo made the king an arbitrary and abſolute monarch, as if there had been no other expedient to ſave the church of England from the attempts of the preſbyterians.

The duke of York returned from Scotland, the beginning of March, and was received by the king with all poſſible ſigns of affection. At the ſame time came a letter to the king from Scotland, ſubſcribed by ſeven biſhops, full of the duke of York's praiſes, and of the happineſs enjoyed by the church of Scotland, under his adminiſtration. So that it was not the fault of theſe prelates, that the duke, though moſt zealous for the popiſh religion, was not reſpected as the principal ſupport and protector of the proteſtant church.

[1682] After two months ſtay in England, the duke returned to Scotland to bring his family from thence. He went by ſea, but by an unexpected accident, the ſhip, though the weather was fair, ſtruck upon the ſand called the Lemon and Oar, and in a little time had above ſeven feet water in the hold. This obliged him to put off in his pinnace, with as many perſons as it would hold, and to ſave himſelf on board the Mary yatcht. It is pretended, he himſelf named the perſons whom he would have in the boat with him, and that ſome prieſts and jeſuits were preferred to ſeveral perſons of quality, who were unfortunately drowned, with a hundred and thirty ſeamen, the ſhip ſinking ſoon after the duke put off. But I will not warrant this circumſtance, which perhaps is only a report ſpread by his enemies [l]. The duke made but a ſhort ſtay in Scotland. He departed within a few days for England, where he continued the reſt of this reign, with great influence over the actions and counſels of the king his brother. To him is generally aſcribed the rigour with which the king treated his enemies the remaining part of his reign. It is ſaid, the king being one day importuned by the duke to undertake things which he thought very dangerous, told him, "Brother, I am reſolved never to travel again, you may do ſo, if you pleaſe."

Though, ſupported by the court and the magiſtrates, the tory party had the advantage, the whigs however were not diſcouraged, in the expectation of cauſing ſome turn by informing the people in pamphlets of their danger from the court. Theſe pamphlets were numberleſs, and new ones daily appeared, to attack or defend. That which made the greateſt noiſe was, the life of Julian the apoſtate, in which a parallel was drawn between that prince and the duke of York. The neceſſity of the excluſion was ſhewn, and paſſive obedience exploded as a mahometan doctrine. This book did but exaſperate the patrons of paſſive obedience. They took occaſion from thence to carry the doctrine ſo high, that when, in the reign of James II. reſtrictions became neceſſary, they knew not how to make them, and many even perſiſted in ſupporting this doctrine, rather than own they had been in the wrong to carry it to ſuch a height.

To demonſtrate, that to this time muſt be fixed the date of the birth, or at leaſt of the great progreſs, of the doctrine of paſſive obedience, it needs only to be conſidered, that the ſecond parliament of this reign, though chiefly compoſed of rigid church of England men, devoted entirely to the king, after having by acts eſtabliſhed ſuch principles as led to paſſive obedience, readily departed from it, when the court, as they believed, intended thereby to introduce an arbitrary government. This ſhews their deſign was not to eſtabliſh ſuch a government. But in 1682, the time I am ſpeaking of, theſe principles were not only preached but practiſed, and the king was thanked in public and ſolemn addreſſes, for having eſtabliſhed an abſolute government. The pulpits rung with paſſive obedience, which was enforced from the poſitive declaration of God; and all the magiſtrates emulouſly ſtrove to reduce this doctrine to practice. The whigs on their part in their attacks of theſe ſtrange opinions, threw themſelves into the other extreme, and thereby gave their enemies room to accuſe them as ſubverters of monarchy. In ſhort, a kind of infatuation ſeized the kingdom, and one party, inſtead of coming to a temper, violently embraced whatever was moſt contrary to the other.

The animoſity againſt the whigs was then ſo exceſſive, that even in the adminiſtration of juſtice, the judges forgot common decency. The earl of Shaftſbury having brought his action of ſcandalum magnatum, againſt one Mr. Cradock, the defendant's counſel alledged, "That there was no probability of a fair trial by a London jury, by reaſon that the earl was of the ſkinners company, of which ſheriff Pilkington was maſter, and that therefore the jury ought to be taken from ſome other place." The court of King's Bench found this exception ſo juſt, that it was ordered, "That unleſs the earl would conſent to try his cauſe by a country jury, it ſhould not be tried in London." I know not whether ſuch an exception had ever been known or admitted before. Party rage appeared in all private affairs, ſo that judgments were formed not according to the right, but the principles of the parties.

Though the whigs had a great diſadvantage in the kingdom, they ſtill preſerved their ſuperiority in London, where almoſt all the magiſtrates were of their party; but they were not ſuffered long to enjoy them. Moor, the lord mayor, who had been an abhorrer, and was in the intereſts of the court, objected againſt the election of the ſheriffs, and afterwards of the lord mayor, who was to ſucceed him; and being ſupported by the privy council, prevailed, partly by force, and partly by conſent, to have new ſheriffs [m], and a new mayor elected of the king's party. This was a triumph for the court, and the earl of Shaftſbury was ſo ſenſible of it, that ſeeing himſelf like to be deprived of the protection of the city of London, he avoided the impending ſtorm, by a retreat into Holland. It was remarked, that he was forced to ſhelter himſelf under the protection of a republic, to which, when he was chancellor, and one of the cabal, he had applied that ſaying of Cato, delenda eſt Carthago.——He died ſix weeks after his arrival in Holland.

The court having got a lord mayor and ſheriffs at their devotion, improved the advantage, and relying on the compliance of the magiſtrates, reſolved to annul the charter of London, and afterwards thoſe of all the other corporations in the kingdom. But this deſign was not executed till the next year.

In the mean time, the lord mayor and the ſheriffs of London, were very active againſt the preſbyterians, and executed the laws with great ſeverity. Moreover, to recommend themſelves the more to the court, they prevented the burning of the pope, as had been cuſtomary on the 17th of November [n].

The duke of York embracing ſo favourable a juncture, brought his action againſt the late ſheriff Pilkington, for theſe words, ſpoken by the defendant, "The duke of York has fired the city, and is now come to cut our throats." The jury found for the duke, and gave him one hundred thouſand pounds damages. To ſuch height was party rage carried.

[l] Burnet ſays, the duke got into a boat, and took care of his dogs, and ſome unknown perſons, who were taken, from that earneſt care of his, to be his prieſts. The long boat went off with very few in her, though ſhe might have carried off above eighty more than ſhe did, p. 523. What makes this account probable in the main, is, that the following perſons periſhed with the reſt, the earl of Roxborough, the lord Obryan, the laird of Hopton, ſir Joſeph Douglaſs, lieutenant Hyde the duke's brother-in-law. Echard, tom. III. p. 657. The duke, ſays Burnet, took no notice of this cruel neglect, which was laid chiefly to Legg's charge, p. 523.

[m] The two ſheriffs the court was for, were Mr. North, and Mr. Box. And thoſe ſet up by the majority of the city, were Mr. Papillon, and Mr. Dubois. Some conteſts aroſe upon this occaſion, for which the late ſheriffs and others were afterwards tried, as guilty of a riot. See ſtate trials, t. III. p. 541, &c.

Henry

Before we finiſh the events of this year 1682, which was memorable only for the progreſs of the court and the tories, the downfall of the whigs, and the perſecution of the preſbyterians; I ſhall relate ſome other things which happened this year.

Firſt, the murder of Mr. Thynne, almoſt in the heart of the city, by count Coningſmark, for which his footman was hanged. As this is a private affair, I ſhall ſay no more of it.

This year the king received two extraordinary embaſſies, one from the king of Fez and Morocco, the other from the king of Bantam in the iſle of Java.

This year died, prince Rupert, count palatine of the Rhine, ſo often mentioned in the foregoing reign, ſixty-three years of age; John Maitland duke of Lauderdale; Heneage Finch earl of Nottingham and lord high chancellor; and Anthony Aſhley Cooper earl of Shaftſbury.

On the other hand, the king created ſeveral peers[o], amongſt the reſt, the duke of Ormond, an Iriſh duke, was promoted to the ſame dignity in England.

Laſtly, the earl of Sunderland was reſtored to the office of ſecretary, upon the reſignation of earl Conway.

[1682-3.] The king having had no extraordinary ſupplies from the parliament for ſome years, it would be aſtoniſhing that he ſhould at once become ſo good an œconomiſt, as to live upon his revenues, if it had not afterwards appeared, that he had contracted many debts, and thereby ſupplied in ſome meaſure the aids of money, which, on one pretence or other, he had uſed to receive from the parliament. The court purſued the ſame courſe, without any appearance of intending to uſe their new power for raiſing money upon the ſubject. It might ſeem ſtrange, that the king, in his preſent ſituation, did not ſummon a parliament, as well to repeal what had been enacted againſt him, as to get a ſupply of money. Pretences would not have been wanting. That was not the thing. But it ſeemed, that notwithſtanding the multitude of addreſſes, which were ſtill daily preſented, he did not confide in the affection of his people, and feared, that the elections would not be favourable to him. Indeed theſe addreſſes came but from one party, and the king knew, it was very poſſible to receive addreſſes from all the corporations in England, without being aſſured that the people in general were well affected. But as foreigners may not underſtand this, I ſhall briefly explain it.

England is almoſt all divided into communities, called corporations, which have each their privileges, obtained from the ſovereigns on certain conditions. There is ſcarce a town, which has not its magiſtrates and laws as a corporation. The mayor, or head of the corporation, the aldermen, the recorder, and other principal officers, are elected either by the whole community, or by a certain number of townſmen. It is eaſy therefore to apprehend, that the prevailing party may, without great difficulty, form a common council of their own principles, and it is this common council which manages the addreſſes preſented to the king, in the name of the whole corporation. Provided the ſuperiority of voices in the common council be for one of the parties, that ſuffices, if an addreſs be ordered, to ſay, it is in the name of the town or community, though all the other members ſhould be of a contrary opinion. But in chuſing repreſentatives, another method is taken. For then every burgeſs, every freeholder, has a right to give his vote, and conſequently repreſentatives of a contrary party to the magiſtrates and common council may very poſſibly be elected. This, probably, hindered the king from venturing to call a new parliament, for fear he ſhould not find his account in it. For the ſame voters who had choſen the members of the two laſt parliaments, would have had a right to vote for the members of a new one; which could not be advantageous to the court. The court therefore came to a reſolution of reſuming the charters of the corporations, and to grant others drawn in ſuch manner, that the king ſhould be almoſt enabled to cauſe ſuch repreſentatives to be choſen, as he pleaſed. It may be affirmed, there was no readier or more effectual way to invade at once the liberties of the nation, and cauſe the parliament itſelf to approve of the ſame.

Till things ſhould be ripe for the execution of this deſign, or ſome favourable occaſion offer itſelf, the king reſolved to take the diverſions of Newmarket. He had ſcarce been there ſix days, when a fire broke out in the town with ſuch violence, that he was obliged to return to London ſome days ſooner than he deſigned. It was pretended afterwards, that there was, at this time, a plot againſt his life, to be executed at Newmarket, and which was prevented by the king's ſudden return, occaſioned by the fire. This accident was aſcribed to a particular providence preſerving the king, when he was in ſuch danger.

[1683.] The king intending to be revenged on the old magiſtracy of London, which had oppoſed him for ſome years, iſſued out a commiſſion for trial of the authors of the diſorder at the election of ſheriffs the laſt year. This diſorder, in the commiſſion, was called a riotous and unlawful aſſembly, and aggravated as much as a thing of ſuch little moment could admit of. Fourteen aldermen and ſubſtantial citizens, the leaders of the whigs, were all tried and condemned in great fines[p].

But the king ſtopped not here, though the new magiſtrates and common council took care to give him marks of their reſpect and zeal, by repealing ſeveral acts of the court of common council, made during the late troubles[q]. They likewiſe replaced, in its nich in the Royal Exchange, the ſtatue of Charles I. which had been taken down after his death. Nevertheleſs, this did not prevent a Quo Warranto from being brought by the king againſt the city, that is, an order to ſhew by what warrant they pretended to be a corporation, and enjoy the privileges mentioned in the writ. On ſuch occaſions, the corporation, againſt whom the Quo Warranto is ſent, produces the charter of their privileges, and the queſtion is to know, whether they have exactly obeyed the conditions and articles of their charter. If they have been faulty in any eſſential article, the court, before whom the affair is brought, may declare their privileges and charter forfeited. This rarely happens, becauſe a corporation is not wont to break their charter in eſſential articles, for fear of loſing it, and if it is in a point of little importance, the court is ſatisfied with a fine to the king. This is the practice where juſtice, and a maintenance of the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom, are only intended. But, in the preſent caſe, the king's intention was not to maintain juſtice and the laws, but to take occaſion from the breach of ſome article of the charter, to ſeize the liberties of London into his hands, and render himſelf abſolute maſter of the government of that city. The preſent juncture was very favourable to his deſign, becauſe, ſince the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, he had taken care to fill the courts of juſtice with judges devoted to him, and to theſe judges was committed the deciſion of the affair.

The king alledged two violations of the charter by the corporation of London. The firſt was the illegal exaction of tolls in the market, and particularly the raiſing money to rebuild Cheapſide conduit. The ſecond was the framing and printing a ſcandalous petition, wherein they charged the king with obſtructing the juſtice of the nation by proroguing the laſt Weſtminſter parliament. This affair was argued ſolemnly on both ſides, and at laſt the judges of the king's bench declared, that the liberties and privileges of the city of London were forfeited, and might be ſeized into the king's hands. Nevertheleſs it was declared by the expreſs command of the king, "That judgment ſhould not be entered until his majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be further known."

Several reflections on this judgment were then, and ſtill are made, which are not to the honour either of the king or the court. However, the inhabitants of London were extremely ſurpriſed with the thing, and the common council aſſembled to conſult how to proceed in this exigency. Some were for having the judgment entered till an opportunity offered to procure a reverſal. But the court party inſiſted upon an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the king before judgment was entered, which was in effect a voluntary ſurrender of the privileges of the city into the king's hands, and a depriving it of the means to cauſe the ſentence one day to be repealed. This opinion was carried by a majority, and the king was waited on with a petition agreeable to this reſolution. The king anſwered by the lord keeper North, that he would re-ſtore the charter, if the city would ſubmit to the following regulations:

1. That no lord mayor, nor any officer of the corporation, or ſteward of the borough of Southwark, ſhould be capable of, or admitted to the exerciſe of their reſpective offices, before his majeſty ſhould have approved them under his ſign manual.

2. That if his majeſty ſhould diſapprove the choice of any perſon to be lord mayor, &c. the citizens ſhould, within one week, proceed to a new choice: and if his majeſty ſhould in like manner diſapprove the ſecond choice, his majeſty might, if he pleaſed, nominate a perſon to be lord mayor for the enſuing year.

3. The ſame with regard to the ſheriffs.

4. The lord mayor and court of aldermen might alſo, with the leave of his majeſty, diſplace any alderman, recorder, &c.

5. Upon the election of any alderman, if the court of aldermen ſhould judge and declare the perſon preſented to to be unfit, the ward ſhould chuſe again; and upon a diſapproval of a ſecond choice, the court might appoint another in his room.

6. The juſtices of the peace were to be by the king's commiſſion; and the ſettling of theſe matters to be left to his majeſty's attorney and ſollicitor general, and council learned in the law.

By theſe articles, it is evident, the king was abſolute maſter of the government of the city, and by reſtoring their charter, effectually deprived them of their principal privileges.

Two days after, the common council met, and reſolved to ſubmit to the king, by a majority of eighteen voices[r]. The hiſtorians of the king's party ſpeak of this affair very ſlightly, pretending the city was juſtly puniſhed for their great provocations to the king of late years. But as to the conduct of the king and court, which occaſioned theſe provocations, they do not think proper to mention it, and ſo the whole blame lies upon the city.

We are at laſt come to the pretended proteſtant plot, that is to ſay, formed by the proteſtants againſt the king and the duke. But as it is hard to conceive the agreement of this term, in a proteſtant country, with deſigns framed by proteſtants againſt papiſts, and as ſome gladly remove the idea of the king and duke of York's being papiſts, they rather chuſe to give it the name of the Rye-houſe plot, from a houſe ſo called, in the road to Newmarket[s], where, it is pretended, the conſpirators had projected to kill the king and duke. I muſt not conceal, that as the former conſpiracy, called the popiſh plot, did then, and ſtill does, paſs for an invention, with the adherents of the court, ſo this had the ſame fate among thoſe who were, or ſtill are, of the contrary party. The hiſtory of this conſpiracy muſt therefore be read with great caution, ſince the hiſtorians are entirely divided, the one repreſenting as falſe, what the others aſſert as true. Were they both contented with relating the bare facts, giving for true thoſe that may be proved, as for falſe thoſe whoſe contrary cannot be proved, and for doubtful ſuch as are doubtful, the reader might be able to form ſome judgment. But their accounts are artfully laboured to prepoſſeſs the reader. A thouſand things are inſinuated which have no foundation but in their ſyſtem. The witneſſes are either knaves or honeſt men, as is moſt for their advantage. The conſpiracy in their recitals is ſuppoſed true or falſe at pleaſure. Nevertheleſs circumſtances are inſerted to ſerve their purpoſe, without the leaſt proof or authority. So the reader, who is in ſearch of truth, finds himſelf at a loſs, it being impoſſible to enter into a particular examination of ſo many oppoſite things. Impartial readers content themſelves with leaving the matter undecided, becauſe they ſee no proofs ſtrong enough to determine their aſſent either way. Others, through prejudice in favour of one of the parties, or through lazineſs or indifference, implicitly follow the ſentiments of the hiſtorian, or abſolutely reject them.

To avoid therefore as much as poſſible the faults which I condemn, I ſhall ſuppreſs all inſinuations of the hiſtorians of both parties, and confine myſelf to the depoſitions and defences of the accuſed, without adding any circumſtance which is not owned by both ſides.

This year, on the 12th of June, Joſiah Keeling diſcovered the conſpiracy, real or pretended, to the lord Dartmouth and ſecretary Jenkins, before whom he had made open confeſſion of the whole matter, and ſubſcribed his depoſitions. But afterwards, conſidering that his ſingle intelligence was not ſufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, that his brother John Keeling might be admitted into the next meeting of the conſpirators. This was done, and thereupon both the brothers gave in their joint teſtimony upon oath on the 14th of June.

It muſt be obſerved, that this circumſtance of the admiſſion of John Keeling into the ſecrets of the plot, manifeſtly ſuppoſes a conſpiracy. Accordingly it is only produced by thoſe hiſtorians who believe the reality of the plot.

In the ſecond place, the diſcovery of the plot being made by Joſiah Keeling, the 12th of June, and the depoſition of the two brothers being given in the 14th, it follows that, according to the firſt ſuppoſition, John Keeling had but one day to be informed of the ſecrets of this plot.

According to the two Keelings depoſitions, the plot conſiſted of three articles. 1. The conſpirators deſigned to ſecure the king's guards (but how this was to be executed does not appear;) then to block up or beſiege Whitehall, and ſeize the perſons of the king, and duke of York. 2. To aſſaſſinate the king and the duke in a hollow way near the Rye-houſe, in their return from Newmarket. 3. To cauſe inſurrections in London, and other parts of the kingdom[t]. But the Keelings depoſed only againſt perſons of no note.

Upon this depoſition, the king publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending, colonel John Rumſey, Richard Rumbold maſter[u], Richard Nelthorpe, Eſq. Edward Wade, gent. Richard Goodenough, gent. Capt. Walcot, William Thompſon, James Burton, and William Hone; for any of which a hundred pounds was offered to the diſcoverer. Upon the proclamation, colonel Rumſey ſurrendered himſelf the next day; and being examined by ſecretary Jenkins, he confeſſed all he knew; which confeſſion was next day confirmed by two others, Mr. Weſt and Mr. Sheppard; ſo that on the 28th of June, there came out a ſecond proclamation, for apprehending James duke of Monmouth, Ford lord Grey, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, knight, and Robert Ferguſon. It is pretended, that when the warrants were delivered to Legat the meſſenger, to ſeize Ferguſon with the reſt of the offenders, ſecretary Jenkins gave Legat a ſtrict command, not to take him, but to ſhun him wherever he met him. Shortly after, the lord Howard of Eſcrick alſo ſurrendered himſelf, and upon his information, warrants for high treaſon were iſſued out againſt the earl of Eſſex, the lord Ruſſel, and others, who were taken up accordingly.

This diſcovery brought addreſſes from all parts to congratulate the king. The embaſſadors of foreign princes paid the ſame compliment; and the king of France offered five hundred piſtoles for the apprehenſion of Monmouth, Grey, Armſtrong, or Ferguſon.

The priſoners were not ſuffered long to languiſh. Walcot was firſt brought to his trial the 12th of July, and againſt him,

Rumſey ſwore, "That the priſoner came to a meeting at Weſt's chamber, where the deponent was preſent, when a liſt was brought of the aſſaſſins, and agreed to join with them, intending to command a party that ſhould charge the guards: that he undertook to go and view Rumbold's houſe, and bought a horſe for that purpoſe: that he was preſent at the dividing London into twenty parts, in order to an inſurrection; and at the conſult for buying of arms after the diſappointment at the Rye-houſe: that he was at the meeting for carrying on the conſpiracy on Thurſday before the diſcovery; and that, after it, they met at captain Tracy's, Walcot's own lodging, the deponent being preſent."

Keeling depoſed, "That Walcot was at the traiterous aſſembly at the Salutation tavern, where the deponent was called Culing, and a health drunk to the Engliſh Culing; Weſt declaring, that Culing in Dutch was Keeling in Engliſh, adding, he hoped to ſee Keeling at the head of as good an army in Wapping, as they heard one Culing was then at Cologn."

Bourn ſwore, "That Walcot uſed to come to Ferguſon when he lodged at his houſe; and that he and ſeveral others met at the Dragon on Snow-hill, and often at other places, in order to raiſe men, and divide the city into twenty parts, for ſecuring the king and the duke: that almoſt every time they met, at leaſt three times, the priſoner at the bar was there: that he was at the laſt meeting at Tracy's, where they debated of ſtanding with ſword in hand, and of killing Keeling for making the diſcovery."

Weſt teſtified, "That the priſoner upon the election of the London Sheriff, aſked him, Will the people do nothing to ſecure themſelves? and acquainted him with the inſurrection then deſigned within three weeks or a month: that the earl of Shaftſbury was in the deſign, and had engaged the priſoner: that he had an expectation of being a colonel of horſe; aſking the deponent, Whether he would have any command under him? That upon his refuſal, he deſired him to lend him a ſuit of ſilk armour: that the ſaid Walcot told him of ſeveral deſigns to attack the king and the duke: that in the buſineſs of the Rye-houſe, he undertook to command the party that was to ſet on the guards."

Beſides theſe witneſſes, there was a letter produced, under Walcot's own hand, to ſecretary Jenkins, in which he ſaid, "That if his majeſty deſired it, he would diſcover to him all that he knew in England, Scotland, or Ireland, which might be ſomething more than the original diſcoverer could acquaint him with, eſpecially as to Ireland: that his intimacy with a Scotch miniſter, through whoſe hands much of the buſineſs went, occaſioned his knowing very much, &c."

Walcot's defence conſiſted, firſt, of a plain denial of having any hand in the aſſaſſination; ſaying, "He knew well enough, if he had undertaken to charge the guards, while others killed the king, he was equally guilty with thoſe that killed him; but that he was ſick of the gout during the meetings, while the king was at Newmarket." To this Weſt replied, "That he remembered it well, by a good token, that the priſoner himſelf ſaid, He was afraid when the time came, he ſhould not be able to draw on his boots." Walcot added, "That he came accidentally to their meetings only to hear news. That what he had promiſed to diſcover, he had only heard from Ferguſon." In concluſion, he was brought in guilty of high treaſon by the jury.

Thoſe who think this plot was only an artifice of the court, to deſtroy their chief enemies, obſerve, that the depoſitions of the witneſſes againſt Walcot, and the other pretended conſpirators, are all founded upon the ſuppoſition, that there was really a deſign to ſeize the king's guards, aſſaſſinate him and the duke, and raiſe an inſurrection, and upon a previous narrative of this pretended conſpiracy, ſuppoſed to be undeniable, to which the ſeveral depoſitions were adjuſted, before the reality of the deſign was proved.

In the ſecond place, they ſay, that theſe depoſitions are incoherent. For the conſpirators muſt have had at the ſame time two contrary deſigns, one to ſecure the king's perſon, to oblige him to conſent to their propoſals, and the other to aſſaſſinate him; two deſigns which can hardly ſubſiſt together.

Their adverſaries reply, it being proved by the depoſitions of the witneſſes, that the accuſed had aſſiſted at ſuch and ſuch meetings, where the king's aſſaſſination was mentioned, and having diſcourſed concerning the deſign, the ſuppoſition was ſufficiently proved.

I ſhall not relate the trials of the other priſoners of little note, but confine myſelf to the lord Ruſſel's, ſon to the earl of Bedford. This lord being one of thoſe againſt whom the court was moſt incenſed, becauſe he had propoſed the excluſion bill in the houſe of commons and carried it up to the lords, he was tried the 12th of July at the Old Baily, before eight judges. He was very urgent for one day longer for his trial, becauſe, as he ſaid, he had witneſſes that might come before night, but he was overruled. He then urged to have his trial deferred to the afternoon, but with no better ſucceſs. Three witneſſes depoſed againſt him, colonel Rumſey the evidence againſt Walcot, Mr. Sheppard, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick.

1. Rumſey depoſed, "That in the end of October, or in the beginning of November 1682, there met at Mr. Sheppard's houſe in Abchurch-lane, the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, the lord Ruſſel the priſoner, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and Robert Ferguſon: that the earl of Shaftſbury deſired him to go to them thither, to know what reſolution they were come to about the riſing of Taunton; that he did go, and Mr. Sheppard carried him up where they were, and he delivered his meſſage. That the anſwer was, Mr. Trenchard had failed them, and there would be no more done in the matter, at that time: that there was at the ſame time a diſcourſe by all the company, about ſeeing what poſture the guards were in, that they might know how to ſurpriſe them: that ſome of them undertook to go and ſee: that the lord Ruſſel in particular did ſpeak about the riſing, and gave his conſent to it"

2. Mr. Sheppard teſtified, "That in October laſt, Ferguſon deſired of him, in the duke of Monmouth's name, the conveniency of his houſe, for the meeting of ſome perſons of quality; and that the ſame day in the evening, the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, the lord Ruſſel, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, colonel Rumſey, and Ferguſon came; that they deſired to be private, and none of his ſervants to come up: that their diſcourſe was how to ſurpriſe the guards: that the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, and ſir Thomas Armſtrong, went one night to the Mews to view them: that the next time they came [x], Armſtrong ſaid, the guards were very remiſs, and the thing was feaſible: that they had two meetings of this kind at his houſe; that in one of them ſomething was read by Ferguſon in the nature of a declaration, ſetting forth the grievances of the nation in order to a riſing: that he could not poſitively ſay, that the lord Ruſſel was there when it was read; but the ſaid lord, the priſoner, was there when it was diſcourſed of ſeizing the guards."

The lord Howard began his teſtimony, with a long ſtory about the plot in general, which ſeemed to be deſigned only to exaſperate the jury; after which he depoſed to this effect: "That after the earl of Shaftſbury's flight, the chief perſons concerned in the conſpiracy, in his time, began to conſider, they had gone ſo far, that it was unſafe for them to make a retreat; and that in ſo great an affair, conſiſting of ſuch infinite particulars, to be managed with ſo much fineſſe, it would be neceſſary to have ſome general council; and that therefore they reſolved to erect a cabal among themſelves, which uſually conſiſted of ſix perſons, the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Eſſex, the lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, Mr. Hampden junior, and the deponent; and this was about the middle of January laſt. They met at Mr. Hampden's houſe, where it was preſently agreed, their proper province was to take care of the inſurrection: that the chief things they debated were, whether that inſurrection ſhould begin firſt in London, or the country; then what counties and towns were the fitteſt, and moſt diſpoſed to action; then, what arms were to be got, and how to be diſpoſed; then, that it was neceſſary to have a common bank of twenty five, or thirty thouſand pounds, to anſwer the occaſions of ſuch an undertaking; but that the greateſt point was, to order it ſo, as to draw in Scotland into a conſent with them; becauſe it was requiſite, that all kinds of diverſion ſhould be given to the king's forces. That about ten days after, every one of the ſame perſons met again at the lord Ruſſel's houſe: that they then came to a reſolution of ſending ſome perſons to the earl of Argyle, to ſettle a correſpondence with him, and that ſome meſſengers ſhould be diſpatched into Scotland, to invite ſome Scotchmen hither, who beſt underſtood the ſtate of Scotland, to give an account of it: that the perſons determined to be ſent for, were ſir John Cockram, the lord Melvil, and one of the name of Campbel: that colonel Sidney was intruſted to take care of a meſſenger; and he told the deponent, he had ſent Aaron Smith; then they agreed not to meet again till the return of the meſſenger, who was gone about a month before they heard any thing of him: that all this debate at the lord Ruſſel's went without contradiction, all there preſent giving their conſent: that as for raiſing of money, every one was put to think of ſuch a way, that money might be collected without giving cauſe of jealouſy. That, after all this, the deponent met no more with them; but, when he returned out of the country, he was informed, that Aaron Smith was come back, and that ſir John Cockram was alſo come to town."

To all this the lord Ruſſel made anſwer, "That he could not but think himſelf mighty unfortunate, to ſtand charged with ſo high a crime, and that intermixed with the treaſons, horrid practices and ſpeeches of other people, while the king's counſel took all advantage, and heightened things againſt him. That he was no lawyer, a very unready ſpeaker, and altogether a ſtranger to things of this nature: that he was ſenſible he was not ſo provided to make his defence, as otherwiſe he ſhould do; but he thought the gentlemen of the jury were men of conſcience, that valued innocent blood, and hoped they would conſider the witneſſes, that they ſwore to ſave their own lives. That the two times they met, was upon no formed deſign, only to talk of news and things in general: that the lord Howard having a voluble tongue, they delighted to hear him diſcourſe: that he knew of no ſuch council as ſix choſen, for who ſhould chuſe them?" As to colonel Rumſey, "He was notoriouſly known to have been highly obliged to the king and the duke; and it was ſtrange he ſhould be capable of ſuch a deſign as to murder the king. That the time was elapſed by the 13th of the king, which limits proſecutions to ſix months. Neither was the deſign of levying war, treaſon, unleſs it appeared by ſome overt act." And aſking upon what ſtatute he was indicted, he was told, "The ſtatute of the 25th of Edward the third." Upon which, he inſiſted upon a matter of law, and particularly, "That the buſineſs at Mr. Sheppard's houſe was ſworn to only by one witneſs." To which he was anſwered, "That if there were one witneſs of one act of treaſon, another of a ſecond, and another of a third, that manifeſted the ſame treaſon, it was ſufficient."

For a further defence of his lordſhip, there appeared for him the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Angleſey, Mr. Edward Howard, the lord Cavendiſh, the lord Clifford, doctor Tillotſon, doctor Burnet, doctor Cox, doctor Fitz Williams, Mr. Luton Gore, and Mr. Spencer. Some of theſe teſtified, that the lord Howard, before he was taken, declared, "He believed the lord Ruſſel innocent, and knew nothing againſt him." Others ſpoke to his lordſhip's private character, and declared his great worth and probity, his virtuous and ſober life, and conſequently the improbability of his being thus engaged. But this was turned againſt him by the king's counſel, who ſaid, there could not be any more dangerous enemies to a ſtate, than ſuch as come ſober to endeavour its deſtruction.

As to what concerned the lord Howard's ſaying, he believed the priſoner innocent, it was anſwered by that lord himſelf, who confeſſed, "He had ſaid ſo, being then himſelf not accuſed, ſo that he intended to outface the thing both for himſelf and the party; but now, his duty to God, the king, and his country required it, he muſt ſay the truth; and that though the council of ſix were not choſen by any community, yet they did erect themſelves by mutual agreement one with another into that ſociety."

In concluſion, the jury brought him in guilty of high treaſon. This ſentence was conſidered by all, who had any ſenſe of ſhame left, as the moſt crying injuſtice, ever known in England. For the lord Ruſſel was condemned for words ſpoken in his hearing, which in England can never paſs for treaſon. The lord Howard ſo loſt his reputation, for being acceſſary to this injuſtice, that he was looked on with horror by honeſt men, who avoided his company, as aſhamed or afraid to be ſeen with him. Some ſay, he had made his peace with the king a little before, by the mediation of the ducheſs of Portſmouth, and by an engagement to ſerve as a witneſs againſt the pretended conſpirators.

But that which was believed to have very much influenced the jury againſt the lord Ruſſel, was, that in the very time of his trial, the earl of Eſſex, priſoner in the Tower, was found dead in his chamber, with his throat cut from ear to ear with a razor. The news was immediately brought to the Old Baily, and communicated to the judges and the king's counſel, who from thence took occaſion to inſinuate to the jury the reality of the plot[y], ſince the earl of Eſſex rather choſe to lay violent hands on himſelf, than ſtand a trial.

Though the coroner's inqueſt, after an examination of the dead body, found the earl Felo de ſe, this was not capable to remove the ſuſpicion entertained by moſt people, that this fact was committed by the order of the king and duke, who were in the Tower that very morning, where they had not been for twelve years before. It was beſides urged, that it was not poſſible for a man to cut his own throat from ear to ear. Several other circumſtances were added, of which it is not eaſy to diſcover the truth. It is pretended, that in the blood ſprinkled on the floor of the room, were diſcovered the marks of a ſtrange foot; and that after the deed was done, the razor was thrown out of the window, and pickt up by a little girl. That before the coroner came to inſpect the body, care was taken to ſtrip and leave it naked, and to waſh the room. That the coroner demanding to ſee the cloaths, was anſwered, it was his buſineſs to examine the body, and not the cloaths. What has been moſt plauſibly urged, in vindication of the king and duke from this horrid action, is, that perſons of credit have teſtified their frequent hearing the earl of Eſſex declare, that ſelf-murder was no ſin. It is further added, that his counteſs and ſir Henry Capel his brother owned the juſtice of the coroner's verdict. But had they believed the contrary, this was no proper time to diſcover their ſuſpicions. I am very certain, the laſt earl of Eſſex, his ſon, was of another opinion, and have heard him ſay, he believed his father was murdered, and that a French footman, who then ſerved his father, was ſtrongly ſuſpected, and diſappeared immediately after the fact. Be this as it will, the general opinion then was, and ſtill is, that this unfortunate nobleman fell a ſacrifice to the revenge of the king and the duke. This ſeems the leſs ſtrange, as among thoſe who declared moſt openly for their country, againſt the king and duke, the earl of Eſſex was not the only perſon who felt the effects of their reſentment. The king however publicly declared in print, that he was deeply afflicted for the earl of Eſſex's death, becauſe he was thereby deprived of an opportunity to exerciſe his clemency, and teſtify, how highly he valued the memory of the lord Capel. But, inſtead of convincing the public by this external demonſtration, it was by many imagined, that the king mentioned the lord Capel, only to inſinuate, how much the earl his ſon had deviated from his ſteps.

Beſides the lord Ruſſel condemned for this plot, two others alſo met with the ſame fate, namely, Hone a joyner, and John Rouſe. This laſt had been indicted for treaſonable words, and eſcaped by an ignoramus jury. But he was re-taken, and tried for the ſame crime, which did not properly belong to this plot, but to his having talked of the king in treaſonable terms. Hone and Rouſe were both condemned as traitors, and executed with Walcot, the 20th of July. They confeſſed, they had heard of a plot in general, but deſcended not to particulars. At leaſt, it did not appear, that the lord Ruſſel had any correſpondence with them.

The next day, the lord Ruſſel was alſo executed[z]. He was ſo univerſally eſteemed, that it could not be thought, the king would refuſe his pardon, which was begged by ſo many powerful relations. It is even ſaid, the earl of Bedford his father, offered a hundred thouſand pounds for his life, but his offer was rejected. The king would not ſo much as grant a reprieve of ſix weeks to his lady, though daughter of the earl of Southampton, but made her this anſwer, "Shall I grant that man ſix weeks, who, if it had been in his power, would not have granted me ſix hours?" Every one however was perſuaded, that if there was a deſign to kill the king, the lord Ruſſel was not concerned in it. Beſides that he denied it with his laſt breath, he was not condemned for that crime, and the witneſſes which depoſed againſt him ſaid nothing like it. And yet, the king, to have an excuſe for refuſing a ſhort delay, ſuppoſed that this crime was fully proved. It cannot be denied, that though the lord Ruſſel had been guilty of the crime for which he was condemned, namely, of giving a tacit conſent to the deſign of an inſurrection, the king could never have had an opportunity of exerciſing his clemency with more applauſe, to a man of ſo known virtue, near relation of the greateſt families in the kingdom. But all theſe conſiderations were weak, againſt the paſſion of revenge with which the king and the duke of York were actuated. The lord Ruſſel had been one of the warmeſt oppoſers of the duke of York, had joined the earls of Shaftſbury and Eſſex, and carried up the excluſion bill to the houſe of lords. Theſe were crimes not to be forgiven by the king and his brother. But perhaps moſt of my readers, after having peruſed the tranſactions of this reign, will not think it ſo enormous a crime to endeavour to oppoſe an arbitrary power, which was beginning to be introduced. He died with great reſolution, proteſting his innocence and ignorance of any deſign againſt the king's perſon, or of any contrivance to alter the government. As it was expected that he would be interrupted, he ſpoke but little on the ſcaffold, leaving in the hands of the ſheriff a paper, in which he proteſted his innocence, and ſaid, "That he died a true and ſincere proteſtant, and in the communion of the church of England, though he could never yet comply with, or riſe up to all the heights of ſome people."

For a concluſion to this tragedy, it remains only to ſpeak of the condemnation and execution of colonel Algernon Sidney, who was accuſed of the plot, and of the deſign to kill the king. He was brother to the earl of Leiceſter, and, in the late troubles, had been deeply engaged in the republican party. At the reſtoration he thought not fit to accept perſonally of the indemnity, whether in diſtruſt of the king or for ſome other reaſon. At laſt, in 1677, he obtained a particular pardon of the king, and returned to England, where he joined the country party, at which the king was extremely offended.

[z] He was beheaded, July 21, on a ſcaffold erected in Lincoln's-inn-fields. There were ten companies of the king's guards, and a troop of horſe, drawn up, to prevent any diſturbances that might ariſe at the ſight of ſo moving and melancholy a ſpectacle. Echard, tom. III. p. 693———In the duke of Monmouth's journal, it is ſaid, that the king told him, "He inclined to ſave the lord Ruſſel, but was forced to conſent to his death, otherwiſe he muſt have broke with his brother, the duke of York." See Kennet, p. 406.

Four witneſſes were produced againſt him, Rumſey, Weſt, Keeling, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick. The three firſt contented themſelves with giving a particular account of the plot, but ſaid nothing directly againſt the priſoner. He complained of it as a great hardſhip, as prepoſſeſſing the jury. The lord Howard depoſed, as before at the trial of the lord Ruſſel, that colonel Sidney was one of the council of ſix, and had ſent Aaron Smith into Scotland, to engage the Scots in a rebellion.

His defence was, firſt, the great improbability of erecting a council of ſix; and that perſons ſo little knowing one another, ſhould preſently fall into ſo great and intimate a friendſhip. As to the duke of Monmouth, he ſaid, he never ſpoke with him above three times in his life; and one time was, when lord Howard brought him to his houſe and cozened them both; for he told the duke, that colonel Sidney had invited him, and he told the colonel, that the duke invited himſelf, and neither of them was true. He enlarged upon the ill reputation of the lord Howard, and his varying his evidence with reſpect to the lord Ruſſel's, and the preſent trial. He alledged the lord Howard's indigence, and his owing him money, which debt might probably be cancelled by his conviction. He proved, by the teſtimonies of the earls of Clare and Angleſey, of Mr. Philip and Mr. Edward Howard, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Ducas, and Mr. Blake, that the lord Howard had confeſſed, "That he could not get his pardon until he had done ſome other jobbs, till he was paſt the drudgery of ſwearing."

During the whole trial, the judges themſelves undertook to anſwer the reaſons of the accuſed, without leaving any thing for the king's council to do. But they anſwered not the objection drawn from the confeſſion of lord Howard, nor did he himſelf make any reply. So that the deſign of the court to furniſh the jury with reaſons to condemn the priſoner, manifeſtly appeared.

But what was moſt urged againſt him, was a manuſcript found among his papers. It was an anſwer to a book, compoſed by ſir Robert Filmer, to prove, that, by the laws of God and nature, kings, and particularly thoſe of England, were inveſted with abſolute and unlimited power. Sidney, in his anſwer to this book, had aſſerted a quite contrary doctrine, and carried his republican principles to a very great height.

He ſaid firſt, that the manuſcript was not writ by him, and he ſaw no reaſon for aſcribing it to him. That though he was the author, it might be writ many years ago in anſwer to Filmer's book, with no intention of publiſhing it, but diſputandi-gratia, only for private diverſion, and the exerciſe of his pen. In fine, he inſiſted very much upon the neceſſity of two witneſſes to the ſame fact. The court, as I ſaid, anſwered all his objections, but it plainly appears, it was with wretched cavils and ſubtilties. To the manuſcript it was anſwered, that ſcribere eſt agere, and that there was ſufficient in it to prove the malice of his heart, and his treaſonable deſigns. I know not whether the Engliſh lawyers are agreed in this maxim [a]. However, he was brought in guilty by the jury. It is pretended, this was the firſt time a man was accuſed of treaſon, and condemned to die, for writing any thing without publiſhing it.

He was beheaded the 7th of December, without diſcovering the leaſt weakneſs. Inſtead of a ſpeech on the ſcaffold he delivered a writing to the ſheriff, in which he complained bitterly of the injuſtice done him. He repreſented the infamous life of the lord Howard, and the judges, as men corrupted and only promoted to ſerve the deſigns of the court.

While theſe pretended conſpirators were vigorouſly proſecuted, the univerſity of Oxford diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a particular manner, amongſt the advocates for the court, by a condemnation in form of twenty-ſeven propoſitions, collected out of ſeveral modern authors, concerning the regal power. This decree was preſented to the king with great ſolemnity, and very graciouſly received. In the decree itſelf will appear the ſentiments of the univerſity at that time.

The judgment and decree of the univerſity of Oxford, paſſed in the convocation, July 21, 1683, againſt certain pernicious books, and damnable doctrines, deſtructive to the ſacred perſons of princes, their ſtates and government, and of all human ſociety [b].

"ALTHOUGH the barbarous aſſaſſination lately enterpriſed againſt the perſon of his ſacred majeſty and his royal brother, engage all our thoughts to reflect with the utmoſt deteſtation and abhorrence on that execrable villainy, hateful to God and man, and pay our due acknowledgments to the divine providence, which by extraordinary methods brought it to paſs, that the breath of our noſtrils, the anointed of the lord, is not taken in the pit which was prepared for him; and that under his ſhadow we continue to live, and enjoy the bleſſings of his government; yet notwithſtanding, we find it to be a neceſſary duty at this time to ſearch into, and lay open thoſe impious doctrines, which having of late been ſtudiouſly diſſeminated, gave riſe and growth to theſe nefarious attempts; and paſs upon them our ſolemn public cenſure, and decree of condemnation.

"Therefore, to the honour of the holy and undivided trinity, the preſervation of catholic truth in the church, and that the king's majeſty may be ſecured both from the attempts of open bloody enemies, and machinations of treacherous heretics and ſchiſmatics: we the vice-chancellor, doctors, proctors, and maſters, regent and non regent, met in convocation, in the accuſtomed manner, time, and place, on Saturday the one and twentieth day of July, in the year 1683, concerning certain propoſitions contained in divers books and writings, publiſhed in the Engliſh, and alſo the Latin tongues, repugnant to the holy ſcriptures, decrees of councils, writings of the fathers, the faith and profeſſion of the primitive church, and alſo deſtructive of the kingly government, the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon, the public peace, the laws of nature, and bonds of human ſociety; by our unanimous aſſent and conſent, have decreed and determined in manner and form following.

"I. All civil authority is derived originally from the people.

"II. There is a mutual compact, tacit or expreſs, between a prince and his ſubjects; and that if he perform not his duty, they are diſcharged from theirs.

"III. That if lawful governors become tyrants, or govern otherwiſe than by the laws of God and man they ought to do, they forfeit the right they had unto their government. Lex rex. Buchan. de jure regni. Vindiciæ contra tyrannos. Bellarm. de conciliis, de pontifice. Milton. Goodwin. Baxt. H. C.

"IV. The ſovereignty of England is in the three eſtates, viz. King, lords, and commons. The king has but a coordinate power, and may be over-ruled by the other two. Lex rex. Hunton. Of a limited and mixed monarchy. Baxter's H. C. Polit. Catechiſ.

"V. Birth-right and proximity of blood give no title to rule or government; and it is lawful to preclude the next heir from his right and ſucceſſion to the crown. Lex rex. Hunt's poſtſcript. Doleman's hiſtory of ſucceſſion. Julian the apoſtate. Mene tekel.

"VI. It is lawful for ſubjects, without the conſent, and againſt the command of the ſupreme magiſtrate, to enter into leagues, covenants and aſſociations, for defence of themſelves and their religion. Solemn league and covenant. Late aſſociation.

"VII. Self-preſervation is the fundamental law of nature, and ſuperſedes the obligation of all others, whenſoever they ſtand in competition with it. Hobbes, de cive; Leviathan.

"VIII. The doctrine of the goſpel, concerning patient ſuffering of injuries, is not inconſiſtent with violent reſiſting of the higher powers, in caſe of perſecution for religion. Lex rex. Julian the apoſtate. Apologet. relat.

"IX. There lies no obligation upon chriſtians to paſſive obedience, when the prince commands any thing againſt the the laws of our country; and the primitive chriſtians choſe rather to die than reſiſt, becauſe chriſtianity was not ſettled by the laws of the empire. Julian the apoſtate.

"X. Poſſeſſion and ſtrength give a right to govern; and ſucceſs in a cauſe or enterpriſe, proclaims it to be lawful and juſt: to purſue it, is to comply with the will of God, becauſe it is to follow the conduct of his providence. Hobbes. Owen's ſermon before the reg-

Decretum figis ſolenne, decanus ut eſſes,
Ut fieres præſul, Jane, refigis idem.

Sir

oides, Jan. 31, 1648. Baxter. Jenkins's petition, Octob. 1651.

"XI. In the ſtate of nature there is no difference between good and evil, right and wrong: the ſtate of nature is a ſtate of war, in which every man hath a right to all things.

"XII. The foundation of civil authority is this natural right, which is not given but left to the ſupreme magiſtrate, upon mens entering into ſocieties: and not only a foreign invader, but a domeſtic rebel, puts himſelf again into a ſtate of nature, to be proceeded againſt, not as a ſubject, but an enemy; and conſequently acquires by his rebellion the ſame right over the life of his prince, as the prince for the moſt heinous crimes has over the life of his own ſubjects.

"XIII. Every man, after his entering into a ſociety, retains a right of defending himſelf againſt force; and cannot transfer that right to the commonwealth, when he conſents to that union whereby a commonwealth is made: and in caſe a great many men together have already reſiſted the commonwealth, for which every one of them expected death, they have liberty then to join together to aſſiſt and defend one another: their bearing of arms, ſubſequent to the firſt breach of their duty, though it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjuſt act; and if it be only to defend their perſons, it is not unjuſt at all.

"XIV. An oath ſuperadds no obligation to pacts, and a pact obliges no further than it is credited, and conſequently, if a prince, gives any indication, that he does not believe the promiſes of fealty and allegiance made by any of his ſubjects, they are thereby freed from their ſubjection; and notwithſtanding their pacts and oaths, may lawfully rebel againſt, and deſtroy their ſovereign. Hobbes de civ. leviathan.

"XV. If a people, that by oath and duty are obliged to a ſovereign, ſhall ſinfully diſpoſſeſs him, and, contrary to their covenants, chuſe and covenant with another; they may be obliged by their latter covenants, notwithſtanding their former. Baxter's H. C.

"XVI. All oaths are unlawful, and contrary to the word of God. Quakers.

XVII. An oath obligeth not in the ſenſe of the impoſers, but the takers. Sheriff's caſe.

"XVIII. Dominion is founded in grace.

"XIX. The powers of this world are uſurpations upon the prerogative of Jeſus Chriſt; and it is the duty of God's people to deſtroy them, in order to the ſetting Chriſt upon his throne. Fifth monarchy men.

"XX. The preſbyterian government is the ſceptre of Chriſt's kingdom, to which kings as well as others are bound to ſubmit, and the king's ſupremacy in eccleſiaſtical affairs, aſſerted by the church of England, is injurious to Chriſt, the ſole king and head of the church. Altare damaſcenum. Apologet. relat. hiſt. of indulgences. Cartwright. Travers.

"XXI. It is not lawful for ſuperiors to impoſe any thing in the worſhip of God that is not antecedently neceſſary.

"XXII. The duty of not offending a weak brother, is inconſiſtent with all human authority of making laws concerning indifferent things. Proteſtant reconciler.

"XXIII. Wicked kings and tyrants ought to be put to death; and if the judges and inferior magiſtrates will not do their office, the power of the ſword devolves to the people: if the major part of the people refuſe to exerciſe this power, then the miniſters may excommunicate ſuch a king: after which it is lawful for any of his ſubjects to kill him, as the people did Athaliah; and Jehu, Jezabel. Buchanan. Knot. Goodman. Gilby. Jeſuits.

"XXIV. After the ſealing of the ſcripture canon, the people of God, in all ages, are to expect new revelations for a rule of their actions; and it is lawful for a private man, having an inward motion from God, to kill a tyrant. Quakers, and other enthuſiaſts. Goodman.

"XXV. The example of Phineas, is to us inſtead of a command: for what God hath commanded or approved in one age, muſt needs oblige in all. Goodman. Knox. Napthali.

"XXVI. King Charles I. was lawfully put to death; and his murderers were the bleſſed inſtruments of God's glory in their generations. Milton. Goodwin. Owen.

"XXVII. King Charles the firſt made war upon his parliament: and in ſuch a caſe, the king may not only be reſiſted, but he ceaſeth to be king. Baxter.

"We decree, judge, and declare, all and every of theſe propoſitions to be falſe, ſeditious, and impious; and moſt of them to be alſo heretical and blaſphemous; infamous to the chriſtian religion, and deſtructive of all government in church and ſtate.

"We further decree, that the books which contain the aforeſaid propoſitions, and impious doctrines, are fitted to deprave good manners, corrupt the minds of uneaſy men, ſtir up ſeditions and tumults, overthrow ſtates and kingdoms, and lead to rebellion, murder of princes, and atheiſm itſelf. And therefore we inderdict all members of the univerſity from the reading of the ſaid books, under the penalties in the ſtatutes expreſſed. We alſo order the before recited books to be publicly burnt by the hand of our marſhal, in the court of our ſchools.

"Likewiſe we order, that in perpetual memory hereof, theſe our decrees ſhall be entered into the regiſtry of our convocation; and that copies of them being communicated to the ſeveral colleges and halls within this univerſity, they be there publicly affixed in the libraries, refectories, or other fit places where they may be ſeen and read of all.

"Laſtly, We command, and ſtrictly enjoin all and ſingular the readers, tutors, catechiſts, and others, to whom the care and truſt of initiating youth is committed, that they diligently inſtruct and ground their ſcholars in that moſt neceſſary doctrine, which, in a manner, is the badge and character of the church of England, of ſubmitting to every ordinance of man, for the lord's ſake; whether it be to the king, as ſupreme; or unto governors, as unto them that are ſent by him, for the puniſhment of evil doers, and for the praiſe of them that do well. Teaching that this ſubmiſſion and obedience is to be clear, abſolute, and without any exception of any ſtate or order of men: alſo, that they, according to the apoſtle's precept, exhort, that firſt of all, ſupplications, prayers, interceſſions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for the king, and all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godlineſs and honeſty, for this is good and acceptable in the ſight of God our ſaviour. And in ſpecial manner, that they preſs and oblige them, humbly to offer their moſt ardent and daily prayers at the throne of grace, for the preſervation of our ſovereign lord king Charles, from the attempts of open violence, and ſecret machinations of perfidious traitors; that the defender of the faith, being ſafe under the defence of the moſt high, may continue his reign on earth, till he exchange it for that of a late and happy immortality."

The marriage of the princeſs Anne, ſecond daughter of the duke of York, with prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, celebrated the 28th of July, gave ſome but no long interruption to the proſecutions of the conſpirators.

We have ſeen that the city of London complied with the king's pleaſure in relation to their charter. But it ſeems the king repented of his being ſo favourable. The election of a lord mayor, which is uſually on the 29th of September, having been deferred to the 6th of October, the king, on pretence that the city had not tendered him a formal ſubmiſſion, ordered the judgment upon the Quo Warranto to be entered. By this the city being without a charter, the government was ſeized by the king, who ſent a commiſſion to ſir William Pritchard to continue in the execution of his office during pleaſure. He confirmed likewiſe the two ſheriffs with the ſame reſtriction, and diſplaced the recorder, naming another in his room[c]. Shortly after, on St. Simon and Jude's day, on which it is cuſtomary for the new lord mayor to take the oaths in the court of exchequer, the king appointed a new lord mayor during his pleaſure. Thus the city of London ſaw itſelf without charter or privileges, and entirely dependent on the king's will.

The king, as I ſaid, publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending all the conſpirators againſt his life, among whom was his natural ſon, the duke of Monmouth. The duke had hitherto kept himſelf concealed. But at laſt, weary of his uneaſy ſituation, he writ a very ſubmiſſive letter to the king his father, wherein, after poſitively denying his ever having any deſign againſt his life, he owned however, that many people had made him believe his own was in danger, and thereby cauſed him to commit things contrary to his duty to the king and the duke of York, and aſked both their pardons with great earneſtneſs and ſubmiſſion. He added, that if his majeſty would give him his pardon, he would deliver himſelf into the hands of the duke, that he might bring him to him. This was accompanied with proteſtations and aſſurances of reſpect, ſubmiſſion, and fidelity for the future. He concluded with ſaying, "That he would never aſk to ſee the king's face more, if ever he did any thing againſt the duke; which was the greateſt curſe he could lay upon himſelf."

The king could not diſſemble his ſatisfaction at the receipt of this letter, for he tenderly loved the duke of Monmouth. Nevertheleſs, with his own hand he writ the following anſwer: "If the duke of Monmouth deſires to make himſelf capable of my mercy, he muſt render himſelf to the ſecretary, and reſolve to tell me all he knows, reſigning himſelf entirely to my pleaſure."

This drew a ſecond letter from the duke, more ſubmiſſive than the former, in which he confeſſed his offence againſt the king and the duke, but in general terms, and without mention of particulars [d]. But in aſſuring the king of an unreſerved ſubmiſſion to his pleaſure, he intreated him, that he would not expoſe him to the ignominy of a trial, nor ſend him to the Tower, nor force him to be a witneſs againſt any perſon.

The king, ſatisfied with this letter, very readily admitted his beloved ſon to aſk forgiveneſs. He was introduced by ſecretary Jenkins, who withdrew, and left him alone with the king and the duke of York. What paſſed between them, can only be known from the report of the king and the duke his brother. It is however affirmed, that he threw himſelf at the king's feet, acknowledging his guilt [e], and aſking his pardon; that he confeſſed himſelf faulty to the duke, aſking his pardon alſo. All this is very probable, but what is added admits of ſome doubt, namely, that he confirmed whatever had been depoſed againſt the lord Ruſſel and colonel Sidney, and thereby corroborated the lord Howard's evidence. It is alſo added, that he aſſured all the conſiderable non-conformiſt miniſters knew of the conſpiracy. As this could only come from the king, or duke of York, and as it was the intereſt of both, that the earl of Eſſex, lord Ruſſel, and colonel Sidney, ſhould be thought guilty, all do not think themſelves obliged to credit their teſtimony.

However this be, the king ordered his pardon to be diſpatched with all expedition. But afterwards, upon a report, "That the duke of Monmouth had made no confeſſion, but had aſſerted the innocency of ſome that had ſuffered," the king required him to write over, and ſubſcribe the following letter:

"I HAVE heard of ſome reports of me, as if I ſhould have leſſened the late plot, and gone about to diſcredit the evidence given againſt thoſe who have died by juſtice. Your majeſty and the duke know, how ingenuouſly I have owned the late conſpiracy; and though I was not conſcious of any deſign againſt your majeſty's life, yet I lament the having had ſo great a ſhare in the other part of the ſaid conſpiracy. Sir, I have taken the liberty to put this in writing for my own vindication; and I beſeech you to look forward, and endeavour to forget the faults you have forgiven me; I will take care never to commit any more againſt you, or come within the danger of being again miſled from my duty, but make it the buſineſs of my life to deſerve the pardon your majeſty hath granted to,

Your dutiful Monmouth."

It is certain, the duke writ, or at leaſt ſubſcribed this letter, which, as it appears, was expreſſed in general terms, without deſcending to particulars. And yet, ſhortly after he repented of what he had done, and with great importunity, preſſed the king to return him the paper he had ſubſcribed. The king anſwered him, he would not keep it againſt his will, that he might not have occaſion to ſay, he had been forced to write it. But withal, he warned him to conſider, what ill conſequences might follow upon this obſtinacy, and therefore gave him time till the next morning to deliberate with himſelf. The next day the duke demanded his letter with ſtill greater importunity, and the king reſtored it, but from that moment baniſhed him from his preſence at court.

It is eaſy to ſee, that the motive which induced the duke to demand his letter again, is a ſubject for conjectures, and difficult to be diſcovered. Some pretend, the duke of Monmouth's friends repreſented to him, that by writing this letter, he had thrown himſelf upon an unavoidable precipice, ſince at ſome other time it might be turned to his ruin. Others maintain, that he was ſo troubled in conſcience, for having aſſerted in this letter a thing which he knew to be falſe, that he was not eaſy till it was returned him. Each follows the opinion which is moſt agreeable to his ſyſtem, but no proof is produced on either ſide. Laſtly, there are who pretend, it was a contrivance between the king and the duke of Monmouth, and that the king, not to diſoblige the duke of York, told, or ordered the duke of Monmouth to be told, to demand his letter again, in order to have an opportunity to reſtore it, for fear the duke of York might one day make an ill uſe of it. They confirm this conjecture from the king's behaviour to the duke of Monmouth in his abſence. The duke withdrawing into Holland, and the prince of Orange receiving him with great reſpect and civility, the king could not forbear teſtifying his ſatisfaction. He writ frequently to the duke of Monmouth, received letters from him, unknown to the duke of York, and privately ſupplied him with money.

The winter this year was very remarkable for a violent froſt, which began about the beginning of December, and laſted till the 5th of February. The Thames was ſo frozen, that there was another city, as it were, on the ice, by the great number of booths erected between the Temple and Southwark, in which place was held an abſolute fair, for above a fortnight, of all ſorts of trades. An ox was likewiſe roaſted whole, bulls baited, and the like.

In September or October this year, the king commiſſioned the lord Dartmouth to go with about twenty ſail of ſhips, and utterly demoliſh the town, caſtle, and mole of Tangier. The mole had coſt the king vaſt ſums, but for want of money, or for ſome other cauſe, was left unfiniſhed. The lord Dartmouth had alſo orders to choak up the haven. Six months were ſpent in executing this commiſſion. The king was thereby freed from a conſiderable annual expence for the preſervation of this place, and moreover, the garriſon, moſtly conſiſting, as I obſerved, of popiſh ſoldiers and officers, ſerved to augment the king's forces at home, and keep in awe thoſe who were impatient of the yoke.

This year 1683, was memorable for the famous ſiege of Vienna, formed by the grand viſier Kara Muſtapha, the 19th of July, with an army of an hundred and thirty thouſand men, and raiſed by the king of Poland, the ſecond of September, when the city was reduced to the laſt extremity.

[1683-4] This year 1684 was almoſt wholly ſpent in eſtabliſhing the king's acquired abſolute power. This was done chiefly by three expedients. The firſt was the augmentation of the forces by the garriſon of Tangier: the ſecond was, the rigorous puniſhment of thoſe who were not only accuſed of the proteſtant plot, but had during the quarrels between the king and the late parliaments, taken the liberty to ſpeak of the king and the duke of York, with too much paſſion and heat. Theſe ſpeeches, at a time when the king and the duke were obliged to diſſemble, for fear of farther exaſperating the parliament, were now remembered when they were in a more favourable ſituation, and the authors made to ſuffer. The third expedient was, the perſuading indirectly all the corporations in the kingdom to ſurrender their charters to the king. I have already ſaid what I had to ſay concerning the garriſon of Tangier.

As to the ſecond expedient, I mean, the proſecutions againſt the king's and duke's enemies, it would be tedious to enumerate all the trials and ſentences given againſt thoſe who were accuſed either of the laſt plot, or of having ſpoken too freely of the king and the duke. Nothing elſe almoſt occurs in the events of the year 1684. Since the city had loſt their privileges, the king had nominated ſheriffs [f] entirely devoted to him, who took care in all criminal trials to impannel juries, diſpoſed to follow the ſuggeſtions of the court. To facilitate the condemnation of thoſe whoſe proſecutions were reſolved, the king, in December laſt, had made ſir George Jefferies lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench. He was a man fit for the purpoſes of the court, without honour or conſcience, impudent to the laſt degree, and ever ready to betray his duty and the intereſts of juſtice and the kingdom to recommend himſelf to thoſe who were in power. Theſe great qualities advanced him at laſt to the chancellorſhip of England. The king had alſo made other alterations among the judges, ſo that he was in a manner aſſured of the compliance of all the courts of juſtice. The court party had made a great noiſe ſome time before, concerning the ignoramus returned by the London juries upon all bills preferred againſt the whigs, and theſe complained no leſs of the rigour exerciſed this year by the tories. Books have been publiſhed to ſhew the paſſion, the partiality, and the crying injuſtice of the judges and juries, in favour of the court. But I cannot deſcend to theſe particulars, however proper they may be to demonſtrate, with what zeal the court promoted the execution of their deſigns, and to ſhew the characters of the perſons employed. I ſhall therefore omit many trials of perſons little known, and confine myſelf to ſome particular caſes, by which the reſt will be eaſily judged of.

The earl of Danby had been ſent to the Tower by the houſe of lords, upon an impeachment from the commons. He had often demanded to be diſcharged upon bail; but the judges had always refuſed his requeſt, declaring that it was not in their power to admit to bail a peer of the realm impriſoned by parliament. This was the law of the kingdom. But the alterations amongſt the judges had likewiſe produced great alterations in the maxims and principles of the courts of juſtice. The judges who had been in office ſome time, believed it lawful to releaſe the earl upon bail, which was accordingly taken, the earl being bound in a recognizance of ten thouſand pounds.

The releaſe of the earl of Danby was a precedent for the liberty of the popiſh lords, priſoners in the Tower. The lord Petre one of thoſe lords, dying about a month before, upon his death-bed ſent a letter to the king, diſowning in his laſt words, and upon his ſalvation, the matters of which he ſtood accuſed. After a declaration ſo expreſs, the king not doubting the innocence of the other four, told the court by his attorney general, that he conſented to whatever the court ſhould think fit to be done with regard to the popiſh lords. Whereupon they were admitted to bail the ſame day with the earl of Danby. It muſt be that the former judges were very ignorant, not to know that an inferior court had power to releaſe men impriſoned by the ſupreme court of the kingdom, or that the preſent judges were more bold than their predeceſſors.

But the perſons accuſed of the laſt conſpiracy, and thoſe who had ſpoken diſreſpectfully of the king and the duke, met not with ſo much humanity. Among the great number proſecuted for theſe two offences, I ſhall only relate the trials of three or four.

Mr. Hampden was tried for a conſpiracy the 6th of February. The lord Howard depoſed againſt him, That the council of ſix meeting at Mr. Hampden's houſe, Mr. Hampden made an introductory ſpeech to open the aſſembly, and that he was concerned in ſending Aaron Smith into Scotland. Mr. Hampden's counſel inſiſted upon lord Howard's ill reputation, and ſcandalous life, and repreſented him little better than an atheiſt. But ſuch objections were of force only againſt Oates and Bedloe. For how was it poſſible that the lord Howard ſhould be an ill man, ſince he only depoſed againſt proteſtants? On the other hand, Mr. Hampden produced witneſſes who teſtified his virtue, his piety, his morality. But theſe teſtimonies were ineffectual. Jefferies, in a long ſpeech, ſpeaking of religion and virtue, turned it upon the priſoner in theſe words, "Was it not (ſaid he) under the ſhape of religion that the bleſſed martyr king Charles I. came to the block? Nay, ſome men were at a loſs to know which way they ſhould put a ſpirit into the common people to oppoſe the king; and ſome among them, Mr. Hampden the firſt, bid them be ſure to put religion to be the pretence, and that would make them run headlong to what they would have them." But this excellent argument, to be virtuous and religious, was a ſign of a man's being engaged in the plot. But obſerve an artifice made uſe of to caſt Mr. Hampden. It is certain, that, ſuppoſing the truth of lord Howard's teſtimony, Mr. Hampden was not leſs guilty than lord Ruſſel or colonel Sidney. Nevertheleſs, he could not be condemned as a traitor, ſince there was but one evidence againſt him, and all laws divine and human require two witneſſes to the taking away a man's life. He was therefore indicted of a miſdemeanour, and, the jury finding him guilty on the teſtimony of lord Howard, the court was ſatisfied with fining him forty thouſand pounds, and obliging him to find ſureties for his good behaviour during life. This was thought to be a very ſtrange and a ſevere ſentence. But the king diſpelled all doubts concerning this affair, by aſſuring the public in a large declaration, "That if he had not granted the duke of Monmouth's requeſt, that he would not make him a witneſs, neither Mr. Hampden, nor ſcarce any one man of thoſe that were freed upon bail, had eſcaped death."

[1684] John Dutton Colt, eſquire, a member of the three laſt parliaments, being accuſed of ſpeaking theſe words, "The duke of York is a papiſt, and before any ſuch papiſt dog ſhall be ſucceſſor to the crown of England, I will be hanged at my own door." Theſe and other injurious words being proved againſt him, the jury brought in their verdict for the duke of York, and gave him for damages a hundred thouſand pounds.

The duke of York alſo brought his action of ſcandalum magnatum againſt Titus Oates, for directly calling him traitor. For this offence the court gave the duke of York a hundred thouſand pounds damages. Shortly after, he was indicted for perjury, in relation to father Ireland's being in London at the time Oates ſwore to, at his trial. Not long after another indictment of perjury was preferred againſt him, in relation to his being preſent at the ſuppoſed conſult of the jeſuits at the Whitehorſe tavern in 1678. But theſe indictments not being tried this reign, Oates continued in priſon.

Theſe three, and ſome others[g], omitted for brevity ſake, eſcaped with life, though properly condemned to perpetual impriſonment, as not being able to pay their exorbitant fines. But two others, who were out of the kingdom, did not come off ſo eaſy. James Holloway having ſeen his name in the Gazette amongſt the conſpirators, who were to be apprehended by the king's proclamation, fled to the Weſt Indies. Upon his flight, he had ſuffered an outlawry for high treaſon, and this year the court hearing he was in the Weſt-Indies, cauſed him to be apprehended and brought to London, where he was executed upon the attainder of outlawry for treaſon.

The ſame thing happened to ſir Thomas Armſtrong, who had been conſidered as one of the principal authors of the laſt plot, and named in the king's proclamation with a reward of five hundred pounds. He made his eſcape into Holland, and was outlawed as well as Holloway. The court hearing he was at Leyden, obtained an order from the ſtates to apprehend him, and accordingly before he had notice, he was apprehended and brought to Rotterdam, and from thence to London. When he appeared at the King's Bench bar, he alledged that he was beyond ſea at the time of the outlawry, and begged that he might be tried. But his requeſt was abſolutely rejected, and the rather, as the attorney general told the court from the king, that Armſtrong was one of the perſons who were to aſſaſſinate his majeſty on his return from Newmarket, which the priſoner poſitively denied. He was executed the 20th of June, and his head and quarters ſet up in ſeveral parts of the city. Only one was reſerved to be ſent down to Stafford, for which town he had been a burgeſs in parliament.

I do not think it neceſſary to relate the trials, this year, of a great number of libellers, and perſons who had ſpoken againſt the king, the duke of York, or the government. In Echard's hiſtory I find thirty-two condemned in great fines, and ſome put in the pillory. The hiſtory of this year properly conſiſts of ſuch tranſactions only.

The whole kingdom being ſtruck with terror, the king believed he ought to improve it to the eſtabliſhment of his abſolute power, ſo as to have nothing to fear from any future oppoſition. This was by depriving at once all the corporations, and conſequently all his ſubjects of their privileges. It was not proper to uſe abſolute power, but to proceed in a manner more politic and more dangerous to the people, by engaging them to make a voluntary ſurrender of their charters in order to receive ſuch new ones as the king ſhould pleaſe to grant. For this purpoſe, courtiers and emiſſaries were ſent to the more conſiderable corporations, to inſpire them with terror, and intimate to them, that ſcarce one could eſcape, ſhould the king exerciſe ſtrict juſtice. This chiefly concerned the whigs and non-conformiſts, for the tories were generally very ready blindly to obey the pleaſure of the court. Jefferies particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his northern circuit at the ſummer aſſizes. He forgot nothing capable of terrifying the people, aſſuring them, that a ſurrender of their charters was the only way to avert the [g] February 7, Laurence Braddon and Hugh Speke were tried for a miſdemeanour in ſuborning witneſſes to prove the earl of Eſſex was murdered by his keepers, for which the firſt was fined two thouſand pounds, and the latter one thouſand pounds.——February 14, ſir Samuel Barnardiſtone was fined ten thouſand pounds for writing ſome letters about the plot. State trials, tom. III. p. 771, 845.——And Samuel Johnſon five hundred marks, for writing Julian the apoſtate, Kennet, p. 405.

miſchiefs which hung over their head. Other judges and emiſſaries did the ſame, and at laſt, the larger corporations being thus gained, the leſſer neceſſarily followed. So, a ſudden, and great change was ſeen in England, namely, the Engliſh nation without rights or privileges, but ſuch as the king would vouchſafe to grant her; and what is more ſtrange, the Engliſh themſelves ſurrendered to Charles II. thoſe very rights and privileges which they had defended with ſo much paſſion or rather fury, againſt the attempts of Charles I.

To make the people in ſome meaſure fully ſenſible of their new ſlavery, the king affected to muſter his forces, which from one regiment of foot and one troop of horſe-guards (raiſed by himſelf, with the murmurs of many of his ſubjects) were increaſed to four thouſand compleatly trained and effective men. It might then be ſeen, that the members of parliament who oppoſed the raiſing, or at leaſt the eſtabliſhment of theſe guards, were not altogether in the wrong. But the zeal of the tory party was now arrived to ſuch a height, that they looked on every thing which contributed to render the king abſolute, as a ſure means to ruin the whigs, and conſequently as a triumph for them. They prepoſterouſly imagined, that the court only aimed at the deſtruction of that odious party, and was ſolely labouring for the tories. Accordingly, we find ſtill ſome authors of this laſt party who repreſent the year 1684 as the moſt peaceable, the moſt quiet, and, in a word, the happieſt year England had ſeen for ſome ages. Nothing was capable to open the eyes of theſe paſſionate men, who, againſt all probability, believed the court well affected both to the ſtate and the proteſtant religion.

Nevertheleſs, the king did a thing this year which ought to have undeceived them. He diſſolved the commiſſion, granted in the year 1681, for the diſpoſal of all eccleſiaſtical preferments. As the eſtabliſhing this commiſſion was in order to perſuade his ſubjects, that he had the intereſt of the proteſtant religion at heart, he could not avoid appointing ſuch commiſſioners as were thought to have the ſame ſentiments. But finding himſelf at length in the ſituation he had wiſhed for, this commiſſion was too great a reſtraint, and therefore he revoked it to fill the vacant benefices agreeably to his own inclinations.

It muſt not be concealed, that moſt hiſtorians aſcribe all the rigours exerciſed this year, and all the meaſures taken by the king for the advancement of his abſolute power to the counſels of the duke his brother. That prince had gained ſo great an aſcendant over the king, that he held him in a kind of ſubjection, and led him into meaſures productive of others, and ſo carried him farther than the king deſired. Beſides, that the king was naturally indolent, and loved his eaſe too much to engage in any affairs capable of diſturbing his repoſe, he knew the genius and temper of the Engliſh much better than the duke of York, and was ſenſible of the great difficulty to preſerve long a power acquired in ſo extraordinary a manner. But, on the other hand, after ſo many proceedings to ſecure this power, he knew not how to retreat, and could not alter his conduct, without breaking entirely with the duke, which muſt have extremely embarraſſed him. He could not change his principles and maxims, without an entire alteration in his court and council, and without putting himſelf into the hands of men of very different principles. Beſides, his inclination did not lead him to it, and it was only this fear of diſturbing his quiet, which cauſed him to conſider the danger of his preſent proceedings. Mean while, as this danger was not yet near, and as all the kingdom appeared ſubmiſſive, he kept off the evil day, and delayed coming to any determination.

However this be, the Hamborough company, to gain the good will of a prince, inveſted with ſuch power, erected a marble ſtatue to him in the middle of the Royal Exchange, with this pompous inſcription on the pedeſtal:

CAROLO II. Cæſari Britannico, patriæ patri, regum optimo, clementiſſimo, auguſtiſſimo, generis humani deliciis, utriuſque fortunæ victori, pacis Europæ arbitro, Maris domino & vindici, ſocietas mercatorum adventur. Angliæ, quæ per CCCC jam prope annos regiâ benignitate floret, fidei interatæ, gratitudinis æternæ, hoc teſtimonium venerabunda poſuit, anno ſal. humanæ, MDCLXXXIV [h].

[1684-5] Almoſt the whole month of January of the new year 1685, was ſpent either in proſecuting delinquents againſt the king and the duke, or in receiving the charters of the corporations, not yet ſurrendered, or in granting new ones on ſuch conditions as the court thought proper. It may well be imagined, that theſe conditions were not prejudicial to the power acquired by the king. All complaints were ſuppreſſed, and the whole kingdom entirely ſubdued, the city of London not excepted, which had always oppoſed abſolute power.

The king now finding himſelf at the height of his wiſhes, was willing to do a popular act, and publiſhed a declaration, drawn up by Dr, Prat, in which, "he affectionately thanked his ſubjects for their great confidence in him, chiefly for their ſo freely reſigning their local immunities and charters into his hands, leſt the abuſe of any of them ſhould hereafter prove dangerous to the juſt prerogatives of the crown. This, he declared he eſteemed as the peculiar honour of his reign, being ſuch as none of the moſt popular of all his late royal predeceſſors could ever have hoped for. Wherefore he thought himſelf more than ordinarily obliged to continue, as he had hitherto begun, to ſhew the greateſt moderation and benignity, in the exerciſe of ſo great a truſt: reſolving upon this occaſion, to convince the higheſt pretenders to the commonweal, that as the crown was the firſt original, ſo it was ſtill the ſureſt guardian of all the people's lawful rights and privileges."

Notwithſtanding all this, it is pretended, he had formed a project for an extraordinary change in the government: that he deſigned to recall the duke of Monmouth, to ſend the duke of York beyond ſea, and call a free parliament. This ſeems to have been founded on ſome paſſages in the duke of Monmouth's pocket book, ſeized with his perſon in the following reign. We are further told, that the king had intimated, that if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himſelf eaſy for the reſt of his life [i]. But he lived not to execute this deſign. He died the 6th of February, fifty-four years of age, and twenty-five ſince his reſtoration. The cauſe of his death being variouſly reported, ſome thinking it natural, others violent, I believe moſt inſtructive for the reader, what Dr. Welwood ſays of it, who ſeems to have ſpoken of it with moſt impartiality.

"It's confeſſed, few princes come to die a ſudden death, but the world is apt to attribute it to foul play; eſpecially if attended with unuſual circumſtances in the time and manner of it.

"King Charles had a healthful conſtitution beyond moſt men, and took great care to preſerve it, by diet and exerciſe, which naturally promiſe a long life: and it was more extraordinary to ſee ſuch a man die before threeſcore, than another in the bloom of youth. Now, if he died a natural death, it is agreed by all, that it muſt have been an apoplexy. This diſeaſe ſeizes all the vital faculties at once; and yet, for the moſt part, does not only give ſome ſhort warnings of its approach, by unuſual affections of the head, but many times is occaſioned by ſome evident preceding cauſe. In king Charles's caſe, there appeared no viſible cauſe, either near or remote, to which, with any certainty of reaſon, his diſeaſe could be aſcribed; and the forerunners of it were rather to be found in his ſtomach and bowels, than in the head. For, after he was a bed, he was overheard to groan moſt of the night: and both then, and next morning, before he fell into the fit, he complained firſt of a heavy oppreſſion in his ſtomach and about his heart, and afterwards of a ſharp pain in thoſe parts; all which ſymptoms had but little relation to an apoplexy. That morning there appeared to every body about him, a ghaſtlineſs and paleneſs in his looks: and when he ſat down to be ſhaved, juſt before the fit took him, he could not ſit ſtraight, as he uſed to do, but continued in a ſtooping poſture, with his hand upon his ſtomach, till the fit came. After he had been brought out of it, by opening a vein, he complained of a racking pain in his ſtomach, and of no indiſpoſition any where elſe: and during the whole time of his ſickneſs, and even when he ſeemed

[h] This year, April 14, ſir Leoline Jenkins reſigned his place of ſecretary of ſtate, wherein he was ſucceeded by Sidney Godolphin, who was created a baron. Kennet, p. 415.

[i] Of this new ſcheme Burnet gives this account. There was at this time a new ſcheme formed, that very probably would have for ever broken the king and the duke.—It was laid at the lady Portſmouth's. Barillon, lord Sunderland, and lord Godolphin, were in it. The duke of Monmouth came over ſecretly. And though he did not ſee the king, yet he went back very well pleaſed with his journey.—The deſign was to begin with the ſending the duke of York to Scotland.—The king ſpoke to the duke concerning his going to Scotland; and he anſwered, there was no occaſion for it. Upon which the king replied, that either the duke muſt go, or that he himſelf would go thither—The king was obſerved to be colder and more reſerved to the duke than ordinary. But what was under all this, was ſtill a deep ſecret. Lord Hallifax was let into no part of it. He complained in council againſt lord Rocheſter, that there were many razures in the books of the treaſury, and moved the king to go to the treaſury chamber. So the king named the next Monday. And Mr. May was ſent for from Windſor, to come to court that day, which it was expected would prove a critical day. And it proved ſo indeed, though in a different way; the king being taken ill in the mean while, p. 604—606.

moſt inſenſible, he was obſerved to lay his hand, for the moſt part, upon his ſtomach, in a moaning poſture, and continued ſo to his death: and ſo violent was the pain, that when all hopes were gone, the phyſicians were deſired to uſe all their art to procure him an eaſy death.

"So much for the diſtemper itſelf. There remain ſome things to be taken notice of, that fell out before and after his death. A few days before he was taken ill, king Charles being in company where the preſent poſture of affairs was diſcourſed of, there eſcaped him ſome warm expreſſions, about the uneaſy circumſtances he was plunged into, and the ill meaſures had been given him: and how, in a certain particular affair, he was pleaſed to mention, He had been abuſed; adding in ſome paſſion, That if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himſelf eaſy for the reſt of his life. This paſſage was whiſpered abroad next day; and the rumour of recalling the duke of Monmouth, and ſending away the duke of York, came to take air about the ſame time. Indeed, all things were making ready, to put the latter in execution; and there is reaſon to believe, the king had intimated as much to the duke himſelf; for ſome of his richeſt furniture was put up, and his chief ſervants ordered to be in a readineſs to attend their maſter upon an hour's warning; and yachts were waiting, to tranſport ſome perſons of quality, without mentioning who it was, or whither bound. The Romiſh party that managed about court, were obſerved to be more than ordinary diligent and buſy up and down Whitehall and St. James's, as if ſome very important affair was in agitation; and a new and unuſual concern was to be ſeen on their countenances. Nor was it any wonder, for in this ſuſpected change they were like to be the only loſers, and all their teeming hopes were in a fair way to be diſappointed. How far the principles of ſome of that party might leave them at liberty to puſh on their revenge for this deſigned affront, as well as to prevent the blow that threatened them, though without the privity, much leſs the conſent of the duke of York, is left to the reader to judge.

"There was a foreign miniſter, that ſome days before the king fell ill, ordered his ſteward to buy a conſiderable parcel of black cloth, which ſerved him and his retinue after for mourning: and the late embaſſador Don Pedro Ronquillo, made it no ſecret, that he had a letter from Flanders the week before king Charles died, that took notice of his death, as the news there. But both theſe might fall out by mere accident.

"There remain two things more that deſerve ſome conſideration in this matter. When his body was opened, there was not ſufficient time given for taking an exact obſervation of his ſtomach and bowels; which one would think, ought chiefly to have been done, conſidering the violent pains he had there: and when a certain phyſician ſeemed to be more inquiſitive than ordinary about the condition of thoſe parts, he was taken aſide, and reproved for his needleſs curioſity. In the next place, his body ſtunk ſo extremely, within a few hours after his death, notwithſtanding the coldneſs of the ſeaſon, that the people about him were extremely offended with the ſmell: which is a thing very extraordinary, in one of his ſtrong and healthful conſtitution; and is not a proper conſequent of a mere apoplectical diſtemper.

"There was ſome weight laid upon an accident that fell out at Windſor ſome years before his death: for the king drinking more liberally than uſual, after the fatigue of riding, he retired to the next room, and wrapping himſelf up in his cloak, fell aſleep upon a couch. He was but a little time come back to the company, when a ſervant belonging to one of them, lay down upon the ſame couch in the king's cloak, and was found ſtabbed dead with a poinard. Nor was it ever known how it happened, but the matter huſhed up, and no enquiry made about it.

"To conclude, Dr. Short, who was a man of great probity and learning, and a Roman catholic, made no ſcruple to declare his opinion to ſome of his intimate friends, that he believed king Charles had foul play done him. And when he came to die himſelf, expreſſed ſome ſuſpicion that he had met with the ſame treatment, for opening his mind too freely in that point.

"So much for the circumſtances of king's Charles's death, that ſeem to have an ill aſpect. There are others, that ſeem to deſtroy all ſuſpicion of treachery in the matter.

"As, firſt, he had lived ſo faſt, as might enervate, in a great meaſure, the natural force of his conſtitution, and exhauſt his animal ſpirits; and therefore he might be more ſubject to apoplexy, which is a diſeaſe that weakens and locks up theſe ſpirits from performing their uſual functions. And though, in his latter years, he had given himſelf up more to the pleaſures of wine, than of women; that might rather be the effect of age than of choice.

"Next, it is known, he had been once or twice attacked before, with fits that much reſembled thoſe of which he afterwards died: and yet, as the manner of them is told, they look rather to have been convulſive motions, than an apoplexy; ſeeing they were attended with violent contorſions of his face, and convulſions of his whole body and limbs. This is the more confirmed, by a paſſage, that happened during the heat of the popiſh plot. King Charles had ſome ſecret matters to manage at that time, by the means of a Romiſh prieſt then beyond ſea, whom he ordered to be privately ſent for: and the gentleman employed betwixt the king and him (from whom I had the ſtory) was directed to bring him in a diſguiſe to Whitehall. The king and the prieſt were a conſiderable time together alone in the cloſet, and the gentleman attended in the next room: at laſt, the prieſt came out, with all the marks of fright and aſtoniſhment in his face; and having recovered himſelf a little, he told the gentleman, that he had run the greateſt riſque ever man did; for while he was with the king, his majeſty was ſuddenly ſurpriſed with a fit, accompanied with violent convulſions of his body and contorſions of his face, which laſted for ſome moments; and when he was going to call out for help, the king held him by force till it was over, and then bid him not be afraid, for he had been troubled with the like before; the prieſt adding, what a condition he ſhould have been in, conſidering his religion, and the preſent juncture of affairs, if the king had died of that fit, and no body in the room with him beſides himſelf.

"But leaving this ſtory to the credit of the prieſt, there might be another natural cauſe aſſigned for king Charles's falling into ſuch a fit as that of which he died, which is this; he had for ſome time an iſſue in his leg, which ran much, and conſequently muſt have made a great revulſion from his head; upon which account, it is probable, it was made. A few weeks before his death, he had let it be dried up, contrary to the advice of his phyſicians, who told him it would prejudice his health. Their prognoſtic was partly true in this, that there came a painful tumour upon the place where the iſſue had been, which proved very obſtinate, and was not thoroughly healed up when he died.

"In fine, it is agreed on all hands, that king Charles expreſſed no ſuſpicion of his being poiſoned, during all the time of his ſickneſs: though it muſt be alſo obſerved, that the fits were ſo violent, that he could not ſpeak while they were upon him, and ſhewed an averſion to ſpeaking during the intervals. And there was not any thing to be ſeen, upon opening his body, that could reaſonably be attributed to the force of poiſon. Yet, to allow theſe conſiderations no more weight than they can well bear, this muſt be acknowledged, that there are poiſons which affect originally the animal ſpirits, and are of ſo ſubtle a nature, that they leave no concluding marks upon the bodies of thoſe they kill."

Let us now ſee what Dr. Burnet ſays upon this ſubject, in his hiſtory of his own times. As this hiſtory is not yet tranſlated, or at leaſt publiſhed in French, I believe it will not be unacceptable to foreigners, to inſert here that famous prelate's account of the death of Charles II.

"All this winter the king looked better than he had done for many years. He had a humour in his leg, which looked like the beginning of the gout: ſo that for ſome weeks he could not walk, as he uſed to do generally, three or four hours a day in the park; which he did commonly ſo faſt that as it was really an exerciſe to himſelf, ſo it was a trouble to all about him to hold up with him. In the ſtate the king was in, he not being able to walk, ſpent much of his time in the laboratory, and was running a proceſs for the fixing of mercury. On the firſt of February, being a Sunday, he eat little all day, and came to lady Portſmouth at night, and called for a porringer of ſpoon meat. It was made too ſtrong for his ſtomach; ſo he eat little of it: and he had an unquiet night. In the morning one Dr. King, a phyſician and a chemiſt, came, as he had been ordered, to wait on him. All the king's diſcourſe to him was ſo broken, that he could not underſtand what he meant. And the doctor concluded, he was under ſome great diſorder, either in his mind, or in his body. The doctor, amazed at this, went out, and meeting with lord Peterborough, he ſaid, the king was in a ſtrange humour, for he did not ſpeak one word of ſenſe. Lord Peterborough deſired he would go in again to the bedchamber, which he did. And he was ſcarce come in, when the king, who ſeemed all the while to be in great confuſion, fell down all of a ſudden in a fit like an apoplexy: he looked black, and his eyes turned in his head. The phyſician, who had been formerly an eminent ſurgeon, ſaid it was impoſſible to ſave the king's life, if one minute was loſt: he would rather venture on the rigour of the law, than leave the king to periſh; and ſo he let him blood.——The king came out of that fit, yet the effects of it hung ſtill upon him, ſo that he was much oppreſſed. And the phyſicians did very much apprehend the return of another fit, and that it would carry him off: ſo they looked on him as a dead man. The biſhop of London ſpoke a little to him, to diſpoſe him to prepare for whatever might be before him; to which the king anſwered not a word. But that was imputed partly to the biſhop's cold way of ſpeaking, and partly to the ill opinion they had of him at court, as too buſy in oppoſition to popery. Sancroft made a very weighty exhortation to him; in which he uſed a good degree of freedom, which he ſaid was neceſſary, ſince he was going to be judged by one who was no reſpecter of perſons. To him the king made no anſwer neither; nor yet to Ken, though the moſt in favour with him of all the biſhops. Some imputed this to an inſenſibility, of which too viſible an inſtance appeared, ſince lady Portſmouth ſat in the bed, taking care of him as a wife of a huſband. Others gueſſed truer; that it would appear he was of another religion. On Thurſday a ſecond fit returned. And then the phyſicians told the duke, that the king was not like to live a day to an end.

"The duke immediately ordered Hudleſton, the prieſt that had a great hand in ſaving the king at Worceſter fight, (for which he was excepted out of all ſevere acts that were made againſt prieſts) to be brought to the lodgings under the bedchamber: and, when he was told what was to be done, he was in great confuſion, for he had no hoſtie about him. But he went to another prieſt that lived in the court, who gave him the pix with an hoſtie in it. But that poor prieſt was ſo frighted, that he ran out of Whitehall in ſuch haſte, that he ſtruck againſt a poſt, and ſeemed to be in a fit of madneſs with fear. As ſoon as Hudleſton had prepared every thing that was neceſſary, the duke whiſpered the king in the ear; upon that the king ordered, that all who were in the bedchamber ſhould withdraw, except the earls of Bath and Feverſham; and the door was double locked. The company was kept out half an hour: only lord Feverſham opened the door once, and called for a glaſs of water. Cardinal Howard told me at Rome, that Hudleſton, according to the relation that he ſent thither, made the king go through ſome acts of contrition, and, after ſuch a confeſſion as he could then make, he gave him abſolution, and the other ſacraments. The hoſtie ſtuck in his throat: and that was the occaſion of calling for a glaſs of water. He alſo gave him extreme unction. All muſt have been performed very ſuperficially, ſince it was ſo ſoon ended. But the king ſeemed to be at great eaſe upon it. It was given out, that the king ſaid to Hudleſton, that he had ſaved him twice, firſt his body and now his ſoul; and that he aſked him, if he would have him declare himſelf to be of their church. But it ſeems, he was prepared for this, and ſo diverted the king from it; and ſaid, he took it upon him to ſatisfy the world in that particular. But though by the principles of all religion whatſoever, he ought to have obliged him to make open profeſſion of his religion; yet, it ſeems, the conſequences of that were apprehended; for, without doubt, that poor prieſt acted by the directions that were given him. The company was ſuffered to come in. And the king went through the agonies of death, with a calm and a conſtancy, that amazed all who were about him, and knew how he had lived. This made ſome conclude, that he had made a will, and that his quiet was the effect of that. Ken applied himſelf much to the awaking the king's conſcience. He ſpoke with great elevation, both of thought and expreſſion, like a man inſpired, as thoſe who were preſent told me. He reſumed the matter often, and pronounced many ſhort ejaculations and prayers, which affected all that were preſent, except him that was the moſt concerned, who ſeemed to take no notice of him, and made no anſwers to him. He preſſed the king ſix or ſeven times to receive the ſacrament; but the king always declined it, ſaying, he was very weak. A table with the elements upon it, ready to be conſecrated, was brought into the room, which occaſioned a report to be then ſpread about, that he had received it. Ken preſſed him to declare, that he deſired it, and that he died in the communion of the church of England. To that he anſwered nothing. Ken aſked him, if he deſired abſolution of his ſins. It ſeems the king, if he then thought any thing at all, thought that would do him no hurt. So Ken pronounced it over him: for which he was blamed, ſince the king expreſſed no ſenſe, or ſorrow for his paſt life, nor any purpoſe of amendment. It was thought to be a proſtitution of the peace of the church, to give it to one, who, after a life led as the king's had been, ſeemed to harden himſelf againſt every thing that could be ſaid to him. Ken was alſo cenſured for another piece of indecency: he preſented the duke of Richmond, lady Portſmouth's ſon, to be bleſſed by the king. Upon this, ſome that were in the room cried out, the king was their common father. And upon that all kneeled down for his bleſſing, which he gave them. The king ſuffered much inwardly, and ſaid, he was burnt up within; of which he complained often, but with great decency. He ſaid once, he hoped he ſhould climb up to heaven's gates, which was the only word ſavouring of religion that he was heard to ſpeak.

"He gathered all his ſtrength to ſpeak his laſt words to the duke, to which every one hearkened with great attention. He expreſſed his kindneſs to him, and that he now delivered all over to him with great joy. He recommended lady Portſmouth over and over again to him. He ſaid, he had always loved her, and he loved her now to the laſt; and beſought the duke, in as melting words as he could fetch out, to be very kind to her and to her ſon. He recommended his other children to him: and concluded, let not poor Nelly ſtarve, that was Mrs. Gwyn. But he ſaid nothing of the queen, nor any one word of his people, or of his ſervants; nor did he ſpeak one word of religion, or concerning the payment of his debts, though he left behind him about ninety thouſand guineas, which he had gathered either out of the privy purſe, or out of the money which was ſent him from France, or by other methods, and which he had kept ſo ſecretly, that no perſon whatſoever knew any thing of it.

"He continued in the agony till Friday at eleven o'clock, being the 6th of February 1684-5; and then died in the fifty fourth year of his age, after he had reigned, if we reckon from his father's death, thirty ſix years and eight days; or if we reckon from his reſtoration, twenty four years, eight months, and nine days. There were many very apparent ſuſpicions of his being poiſoned: for though the firſt acceſs looked like an apoplexy, yet it was plain in the progreſs of it, that it was no apoplexy. When his body was opened, the phyſicians who viewed it, were, as it were, led by thoſe, who might ſuſpect the truth, to look upon the parts that were certainly ſound. But both Lower and Needham, two famous phyſicians, told me, they plainly diſcerned two or three blue ſpots on the outſide of the ſtomach. Needham called twice to have it opened, but the ſurgeons ſeemed not to hear him. And when he moved it the ſecond time, he, as he told me, heard Lower ſay to one that ſtood next him, Needham will undo us, calling thus to have the ſtomach opened; for he may ſee they will not do it: they were diverted to look to ſomewhat elſe: and when they returned to look upon the ſtomach, it was carried away: ſo that it was never viewed. Le Fevre, a French phyſician, told me, he ſaw a blackneſs in his ſhoulder: upon which he made an inciſion, and ſaw it was all mortified. Short, another phyſician, who was a papiſt, but after a form of his own, did very much ſuſpect foul dealing. And he had talked more freely of it, than any of the proteſtants durſt do at that time. But he was not long after taken ſuddenly ill, upon a large draught of wormwood wine, which he had drank in the houſe of a popiſh patient that lived near the tower, who had ſent for him, of which he died; and, as he ſaid to Lower, Millington, and ſome other phyſicians, he believed that he himſelf was poiſoned for his having ſpoken ſo freely of the king's death.

"The king's body was indecently neglected; ſome parts of his inwards, and ſome pieces of the fat, were left in the water in which they were waſhed: all which were ſo careleſsly looked after, that the water being poured out at a ſcullery hole, that went to a drain, in the mouth of which a grate lay, theſe were ſeen lying on the grate many days after. His funeral was very mean. He did not lie in ſtate; no mournings were given: and the expence of it was not equal to what an ordinary nobleman's funeral will riſe to. Many upon this ſaid, that he better deſerved from his brother, than to be thus ungratefully treated in ceremonies that are public, and that make an impreſſion on thoſe who ſee them, and who will make ſevere obſervations and inferences upon ſuch omiſſions.

"But ſince I have mentioned the ſuſpicions of poiſon as the cauſe of his death, I muſt add, that I never heard any lay thoſe ſuſpicions on his brother. But his dying ſo critically, as it were in the minute in which he ſeemed to begin a turn of affairs, made it to be generally the more believed, and that the papiſts had done it, either by the means of ſome of lady Portſmouth's ſervants, or, as ſome fancied, by poiſoned ſnuff: for ſo many of the ſmall veins of the brain were burſt, that the brain was in great diſorder, and no judgment could be made concerning it. To this I ſhall add a very ſurpriſing ſtory, that I had in November 1709, from Mr. Henly of Hampſhire. He told me, that, when the ducheſs of Portſmouth came over to England in 1699, he heard, that ſhe talked as if king Charles had been poiſoned; which he deſiring to have from her own mouth, ſhe gave him this account of it. She was always preſſing the king to make both himſelf and his people eaſy, and to come to a full agreement with his parliament: and he was come to a final reſolution of ſending away his brother, and of calling a parliament; which was to be executed the next day, after he fell into that fit of which he died. She was put upon the ſecret, and ſpoke of it to no perſon alive but to her confeſſor: but the confeſſor, ſhe believed, told it to ſome, who ſeeing what was to follow, took that wicked courſe to prevent it. Having this from ſo worthy a perſon, as I have ſet it down without adding the leaſt circumſtance to it, I thought it too important not to be mentioned in this hiſtory. It diſcovers both the knavery of confeſſors, and the practices of papiſts ſo evidently, that there is no need of making any further reflections on it."

Theſe two relations of the death of king Charles II. agree in the principal circumſtances; particularly in the ſuſpicion of his being poiſoned. Several other accounts have been given of his death, in which are inſerted circumſtances not to be met with here, and others omitted which are here related. It is ſaid, that at the perſuaſion of biſhop Ken, the king at laſt reſolved to diſmiſs the ducheſs of Portſmouth, and ſending for the queen, aſked her pardon for the injury he had done her. It is added, that he had the ſatisfaction of her particular forgiveneſs. This directly contradicts Dr. Burnet's account of the ducheſs of Portſmouth. Some ſay, Hudleſton was not brought to the king till he had loſt all ſenſe, and that he received the ſacrament of extreme unction, without giving the leaſt ſign either of his approbation or refuſal. It is pretended, he adviſed the duke his brother, not to think of introducing popery into England, becauſe it was an impracticable undertaking. Laſtly, ſome ſay only, that the phyſicians and ſurgeons inſpecting the body, diſcovered no mark of poiſon, and entirely omit the circumſtances of the ſtomach, mentioned in the two foregoing relations, though they own the ſuſpicion of the king's being poiſoned, but repreſent this ſuſpicion as coming from the enemies of the duke and of the papiſts.

It is univerſally agreed, that no man had the boldneſs to accuſe the duke of poiſoning his brother. But it is not to be concluded from thence, that no man believed it. Thoſe who might have entertained this ſuſpicion, took care not to expoſe themſelves to a danger ſo great as that of accuſing the ſucceſſor, without being able to prove it. The papiſts in general are accuſed, but this is ſo undeterminate a word, that one knows not to whom to apply it, when they are ſeparated from the duke of York their head. Beſides, the inſpection of the dead body was managed in a proper way to diſpel all ſuſpicions of poiſon; but who directed the phyſicians or ſurgeons is a ſecret, at leaſt the brother of the deceaſed does not appear to have concerned himſelf much in this inſpection, though the ſuſpicions of poiſon were very violent. All this creates ſuch an obſcurity as gives every man room to judge as he pleaſes. Thus much is certain, there is no formal proof that king Charles II. was poiſoned, or if he was, the authors of his death remain hitherto concealed.

It is not very ſtrange that the hiſtorians or others, ſhould diſagree in their character of Charles II. when it is conſidered, that he was the head and protector of one of the two parties, and the perſecutor of the other. This muſt have neceſſarily produced a diverſity of characters, according as they are given by tories or whigs. When we read ſucceſſively the writers of the two parties, who have ſpoken of this prince in general, or given his character, we are almoſt apt to think, they ſpeak of two different kings of the ſame name. The one by ſeveral omiſſions endeavour to cover all his faults, or if they are mentioned, it is very ſlightly, and always with ſome addition or inſinuation tending to juſtify them. The others inſiſt chiefly upon what may blacken his character, and ſhew, that he acted upon very ill motives, and upon principles directly contrary to the good of the kingdom. If they ſpeak of his good qualities, it is only to render him more faulty, and demonſtrate that he tranſgreſſed not through ignorance, but with premeditation. Which ever way I take to draw the character of this prince, I cannot avoid the cenſure of one or the other party, if I ſpeak as from myſelf, and I ſhould not gain much in going upon the teſtimony of either party. However, as the reader, doubtleſs, expects to know ſomething more of the character of this king than could be learnt from the hiſtory of his reign, I chuſe to inſert Dr. Burnet's account in the hiſtory of his own times. I own this, of all the characters of Charles II. ſeems to me, in the whole, to be moſt like, and moſt agreeable to the hiſtory of his life. I could wiſh however, this illuſtrious prelate had omitted, or at leaſt ſoftened ſome ſtrokes, which appear to me a little over-charged, and ſeem to diſcover ſome paſſion in the author. However that be, he concludes the hiſtory of this prince in the following manner:

"Thus lived and died king Charles the ſecond. He was the greateſt inſtance in hiſtory of the various revolutions of which any one man ſeemed capable. He was bred up the firſt twelve years of his life with the ſplendour that became the heir of ſo great a crown. After that he paſſed through eighteen years in great inequalities, unhappy in the war, in the loſs of his father, and of the crown of England. Scotland did not only receive him, though upon terms hard of digeſtion, but made an attempt upon England for him, though a feeble one. He loſt the battle of Worceſter with too much indifference: and then he ſhewed more care of his perſon than became one, who had ſo much at ſtake. He wandered about England for ten weeks after that, hiding from place to place. But under all the apprehenſions he had then upon him, he ſhewed a temper ſo careleſs, and ſo much turned to levity, that he was then diverting himſelf with little houſehold ſports, in as unconcerned a manner as if he had made no loſs, and had been in no danger at all. He got at laſt out of England. But he had been obliged to ſo many, who had been faithful to him and careful of him, that he ſeemed afterwards to reſolve to make an equal return to them all. And finding it not eaſy to reward them all as they deſerved, he forgot them all alike. Moſt princes ſeem to have this pretty deep in them; and to think that they ought never to remember paſt ſervices, but that their acceptance of them is a full reward. He of all in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative in the ampleſt manner: for he never ſeemed to charge his memory, or to trouble his thoughts with the ſenſe of any of the ſervices that had been done him. While he was abroad at Paris, Colen, or Bruſſels, he never ſeemed to lay any thing to heart. He purſued all his diverſions and irregular pleaſures in a free career; and ſeemed to be as ſerene under the loſs of a crown as the greateſt philoſopher could have been. Nor did he willingly hearken to any of thoſe projects, with which he often complained that his chancellor perſecuted him. That in which he ſeemed moſt concerned was, to find money for ſupporting his expence. And it was often ſaid, that if Cromwell would have compounded the matter, and have given him a good round penſion, that he might have been induced to reſign his title to him. During his exile he delivered himſelf ſo entirely up to his pleaſures, that he became incapable of application. He ſpent little of his time in reading, or ſtudy, and yet leſs in thinking. And in the ſtate his affairs were then in, he accuſtomed himſelf to ſay to every perſon, and upon all occaſions, that which he thought would pleaſe moſt: ſo that words or promiſes went very eaſily from him. And he had ſo ill an opinion of mankind, that he thought the great art of living and governing was, to manage all things and all perſons with a depth of craft and diſſimulation. And in that, few men in the world could put on the appearances of ſincerity better than he could: under which ſo much artifice was uſually hid, that in concluſion he could deceive none, for all were become miſtruſtful of him. He had great vices, but ſcarce any virtues to correct them. He had in him ſome vices that were leſs hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones. He was, during the active part of his life, given up to ſloth and lewdneſs to ſuch a degree, that he hated buſineſs, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much trouble, or put him under any conſtraint. And though he deſired to become abſolute, and to overturn both our religion and our laws, yet he would neither run the riſk, nor give himſelf the trouble, which ſo great a deſign required. He had an appearance of gentleneſs in his outward deportment: but he ſeemed to have no bowels, nor tenderneſs in his nature: and in the end of his life he became cruel. He was apt to forgive all crimes even blood itſelf; yet he never forgave any thing that was done againſt himſelf, after his firſt and general act of indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done rather upon maxims of ſtate, than inclinations of mercy. He delivered himſelf up to a moſt enormous courſe of vice, without any ſort of reſtraint, even from the conſiderations of the neareſt relations; the moſt ſtudied

extravagancies that way ſeemed to the very laſt to be much delighted in, and purſued by him. He had the art of making all people grow fond of him at firſt, by a ſoftneſs in his whole way of converſation, as he was certainly the beſt bred man of the age. But when it appeared how little could be built on his promiſe, they were cured of the fondneſs that he was apt to raiſe in them. When he ſaw young men of quality, who had ſomething more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and ſet himſelf to corrupt them both in religion and morality; in which he proved ſo unhappily ſucceſsful, that he left England much changed at his death, from what he had found it at his reſtoration. He loved to talk over all the ſtories of his life to every new man that came about him. His ſtay in Scotland, and the ſhare he had in the war of Paris, in carrying meſſages from the one ſide to the other, were his common topics. He went over theſe in a very graceful manner; but ſo often, and copiouſly, that all thoſe who had been long accuſtomed to them grew weary of them: and when he entered on thoſe ſtories, they uſually withdrew: ſo that he often began them in a full audience, and before he had done, there were not above four or five left about him; which drew a ſevere jeſt from Willmot earl of Rocheſter. He ſaid, He wondered to ſee a man have ſo good a memory, as to repeat the ſame ſtory without loſing the leaſt circumſtance, and yet not remember that he had told it to the ſame perſons the very day before. This made him fond of ſtrangers; for they hearkened to all his often repeated ſtories, and went away as in a rapture, at ſuch an uncommon condeſcenſion in a king.

"His perſon and temper, his vices as well as his fortune reſemble the character that we have given us of Tiberius, ſo much, that it were eaſy to draw a parallel between them. Tiberius's baniſhment, and his coming afterwards to reign, makes the compariſon in that reſpect come pretty near. His hating of buſineſs, and his love of pleaſures, his raiſing of favourites, and truſting them entirely, and his pulling them down, and hating them exceſſively; his art of covering deep deſigns, particularly of revenge, with an appearance of ſoftneſs, brings them ſo near a likeneſs, that I did not wonder much to obſerve the reſemblance of their face and perſon. At Rome I ſaw one of the laſt ſtatues made for Tiberius after he had loſt his teeth. But, bating the alteration which that made, it was ſo like king Charles, that prince Borgheſe and Signior Dominico to whom it belonged, did agree with me in thinking that it looked like a ſtatue made for him.

"Few things ever went near his heart; the duke of Glouceſter's death ſeemed to touch him much. But thoſe who knew him beſt thought it was, becauſe he had loſt him, by whom only he could have balanced the ſurviving brother, whom he hated, and yet embroiled all his affairs to preſerve the ſucceſſion to him.

"His ill conduct in the firſt Dutch war, and thoſe terrible calamities of the plague, and fire of London, with that loſs and reproach which he ſuffered by the inſult at Chatham, made all people conclude, there was a curſe upon his government. His throwing the public hatred at that time upon lord Clarendon, was both unjuſt and ungrateful. And when his people had brought him out of all his difficulties, upon his entering into the triple alliance, his ſelling that to France, and his entering on the ſecond Dutch war with as little colour as he had for the firſt; his beginning it with the attempt on the Dutch Smyrna fleet; the ſhutting up the exchequer; and his declaration for toleration, which was a ſtep for the introduction of popery; make ſuch a chain of black actions flowing from blacker deſigns, that it amazed thoſe who had had known all this, to ſee with what impudent ſtrains of flattery addreſſes were penned during his life, and yet more groſsly after his death. His contributing ſo much to the raiſing the greatneſs of France, chiefly at ſea, was ſuch an error, that it could not flow from want of thought or of true ſenſe. Rouvigny told me, he deſired that all the methods the French took in the increaſe and conduct of their naval force might be ſent him. And, he ſaid, he ſeemed to ſtudy them with concern and zeal. He ſhewed what errors they committed, and how they ought to be corrected, as if he had been a viceroy to France, rather than a king that ought to have watched over, and prevented the progreſs they made, as the greateſt of all the miſchiefs that could happen to him or to his people. They that judged the moſt favourable of this, thought it was done out of revenge to the Dutch, that, with the aſſiſtance of ſo great a fleet as France could join to his own, he might be able to deſtroy them. But others put a worſe conſtruction on it; and thought, that ſeeing he could not quite maſter or deceive his ſubjects by his own ſtrength and management, he was willing to help forward the greatneſs of the French at ſea, that by their aſſiſtance he might more certainly ſubdue his own people; according to what was generally believed to have fallen from lord Clifford, that if the king muſt be in a dependence, it was better to pay it to a great and generous king, than to five hundred of his own inſolent ſubjects. No part of his character looked wickeder as well as meaner, than that he, all the while that he was profeſſing to be of the church of England, expreſſing both zeal and affection to it, was yet ſecretly reconciled to the church of Rome: thus mocking God, and deceiving the world with ſo groſs a prevarication. And his not having the honeſty or courage to own it at the laſt: his not ſhewing any ſign of the leaſt remorſe for his ill led life, or any tenderneſs either for his ſubjects in general, or for the queen and his ſervants: and his recommending only his miſtreſſes and their children to his brother's care, would have been a ſtrange concluſion to any other life, but was well enough ſuited to all the other parts of his.

"The two papers found in his ſtrong box concerning religion, and afterwards publiſhed by his brother, looked like ſtudy and reaſoning. Tenniſon told me, he ſaw the original in Pepy's hand, to whom king James truſted them for ſome time. They were interlined in ſeveral places. And the interlinings ſeemed to be writ in a hand different from that in which the papers were writ. But he was not ſo well acquainted with the king's hand, as to make any judgment in the matter, whether they were writ by him or not. All that knew him when they read them, did, without any ſort of doubting, conclude, that he never compoſed them: for he never read the ſcriptures, nor laid things together, further than to turn them to a jeſt, or for ſome lively expreſſion. Theſe papers were probably writ either by lord Briſtol, or by lord Aubigny, who knew the ſecret of his religion, and gave him thoſe papers, as abſtracts of ſome diſcourſes they had with him on thoſe heads, to keep him fixed to them. And it is very probable, that they apprehending their danger, if any ſuch papers had been found about him writ in their hand, might prevail with him to copy them out himſelf, though his lazineſs that way made it certainly no eaſy thing to bring him to give himſelf ſo much trouble. He had talked over a great part of them to myſelf: ſo that as ſoon as I ſaw them, I remembered his expreſſions, and perceived that he had made himſelf maſter of the argument, as far as thoſe papers could carry him. But the publiſhing them ſhewed a want of judgment, or of regard to his memory in thoſe who did it; for the greateſt kindneſs that could be ſhewn to his memory, would have been, to let both his papers and himſelf be forgotten."

After ſeeing in this character, all that can be ſaid to the diſadvantage of Charles II. the reader doubtleſs will not be diſpleaſed to behold the picture of the ſame prince, drawn a little differently by a very able hand, I mean John Sheffield earl of Mulgrave, who was no enemy to the king, or the royal family. He has laboured this deſcription with all poſſible care. I omit a ſhort introduction concerning the author, to come at once to the character of the king.

"As to the king's religion, it was more deiſm than popery; which he owed more to the livelineſs of his parts, and careleſſneſs of his temper, than either to reading, or much conſideration; for his quickneſs of apprehenſion, at firſt view, could diſcern through the ſeveral cheats of pious pretences; and his natural lazineſs confirmed him in an equal miſtruſt of them all, for fear he ſhould be troubled with examining which religion was beſt. If in his early travels, and late adminiſtration, he ſeemed a little biaſſed to one ſort of religion; the firſt is only to be imputed to a certain eaſineſs of temper, and a complaiſance for that company he then was forced to keep; and the laſt was no more than his being tired, (which he ſoon was in any difficulty) with thoſe bold oppoſitions in parliament, which made him almoſt throw himſelf into the arms of a Roman catholic party, ſo remarkable in England for their loyalty, who embraced him gladly, and lulled him aſleep with thoſe enchanting ſongs of abſolute ſovereignty, which the beſt and wiſeſt of princes are often unable to reſiſt. And though he engaged himſelf on that ſide more fully, at a time when it is in vain, and too late to diſſemble, we ought leſs to wonder at it, than to conſider that our very judgments are apt to grow in time as partial as our affections; and thus, by accident only, he became of their opinion in his weakneſs, who had ſo much endeavoured always to contribute to his power. He loved eaſe and quiet; to which his unneceſſary wars are ſo far from being a contradiction, that they are rather a proof of it, ſince they were made chiefly to comply with thoſe perſons, whoſe diſſatisfaction would have proved more uneaſy

to one of his humour, than all that diſtant noiſe of cannon, which he would often liſten to with a great deal of tranquillity. Beſides, the great and almoſt only pleaſure of mind he appeared addicted to, was ſhipping and ſea affairs: which ſeemed to be ſo much his talent both for knowledge as well as inclination, that a war of that kind was rather an entertainment, than any diſturbance to his thoughts. If he did not go himſelf at the head of ſo magnificent a fleet, it is only to be imputed to that eagerneſs of military glory in his brother: who, under the ſhew of a decent care for preſerving the royal perſon from danger, engroſſed all that ſort of honour to himſelf, with as much jealouſy of any other's interpoſing in it, as a king of another temper would have had of his, though without reaſon.———It is certain, no prince was ever more fitted by nature for his country's intereſt, than he was in all his maritime inclinations; which might have proved of ſufficient advantage to this nation, if he had been as careful in depreſſing all ſuch improvements in France, as of advancing and encouraging our own: but it ſeems he wanted jealouſy in all his inclinations, which leads us to conſider him in his pleaſures: where he was rather abandoned than luxurious; and, like our female libertines, apter to be debauched for the ſatisfaction of others, than to ſeek with choice, where moſt to pleaſe himſelf. I am of opinion alſo, that in his latter time, there was as much of lazineſs as of love, in all thoſe hours he paſſed among his miſtreſſes; who, after all, ſerved only to fill up his ſeraglio, while a bewitching kind of pleaſure, called ſauntering, and talking without any conſtraint, was the true ſultana queen he delighted in.

"He was ſurely inclined to juſtice; for nothing elſe would have retained him ſo faſt to the ſucceſſion of a brother, againſt a ſon he was ſo fond of, and the humour of a party which he ſo much feared. I am willing alſo to impute to his juſtice, whatever ſeems in ſome meaſure to contradict the general opinion of his clemency; as his ſuffering always the rigour of the law to proceed, not only againſt all highwaymen, but alſo ſeveral others, in whoſe caſes the lawyers, (according to their wonted cuſtom) had uſed ſometimes a great deal of hardſhip and ſeverity. His underſtanding was quick and lively in little things, and ſometimes would ſoar high enough in great ones, but unable to keep it up with any long attention or application. Witty in all ſorts of converſation; and telling a ſtory ſo well, that not out of flattery, but for the pleaſure of hearing it, we uſed to ſeem ignorant of what he had repeated to us ten times before, as a good comedy will bear the being ſeen often. Of a wonderful mixture; loſing all his time, and till of late ſetting his whole heart on the fair ſex, yet neither angry with rivals, nor in the leaſt nice as to their being beloved; and while he ſacrificed all things to his miſtreſſes, he would uſe to grudge and be uneaſy at their loſing a little of it again at play, though never ſo neceſſary for their diverſion: nor would he venture five pounds at tennis to thoſe ſervants, who might obtain as many thouſands, either before he came thither, or as ſoon as he left off. Not falſe to his word, but full of diſſimulation, and very adroit at it, yet no man eaſier to be impoſed on; for his great dexterity was in cozening himſelf, by gaining a little one way, while it coſt him ten times as much another; and by careſſing thoſe perſons moſt, who had deluded him the ofteneſt; and yet the quickeſt in the world at ſpying ſuch a ridicule in another. Familiar, eaſy, and good natured; but for great offences ſevere and inflexible: alſo in one week's abſence, quite forgetting thoſe ſervants, to whoſe faces he could hardly deny any thing. In the midſt of all his remiſſneſs, ſo induſtrious and indefatigable on ſome particular occaſions, that no man would either toil longer, or be able to manage it better.

"He was ſo liberal, as to ruin his affairs by it; for want in a king of England, turns things juſt upſide down, and expoſes a prince to his people's mercy. It did yet worſe in him, for it forced him alſo to depend on his great neighbour of France; who played the broker with him ſufficiently in all thoſe times of extremity. Yet this profuſeneſs of his did not ſo much proceed from his overvaluing thoſe he favoured, as from his undervaluing any ſums of money which he did not ſee; though he found his error in this, but I confeſs a little of the lateſt. He had ſo natural an averſion to all formality, that with as much wit as moſt kings ever had, and with as majeſtic a mein, yet he could not on premeditation act the part of a king for a moment, either at parliament, or at council, either in words or geſture; which carried him into the other extreme, more inconvenient of the two, of letting all diſtinction and ceremony fall to the ground, as uſeleſs and foppiſh. His temper, both of body and mind, was admirable, which made him an eaſy generous lover, a civil obliging huſband, a friendly brother, an indulgent father, and a good natured maſter. If he had been as ſollicitous about improving the faculties of his mind, as he was in the management of his bodily health; though, alas! the one proved unable to make his life long, the other had not failed to have made it famous. He was an illuſtrious exception to all the common rules of phyſiognomy: for with a moſt Saturnine harſh ſort of countenance, he was both of a merry and merciful diſpoſition; and in the laſt thirty years of his life, as fortunate, as thoſe of his father had been diſmal and tumultuous.

"If his death has been by ſome ſuſpected of being untimely, it may be partly imputed to his extreme healthy conſtitution, which made the world as much ſurprized at his dying before threeſcore, as if nothing but an ill accident could have killed him. I would not ſay any thing on ſo ſad a ſubject, if I did not think ſilence itſelf would in ſuch a caſe ſignify too much; and therefore, as an impartial writer, I am obliged to obſerve, that the moſt knowing, and moſt diſcerning of his phyſicians [doctor Short] did not only believe him poiſoned, but thought himſelf ſo too not long after, for having declared his opinion a little too boldly. But here I muſt needs take notice of an unuſual piece of juſtice, which yet all the world has almoſt unanimouſly agreed in; I mean, in not ſuſpecting his ſucceſſor of the leaſt connivance in ſo horrid a villany; and perhaps there was never a more remarkable inſtance of the wonderful power of truth and innocence; for it is next to a miracle, that ſo unfortunate a prince, in the midſt of all thoſe diſadvantages he lies under, ſhould be yet cleared of this, even by his greateſt enemies; notwithſtanding all thoſe circumſtances that uſed to give a ſuſpicion, and that extreme malice which has of late attended him in all his other actions[1]."

After giving theſe different characters of king Charles II. drawn by ſuch able hands, I think myſelf obliged to make a ſort of parallel, in order to aſſiſt the reader in the diſcovery of the truth. Dr. Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury was a Scotchman. He had been educated among the epiſcopalians, but however, was always accuſed of preſerving a tincture of preſbyterianiſm, the religion of his country, when free to purſue his inclination. He is likewiſe accuſed of having been entirely in the whig party. In ſhort, he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with either Charles II. or James II. and therefore we muſt read with caution whatever he ſays, not reconcileable with the known actions of Charles II. or expreſsly contradicted by others.

It is not difficult to diſcover, that Burnet's picture of Charles II. is very much charged. The painter has ſtrongly drawn all the lines, which he thought might beget a likeneſs between the picture and the original, without any regard to the reputation of this prince. It is even ſeen, that poſſibly he ſpoke with prejudice, and by this prejudice, was led to credit too lightly what he had received upon hearſay to the king's diſadvantage. For inſtance, what he affirms, that Charles, after the battle of Worceſter, ſhewed a temper ſo careleſs, that he was then diverting himſelf with trifles in as unconcerned a manner, as if he had ſuſtained no loſs, and been in no danger at all, appears to me a little aggravated. It is not even probable, that the biſhop could be informed of the king's actions at that time, by eye-witneſſes. When he ſays, the king had great vices, but ſcarce any virtues to correct them, this plainly appears to be the language of paſſion and prejudice. When he ſays again, the king never forgave any thing that was done againſt himſelf, this muſt be aggravated. For if he was mercileſs to lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and ſome others, it cannot from thence be inferred, that he never forgave. Such expreſſions excepted, which diſcover ſome paſſion in the author, the reſt of Charles II's character is true in general. This I believe, becauſe I find it agreeable to the hiſtory of his reign, and becauſe the earl of Mulgrave has in his picture drawn the ſame lines with Dr. Burnet, to expreſs his likeneſs. All the difference between theſe two authors, is, that in the biſhop's picture, the principal lines are ſtrongly expreſſed, and much ſoftened in the earl's.

The earl of Mulgrave, afterwards marquis of Normandy, and then duke of Buckinghamſhire, was entirely in the tory party, and if common report may be credited, his religion, like that of Charles II. was deiſm. In his deſcription of this prince, he denies not the general ſuſpicion of his being poiſoned. Burnet ſays alſo the ſame thing. The earl inſiſts that the duke of York was not ſuſpected of the leaſt connivance at ſo horrid a villany. The ſame is likewiſe to be found in Burnet. If the laſt ſays, king Charles was a papiſt, this is not denied by the earl. He only imputes it to two cauſes, firſt, to a complaiſance for the company he was forced to keep in his exile; and ſecondly, to the oppoſition he met with in parliaments, which threw him into the arms of the papiſts. If the firſt of theſe cauſes be true, the ſecond cannot be ſo, ſince the king was not twice a papiſt. Beſides the oppoſitions in parliament were partly owing to a belief, that he deſigned to introduce popery.

[1] R. Coke ſays, that king Charles left the nation more vitiated and debauched in their manners, than ever it was by any other king; having not only ſquandered away the ancient revenues of the crown, which were eſteemed ſacred, and which ſhould have ſupported it againſt foreign force and inteſtine diſcord, but left ſuch a debt upon it as never before was heard of, nor contracted by ſuch means, tom. II. p. 320.

Burnet ſays, Charles was incapable of any application. The earl ſays the ſame. The biſhop ſays, the king was for rendering himſelf abſolute. If the earl ſays it not in expreſs terms, he ſufficiently intimates it, by ſaying, "That the Roman catholic party lulled him aſleep with the enchanting ſongs of ſovereignty and prerogative. Burnet ſays, the king was apt to forgive all crimes, but never forgave any thing that was done againſt himſelf. The earl praiſes his clemency, and ſays, "he was eaſy and good-natured in trifles, but in great affairs ſevere and inflexible." This may be the biſhop's meaning expreſſed in other words.

The ſtories which the king loved to talk over, are in both characters. The only difference is, that Burnet ſays, the company grew weary of them, and the earl ſays, the hearers were pleaſed with the repetition. But the raillery of the earl of Rocheſter turns the balance for the biſhop.

Burnet ſays, Charles engaged in two wars againſt Holland, without any colour, and the earl calls theſe wars unneceſſary.

Burnet ſays, he contributed to the raiſing of the greatneſs of France at ſea, and the earl ſays, he was not ſufficiently careful to depreſs the maritime improvements of France, and that here he wanted jealouſy. Is not this much the ſame thing?

In ſhort, let theſe two pictures be compared with all poſſible exactneſs, and they will both be found very like; but that the two painters had different views, and purſued different methods. The one propoſed to expreſs ſtrongly the lines which might moſt contribute to a reſemblance with the original, without regarding the beauty of the picture in itſelf. The other, without omitting the ſame lines, which could not be done and the likeneſs preſerved, has taken all poſſible care to ſoften them, in order to hide, as much as lay in his power, the deformities of the original. In a word, the one has given us an ugly, and the other a beautiful likeneſs. This doubtleſs, induced the earl to ſuppreſs ſeveral ſtrokes of his pencil, which might have improved the reſemblance, but would have been prejudicial to the end he propoſed in his work [m].

[m] I. King Charles II. left no iſſue by his queen, Donna Catherina, daughter of John IV. king of Portugal. But by his ſeveral miſtreſſes, he had the following children.

1. By Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, Eſq. James duke of Monmouth, born at Rotterdam, April 9, 1649. beheaded on Tower-hill, July 15, 1685. He married in 1665, Anne Scot, daughter of Francis earl of Buckleugh in Scotland.

2. By Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, viſcounteſs Shannon, daughter of ſir William Killigrew, Charlot-Jeremia-Henrietta-Maria-Fitz-roy, who died in 1684. Her huſbands were, James Howard, and ſir William Paſton earl of Yarmouth.

3. By Mrs. Catharine Peg, daughter of Thomas Peg, Eſq. Charles Fitz-Charles earl of Plymouth, commonly called Don Carlos, born 1658, killed October 17, 1680, at Tangier. He married Bridget daughter of ſir Thomas Oſborne duke of Leeds, who married afterwards Dr. Biſs the late biſhop of Hereford.

4. By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, heireſs of William viſcount Grandiſon in Ireland, and wife of Roger Palmer earl of Caſtlemain, created lady Nonſuch, counteſs of Southampton, and ducheſs of Cleveland, who died in 1709, he had three ſons, and three daughters. 1. Charles Fitz-roy, born 1662, created 1675, duke of Southampton, and after his mother's death duke of Cleveland. His wives were Mary daughter of ſir Henry Wood, and Alice daughter of ſir William Poultney. 2. Henry Fitz-roy duke of Grafton, born September 20. 1663, and killed October 9, 1690, at the ſiege of Cork in Ireland. His wife was Iſabella daughter of Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington, married after his death to ſir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. 3. George Fitz-roy duke of Northumberland, born December 28, 1665, who died July 8, 1716, without children. 4. Anne Fitz-roy born Feb. 29, 1661, married in 1674, to Thomas Lennard earl of Suſſex. 5. Charlotte Fitz-roy, born September 5, 1664, married Feb. 20, 1676-7, to ſir Edward Henry Lee earl of Litchfield. 6. Barbara born July 16, 1672, who became a nun at Pontoiſe in France.

5. By Mrs. Eleanor Gwin, 1. Charles Beauclerk duke of St. Albans, born May 8, 1670, who married Diana Vere, eldeſt daughter and coheireſs of Aubrey de Vere, the 20th and laſt earl of Oxford. 2. James Beauclerk born December 25, 1671. He died in 1680 in France.

6. By Louiſe de Querouaille ducheſs of Portſmouth, Charles Lenox duke of Richmond and Lenox, born July 29, 1672, who died May 27, 1723. His wife was Anne, eldeſt daughter of Francis lord Brudenel.

7. By Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tuder, born October 16, 1673, married in Auguſt 1687, to Francis lord Ratcliff earl of Derwentwater. See Sandford, p. 639, &c.

II. In this reign the city of London put on a new face, by being rebuilt, after the great fire, in ſo handſome and well contrived a manner, as hath greatly contributed to the beauty, healthfulneſs, and conveniency of that great and noble city.——In this reign likewiſe it was, that the royal Hoſpital at Chelſea, was founded.

III. By an indenture in the 12th of Charles II. gold and ſilver monies were coined in the ſame pieces, and at the ſame rates, as in the 2d of Charles I. See above p. 801. note—By another indenture in the 22d of king Charles II. Crown gold, twenty-two carats fine, and two carats allay, was coined into 44l. 10s. by tale; namely, into pieces to go for ten ſhillings, twenty ſhillings, forty ſhillings, or five pounds a piece; and a pound of ſilver of the old ſtandard into three pounds two ſhillings by tale; namely into crowns, half crowns, ſhillings, half ſhillings, groats, half ſixpences, half groats, and pence.

The money of king Charles II. was of three ſorts: the hammered, which was the only current coin, till 1663; the milled upon the ſide: and that with the graining or letters upon the the edge—The firſt money that bore the name of this king, was coined at Pontfract Caſtle; round which is inſcribed CAROLVS SECVNDVS, 1648. on each ſide of the middle tower is PC. Reverſe, a crown, with CR. DUM SPIRO, SPERO. A crown hath CAROLVS II. D. G. MAG. B. F. ET. H. REX. In the field, HANC. DEUS. DEDIT. 1648. Reverſe PC. Above the caſtle, POST. MORTEM. PATRIS. PRO. FILIO. Upon the hammered money in general, he is repreſented with the half face, crown and band, &c. CAROLUS II. D. G. MAG. BRIT. FR. ET. HIB. REX. Reverſe, the arms in one ſhield, not crown'd, with his father's motto, CHRISTO AUSPICE REGNO.——The gold coins have, on one ſide, the king's head laureat, with a youthful countenance. Reverſe, the arms in a ſingle ſhield, crown'd between C. R. FLORENT CONCORDIA REGNA. Another has XX behind the head. On the money called cutters, the legend goes quite round the head; which, it does not in a very neat cutter, called by ſome the unmilled guinea, the king's head extending to the rim, without the initial figures behind the head, and the titles abbreviated to CAR. D. G. M. BR. FR. ET. HIB. REX. Reverſe as the former 1662. The five pounds, three pounds, and forty ſhilling pieces, have the king's head laureat, CAROLUS II. DEI GRATIA. Reverſe, the arms of the four kingdoms, ſingle in four ſeparate ſhields crowned, a ſceptre in each of the vacancies, with a roſe, flower-de-lis, thiſtle, and harp at the points, and the c's interlink'd in the center. MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. 1673. Upon the rim, DECUS, ET TVTAMEN. ANNO REGNI VICESIMO QUINTO. This king was the firſt that coined GUINEAS and half guineas, which he did in his 22d year. The guineas were ordered to go at twenty ſhillings, the half guineas at ten ſhillings. As they are in every body's hands, there is no need of giving a further deſcription of them. Of the hammer'd ſilver money, the ſhilling is very fair, and has a crown for the mint mark. Of theſe there are two ſorts, one with XII. behind the head, which the other wants; as alſo the inner circle. (fig. 1.) The ſixpences are like the ſhillings, but have VI. inſtead of XII. The leſſer pieces, from the groat to the penny, are marked with the initial figures, IIII. III. II. I. behind the head; except upon ſome of the two-pences, which want the figures. This hammer'd money continued current till 1663, when the milled money came to be in uſe. Of this there is a very fair crown, having a roſe under the king's head laureat, from thence called the roſe crown, CAROLVS II. DEI GRA. Reverſe, MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. 1662. The Arms of the four kingdoms in four Shields, France and England quartered together in the firſt and fourth: each ſhield is crowned; between them are c's interlinked, and St. George's croſs radiant in the center; upon the rim, DECVS, ET TUTAMEN. (fig. 2.) The half-crowns are like the crowns; only one has the year in figures upon the rim, ANNO REGNI. XVIII. The milled ſhillings are neatly ſtruck, having the c's between the four ſhields crown'd, with the arms ſingle, and inſcribed as the crown. Upon ſome is an elephant; upon others the prince's feathers; and a third has the ſcepters. The ſixpence is like the ſhilling. The groat has four c's interlinked, with a roſe, thiſtle, fleur-de-lis, and harp in the vacancies. The threepence, two-pence and penny, have as many c's thereon crown'd.——In 1672. the king coined copper half-pence and farthings. They have, on one ſide, the king's head laureat, CAROLVS. A. CAROLO. Reverſe, Britannia, and round her BRITANNIA. with the year in the exergue. There was another farthing coined of rare copper, having on the reverſe, QVATVOR MARIA VINDICO. exergue, BRITANNIA. But theſe were called in, to pleaſe the French king.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XXIV.

The Reign of King JAMES II. from his Acceſſion to the Throne, to the Eſtabliſhment of King WILLIAM and Queen MARY: containing the Space of Four Years and Seven Days.

27. JAMES II.

[1684-5] WITHIN a few hours after Charles had reſigned his laſt breath, his brother, the duke of York, was proclaimed King in London, by the name of JAMES II. Having ſeen how the government was ſettled for ſome years paſt, we muſt not think it ſtrange, there was no endeavours, either in London or any other part of the kingdom, to oppoſe the new king. Of the two parties in England, that againſt the bill of excluſion was triumphant, and the other entirely broken and oppreſſed. The acceſſion of James II. to the crown, was a freſh occaſion of triumph to the former, and notwithſtanding the fears expreſſed by the other party, about a Catholic ſucceſſor, they who had ſupported his intereſt, endeavoured to repreſent the late change, as the greateſt of bleſſings to the Engliſh nation. The king, on his part, omitted nothing that lay in his power to confirm the good opinion his friends had of his virtue and ſincerity. As ſoon as the lords were returned to Whitehall from proclaiming the king, he aſſembled the privy-council, and made the following ſpeech:

"My Lords,

"Before I enter upon any other buſineſs, I think fit to ſay ſomething to you. Since it hath pleaſed Almighty God to place me in this ſtation, and I am now to ſucceed ſo good and gracious a king, as well as ſo very kind a brother, I think fit to declare to you, that I will endeavour to follow his example, and moſt eſpecially in that of his great clemency and tenderneſs to his people. I have been reported to be a man for arbitrary power; but that is not the only ſtory has been made of me; and I ſhall make it my endeavour to preſerve this government both in church and ſtate, as it is now by law eſtabliſhed. I know the principles of the church of England are for monarchy, and the members of it have ſhewed themſelves good and loyal ſubjects, therefore I ſhall always take care to defend and ſupport it. I know too, that the laws of England are ſufficient to make the king as great a monarch as I can wiſh; and as I ſhall never depart from the juſt rights and prerogative of the crown, ſo I ſhall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defence of this nation, and I ſhall ſtill go as far as any man in preſerving it in all its juſt rights and liberties."

This ſpeech being addreſſed to a council wholly compoſed of perſons devoted to the king, was received with great applauſe. His majeſty was deſired that it might be printed, and diſperſed among the people, which was immediately done. Moreover, great care was taken to extol the king's extreme affection for his ſubjects; and, above all, his ſtrict obſervance of his word and faith was ſo induſtriouſly propagated, that ſome counting it impoſſible for the king to promiſe what he did not intend to perform, began to give him the name of JAMES THE JUST, as if to ſay and to do, were in him one and the ſame thing.

The next day, the king publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that all perſons who at the late king's deceaſe were poſſeſſed of any office ſhould be continued in the ſame, till the king's pleaſure was further known. He declared, moreover, that all orders and directions given by the late king's privy-council, ſhould be obeyed and performed, as if he were ſtill alive. This is a clear evidence of the great influence that the king, when duke of York, had in the counſels of the king his brother. Upon his coming to the crown, he made no changes, either in the council, or in the chief places of truſt, a plain ſign that he looked upon the poſſeſſors as his creatures. And indeed, ſince his return from Scotland, he had properly governed the kingdom in his brother's name. This being known to all, might have ſhewn with what intention he promiſed to preſerve the Proteſtant religion, and the rights of the ſubject, ſince no man could be ignorant, that he was the principal author of the plots in the late reign, againſt religion, and the liberties of the nation. But the tories, who were then highly exalted, were willing to ſhut their eyes, and not ſee the danger the proteſtant religion was in, under a king who was ſo zealous a papiſt. The king's bare word was ſufficient to calm all their uneaſineſs on that account. As for arbitrary power, which began to be introduced in the late reign, far from being frighted at it, they rather conſidered it as an effectual means to keep their adverſaries, the whigs, in ſubjection. Had they known or foreſeen to what height James was reſolved to carry his power, they would, doubtleſs, have had other thoughts. But they imagined, things would always remain as they were, that is, in a ſituation to them very advantageous.

Moſt of the hiſtorians repreſent as ſurpriſing, the king's going publicly to maſs two days after his acceſſion to the crown. But I cannot ſee any reaſon for this ſurpriſe. Since the year 1670, no man had been ignorant that the duke of York was a catholic. On this account he had reſigned the office of lord high-admiral, and in the following years, the bill of excluſion, which cauſed three parliaments to be diſſolved, had ſufficiently taught the Engliſh this truth. Where then could the wonder be, to ſee him go to maſs, being king, ſince for the laſt fourteen years he had not concealed his religion, though he had run the riſk of forfeiting his right to the crown?

But what gave more juſt cauſe of ſurpriſe, was, his requiring by proclamation the ſame week, that the cuſtoms, and other duties which had been granted to the king his brother, only for life, ſhould be continued to be collected [a]. This was a manifeſt invaſion of the nation's rights and liberties [b]. He could not be ignorant, that an encroachment of the ſame nature had occaſioned a great conteſt between the king his father and the parliament, and that this conteſt produced the petition of right. And yet, he not only undertook the ſame thing, but uſed alſo the ſame reaſons with Charles I. which were ſo little ſatisfactory to the parliament. His proceedings were the more ſurpriſing, as he affected to take by authority, what he knew would not be refuſed by the parliament, conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of the kingdom. Though his friends endeavoured to excuſe this conduct, it made impreſſion upon many of both parties, who had no

[a] Another proclamation was put out for levying the additional exciſe, which had been given to the late king only for life. There was a clauſe in this act, that empowered the treaſury to make a farm of it for three years, without adding a limiting clauſe, in caſe it ſhould be ſo long due. And it was thought a great ſtretch of the clauſe, to make a fraudulent farm, by which it ſhould continue to be levied three years after it was determined, according to the letter and intent of the act. A farm was now brought out, as made during the king's life, though it was well known, that no ſuch farm had been made, for it was made after his death, but a falſe date put to it. Burnet, p. 622.

[b] It was an open violation of our fundamental conſtitution, by which no money can be levied on the ſubject, but by their conſent in parliament, as Dr. Welwood rightly obſerves, p. 138.

The

good opinion of a reign which began in this manner. This gave occaſion to fear, that the new king's promiſes were not ſo firmly to be relied on, as was pretended.

Another ſtep the king made at the ſame time, and, as it ſeems, without any neceſſity, was to cauſe it to be publiſhed, and atteſted by father Huddleſton a prieſt, that Charles II. died a catholic, and that the ſame prieſt gave him the euchariſt and extreme unction. Huddleſton publiſhed withal a little treatiſe, called, "A ſhort and plain way to the faith and church;" which treatiſe, the author affirms, made great impreſſions upon the mind of king Charles, in the year 1651, immediately after the battle of Worceſter, ſo that he declared, "he had not ſeen any thing more plain and clear upon the ſubject; and the arguments drawn from ſucceſſion were ſo concluſive, he did not conceive how they could be denied." Moreover, at the ſame time, James ordered two papers to be publiſhed, found in the king his brother's ſtrong box, written with his own hand, both tending to prove the neceſſity of a viſible church and guide in matters of faith [c]. To confirm that Charles II. was really a catholic, Mr. William Chaffinch, keeper of the king's cloſet, made no ſcruple to ſhew a little chapel annexed to the cloſet, where the king went ſecretly to maſs. It is hard to conceive, what great advantage it could be to James to divulge ſuch a ſecret, conſidering the injury he did the late king's reputation, who had ſo frequently and ſolemnly affirmed in full parliament, that he was a good proteſtant, and had poſitively promiſed to maintain the proteſtant religion to the utmoſt of his power. As James thereby manifeſtly ſhewed the inſincerity of his brother, he ſhould, it ſeems, have feared, it would be inferred, there was no more reaſon to confide in his own promiſes.

The funeral of Charles II. was ſolemnized on the 14th of February at night. It may eaſily be judged, it was not very expenſive, ſince eight days were ſufficient for the preparations. It is obſervable, that Charles II. had neglected, after his reſtoration, to ſolemnize his father's funeral, on pretence, that his body could not be found in Windſor chapel, the place where it was interred, as the lord Clarendon ſays in his hiſtory. But as it would have been eaſy to ſearch the whole chapel, it is more likely, the reaſon of that neglect was the charges of a funeral, tho' Charles II. had received for that purpoſe from the parliament the ſum of ſeventy thouſand pounds. For the ſame reaſon, probably, James cauſed his brother to be buried with little pomp, though Charles left him ninety thouſand guineas in a box.

Two days after, the king ordered the privy-councillors and great officers of the crown and houſhold to be ſworn, and at the ſame time filled the vacant places. The office of lord-treaſurer, vacant ſince the year 1679, by the reſignation of the earl of Danby, was conferred on Lawrence Hyde, earl of Rocheſter, the king's brother-in-law; Henry earl of Clarendon, elder brother to the earl of Rocheſter, was made lord privy-ſeal; and George Savil, marquis of Hallifax, preſident of the council [d].

In the mean time, the counties, cities, boroughs, and univerſities, were employed in preparing congratulatory addreſſes to the king, upon his acceſſion to the crown. Theſe addreſſes, for the moſt part, took notice of the king's poſitive declaration to the privy-council, to maintain the church of England and the liberties of the nation. But there were two amongſt others very remarkable. The firſt from the barriſters and ſtudents of the Middle-Temple, wherein "with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude they acknowledged his majeſty's great goodneſs in extending his royal care of the government to the preſervation of the cuſtoms, which had been continually received by his royal predeceſſors for ſome hundreds of years, and never queſtioned by any parliament, unleſs in that wherein were ſown the ſeeds of rebellion againſt the king his father [e]." They concluded with ſaying, "May there never want millions as loyal as we are, to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of your ſacred perſon, and prerogative in its full extent:" and promiſed that they would endeavour the choice of ſuch repreſentatives for the enſuing parliament, as would not only concur in ſettling a revenue to ſupport the government as formerly, but alſo ſhew an entire confidence in his majeſty. The addreſs from the county of Suffolk had theſe words: "We are every day making ſteps towards your majeſty's grandeur, by our care for ſending fit repreſentatives to a parliament, that we hope will no more endure excluders than a late one did abhorrers." The Quakers alſo preſented an addreſs to the king, wherein they ſaid: "Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God (by whom kings reign) to take hence the late king Charles the ſecond, and to preſerve thee peaceably to ſucceed; we thy ſubjects heartily deſire, that the giver of all good and perfect gifts, may pleaſe to endue thee with wiſdom and mercy in the uſe of thy great power, to his glory, the king's honour, and the kingdom's good. And it being our ſincere reſolution, according to our peaceable principles and converſation (by the aſſiſtance of Almighty God) to live peaceably and honeſtly, as becomes true and faithful ſubjects, under the king's government, and a conſcientious people that truly fear and ſerve God: we do humbly hope, that the king's tenderneſs will appear and extend with his power to expreſs the ſame [f]."——

[1685] The king's and queen's coronation was celebrated the 23d of April, St. George's-day, patron of the order of the Garter. Though ſuch a ceremony cannot be ſolemnized without pomp, it was obſerved, the king retrenched ſeveral things which cauſed a needleſs expence, as for inſtance, the cavalcade from the Tower to Weſtminſter, which was wont to be performed the day before the coronation, ſaving thereby a charge of ſixty thouſand pounds. But if ſome authors are to be credited, the moſt conſiderable retrenching was in the words of the coronation oath, out of which, they pretend, ſeveral material things were ſtruck, without ſpecifying the particulars. Others maintain, it is an aſperſion on archbiſhop Sancroft, who is ſuppoſed, without foundation, to have conſented to the abridging of the oath. As I have ſeen no proof on either ſide, I forbear to decide. Thus much is certain, the crown not being fit for the king's head, was often in a tottering condition, and like to fall off. Mr. Henry Sidney ſupporting it once with his hand, pleaſantly told the king, "This is not the firſt time our family hath ſupported the crown [g]." The people reckoned this an ill omen to the king, as well as another thing which happened the ſame day. In one of the churches in London, the king's arms, painted in a glaſs window, ſuddenly fell down and broke in pieces, while the reſt of the window was ſtanding, without a poſſibility of diſcovering why that part ſhould fall ſooner than the reſt [h].

The ſame day that the king was crowned at London, the parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh, William Douglaſs, duke of Queenſbury, being lord high-commiſſioner. This lord was entirely in the king's party, but not in ſuch a manner as to pretend to ſacrifice to him the proteſtant religion and his country's liberties. Before he left London in order for Scotland, he told the king plainly, he could not engage to ſerve him in any thing but what ſhould be agreeable to the laws: whereupon the king proteſted to him, he had no intention to make any breach either in the eſtabliſhed religion or the laws.

The king's letter to the Scotch parliament ran, "That the many experiences he had of the loyalty and exemplary forwardneſs of that ancient kingdom, by their repreſentatives aſſembled in parliament in the reign of his brother, made him deſirous to call them together in the beginning of his

[c] The duke of Ormond, beſides the king's atteſtation, declared the papers to be king Charles's own hand.

[d] The duke of Beaufort was made lord preſident of Wales; the lord Arlington lord high chamberlain; the duke of Ormond lord ſteward of the houſhold; the lord Godolphin lord chamberlain to the queen; the lord viſcount Newport treaſurer of the houſhold; the lord Maynard comptroller; Henry Savil vice-chamberlain; Henry Bulkley maſter of the houſhold; ſir Stephen Fox, ſir William Boreman, ſir Winſton Churchill, and ſir Richard Maſon, clerks and comptrollers of the green-cloth. Kennet, p. 421.

[e] The reaſon of thanking the king for ſeizing the cuſtoms, alledged by thoſe gentlemen, was, "That thouſands would be ruined that had paid cuſtom in the late king's time, if the cuſtoms were not levied, and by an exceſſive exportation and importation cuſtom-free, that branch of the revenue would be rendered unprofitable for ſome years to come." Not conſidering that entries might be made, and bonds taken, to be ſued when the act for granting them ſhould paſs.

[f] This is the true addreſs from Sewell's hiſtory of the quakers, Rapin has wrongly followed Echard, and given it as follows, "We are come to teſtify our ſorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for thy being made our governor. We are told thou art not of the perſuaſion of the church of England no more than we; therefore we hope thou wilt grant us the ſame liberty which thou alloweſt thyſelf."

[g] Mr. Sidney, who was afterwards earl of Rumney in king William's reign, was one of the principal inſtruments in the downfall of king James, and one of the firſt that went and joined the prince of Orange. Rapin.

[h] The crown was not well fitted to the king's head: it came down too far, and covered the upper part of his face. The canopy carried over him did alſo break. But to take ſuch things for omens is ridiculous. Turner preached the coronation ſermon, in which he ſet forth that part of Constantius Chlorus's hiſtory, wherein he tried who would be the trueſt to their religion, and reckoned that thoſe would be faithfulleſt to himſelf who were trueſt to their God. The king and queen reſolved to have all done in the proteſtant form, and to aſſiſt in all the prayers: only the king would not receive the ſacrament. In this certainly his prieſts diſpenſed with him, and he had ſuch ſenſes given him of the oath, that he either took it as a ſin with a reſolution not to keep it, or he had a reſerved meaning in his own mind. Burnet, p. 628.

The

reign, to give them an opportunity not only of ſhewing their duty, but alſo to be exemplary to others in their demonſtrations of their affection to his perſon, and compliance with his deſires. That which he had to propoſe to them at this time, was what was as neceſſary for their ſafety as his ſervice, and had a greater tendency to ſecure their own privileges and properties, than the aggrandizing his power, which, however, he was reſolved to maintain in its greateſt luſtre, that he might be the more enabled to defend and protect their religion as eſtabliſhed by law, and their rights and properties, againſt phanatical[i] contrivances, murderers, aſſaſſins[k], which had brought them into ſuch difficulties, as only the ſteady reſolutions of his brother and thoſe employed by him, could have ſaved them from the moſt horrid confuſions and inevitable ruin. That nothing had been left unattempted by thoſe inhuman traitors, to overturn their peace; and therefore he hoped they would be wanting in nothing to ſecure themſelves and him."—

The high commiſſioner ſeconded the king's letter with a ſpeech, wherein he gave them aſſurance of his majeſty's reſolution to protect and maintain the religion and government of their church as by law eſtabliſhed[l]; and alſo the ſubjects rights and properties, in ſuch manner, that no perſon ſhould be injured by any arbitrary oppreſſions of ſoldiers or others; and he would condeſcend as much in the buſineſs of the exciſe and militia as could be juſtly expected. And, on the other ſide, his majeſty expected from them, to aſſert the rights and prerogatives of the crown, and to eſtabliſh the revenue as amply upon him and his ſucceſſors, as it was enjoyed by the king his brother. In the laſt place, the lord-commiſſioner deſired in very pathetic terms, that effectual means might be found to deſtroy the phanatical party, who were wretches of ſuch monſtrous principles and practices, as paſt ages never heard, nor thoſe to come will hardly believe.

Theſe phanatical murderers and aſſaſſins could be no other than the preſbyterians of Scotland, who were properly the body of the nation, to whom was imputed the murder of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, as if it had been committed by the determination of the whole preſbyterian party.

James Drummond, earl of Perth, lord chancellor, made a ſpeech likewiſe, in which he enlarged on the king's great virtues. I do not know whether he was yet a papiſt, but at leaſt, preſently after, he embraced the catholic religion, and by that infallible means ſupplanted the duke of Queenſbury.

The parliament returned a very humble and ſubmiſſive anſwer to the king, promiſing to do whatever he deſired. To perform which promiſe they forthwith paſſed the three following acts.

By the firſt act were ratified all ſtatutes paſſed in the late reign for the ſecurity of religion as at preſent profeſſed within the kingdom.

By the ſecond, they annexed the exciſe of foreign and inland commodities to the crown of Scotland for ever.

By the third, they ordained, that all ſuch perſons, as being cited in caſe of high-treaſon, field or houſe conventicles, or church irregularities, ſhould refuſe to give teſtimony, ſhould be liable to be puniſhed as guilty of thoſe crimes reſpectively, in which they refuſed to be witneſſes.

Before the meeting of the parliament of England, which was called the 19th of May, three perſons, odious to the king, the papiſts, and the prevailing party, were brought to their trials. The firſt was the famous Titus Oates, diſcoverer of the popiſh plot, and one of the witneſſes againſt the condemned jeſuits. He was accuſed of perjury on two points of his evidence, namely, for affirming upon oath, that he was preſent at the grand conſult held at London the 24th of April 1678, where, as he pretended, the reſolution of killing the king was taken. Secondly, for ſaying, that father Ireland, an executed jeſuit, was at London ſuch a day. To convict him of theſe two real or pretended crimes, he was brought before chief-juſtice Jefferies at the King's-bench bar, the 8th and 9th of May 1685. As I have amply ſpoken of this matter in the reign of Charles II. I ſhall not repeat here what has been already ſaid, but confine myſelf to ſhew the partiality wherewith Oates was tried and condemned.

In the firſt place, immediately after the indictment was read, and before any witneſs was heard, the attorney-general, ſir Robert Sawyer, made a ſpeech, declaring, "Oates was one of the greateſt impoſtors that ever did appear upon the ſtage, either in this kingdom or any other nation." It muſt be obſerved, this attorney-general had been one of the counſel for the king in 1678, to ſupport and improve Oates's evidence.

2. Twenty witneſſes from St. Omer's were produced, who ſwore, that Oates was at that place the 24th of April 1678, at the very time that he ſaid he was preſent at the grand conſult. It is obſervable, that theſe very witneſſes had depoſed the ſame thing 1678, and that the jury had not regarded their evidence. But in 1685 there was not the leaſt reaſon to reject their depoſitions.

3. Oates deſired it might be obſerved, that the king's counſel who were now againſt him, had been for him in the trials of the five jeſuits, and particularly the attorney and ſollicitor-general: that lord chief-juſtice Jefferies, before whom his cauſe was pleading, was among the king's counſel in 1678, and did then expreſsly declare, "That the verdict againſt the five jeſuits was a juſt verdict." As he laid great ſtreſs upon the verdicts given upon his depoſitions, he was told, that theſe verdicts had been diſbelieved ſeveral times, as well as believed. Moreover, the records of the trials of ſir George Wakeman and the earl of Caſtlemain were produced, who being accuſed of the pretended plot, had been acquitted, and depoſed upon oath, that Oates had not ſaid one word of truth.

4. Oates demanded, "Whether a papiſt in caſe of religion might be believed?" It was replied, "He might." And as if the queſtion had been impertinent and foreign to the purpoſe, juſtice Withens aſked him, "Whether he was come there to preach?"

5. Oates urged the lord Coke's practice, who would not allow of a popiſh recuſant for a witneſs, even between party and party. To which it was anſwered in general, that this practice was contrary to law.

6. He ſaid, that the witneſſes againſt him were brought up in a ſeminary, againſt law. Jefferies replied, ſo was a diſſenter.

7. He inſiſted upon the ſtatute of the 27th year of Elizabeth againſt ſeminary prieſts and jeſuits. Whereupon Jefferies aſked him, whether the witneſſes owned themſelves to be prieſts and jeſuits?

8. He pleaded the ſtatute of the third of Charles I. to which Jefferies anſwered, It was nothing to the purpoſe.

9. Laſtly, he repreſented, that the lord Shaftſbury, upon his trial, moving that he might have liberty to bring an indictment of perjury againſt the witneſſes that accuſed him, the court over-ruled the motion, and would not ſuffer the king's evidence to be indicted of perjury, nor the popiſh plot called in queſtion. He inferred from thence, that having been himſelf evidence for the king. he could not for that reaſon be indicted of perjury. Jefferies told him all this was nothing to the purpoſe. Then ſumming up the evidence, he concluded with theſe words: "There does not remain the leaſt doubt, but that Oates is the blackeſt and moſt perjured villain that ever appeared upon the face of the earth."

The jury withdrawing about a quarter of an hour brought him in guilty of the perjury he was accuſed of.

The next day he was tried upon the ſecond indictment of perjury, concerning father Ireland. Above forty witneſſes were produced againſt him, nine of whom were proteſtants, who ſwore, that Ireland was in Staffordſhire when Oates ſaid he was in London[m], and he was alſo found guilty of this indictment. What is moſt ſtrange, ſome pretend, there is not the leaſt appearance of injuſtice or partiality in the verdict againſt Oates, but on the contrary, the partiality is evident in the verdict againſt the five jeſuits. I leave it to the unbiaſſed reader to compare them and judge. But at leaſt it cannot be denied, there was a great deal of paſſion in the ſentence againſt Oates, and much more in the execution of the ſame. The ſentence was as follows:

1. That he ſhould pay for a fine one thouſand marks upon each indictment.

2. That he ſhould be ſtript of all his canonical habits.

3. That he ſhould ſtand in the pillory before Weſtminſter-Hall gate on Monday next, for an hour's time, with a paper over his head (which he muſt firſt walk with round about all the courts in Weſtminſter-Hall) declaring his crime; and that upon the firſt indictment.

4. That for the ſecond indictment, he ſhould, upon Tueſ-day, ſtand in the pillory at the Royal Exchange in London, for an hour, with the ſame inſcription.

5. On Wedneſday he ſhould be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate.

6. On Friday he ſhould be whipt from Newgate to Tyburn.

7. And for annual commemorations, upon every 24th of April, as long as he ſhould live, he was to ſtand in the pillory at Tyburn, juſt oppoſite to the gallows, for an hour.

8. That, upon every 9th of Auguſt, he was to ſtand in the pillory at Weſtminſter hall gate, becauſe he had ſworn that Ireland was in town between the 8th and 12th of Auguſt. The like on every 10th of Auguſt at Charing-croſs, and over-againſt the Temple-gate every 11th of Auguſt. And upon every 2d of September he was to do the ſame at the Royal-Exchange. All this was to do every year during his life, and be committed a cloſe priſoner, as long as he lived.

After pronouncing this ſentence, Jefferies added, that if it had been in his power, Oates ſhould have been condemned to die.

It muſt be obſerved, that ſtanding in the pillory, which in other countries only expoſes to ſhame, is in England ſomething more: for it is permitted to pelt thoſe that ſtand there, with dirt, and all ſorts of naſtineſs, and it often happens that the mob abuſe this liberty, and throw rotten eggs and even ſtones at the priſoner.

But what was thought moſt barbarous in this ſentence, was the ordering a man to be whipt twice in three days. Some charitable perſons uſed their endeavours to beg off part of this wretched man's puniſhment, and made application to the queen, intreating her to intercede for him, at leaſt with regard to the ſecond ſcourging. But all interceſſion was in vain. The ſentence was executed with all imaginable rigour and barbarity. The firſt day he was tied to a cart, and as the hangman no doubt was commanded not to ſpare him, he executed the order with ſuch cruelty, as was unknown to the Engliſh nation. Oates ſwooned away ſeveral times the firſt day, with the extremity of the anguiſh. We may judge what he endured the ſecond day, when his wounds were yet freſh. In a word, his ſuſtaining ſuch great torments, and eſcaping with life, was looked upon as ſomething miraculous. Every one was ſenſible that both in the ſentence and in the execution revenge had a greater ſhare than juſtice, and that he was made a ſacrifice to the manes of the five Jeſuits executed in the late reign.

The next victim to the Catholics, not long after Oates, was Thomas Dangerfield, who diſcovered the pretended meal-tub-plot, which he had laid to the charge of the Proteſtants. But afterwards, not being able to maintain before the council what he had depoſed, he confeſſed, he was perſuaded to invent it by the counteſs of Powis, and the Popiſh lords in the Tower. Moreover he had publiſhed a narrative of all the ſecret practices uſed as well to corrupt him, as to render the plot probable, As he owned, he had received money from the late king and the duke of York, the laſt would never ſuffer ſuch an offence to go unpuniſhed, when he came to be king. Dangerfield therefore was committed to priſon, and indicted for publiſhing a ſcandalous libel. He was tried and brought in guilty by the jury, after which he received judgment at the King's-Bench bar, "That he ſhould ſtand twice in the pillory; that he ſhould be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate on one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn on another, and ſhould pay a fine of five hundred pounds." The ſcourging was executed with rigour, though with leſs cruelty than on Oates. The ſecond day, Dangerfield, after the whipping was over, being in a coach againſt Hatton-Garden, Robert Frances, a barriſter of Grey's-Inn, came to the coach-ſide, and uſing ſome inſulting expreſſions, Dangerfield returned a reproachful anſwer[n]. Frances having a ſmall cane in his hand, thruſt it into his eye with all his force, which in two hours put an end to his life. Frances was condemned to be hanged, and was executed accordingly, the king, though ſtrongly ſollicited for a pardon, not thinking proper to leave ſuch a crime unpuniſhed[o].

Richard Baxter, a Preſbyterian miniſter, famous for his voluminous writings during the troubles, in favour of his religion againſt the church of England, was the third inſtance of the mildneſs of the new government. As he could not be proceeded againſt for his books publiſhed during the troubles, by reaſon of the act of indemnity, occaſion was taken to proſecute him for a late book, intitled, A Paraphraſe on the New Teſtament; wherein it was pretended, there were ſeveral ſeditious paſſages, and highly reflecting on the biſhops. Baxter being brought before Jefferies at the King's-Bench bar, and moving, that farther time might be allowed him for his trial, Jefferies, with his uſual moderation, cried out, "I will not give him a minute's time more to ſave his life: we have had to do with other ſort of perſons, but now we have a ſaint to deal with; and I know how to deal with ſaints as well as ſinners. Yonder (ſays he) ſtands Oates in the pillory, and ſays, he ſuffers for the truth, and ſo ſays Baxter; but if Baxter did but ſtand on the other ſide of the pillory with him, I would ſay there ſtood two of the greateſt rogues and raſcals in the kingdom." In this manner did the judge prepare the jury, before any evidence was heard. It would be needleſs to inſert the particulars of the charge, and Baxter's defence. The point was only to know, whether certain paſſages of his late book could be applied to the prelates of the church of England, or ſolely to thoſe of the church of Rome. Baxter's council[p] urged, that without a forced conſtruction, none of the paſſages could be applied to the biſhops of the church of England. The whole proceſs turned upon this point. But it will not be improper to ſhew the paſſion and partiality of Jefferies in this as in all other affairs. Baxter alledged in his defence, "That he had been ſo moderate with reſpect to the church of England, and had ſpoken ſo honourably of the biſhops, that he had incurred the cenſure of many of the Diſſenters upon that account." Jefferies, laying aſide on this occaſion the office of a judge to turn evidence, affirmed, "That Baxter was an enemy to the name and thing, the office and perſons of biſhops;" and ſeverely reprimanded the counſel, probably for defending their cauſe too well. Then, ſpeaking to Baxter, he ſaid, "Richard, thou art an old fellow, and old knave, thou haſt written books enough to load a cart, every one is as full of ſedition, I might ſay treaſon, as an egg is full of meat. Hadſt thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretendeſt to be a preacher of the goſpel of peace, and thou haſt one foot in the grave; it is time for thee to begin to think what account thou intendeſt to give. But leave thee to thyſelf, and I ſee thou'lt go on as thou haſt begun; but by the grace of God I will look after thee. I know thou haſt a mighty party, and I ſee a great many of the brotherhood in corners, waiting to ſee what will become of their mighty Don; and a doctor of the party [Dr. Bates] at your elbow; but by the grace of Almighty God I will cruſh you all."

The chief juſtice in ſumming up the evidence ſaid; "It is notoriouſly known, that there has been a deſign to ruin the king and the nation; and this has been the main incendiary: he is as modeſt now as can be; but time was, when no man was ſo ready at 'Bind your kings in chains, and your nobles in fetters of iron; and to your tents, O Iſrael!' Gentlemen, for God's ſake do not let us be gulled twice in an age."

It manifeſtly appears from theſe laſt words of Jefferies, that Baxter's book was only a pretence to puniſh him for what he had done during the troubles. However that be, ſuch was the impartial manner in which this judge directed the jury. There is ſcarce a man who will deny, that, as well during this reign as in the latter part of the former, all the juries were packed, and had engaged beforehand to be guided by the court. In concluſion, Baxter being found guilty, judgment was given againſt him, to be fined five hundred marks; to lie in priſon till he paid it, and to be bound to his good behaviour for ſeven years.

The parliament met the 19th of May. But the king was pleaſed that the commons ſhould firſt chooſe their ſpeaker, before he made his ſpeech to both houſes. The choice fell upon Sir John Trevor, who was recommended by the lord Middleton, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate; after which, the king came to the parliament the 22d of May, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes. As he had that morning received advice of the earl of Argyle's arrival in Scotland, it gave him occaſion to add ſomething to his ſpeech.

My lords and gentlemen,

"AFTER it pleaſed Almighty God, to take to his mercy

[p] Baxter's counſel were Wallop, Williams, Rotherham, Atwood, and Phipps, all retained by Sir Henry Aſhhurſt, who had a particular reſpect for Baxter. It may be noted of Baxter, that ſoon after the reſtoration he refuſed the biſhopric of Hereford, and when turned out of his living with the reſt, ſent back a penſion of a hundred pounds a year offered him by the king. He frequently attended divine ſervice in the church of England, went to the ſacrament, and perſuaded others to do the ſame. Echard, Tom. III. p. 743.

The

the late king my deareſt brother, and to bring me to the peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne of my anceſtors, I immediately reſolved to call a parliament, as the beſt means to ſettle every thing upon thoſe foundations, as may make my reign both eaſy and happy to you: towards which, I am diſpoſed to contribute all that is fit for me to do. What I ſaid to my privy-council, at my firſt coming there, I am deſirous to renew to you; wherein I fully declared my opinion concerning the principles of the church of Englnnd, whoſe members have ſhewn themſelves ſo eminently loyal in the worſt of times, in defence of my father, and ſupport of my brother, of bleſſed memory, 'that I will always take care to defend and ſupport it: I will make it my endeavour to preſerve this government both in church and ſtate, as it now is by law eſtabliſhed; and as I will never depart from the juſt rights and perogative of the crown, ſo I will never invade any man's property:' and you may be ſure that having heretofore ventured my life in the defence of this nation, I will ſtill go as far as any man in preſerving it in all its juſt rights and liberties.

"And having given you this aſſurance concerning the care I will have of your religion and property, which I have choſen to do in the ſame words I uſed at my firſt coming to the crown, the better to evidence to you, that I ſpoke them not by chance, and, conſequently, that you may the more firmly rely upon a promiſe ſo ſolemnly made; I cannot doubt, that I ſhall fail of ſuitable returns from you, with all imaginable duty and kindneſs on your part; and particularly in what relates to the ſettling of my revenue, and continuing it during my life, as it was in the time of the king my brother. I might uſe many arguments to enforce this demand, from the benefit of trade, the ſupport of the navy, the neceſſity of the crown, and the well-being of the government itſelf; which I muſt not ſuffer to be precarious: but I am confident, your own conſideration of what is juſt and reaſonable, will ſuggeſt to you whatſoever might be enlarged upon this occaſion. There is one popular argument, which I foreſee may be uſed againſt what I aſk of you, from the inclination men may have for frequent parliaments, which ſome may think will be the beſt ſecured, by feeding me from time to time, by ſuch proportions as they ſhall think convenient: and this argument, it being the firſt time I ſpeak to you from the throne, I will anſwer once for all, that this would be a very improper method to take with me, and that the beſt way to engage me to meet you often, is always to uſe me well[a]. I expect therefore that you will comply with me in what I have deſired, and that you will do it ſpeedily, that this may be a ſhort ſeſſion, and that we may meet again to all our ſatisfactions."

My lords and gentlemen,

"I muſt acquaint you, that I have had news this morning from Scotland, that Argyle is landed in the Weſt-Highlands, with the men he brought with him from Holland; and that there are two declarations publiſhed, one in the name of all thoſe in arms there, the other in his own; it would be too long for me to repeat the ſubſtance of them, it is ſufficient to tell you I am charged with uſurpation and tyranny: the ſhorter of them I have directed to be forthwith communicated to you. I will take the beſt care I can, that this declaration of their own treaſon and rebellion may meet with the reward it deſerves: and I will not doubt, but that you will be the more zealous to ſupport the government, and give me my revenue as I have deſired it, without delay."

I ſhall make upon this ſpeech, three remarks, the importance whereof will hereafter appear. The firſt is, that when the king renewed to his parliament the promiſe he had made to the council, to preſerve the government both in church and ſtate, as it was by law eſtabliſhed, nothing was farther from his thoughts than the performance of it. This will very clearly appear in the ſequel. Wherefore this promiſe was only a lure uſed by the king to engage the parliament to enable him to proceed without them. This happened accordingly; for this parliament, which had but two ſhort ſeſſions, was the only one the king called in his reign.

The ſecond remark is, that when the king ſaid, he would not ſuffer the government to be precarious, (that is, to depend upon the ſupplies the parliament ſhould grant him from time to time) he plainly intimated, he meant to govern in a different manner from his predeceſſors, ſince among all the kings of England, there was never any whoſe government was not ſupported by the aids of the parliaments.

The third is, that the objection which he foreſaw would be made to his deſire concerning his revenue, was ſo ſtrong, that he could find no other reaſon to anſwer it, than a menace, which ought rather to induce the parliament to guard againſt it. For if the king, in caſe of refuſal, thought himſelf powerful enough to make the parliament repent, how much greater reaſon was there to fear, if he ſhould be enabled to proceed without the parliament, and to execute his threat.

This parliament, according to ſome hiſtorians, was better compoſed than any for ſome years paſt. All the members were rich, zealous for their country, good churchmen, averſe to all republican or anti-monarchial principles, faithful to the king, and of ſo wonderful harmony among themſelves, that the like had never been ſeen. The meaning of all which in ſhort is, that they were tories without any mixture of republicans, preſbyterians, or whigs. This parliament conſiſted indeed of perſons prepoſſeſſed in favour of the king, who imagining that, according to his promiſe, he would never meddle with the laws or religion, believed it a ſignal ſervice to the kingdom, to enable the king to oppoſe effectually the attempts of the whigs. They were miſtaken in their ſuppoſition: but it cannot be inferred from their conduct, that they intended to betray the nation's intereſts, as they plainly ſhewed afterwards.

Other hiſtorians do not give the ſame idea of this parliament. They pretend, the members for the moſt part, being elected by the intrigues of the court, were tories, and moſt violent for the doctrine of paſſive-obedience, and for that reaſon ſurrendered the liberties of the people, and paved the way for the king to become abſolute, by granting him ſuch a revenue as enabled him to govern without a parliament[b].

Though theſe two aſſertions with reſpect to this parliament, ſeem to be oppoſite, it is, however, eaſy to reconcile them, on ſuppoſition of a thing which is very true, namely, the parliament was deceived by the king's promiſes. So, the only difference between theſe two opinions, is, that the whigs accuſe the tories of betraying the intereſts of their country with premeditated deſign, and the tories without denying that they acted indeed againſt the intereſts of the kingdom, maintain that they did ſo through a too great confidence in the king's word, given from the throne in the moſt ſolemn manner. It will hereafter be ſeen, that the parliament had no ſuch intention, as is imputed to them: but I cannot ſay their imprudence may be ſo eaſily vindicated.

However this be, both houſes, pleaſed with the king's ſpeech, waited on him the ſame day with an addreſs of thanks; to which the king anſwered. "That he was very well pleaſed with their thanks, and could repeat no more than what he had ſaid in the morning, and they ſhould find that he would be as good as his word."

This confirmation was ſo agreeable to the commons, that when they returned to their houſe, they voted immediately, nemine contradicente, "That all the revenue enjoyed by the late king at his death, ſhould be granted to his preſent majeſty, and ſettled upon him during life." Thus the conſtant and ordinary revenue of the late king, which, according to the intent of the firſt parliament, held in his reign, was to be twelve hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, but which amounted to above double that ſum; this revenue, I ſay, which two parliaments had ſpent about two years in ſettling, was granted to James II. in the ſpace of two hours. They who ſpeak moſt moderately of this revenue, compute it at more than two millions. But a hiſtorian[c] pretends, that including the one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, enjoyed by the king while duke of York, and annexed to the crown, the whole amounted to above two millions five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. This liberality was not founded upon the ſervices the king when duke of York had done the nation, but ſolely upon his promiſes to ſupport the government of

[a] The king's aim, in this latter part of his ſpeech, was to prevent a motion, which was talked of abroad, though none ventured to make it in the houſe. "That it was ſafeſt to grant the revenue only for a term of years. Burnet, p. 638.

[b] Burnet ſays of this parliament, that all arts were uſed to manage elections, ſo that the king ſhould have a parliament to his mind. Complaints came up from all parts of England, of the injuſtice and violence uſed in elections beyond what had ever been practiſed in former times. In the new charters that had been granted, the election of the members was taken out of the hands of the inhabitants, and reſtored to the corporation-men, all thoſe being left out, who were not acceptable at court. In ſome boroughs they could not find a number of men to be depended upon: ſo the neighbouring gentlemen were made corporation-men: and in ſome places, perſons of other counties, not ſo much as known in the borough, were named. This was practiſed in the moſt avowed manner in Cornwal by the earl of Bath, who put the officers of the guards name in almoſt all the charters of that county, ſo that the king was ſure of forty four votes on all occaſions. There were not above forty but what were thus choſen. Burnet, p. 625.

The

the church and ſtate. But, through extreme prejudice, the parliament was not aware, that by granting the king for life ſuch an immenſe revenue, they enabled him to maintain an army and fleet without the aſſiſtance of parliament, and conſequently to ſubdue thoſe that ſhould dare to oppoſe his will, as he did accordingly.

The commons having given the king ſo real a demonſtration of their zeal and affection, the lords were willing likewiſe to ſhew him how much they were devoted to him in whatever lay in their power. To that end, the king having ſent a noli proſequi upon the indictments againſt the popiſh lords, who had been priſoners in the Tower for the plot, and againſt the earl of Danby, the houſe of peers annulled their order of the 19th of March 1678-9, and entirely diſcharged thoſe lords who had been releaſed only upon bail.

Theſe proceedings in favour of the popiſh lords, made way for a bill to reverſe the attainder of the lord viſcount Stafford in 1680. The ſole reaſon alleged in the bill for the reverſal was in theſe words: "Whereas it is now manifeſt, that the ſaid William late viſcount Stafford was innocent of the treaſon laid to his charge, and the teſtimony whereupon he was found guilty was falſe. Be it enacted, &c." Thus, the preparers of the bill founded the lord Stafford's innocence upon Oates's being condemned for perjury, though in Oates's trial there was not a word of his teſtimony againſt Stafford. Nevertheleſs, the bill was paſſed by a majority of voices. But ſuch of the lords[d] as oppoſed it, entered their diſſents for the following reaſons:

1. Becauſe the aſſertion in the bill of its "being now manifeſt, that the late viſcount Stafford died innocent, and that the teſtimony by which he was convicted was falſe," which are the ſole grounds and reaſons given to ſupport the bill, are deſtitute of all proof, warrant, or teſtimony, or matter of record before us.

2. That the record of the King's-Bench, read at the committee, concerning the convictions, laſt term, of one of the witneſſes for perjury, in collateral points of proofs, of no affinity to the lord Stafford's trial, and given ſeveral years before, it is conceived, can be no ground to invalidate the teſtimony upon which the ſaid viſcount was convicted, which could never legally be by one witneſs, and was in fact by the judgment of his peers, on the evidence of at leaſt three.

3. It is conceived, the ſaid judgment in the King's-Bench was unprecedented, illegal, and highly derogatory to the honour, judicature, and authority of this court, who have power to queſtion and puniſh perjuries of witneſſes before them, and ought not to be impoſed upon by the judgments of inferior courts, or their attainder of a peer invalidated by implication; and the popiſh plot, ſo condemned, purſued, and puniſhed by his late majeſty and four parliaments, after public ſolemn devotion through the whole kingdom, by authority of church and ſtate, to be eluded to the arraignment and ſcandal of the government; and only for reſtoring the family of one popiſh lord. And all this being without any matter judicially appearing before us to introduce the ſame; and the records of the trial not ſuffered to be read, for the information of the truth, before the paſſing of the bill.

4. For many other weighty reaſons, offered and given by divers peers in the two days debate of this bill, both at the committee, and in the houſe.

Theſe reaſons plainly ſhew, in my opinion, that the lords, in paſſing this bill, deſigned rather to oblige the king than do juſtice to the memory of the lord Stafford. But the commons had not the ſame complaiſance, ſince it was dropt after the ſecond reading, and never heard of more, they having no intention to ſtrengthen or encourage the popiſh party[e].

The parliament of Scotland was ſtill extremely zealous for the king's intereſt. Beſides the acts before-mentioned, they paſſed one for granting the king during life the yearly ſum of two hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds; and another, declaring, That the giving or taking the national covenant, or the ſolemn league and covenant, or owning them as lawful or obligatory, ſhould incur the crime of high-treaſon.

Since the earl of Argyle's eſcape after his condemnation in 1681, he had kept himſelf concealed at Amſterdam, very few perſons in Scotland knowing where he was. He waited there for a favourable opportunity either to make his peace with the king, or to raiſe in Scotland, where he thought he had many friends, an inſurrection, which ſhould put him again in poſſeſſion of his eſtate. He believed a fair occaſion offered for an inſurrection after the death of Charles II. knowing that the duke of York, who was to ſucceed, was beloved neither in Scotland nor England. For though, in both kingdoms, the government, and all the public offices, were in the hands of the tories, the earl of Argyle imagined, that if by his credit he could raiſe an army in Scotland, all the preſbyterians would liſt under his banner, and then his party would be much ſuperior to the king's.

While he was full of theſe thoughts, the prince of Orange, foreſeeing the king his father-in-law would ſoon deſire the ſtate to deliver up the duke of Monmouth, adviſed him to retire elſewhere. The duke followed his advice and withdrew to Bruſſels. But fearing he was not ſafe there, and that the court of Spain would think proper to ſacrifice him to king James, he repaired privately to Amſterdam, where he had frequent conferences with Argyle. They had nothing ready to make an attempt, which might have the leaſt appearance of ſucceſs. They were both without money, and not ſure of friends in England or Scotland to ſecond their projects. Mean while, the earl of Argyle meeting at Amſterdam with a rich widow, who lent him ten thouſand pounds, this unexpected ſupply ſo encouraged him, that he reſolved to make a deſcent in Scotland, where he hoped, that his name, his credit, and the cauſe he intended to ſupport, would procure him friends enough. But the duke of Monmouth was not in ſo favourable a ſituation. He flattered himſelf, that the enmity of the whigs againſt the duke of York would revive, when they ſhould ſee one at the head of their party; but he had yet no private correſpondence, with ſuch of the nobility and gentry, whoſe credit would be able to ſupport him, and moreover he wanted money. However, the earl of Argyle perceiving how advantageous it would be to him, that the duke of Monmouth ſhould make an invaſion in England, whilſt he ſhould himſelf do the like in Scotland, ſo managed that at length he perſuaded him to try the ſame fortune, though not till after the duke had long reſiſted his ſollicitations. Indeed, as the duke's affairs then ſtood, it was a raſh undertaking, eſpecially as it was to be executed when the parliament was ſitting. But ſome of his friends, very unfit to manage ſuch a deſign, and who were tired with living in exile, did all they could to encourage him[f]. He therefore promiſed Argyle, that as ſoon as he ſhould hear of his landing in Scotland, he would not fail to make a deſcent in England.

Upon this poſitive promiſe, the earl of Argyle ſailed with three ſmall ſhips laden with arms for five thouſand men, having with him ſome German officers and ſome ſoldiers liſted in Holland. He arrived the 5th of May before Orkney in the north of Scotland, and ſent his ſecretary on ſhore for intelligence how the country ſtood affected. But the ſecretary being ſeized and brought to Edinburgh, the earl found nothing was to be done in thoſe parts. Wherefore he put to ſea again, and landed in the Weſt-Highlands, at a place called Dunſtafnage, a ruinous caſtle formerly his own. Here he left his arms and ammunition, and then publiſhed two declarations mentioned by the king in his ſpeech to both houſes. Whereupon the parliament of Scotland now ſitting, paſſed an act, That all the ſubjects of Scotland ſhould renew the oath of allegiance, and ſwear to aſſert the royal prerogatives whenever they ſhould be required, upon pain of baniſhment or impriſonment.

The king, as we have ſeen, communicated to the parliament of England but one of Argyle's declarations: however preſently after he imparted alſo the other. Whereupon both houſes came to this reſolution. That they would aſſiſt his majeſty with their lives and fortunes, againſt the earl of Argyle and his adherents, and all other traitors whatſoever. The king very graciouſly thanked them, and in his anſwer to the lords, renewed his former promiſes.

The committee appointed by the houſe of commons for the affairs of religion, and which, no doubt, conſiſted of the moſt zealous churchmen, conſidered the earl of Argyle's invaſion in Scotland, as an outrage committed by all the preſbyterians of both kingdoms. Though the particulars of this invaſion could not yet be known, except only that the earl of Argyle was landed in Scotland, and had publiſhed two declarations, the committee took occaſion to draw up two votes namely, 1ſt, That it is the opinion of the committee, that this houſe will ſtand by his majeſty with their lives and fortunes, in defence of the reformed religion of the church of England, as it is by law eſtabliſhed. 2dly, That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to deſire him to iſſue out a proclamation, to cauſe the penal laws to be put in execution againſt all diſſenters whatſoever. This laſt vote was the pure effect of the committee's prejudice, founded on the king's promiſe, that he would ſupport and preſerve the church of England to the utmoſt of his power. Probably, they imagined, the king, though a papiſt, was ready to proceed with vigour againſt all the enemies of that church. But the previous queſtion being, Whether the queſtion ſhould then be put for the houſe to agree with the committee? it was carried in the negative. It was conſidered, it would not be agreeable to the king to cauſe the penal laws to be executed againſt all diſſenters, and conſequently againſt thoſe of his own religion. On the other hand, it was not proper to confine the order to the preſbyterians in particular, without mention of the papiſts. For theſe reaſons, the houſe, after mature deliberation, came to the following reſolution, nemine contradicente, "That this houſe doth acquieſce, and entirely rely, and reſt wholly ſatisfied on his majeſty's gracious word, and repeated declaration, to ſupport and defend the religion of the church of England, as it is now by law eſtabliſhed, which is dearer to us than our lives." This vote clearly ſhews, that though the commons and tories in general expreſſed a very great zeal for the king's intereſt, they had no intention to countenance the Romiſh religion, though ſome of their enemies have been pleaſed to draw ſuch an inference.

Purſuant to this reſolution, when the revenue-bill was ready, and the king come to the houſe of peers to give the royal aſſent, the ſpeaker of the commons made the following ſpeech.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WE, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons aſſembled in parliament, do preſent to your majeſty the revenue you was pleaſed to demand at the opening of this parliament, wherein we proceeded with as much ſpeed, as the forms of paſſing bills of that nature would admit. We bring not with it any bill for the preſervation and ſecurity of our religion, which is dearer to us than our lives. In that we acquieſce entirely and reſt wholly ſatisfied in your majeſty's gracious and ſacred word, repeated declarations, and aſſurance to ſupport and defend the religion of the church of England, as it is now by law eſtabliſhed. We preſent this revenue to your majeſty, without the condition of any additional, appropriating, or tacking clauſes whatſoever. And we humbly beſeech your majeſty to accept of it, and along with it our hearty prayers, That God Almighty would bleſs you with a long life, and happy reign to enjoy it."

Upon the paſſing this bill, his majeſty was pleaſed to make this ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I thank you very heartily for the bill you have preſented me this day; and I aſſure you, the readineſs and chearfulneſs that hath attended the diſpatch of it, is as acceptable to me as the bill itſelf. After ſo happy a beginning, you may believe I would not call upon you unneceſſarily for an extraordinary ſupply: but when I tell you, that the ſtores of the navy and ordinance are extremely exhauſted; that the anticipations upon ſeveral branches of the revenue are great and burthenſome; that the debts of the king my brother, to his ſervants and family, are ſuch as deſerve compaſſion; that the rebellion in Scotland, without putting more weight upon it than it really deſerves, muſt oblige me to conſiderable expence extraordinary. I am ſure ſuch conſiderations will move you to give me an aid to provide for thoſe things, wherein the ſecurity, the eaſe and happineſs of my government are ſo much concerned. But above all, I muſt recommend to you the care of the navy, the ſtrength and glory of this nation, that you would put it into ſuch a condition, as may make us conſidered and reſpected abroad. I cannot expreſs my concern upon this occaſion more ſuitable to my own thoughts of it, than by aſſuring you, I have a true Engliſh heart, as jealous of the honour of the nation as you can be; and I pleaſe myſelf with the hopes, that by God's bleſſing, and your aſſiſtance, I may carry the reputation of it yet higher in the world than ever it has been in the time of any of my anceſtors. And as I will not call upon you for ſupplies, but when they are of public uſe and advantage, ſo I promiſe you that what you give me upon ſuch occaſions, ſhall be managed with good huſbandry; and I will take care it ſhall be employed to the uſes for which I aſk them."

If ever there was occaſion to repeat his promiſes concerning religion, and the nation's liberties, it was doubtleſs immediately after receiving from the houſe of commons ſo real a proof of their zeal, founded, as the ſpeaker ſaid, upon their confidence in the king's word. But it was by no means proper for the king to renew a promiſe he did not intend to perform. When this promiſe had procured him what he deſired, it was entirely forgot; and if it was ſometimes mentioned among the king's adherents, it was only to palliate the violation of it, as will hereafter appear.

The very moment the king thanked the commons for their noble preſent, they had occaſion to perceive their error, in not appointing the uſes to which ſuch an immenſe revenue ſhould be applied. It manifeſtly appeared by the king's ſpeech, that he did not pretend to employ this revenue ſolely in the uſual expences of the government, ſince at that very time, he demanded a great and extraordinary aid, for all the other things enumerated by him, and even for the maintenance of the navy, as if his revenue had been too inconſiderable to ſupply his occaſions.

In ſhort, it muſt appear ſtrange, that James, for having gained one naval victory, ſhould affect to exalt himſelf above all his predeceſſors. This was a vanity which did not ſeem to become him. Beſides, it will hereafter be ſeen, that nothing was farther from his thoughts than the deſign of promoting the honour and reputation of the Engliſh nation. Nevertheleſs, the commons, highly pleaſed with the king's ſpeech, granted him an additional duty of exciſe upon wines and vinegar, with a further impoſition upon ſugar and tobacco.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the earl of Argyle was endeavouring to ſtrengthen himſelf in Scotland, diſperſing declarations, and ſending letters upon letters to his relations and friends. But though he was in his own country of Argyle, and the inhabitants had been formerly his vaſſals, all he could do was to aſſemble two or three thouſand men. With this little army he croſſed over, and landed in the Iſle of Bute. But within few days, having notice that a great number of forces, under the command of the earl of Dunbarton, the duke of Gordon, the marquis of Athol, the earl of Arran, and others, were advancing towards him from ſeveral parts, in order to ſurround him, he was forced to ſhift from iſland to iſland, to avoid them. This he could eaſily do, by means of his three ſhips, and ſeveral ſmall boats, till he heard that three men of war, and ſome frigates, would ſoon come and attack him. Then, he marched into Argyleſhire towards Inverary, ordering his veſſels and boats to come and join him. But they were hindered by contrary winds from doing it ſoon enough. So finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, and conſidering that few came to join him, and that his troops began to deſert, he gave out, that he intended to attack the marquis of Athol, who was at Inverary. But at the ſame time, he ordered the old caſtle of Ellengreg to be fortified in the beſt manner poſſible, and leaving his cannon there, with a garriſon of one hundred and eighty men, marched into Dumbartonſhire. The ſame day, the king's ſhips came up to the caſtle, with intent to batter it, but the caſtle ſurrendered upon the firing of the firſt gun. By which the earl loſt five thouſand arms, five hundred barrels of powder, and all his cannon, beſides his three ſhips, which were alſo taken at the ſame time. This loſs ſo diſcouraged Argyle, as well as his officers, that from that moment they thought only of means to eſcape. But as, after the loſs of their ſhips, there was no way to fly out of Scotland, they retired from place to place with all poſſible ſpeed, even to the ſwimming of rivers. But they were ſo hotly purſued, that they were forced at length to diſperſe into ſmall parties [g], in order to ſave ſome, in caſe the reſt ſhould have the misfortune to be over taken. At laſt, not to be tedious, I ſhall ſay in two words, the earl of Argyle having received a wound in his head, was obliged to quit his horſe, and run into the water up to his neck to ſave himſelf. In this poſture he was taken by a countryman, who threatened to knock him down if he would not yield [h]. This happened on the 17th of June, twenty-eight days after his firſt landing in Scotland. He was not ſuffered to languiſh long. For, being brought to Edinburgh with great ignominy, [g] It was then generally believed, that they were betrayed by Sir John Cochram, one of thoſe that came over with Argyle. For he undertaking to provide guides to conduct them ſafely into Galloway, and either miſtaking the way, or deſignedly miſleading them, he carried them into a bog, where they loſt their horſes and baggage. Kennet, p. 426.

[h] The earl preſented a piſtol to the countryman, but it miſſed fire. Whereupon the other gave him a blow on the head, which ſo ſtunned him that he fell, and in ſinking cried out, "Unfortunate Argyle! Kennet, p. 427.

his head was cut off in a few days, and placed on the Toll-Booth of the city [i]. Rumbold, one of his friends and confidents, was likewiſe taken and executed with ſeveral others [k]. Thus the king, without having contributed ſcarce any thing to it, ſaw himſelf delivered from the danger which threatened him from Scotland.

The duke of Monmouth, purſuant to his promiſe to Argyle, ſailed out of the Texel the 24th of May, with a ſmall man of war of thirty-two guns, and two other veſſels. He met with ſuch contrary winds, that he was nineteen days at ſea, though without being diſcovered by the king's ſhips which waited in the channel to intercept him, the king having had ſo early notice of his deſign, that Skelton, his majeſty's envoy at the Hague, had obtained an order from the ſtates to arreſt him. For which reaſon, the duke departed ſooner than he intended. At laſt, he landed the 11th of June, with about eighty followers, in the Weſt of England, near Lyme, and the ſame day repaired to the town, where he was received without oppoſition. Here he publiſhed a declaration againſt the king. As this declaration is well known, I ſhall only mention the moſt material things in it [l].

In the preface he ſaid, "That government was originally inſtituted by God, and this or that form of it choſen and ſubmitted to by men, for the happineſs and ſecurity of the governed, and not for the private intereſt, and perſonal greatneſs of thoſe that rule. That the government of England was, above all others, happy in its primitive form, whereby the prerogatives of the crown, and the privileges of the ſubjects were ſo far from joſtling one another, that the people's rights tended to make the prince great, and the prince's prerogatives were in order to the ſubjects protection and ſafety. But that all the boundaries of the government had of late been broken, and nothing left unattempted, for turning the limited monarchy into an abſolute tyranny."

Then the duke proceeded to impute to the king all the miſchiefs in the reign of Charles II, as "the burning of London, the alliance with France, the two wars with Holland, the popiſh plot, Godfrey's murder, the proteſtant-plot, the ſuborning witneſſes to ſwear the moſt zealous patriots out of their lives, the hiring of villains to aſſaſſinate the earl of Eſſex, and cauſing others to be clandeſtinely cut off, the frequent prorogations and diſſolutions of the parliaments."

He next proceeded to what the duke of York had done ſince he aſſumed the title of king, as "the avowing himſelf of the Romiſh religion; his publiſhing two proclamations, one whereof required the collecting of the cuſtoms, and the other continued that part of the exciſe which was to expire at the king's death; his advancing thoſe to the bench that were the ſcandal of the bar, and conſtituting thoſe very men to declare the laws who were branded in parliament for perverting them; his cauſing juries to be packed, falſe returns to be made, and new illegal charters to be granted, in order to have a parliament that ſhould, inſtead of preſerving the people's liberties, eſtabliſh his arbitrarineſs, and confirm the ſubjects thraldom." He declared moreover, "That he did not take up arms to revenge any perſonal injuries, but ſolely for vindicating his country's religion and laws." He did not fail, however, to affirm, "That his mother was lawful wife of Charles II." In concluſion, he accuſed the king of poiſoning the late king his brother. The reſt of the declaration contained the uſual proteſtations and invitations in papers of this nature.

Though the facts contained in this declaration cannot be looked upon as proofs that the king was guilty of what the duke of Monmouth laid to his charge, they may ſerve however for proof, that the king from that time was accuſed of them, at leaſt by ſome men, and that theſe accuſations were not invented after his fall.

The king having communicated to both houſes the duke of Monmouth's landing at Lyme, they preſented an addreſs to him, aſſuring him of their zeal and aſſiſtance, and immediately after the commons proceeded to a bill of attainder againſt the duke of Monmouth [m]. At the ſame time they deſired his majeſty to iſſue a proclamation, promiſing a reward of five thouſand pounds to any that ſhould bring in the duke dead or alive. The bill of attainder was diſpatched by the commons in two days, and in one by the lords.

The 16th of June the king came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent both to this bill and the money-bills before-mentioned. Two days after he ſent a meſſage to the commons, to acquaint them, that he judged it neceſſary for the members to be preſent in their reſpective counties, and therefore deſigned there ſhould be an adjournment in a few days; deſiring there might be a good fund for a preſent ſum of money, to anſwer the immediate charge his majeſty muſt be at, on account of the duke of Monmouth's rebellion in the Weſt. Upon this meſſage, the commons voted a ſupply of four hundred thouſand pounds for the king's preſent extraordinary occaſions.

The two houſes were ſo expeditious to anſwer the king's deſires, that on the 27th of June there were twelve bills ready, moſt of them for the king's benefit; and on the 2d of July, four more [n], beſides private bills. That day, the parliament was adjourned to the 4th of Auguſt. But the lord keeper gave notice, that the king did not intend there ſhould be a ſeſſion, but that the members about London ſhould meet and adjourn themſelves as there ſhould be occaſion, till winter, or till the king ſhould appoint the time by proclamation. Thus ended the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, having done in ſix weeks what no other ever did in many months [o].

The duke of Monmouth's followers, who were not above eighty-two when he landed at Lyme, increaſed to two thouſand in three or four days. This made him hope they would continually increaſe as he advanced into the country. Wherefore, he departed from Lyme the 15th of June, and came the ſame day to Axminſter. He thereby prevented Chriſtopher Monk duke of Albemarle, who with four thouſand of the militia intended to go and beſiege him in Lyme. The duke of Monmouth being come to Axminſter, diſpoſed his troops in ſuch manner, that Albemarle, inſtead of attacking him, thought proper to retreat, perceiving his militia-men had no inclination to do their duty. Albemarle's retreat enabled the duke of Monmouth to march to Taunton, where he arrived the 18th, and was received with loud acclamations. His army being conſiderably increaſed during a five or ſix days ſtay at Taunton, he imagined his affairs were in a proſperous way, and that all the country would join him. In this expectation he called a council, where it was reſolved he ſhould aſſume the title of king. He had already inſinuated in his declaration, that he was lawful ſon of Charles II. and thereby ſhewn, that he pretended to the crown. But, in all likelihood, he would not have taken the title ſo ſoon, had not thoſe about him [p] repreſented to him, that appearing in arms againſt a king actually on the throne, he muſt be accounted a rebel as long as that king's right was acknowledged: that therefore, neither the nobility nor people could have any pretence to join him; whereas by taking upon him the royal ſtile, he would have the ſame advantage as James with regard to right. Probably, there was no occaſion to uſe many other arguments to prevail with him. What he had intimated in his declaration, plainly ſhews, that this was the end he propoſed to himſelf. The only thing there-

[i] Purſuant to the ſentence paſſed three years before, which made his death to be looked on as no better than murder. He juſtified all he had done; for he ſaid, he was unjuſtly attainted: and that had diſſolved his allegiance. He complained of the duke of Monmouth much for delaying his coming ſo long after him, and for aſſuming the name of king, both which he ſaid was contrary to their agreement at parting. Burnet, p. 632.

[k] Ailoffe and Rumbold were taken, who, though Engliſhmen, had choſe rather to follow Argyle than Monmouth. Rumbold was the perſon that dwelt in Rye-houſe, where it was pretended the plot was laid for murdering the late and preſent king. He denied the truth of that conſpiracy. He owned that he had heard many propoſitions at Weſt's chambers about killing the two brothers, and upon that he had ſaid, it could have been eaſily executed near his houſe; upon which ſome diſcourſe had followed how it might have been managed. But he ſaid, it was only talk, and that nothing was laid or ſo much as reſolved on. He ſaid he was for kingly government, but did not believe that God had made the greater part of mankind with ſaddles on their backs, and bridles in their mouths, and ſome few booted and ſpurred to ride the reſt. When Ailoffe was brought to London and examined by the king, he refuſed to diſcover any thing. Whereupon the king ſaid, "Mr. Ailoffe, you know it is in my power to pardon you, therefore ſay that which may deſerve it." He anſwered, as it is ſaid, "Though it is in your power, it is not in your nature to pardon." He was nephew by marriage to the old earl of Clarendon. But that could not ſave him. Burnet, p. 633.

[l] It was entitled, "The declaration of James duke of Monmouth, and the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, now in arms for the defence and vindication of the proteſtant religion, and the laws, rights and privileges of England." It was long (ſays Burnet) and ill penned: full of black and dull malice; it was plainly Ferguſon's ſtile, which was both long and fulſome, p. 641.

[m] The commons, in their addreſs, called the duke of Monmouth—— "That ungrateful rebel."

[n] One was, for erecting a new church, to be called the pariſh of St. James, within the liberty of Weſtminſter.

[o] The ending of this ſeſſion, ſays Burnet, was no ſmall happineſs to the nation; ſuch a body of men being diſmiſſed with doing ſo little hurt, p. 641.

[p] Particularly Ferguſon. See Kennet, p. 431. Note [c].

Henry

fore was to conſult about the moſt proper time for it. In ſhort, purſuant to the advice of thoſe he conſulted, he was proclaimed king at Taunton the 20th of June, by the name of James II.

He began his pretended reign with three proclamations. By the firſt, he promiſed the ſum of five thouſand pounds to any that ſhould bring the duke of York dead or alive. By the ſecond, he declared the parliament now ſitting a ſeditious aſſembly, and gave power to any that would to lay hold of the members as rebels and traitors, if they did not ſeparate before the end of June. The third was to declare the duke of Albemarle a traitor, who lay within ſix miles of Taunton with his militia-men to attack him, if he found opportunity.

The 21ſt of June the duke marched to Bridgewater. He was received there as at Taunton, eſpecially as his army was increaſed to five thouſand men, and might have been more numerous, had he been able to arm thoſe that offered to ſerve him. Beſides arms he wanted alſo good officers, ſcarce any but the meaneſt of the people having joined him. After cauſing himſelf to be proclaimed in Bridgewater, and his three proclamations to be read, he marched for Briſtol, where the inhabitants were inclined to receive him, had they not been awed by the duke of Beaufort their governor. He advanced, however, within three miles of the city, at the inſtance of ſome Briſtol men, who aſſured him, he would be received in ſpite of the governor and the garriſon. But in the mean time, he had notice that the king's forces were advancing, which made him alter his reſolution of attempting Briſtol to that of retreating to Bridgewater. He marched therefore towards Bath, and after vainly ſummoning that city to ſurrender, he beat up one of the king's quarters, at Philip's-Norton, where lay a troop of horſe, which were entirely defeated [a]. From thence he advanced to Frome, where he met with a chearful reception. But unhappily for him, the king's party had found means a few days before to diſarm all the inhabitants, ſo that he was diſappointed, his chief aim being to ſeize thoſe arms for ſuch of his men as wanted them. At Frome he heard of the earl of Argyle's defeat, which threw him into a great conſternation. However, he reſolved to purſue his march, and return to Bridgewater.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in the Weſt, the king was preparing at London, with all poſſible diligence, for his defence againſt an enemy who could not but make him extremely uneaſy. But he had not many regular troops, and thoſe diſperſed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. This obliged him to raiſe the militia, particularly in the weſtern counties, till the arrival of the ſix Engliſh and Scotch regiments which were to come from Holland. On this occaſion, the prince of Orange, his ſon-in-law, ſent monſieur Bentinck, with an offer of his perſon to head his army: but the king did not think proper to accept it. Mean while, as he had no great confidence in the militia, he ſent down his guards, and all the regular troops he could aſſemble, and formed a little army of two thouſand foot, and ſeven hundred horſe and dragoons. He gave the command to Lewis Duras, earl of Feverſham, brother of the marſhals Duras and de Lorge, and nephew to the late Mr. de Turenne. With theſe few troops, the earl of Feverſham encamped at a place called Sedgemore near Bridgewater, whilſt ſeveral parties of militia of the neighbouring counties lay about him, under the command of the dukes of Beaufort, Somerſet, Albemarle, and the earl of Pembroke.

The duke of Monmouth, who was come to Bridgewater, looking upon himſelf as beſieged, and conſidering that the king's forces daily increaſed, whilſt his own began to deſert, held a council of war, wherein it was reſolved to march in the night, and ſurprize the earl of Feverſham, who was encamped that day at Sedgemore, and according to the report of the ſpies, little expected to be attacked. Purſuant to this reſolution the duke began his march about eleven at night with profound ſilence, and within two hours fell in with Dunbarton's regiment, which, lying in an advanced poſt, gave the alarm to the royal army, and by that they had time to draw up and receive their enemies. The particulars of the battle, which was fought about an hour after, are not well known. Thus much is certain, the duke of Monmouth's horſe, commanded by the lord Grey, behaved very ill [b], though ſuperior to the king's in number, and were routed at the firſt charge. The duke of Monmouth, at the head of the foot, long fought with great bravery. But being deſerted by his own, and attacked by the king's horſe, his army was at laſt forced to take to flight. The loſs of this battle was aſcribed to the little experience or cowardice of the lord Grey, who commanded the horſe, and was even ſuſpected of treachery. What confirmed this ſuſpicion was, that being made priſoner, he readily obtained the king's pardon. It is ſaid moreover, that when he had ſo ill performed his duty, inſtead of endeavouring to rally the horſe, he rode up to the duke of Monmouth and told him, "all was loſt, and it was more than time to ſhift for himſelf [c]."

This battle was fought the 6th of July, at break of day. There was ſlain on the duke of Monmouth's ſide three hundred men on the ſpot, a thouſand in the purſuit, and as many taken priſoners. The duke retiring out of the fight, could hardly rally fifty horſe to ſecure his retreat. But theſe being quickly diſperſed, he was obliged to fly on foot, accompanied only by a German count, whom he had brought with him from Holland. The lord Grey was taken on the morrow, and, the day after, the duke of Monmouth was found in a ditch covered with fern, with ſome green peaſe in his pocket. Probably he had eaten nothing elſe for two days. He was brought to the lord Lumley, who immediately conveyed him to London.

No ſooner was the duke taken, but he believed himſelf loſt, and yet he retained ſome hopes that the king would be moved by his ſubmiſſion and repentance, and the queen dowager would intercede for him. In this belief, he wrote to the king for pardon, in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms he could deviſe, and which he thought moſt apt to move his compaſſion. He writ alſo to the queen dowager, who really interceded for him, and prevailed with the king to ſee the unfortunate duke. She made no doubt, that ſince the king had conſented to ſee him, he intended to pardon him; but ſhe was miſtaken. The duke being brought to the king's preſence, threw himſelf at his feet, and begged his life in a very ſubmiſſive or rather abject manner. The king, after aſking him ſome queſtions, made him ſign a declaration, whereby he owned, that the king his father aſſured him, he was never married to his mother. This done, the king told him, his crime was of too great a conſequence to be forgiven, and therefore he muſt prepare to die. The queen, who was preſent, is ſaid to have inſulted his misfortune in an unmerciful manner. The duke ſeeing no hopes left, roſe from the king's feet with an air of bravery, which would have better become him when he firſt came into his preſence, and was carried to the Tower to prepare for death. The king's and queen's behaviour on this occaſion was thought very ſtrange, princes not being uſed to admit criminals to their preſence, but when they deſigned to grant them a pardon. I do not find in any hiſtorian, that the duke was proceeded againſt in the uſual forms, ſo probably he was condemned by the king alone.

Till his execution, the king ordered Turner, biſhop of Ely, to attend him, and prepare him to die. The duke writ once more to the king for pardon, or at leaſt for a longer time, and deſired him to ſend him Dr. Tenniſon [d] or any other divine. The king denied the two firſt articles of his requeſt, and appointed Ken, biſhop of Bath and Wells, to go and acquaint him, that he muſt die the next morning.

In the morning, July the 15th, Dr. Tenniſon and Dr. Hooper were brought to him, and attended him till the laſt hour of his life. By their exhortations they perſuaded him to give it in writing, that the king his father told him, he was never married to his mother. He confeſſed alſo that his invaſion was a ſin, but would never own it a rebellion. There was another point about which the two divines could not receive from him any ſatisfaction, namely, his living with the lady Harriot Wentworth, though he had a ducheſs of his own, and his pretending to be lawfully married to her before God, alledging, that his firſt marriage was null, as being too young when he gave his conſent. All the pains taken by the two doctors to convince him of the falſhood of this opinion were fruitleſs, nay, he choſe rather to deprive himſelf of the communion, than own his engagements with that lady to be unlawful.

When he was on the ſcaffold, he declared, he died a proteſtant of the church of England. But Turner and Ken ſtopped him, and ſaid, that to be a member of the church of England, he muſt believe the doctrine of non-reſiſtance. He

[c] But after all, it ſeems there was no ground for ſuſpecting him of treachery. And as for his being pardoned, it was done, that the earl of Rocheſter might enjoy his eſtate, which could not be without ſparing that lord's life, ſince his eſtate was entailed. See Kennet, p. 432. He anſwered, he could not help it, but he did not believe it, yet he approved the doctrine of the church in all other things. At laſt, he laid his head on the block, which was not ſevered from his body until the fifth ſtroke. Thus died the duke of Monmouth, who had long been the people's idol, and whom James always conſidered as a very formidable rival. Charles II. died very ſeaſonably to free the duke his brother from the uneaſineſs created him by his competitor. But though James had mounted the throne, the duke of Monmouth endangered his crown. Neither the victory at Sedgemore, nor Argyle's defeat in Scotland, could be aſcribed to the valour or conduct of the king, but to mere chance, or rather to the direction of providence, which, for the welfare of England, was pleaſed to uſe proper means to be more plainly diſtinguiſhed.

The king being thus freed from his greateſt fears, gave himſelf over entirely to the paſſion of revenge on thoſe who directly or indirectly had aſſiſted the duke of Monmouth. To that end, the lord chief juſtice Jefferies was ſent with four judges aſſiſtants, into the Weſt, with a ſpecial commiſſion of oyer and terminer to try the late rebels; and major general Kirk was ordered to attend him with a body of troops, to keep the people in awe. It was not poſſible for the king to find in the whole kingdom, two men more deſtitute of religion, honour, and humanity. They were two cruel and mercileſs tygers, that delighted in blood. I ſhall relate here but ſome few of their barbarous actions: for a particular account of all their proceedings would be too great a digreſſion.

At Wincheſter, the widow of lord Liſle[e]; one of king Charles I's judges, was brought before him to be tried. Her crime was the harbouring and concealing Mr. Hickes a Preſbyterian miniſter[f] of the duke of Monmouth's party, though his name was in no proclamation, and one Nelthorp, who was a ſtranger to her. The jury, not ſatisfied with the evidence, brought her in not guilty. But Jefferies in great fury ſent them out again. They found her not guilty three times: but Jefferies threatening them with an attaint of jury, ſhe was brought in guilty, and executed accordingly, being above ſeventy years old[g].

At Dorcheſter, Jefferies, to ſhorten his work, told thirty priſoners, that if they expected any favour, they ſhould plead guilty. But as they did not care to take that courſe, he condemned twenty-nine, who were immediately executed.

In another place, two hundred perſons being indicted, Jefferies poſitively promiſed a pardon to ſuch as ſhould plead guilty, and of the two hundred, he ordered fourſcore to be hanged.

In fine, not to enlarge on ſuch a ſcene of horror, it ſuffices to ſay, that Jefferies condemned five hundred perſons, whereof two hundred and thirty were executed, according to the loweſt computation[h], and their quarters ſet up in the highways. Jefferies himſelf gloried in this barbarity, and boaſted, that he had hanged more men than all the judges of England ſince William the Conqueror. And yet he would have carried his cruelty farther, had not many purchaſed his favour with their eſtates. One Mr. Prideaux[i] alone gave him fourteen thouſand pounds to ſave his life. As for thoſe who had not money enough to buy pardons at his price, they were either hanged, or cruelly whipped, or ſold for ſlaves into the American plantations.

Kirk was not behind Jefferies either in cruelty or inſolence. Immediately after the duke of Monmouth's defeat, being ſent to Taunton, he cauſed nineteen perſons, by his own authority, without any trial or proceſs, and without ſuffering their wives or children to ſpeak with them, to be hanged, with pipes playing, drums beating, and trumpets ſounding. It was this doubtleſs, that made him worthy to be an aſſiſtant to Jefferies.

In the ſame town of Taunton, Kirk having invited his officers to dinner, ordered thirty condemned perſons to be hanged whilſt they were at table, namely, ten in a health to the king, ten in a health to the queen, and ten in a health to Jefferies. But one action he committed in another town is beyond all imagination. A young girl throwing herſelf at his feet to beg her father's[k] life, he drew her in to proſtitute herſelf to him, with the promiſe of granting her requeſt. But having ſatisfied his brutal luſt, he was ſo inhuman, as out of the window, to preſent the credulous girl with the ſight of her father hanging on the ſign-poſt. This ſad ſpectacle ſo affected the poor girl, that ſhe fell diſtracted.

Father Orleans, who writ from the mouth of James II, not being able to deny theſe barbarous executions, endeavours to excuſe them two ways. He ſays firſt, that the king was informed of them too late to prevent them, and that the great ſervices performed by Jefferies and Kirk, prevailed with him to ſpare them[l]. He ſays, in the next place, that the king made amends for theſe injuſtices, as far as lay in his power, by the general pardon he afterwards granted. But it is eaſy to ſee, how vain theſe excuſes are, if it is conſidered, that when Kirk was charged with theſe cruelties, he anſwered, that Jefferies and himſelf acted far ſhort of the king's inſtructions. Again, the king was ſo little diſpleaſed with Jefferies's conduct, that at his deſire he made him lord-chancellor[m], the lord keeper North dying while the chief-juſtice was exerciſing his cruelties in the Weſt. As for the general pardon, it was not publiſhed till ſeveral months after all theſe executions, when there were no more guilty to be found. The court muſt have believed, that very few could have the benefit of the pardon, ſince a company of young girls, from ten to twelve years old, were inſerted by name, who with chaplets of flowers on their heads, had preſented a bible to the duke of Monmouth, at his entry into Taunton.

It was not only in the Weſtern counties that the king gave ſenſible proofs of his revengeful temper. The city of London was witneſs alſo of ſeveral executions in October; among others, of Elizabeth Gaunt, who was publicly burnt for harbouring one of the duke of Monmouth's adherents[n]. Six men were hanged at Tyburn as traitors, for crimes of the like nature, and what is more ſtrange, without any previous trial.

But the execution that made moſt noiſe, was that of alderman Corniſh. This man, who was ſheriff of London at the time of the diſcovery of the popiſh plot, had been very active on that occaſion, which was grown an unpardonable crime in the preſent reign. Corniſh, whoſe name had hardly been mentioned in the rye-plot, not ſuſpecting any thing, and following his profeſſion, was ſeized on Tueſday the 13th of October, and hurried to Newgate without being allowed the uſe of pen, ink, and paper. The next Saturday evening, he had notice that he was indicted of high-treaſon, and that his trial was to be on Monday morning. On the morrow, he ſent a petition to the king for a longer time, alledging, that he did not even know wherein conſiſted the treaſon he was accuſed of. The king referred his petition to the judges, who abſolutely denied his requeſt. He was charged with conſpiring againſt king Charles II, with the Lord Ruſſel, and the reſt who had been executed for that affair, and condemned upon the evidence of the ſame witneſſes, though he ſhewed, in their depoſitions, manifeſt contradictions, and viſible improbabilities. But it was reſolved to revenge the death of thoſe who ſuffered for the popiſh plot, upon ſuch as had been moſt active againſt the papiſts. Corniſh was executed as a traitor, the 23d of October. But the parliament, in the year 1688, reverſed the ſentence, as well as thoſe of ſome others, who had unjuſtly ſuffered in the beginning of this reign.

The laſt that died for the proteſtant plot, was Charles Bateman, a noted ſurgeon, who was accuſed of holding ſeveral ſeditious diſcourſes at that time againſt the government. But many people believed, his chief crime conſiſted in his compaſſion to Titus Oates, having conſtantly attended him after his cruel ſcourgings, and uſed all his ſkill to cure his wounds. This man, who did not expect to be accuſed, grew diſtracted during his impriſonment, and the court was ſo well ſatisfied of it, that his ſon was permitted to make his defence for him. But his condition did not prevent his being condemned and executed.

The king was then in a flouriſhing ſtate. His two greateſt enemies were deſtroyed, and by his revenge upon thoſe that had offended him, as well in his own as in his brother's reign,

And he took pleaſure to relate them in the drawing room to foreign miniſters, and at his table, calling it Jefferies's campaign. The he had ſtruck ſuch a terror into the whole kingdom, that no man dared ſo much as to think of reſiſting him. The whigs were intirely humbled, the tories were triumphant, and the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance was openly preached, as an eſſential article of the faith of the church of England. The king had a parliament, which ſought only to give him marks of their zeal, and ever ready to ſupply him with money for all extraordinary occaſions, without his being obliged to meddle with his revenue. His army greatly contributed to make him feared, and keep the people in awe. Scotland was entirely ſubdued, and the managers of the affairs of that kingdom ſeemed only to mind the enlarging of the prerogative royal. As for Ireland, it will preſently be ſeen, that he had not ſtayed till now to put that kingdom in the ſtate he deſired. In fine, the princes of Europe conſidering him as a monarch able to incline the balance to which ſide he pleaſed, made, as I may ſay, their court to him, either to gain him, or at leaſt to hinder him from turning againſt them.

What therefore did James II want to render his happineſs complete? One thing, which affected him more than all the reſt, but which he could not hope to obtain, without hazarding all his other advantages. This was, to make all his ſubjects papiſts, or at leaſt, to force them to pretend to be ſo. But this was not eaſy to be accompliſhed, by reaſon of the great ſuperiority of the number of the proteſtants in England and Scotland. Nevertheleſs, he attempted it, imagining, that the opportunity was too favourable to be neglected. But as he uſed at firſt very groſs artifices, obvious to all the world, he was obliged to ſupport them with force, and to that end, he was to ſet himſelf above the laws. Theſe two projects, of eſtabliſhing an arbitrary government, and deſtroying the proteſtant religion, were not of a late date. Every one knew they had long been in hand. But the Engliſh did not expect, the king would violate his repeated promiſes to ſupport and defend the religion eſtabliſhed by law: Nay, ſome were ſo ſtrangely blind, as to think it impoſſible for the king to break his word. But they were afterwards too ſenſible of their error. All the reſt of this reign conſiſts only in the means uſed by the king to execute this deſign, and in the meaſures taken by the Engliſh at laſt to ſtop his career. I muſt begin with the firſt of theſe points, before I proceed to the ſecond.

Many things ſhould have diverted the king from forming ſuch a project. Firſt, the difficulty of the execution, which might have been eaſily foreſeen. For if it is conſidered, that the papiſts of England are not the thouſandth part of the nation, it muſt be thought ſtrange, that with this thouſandth part it is attempted to compel the reſt to change their religion. I ſay compel, for what likelihood is there that, without compulſion, a whole nation may be perſuaded to quit their religion and embrace another, for which they have the utmoſt abhorrence? It will, perhaps, be ſaid, that James had almoſt accompliſhed it, and that without a foreign aid, the Engliſh would have been forced to ſubmit to the yoke. But the inconſiderableneſs of this aid demonſtrates, he was yet very far from his ends.

Secondly, As to the abſolute power, which muſt have been eſtabliſhed, in order to introduce a religion contrary to that of the whole kingdom, he was much miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that France would lend him a powerful aid for that purpoſe. For it was not the intereſt of Lewis XIV, to render the king of England abſolute, but only to raiſe commotions in that kingdom, which, by keeping England employed, ſhould facilitate the execution of his ambitious deſigns.

Thirdly, If the examples of Edward II, and Richard II, as too remote from his time, made no impreſſion upon him, he ſhould have conſidered that of the king his father, who, for endeavouring to ſtretch the prerogative royal, and for being only ſuſpected of intending to introduce popery, loſt his head on the ſcaffold. It has been ſeen, that Charles I, in the time of his afflictions, writ to the prince his eldeſt ſon, to take warning by him, not to aſſume more power than belonged to him. Moreover, when he was brought on the ſcaffold, he took off his George, and gave it to Dr. Juxon, ſaying, "Remember." The council of ſtate being willing to know the meaning of that expreſſion, Juxon anſwered, "That the king immediately before his coming out to the place of execution, had charged him to carry to the prince his George, with theſe his two laſt commands, That he ſhould forgive his murderers; and, If ever he came to the crown, he ſhould ſo govern, as not to force them upon extremities." The queen dowager, as ſhe was going into Somerſet-houſe, after the reſtoration of Charles II, ſaid, "Had I known the Engliſh ſome years ſince, as well as I do now, I ſhould never have been forced to leave this palace." In fine, Charles II, when at the point of death, told the duke his brother, "not to think of introducing the Roman-catholic religion into England, it being a dangerous and impracticable thing." Theſe warnings, which could not be ſuſpected by the king, ought to have made him ſeriouſly conſider what he was going to do.

Fourthly, don Pedro Ronquillo, the Spaniſh embaſſador, at his firſt audience after the king's acceſſion to the crown, told him, "That he ſaw ſeveral prieſts about him, who would importune him to alter the eſtabliſhed religion; but wiſhed his majeſty not to hearken to their advice, for if he did, he would have reaſon to repent of it when it was too late." The king taking ill the embaſſador's freedom, aſked him in a paſſion, "Whether, in Spain, the king adviſed with his confeſſors? Yes, Sir, replied don Pedro, and that is the reaſon our affairs go ſo ill."

Fifthly, pope Innocent XI, in a letter to the king upon his coming to the crown, told him, "That he was highly pleaſed with his zeal for the catholic religion: but was afraid he would carry it too far, and inſtead of contributing to his own greatneſs, and the advancement of religion, he would do both himſelf and the catholic church the greateſt prejudice, by attempting that which could never ſucceed."

Laſtly, It was manifeſt, that the king could hope to ſucceed in his undertaking only by force, and that this force wholly lay in his army and fleet. But was it not a ſtrange project, to attempt to reduce by force a proteſtant kingdom to the catholic religion, with a proteſtant army, and a fleet whoſe commanders and mariners were proteſtants? He had but too much reaſon to perceive his error, when it was too late to correct it.

Theſe conſiderations, examples, and warnings, were ineffectual againſt the impetuous zeal of the king, and the importunities of thoſe who were admitted to his ſecret counſels, and particularly the queen. He attempted at once two things equally difficult, namely, to ſet himſelf above the laws, and to alter the eſtabliſhed religion. When I ſay he attempted it, I mean, openly and bare-faced, for it was no new deſign. He had formed it long ſince, and, not to carry back the beginning of it too far, it ſuffices to obſerve, that the execution of it had been privately labouring about twenty years; and that moreover, James did but purſue the ſcheme he had perhaps himſelf framed, when duke of York. It was not therefore the duke of Monmouth's defeat that inſpired James II with the thoughts of becoming abſolute, and altering the eſtabliſhed religion. His good fortune to conquer that rival, ſerved only to put him upon haſtening the execution of his projects. This evidently appears, when it is conſidered, what paſſed in Ireland ſince the beginning of his reign.

About two months after the king's acceſſion to the crown, he recalled the duke of Ormond from Ireland, and appointed two lords juſtices to govern that kingdom [o]. The duke of Ormond was not a proper inſtrument for the king's purpoſes. At the ſame time, the privy council of Ireland was diſſolved, and a new one appointed, into which were admitted ſeveral known papiſts. Soon after, their number was ſo increaſed, that they made the major part of the council, ſo that the proteſtants no longer aſſiſted, that they might not authorize by their preſence, ſuch reſolutions as it was in vain to oppoſe. When the council was thus modelled, nothing was heard in Ireland, but impeachments againſt the proteſtants, for being concerned in the Rye-plot, and afterwards for holding correſpondence with the duke of Monmouth, or his adherents. The moment any perſon was accuſed, he was ſent to priſon by the council, without being admitted to bail, or brought to a trial. The earl of Granard, one of the lords juſtices, and a good proteſtant, weary of being an inſtrument to thoſe acts of injuſtice, deſired to be diſmiſſed. But the king denied him, and ſent him a letter under his own hand, aſſuring him, "that nothing ſhould be acted prejudicial to the proteſtant intereſt." But it ſoon appeared, that the king never meant to perform this promiſe. For very ſhortly after, he reſolved to have a ſtanding army of papiſts in Ireland, and to diſarm the proteſtants. This laſt article was firſt put in practice. The king writ to the lords-juſtices, "That there was reaſon to believe, that the rebellion of Monmouth had been of that ſpreading contagion, as to reach Ireland, and therefore it was not ſafe to have the arms of the militia diſperſed abroad; but they would be in greater readineſs for the uſe of the militia, and the defence of the country, to have them depoſited in the ſeveral ſtores of each county." Upon this order, the lords-juſtices publiſhed a proclamation, agreeable to the king's desire, and the city of Dublin having brought in their arms, their example was followed by all the country.

The protestants being thus disarmed, means were devised to turn the protestant, into a catholic army. For that purpose, colonel Richard Talbot, a violent papist, was impowered to cashier such officers and soldiers as he thought fit. He was the man of all others most odious to the English protestants in Ireland. It is observable, that Titus Oates in his narrative of the popish plot, named him as designed for this very service. So, when the event was seen to agree so well with what Oates had related, many could not help thinking either that he had been well informed, or was a good prophet.

Talbot having received this commission, broke many officers, on pretence that they had borne arms against the king during the troubles, or were sons and relations of those who had served the parliament of Cromwell. It must be observed, that all this passed in Ireland, before or immediately after the duke of Monmouth's defeat, at a time when the king had not yet manifested his designs in England. That I may not be obliged frequently to return to what was transacting in Ireland, I shall briefly add here, that about the end of the year, Talbot came into England, and was made earl of Tyrconnel, and lieutenant-general of the Irish army; and shortly after, Henry earl of Clarendon was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

The parliament of England, after several adjournments, meeting at last on the 9th of November, the king made the following speech to both houses.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"AFTER the storm that seemed to be coming upon us when we parted last, I am glad to meet you all again in so great peace and quietness; God Almighty be praised, by whose blessing that rebellion was suppressed; but when I reflect what an inconsiderable number of men began it, and how long they carried it on without any opposition, I hope every body will be convinced, that the militia, which hath hitherto been so much depended on, is not sufficient for such occasions; and that there is nothing but a good force of well-disciplined troops in constant pay, that can defend us from such as, either at home or abroad, are disposed to disturb us. And in truth, my concern for the peace and quiet of my subjects, as well as for the safety of the government, made me think it necessary to increase the number to the proportion I have done; this I owed as well to the honour, as to the security of the nation, whose reputation was so infinitely exposed to all our neighbours, by having lain open to this late wretched attempt, that it is not to be repaired without keeping such a body of men on foot, that none may ever have the thought again of finding us so miserably unprovided. It is for the support of this great charge, which is now more than double to what it was[p], that I ask your assistance, in giving me a supply answerable to the expence it brings along with it; and I cannot doubt, but what I have begun, so much for the honour and defence of the government, will be continued by you with all the chearfulness and readiness, that is requisite for a work of so great importance.

"Let no man take exception, that there are some officers in the army not qualified, according to the late tests, for their employments: the gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them well known to me; and having formerly served me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their practice, I think them fit now to be employed under me; and I will deal plainly with you, that after having had the benefit of their services in such time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them, if there should be another rebellion to make them necessary to me. I am afraid some men may be so wicked to hope and expect, that a difference may happen between you and me upon this occasion: but when you consider, what advantages have risen to us in a few months, by the good understanding we have hitherto had; what wonderful effects it hath already produced in the change of the whole scene of affairs abroad, so much more to the honour of the nation, and the figure it ought to make in the world; and that nothing can hinder a further progress in this way to all our satisfactions, but fears and jealousies amongst ourselves; I will not apprehend that such a misfortune can befal us, as a division, or but a coldness between me and you; nor that any thing can shake you in your steadiness and loyalty to me, who, by God's blessing, will ever make you all returns of kindness and protection, with a resolution to venture even my own life in the defence of the true interest of this kingdom."

This speech equally surprised both houses of parliament, and the whole kingdom, when it came to be published. The English had often ventured their lives in the defence of their laws and liberties, of which they then believed themselves secure, as well by the constitution of the government, as by the king's solemn promise, but they beheld their laws openly attacked in the most sensible part. Many of those who had most warmly opposed the exclusion-bill, began to open their eyes, and perceive, that the jealousies and fears of the whig parliaments were too well grounded, and that it was difficult to reconcile the interests of a Roman catholic king, with those of a protestant kingdom. This was what the whigs had in vain declared in the late reign. Instead of duly weighing their reasons, the tories had run into the other extreme, nay, had expected to be gainers by setting the duke of York on the throne. But this first public step of the king, made them proceed for the future with a little more caution, though by their principles they were not yet obliged to take such measures as would have been necessary.

It was warmly debated in the house of lords, whether they should give the king thanks for his speech. Some were utterly against it; whereupon the marquis of Hallifax said, "They had now more reason than ever to give thanks to his majesty, since he had dealt so plainly with them, and discovered what he would be at." Nevertheless, it was resolved by the majority, that the king should be thanked. But, however, the bishop of London moved, that his majesty's speech might be debated; and, though it was unusual in the house, the 23d of the month was appointed to take the speech into consideration, with which the king was highly displeased.

When the commons were returned to their house, the king's speech was ordered to be read, which was followed by a long and profound silence. At last, the earl of Middleton moved for an address of thanks to the king for his speech. This motion produced a second silence, which was broke by the lord Castleton, who, more bold than the rest, plainly declared against thanking the king. Wherefore, as there would probably be some difficulty in the matter, the debate was adjourned till the 12th of the month. To give the reader a clear notion of the difficulties which occurred in the king's demand, I shall make here some observations which perhaps will not be foreign to the purpose.

The house of commons, as I said, consisted then of tory members, there being very few whigs, or, if any, their number was not considerable. Now the tories had a very different notion of the regal power from that of the whigs. They had, as we have seen, declared in the late reign for passive-obedience and non-resistance, and the church made it an article of faith. Nevertheless it may be said, when they introduced this doctrine without any limitation, they did not foresee all the consequences. It was properly to contradict the principles of the whigs, who ran into the other extreme. As they imagined that Charles II. and James II. were for them, they fancied they could not stretch the royal prerogative too much, in the belief, that these two princes would exert it only against their adversaries. According to this principle, king James's demand for a standing army of fifteen thousand men in time of peace, did not seem contrary to their interest, though the parliaments had ever been extremely averse to a standing army, which served only to increase the regal power. But what the king did by his sole authority, in employing popish officers in this army, was a thing as much against the tory as the whig interest. It was easy to perceive, of what dangerous consequences it might be to the protestant religion in general, as well Episcopalian as presbyterian; and these consequences were the more to be dreaded, as what passed in Ireland plainly discovered the king's intentions. Besides, the power assumed by the king, to exempt the popish officers from taking the test, was directly contrary to the liberties of the kingdom as well as to religion.

When therefore the king's speech was debated the 12th of November, in the house of commons, such members as were not of the same principles with the rigid and violent tories, spoke with great freedom, representing the inconveniences of a standing army in time of peace,[q], and moved for new modelling the militia, ſo as to render them of uſe upon occaſion. They were ſuffered to talk as much as they pleaſed, but when the queſtion was put for a ſupply to be given to the king, it was carried in the affirmative. It is true, ſome one having moved that theſe words might be added, "towards the ſupport of the additional forces," they were rejected, that the houſe might not appear to approve of the augmentation of the regular troops, and inſtead thereof it paſſed, "the houſe be moved to bring in a bill to make the militia uſeful." By this they would have had it believed, that the parliament reſerved to themſelves the power of breaking the regular troops, and eſtabliſhing a good militia in their room. But, doubtleſs, it was to hinder the people from being alarmed, if they ſaw the parliament approve of maintaining an army in time of peace. For, after all, a ſupply was given the king for the maintenance of this army.

On the other hand, the contrary party alledged, "That there was a bitter spirit in the three last parliaments, not yet well allayed, and to consider-

As to the ſum which was to be granted, the courtiers moved for twelve hundred thouſand pounds. Others exclaimed againſt the exorbitancy of ſuch a ſum, and were for reducing it to four hundred thouſand pounds, alledging, that it would be enough to maintain the additional forces two years, till the militia ſhould be made uſeful. They repreſented, that they had already given cuſtoms and exciſes for his majeſty's life, which amounted to ſix millions[r], and that if they gave ſo much at once, they ſhould have nothing left to give; eſpecially as it was the nation's intereſt, that the king ſhould have frequent occaſion for his parliament. At laſt, after great debates, it was reſolved, that a ſupply of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds ſhall be granted to the king. It was evident therefore, that the maintenance of an army of fifteen thouſand men was not what moſt diſpleaſed the commons in the king's ſpeech.

But the affair of the popiſh officers was of ſuch a nature, that it concerned the tory no leſs than than the whig party. It was eaſy to ſee the great danger of the proteſtant religion, if the parliament, after having agreed to a ſtanding army, ſhould farther conſent to the king's employing as many papiſts as he pleaſed. The commons thought therefore, that on this occaſion it was neceſſary to ſet ſome bounds to paſſive-obedience, though till now this doctrine had been maintained without any reſtriction, becauſe it was not imagined, that the king would attack religion and the laws. One of the members ſpeaking on this ſubject, repreſented very ſtrongly, "That his majeſty, on his firſt acceſſion to the crown, told them, 'He had been miſrepreſented, and that he would preſerve the government in the church and ſtate, now eſtabliſhed by law, and maintain them in all their juſt rights and privileges:' That, overjoyed at this, they ran haſtily to him, and were ſo forward to give, that the king's miniſters put their ſtop to it: that they ought not to forget, that there was a bill of excluſion debated in that houſe; and that the arguments for it were, 'That they ſhould, in caſe of a popiſh ſucceſſor, have a popiſh army:' That they ſaw the act of the teſt already broken; but prayed them to remember what the late lord chancellor told them when king Charles paſſed that act: 'By this act, ſaid he, you are provided againſt popery, that no papiſt can poſſibly creep into any employment:' That he was greatly afflicted at the breach of their liberties, and ſeeing ſo great a difference between his laſt ſpeech, and thoſe heretofore made, he could not believe but this was made by ſome other advice: that what the king ſtruck at there was their all; and that he wondered there had been any men ſo deſperate, as to take any employment without being qualified for it: and concluded to have a ſtanding army voted deſtructive to the country." During theſe debates the court party were not idle. They repreſented very ſtrongly, the inconveniencies of not complying with the king's deſires. The reſult was, the appointing a committee to draw up the following addreſs, which was preſented to the king the 17th of November.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt loyal and faithful ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, do, in the firſt place, as in duty bound, return your majeſty our moſt humble and hearty thanks, for your great care and conduct in ſuppreſſing the late rebellion, which threatened the overthrow of this government both in church and ſtate, to the extirpation of our religion as by law eſtabliſhed, which is moſt dear unto us, and which your majeſty has been pleaſed to give us REPEATED ASSURANCES you will always defend and maintain; which, with all grateful hearts we ſhall ever acknowledge. We further crave leave to acquaint your majeſty, that we have, with all duty and readineſs, taken into our conſideration your majeſty's gracious ſpeech to us: and as to that part of it relating to the officers in the army, not qualified for their employments, according to an act of parliament made in the 25th year of the reign of your royal brother, entitled, 'An act for preventing dangers which may happen to popiſh recuſants;' we do, out of our bounden duty, humbly repreſent unto your majeſty, that theſe officers cannot by law be capable of their employments; and that the incapacities they bring upon themſelves that way, can no way be taken off but by an act of parliament: therefore, out of that great reverence and duty we owe unto your majeſty, who have been graciouſly pleaſed to take notice of their ſervices to your majeſty, we are preparing a bill to paſs both houſes, for your royal aſſent, to indemnify them from the penalties they have now incurred: and becauſe the continuing them in their employments, may be taken to be a diſpenſing with that law, without an act of parliament, the conſequences of which is of the greateſt concern to the rights of your majeſty's ſubjects, and to all the laws made for the ſecurity of their religion. We therefore, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, of your majeſty's houſe of commons, do moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, that you would be moſt graciouſly pleaſed to give ſuch directions therein, that no apprehenſions or jealouſies may remain in the hearts of your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects."

This addreſs being preſented to the king by the ſpeaker, attended by the whole houſe, his majeſty gave them this anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I Did not expect ſuch an addreſs from the houſe of commons: for having ſo lately recommended to your conſideration the great advantage a good underſtanding between us had produced in a very ſhort time, and given you warning of fears and jealouſies amongſt ourſelves; I had reaſon to hope, that the reputation God had bleſſed me with in the world, would have ſealed and confirmed a good confidence in you of me, and of all that I ſay to you. But however you proceed on your part, I will be ſteady in all my promiſes I have made you, and be juſt in my word in this, and in all my other ſpeeches."

This anſwer, though pretty obſcure, ſo ſurprized the commons, that when it was read in the houſe, they kept a profound ſilence for a conſiderable time. At laſt it was moved by one of the members, that a particular day might be appointed to conſider of the king's anſwer. This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Coke, burgeſs for Derby, who added, "He hoped they were all true Engliſhmen, and not to be frighted out of their duty by a few hard words." Though this ſpeech was very conſiſtent with the freedom of a houſe of commons, the majority, however, were pleaſed to look upon Mr. Coke as an incendiary, who intended to ſow diſcord between the king and the commons, and voted him to be ſent to the Tower. Moreover, the houſe, to make amends in ſome meaſure for the offence they had given the king, proceeded to ways and means towards raiſing the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds before voted. But they ſtopped not there. To ſhew the king that they ſought all poſſible ways to content him, beſides a bill to indemnify the popiſh officers from the penalties they had already incurred, they reſolved to offer another to the king, to qualify ſuch a number of thoſe officers to ſerve in the army as he ſhould think fit. All this demonſtrates, it was with regret that the houſe ſwerved from the principle of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance.

In the mean time, the lords received petitions from Thomas Grey, earl of Stanford, and Henry Booth, lord Delamere, repreſenting, that theſe two peers were committed to the Tower in July laſt, upon a general accuſation of treaſon, kept cloſe priſoners, and denied the uſe of pen, ink, and paper. Theſe petitions obliged the lords to ſend to the king, to know the reaſon why theſe two peers were impriſoned. The king anſwered by the lord chancellor, that they were committed for high treaſon, and that he had given orders for a commiſſion of oyer and terminer to try the lord Delamere in Cheſhire, where the crime was committed. But as he had given no orders about the earl of Stanford's trial, the lords appointed him to be tried by his peers, to which the king conſented.

This

Within a few days, on the 20th of November, the king finding it would be very difficult to obtain his deſires of the commons concerning the popiſh officers, prorogued the parliament till the 10th of February, after a ſeſſion but of eleven days. The king loſt, by the prorogation, the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds voted by the commons. But he did not want it, conſidering the vaſt ſums they had liberally granted him. This prorogation, which was followed by ſeveral others, and at length by the diſſolution of the parliament, the laſt in this reign, is a clear demonſtration of two things. Firſt, that the king conſidered the affair of the popiſh officers in the army, as of great moment, ſince he choſe rather to loſe ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, than ſee his pretended right to employ them conteſted by the parliament. The ſecond is, the exceſſive compliance ſhewn the king by the commons, in enabling him to maintain an army, employ popiſh officers, and, in a word, to have no occaſion for a parliament. For from hence ſprung all the evils which afflicted England during the reſt of this reign.

About a month after the prorogation of the parliament, the lord Delamere was brought to his trial by his peers, though the king had before reſolved to have him proceeded againſt in another manner. The lord Howard was the firſt witneſs produced againſt him. But though he gave a large account of the duke of Monmouth's conſpiracy, he depoſed nothing poſitive againſt the lord Delamere. The ſecond witneſs was Ford lord Grey, at which every one was ſurprized, it not being known that he was pardoned. This gave occaſion to think he was in great favour with the king. But his evidence tended more to prove in general the duke of Monmouth's rebellion, than the guilt of the priſoner in particular. One Saxon was the only witneſs that ſwore to the lord Delamere's correſpondence with the duke of Monmouth. But as he was a perſon of very bad reputation, the lords took no notice of his evidence, and the priſoner was unanimouſly acquitted.

As for the earl of Stanford he was admitted to bail, and though nothing could be proved againſt him, he thought fit to lay hold on the proclamation of pardon which was publiſhed ſhortly after. This pardon appeared not till the end of the year, after the executions of a great number of perſons. It was moreover clogged with ſo many exceptions, that the king was not much thanked for it.

James, in this firſt year of his reign, beſtowed honours and dignities upon ſeveral of his favourites and adherents, and advanced others to high offices. Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington, dying July 28, his place of lord chamberlain was given to John Sheffield, earl of Mulgrave, who became one of the chief favourites in this reign. Laurence Hyde, earl of Rocheſter, was made lord treaſurer, and Henry, earl of Clarendon, his elder brother, lord lieutenant of Ireland. Robert Spencer, earl of Sunderland, principal ſecretary of ſtate, was declared lord preſident of the council, and from that time became prime miniſter of ſtate.

The perſon moſt known abroad, that died this year, was Sir John Marſham, eminent for his great ſkill in ancient hiſtory and chronology. He departed this life in the eighty third year of his age [s].

[1686.] The year 1686, to which we are now to proceed, was wholly ſpent, as well as the next, in the execution of the king's two grand projects, namely of making himſelf abſolute and eſtabliſhing popery. Theſe two projects could not but keep equal pace. For the king being a papiſt, his chief aim in rendering himſelf abſolute was to alter the religion of the kingdom, and, on the other ſide, he could not introduce popery, but by ſetting himſelf above the laws.

Before things were carried any farther in England, he believed it proper to be aſſured firſt of Scotland and Ireland. As for Scotland, the managers there were entirely diſpoſed to comply with the king's will. The late parliament, beſides the acts before-mentioned, paſſed one [t] wherein it was declared, "That they owe all their bleſſings to the ſacred race of their glorious kings, and to the ſolid, abſolute authority wherewith they were inveſted by the firſt and fundamental laws of their monarchy:——And therefore they again declare to the world, That they abhor and deteſt not only the authors and actors of all preceding rebellions againſt their ſovereign, but alſo all principles and poſitions which are contrary or derogatory to the king's ſacred, ſupreme, ſovereign, abſolute power and authority, which none, whether particular perſons or collective bodies, can participate of any manner of way, or upon any pretext, but in dependence on him, and by commiſſion from him, &c." They paſſed another act, "To confirm and approve whatever had been done by his majeſty's privy council, juſtice-court, and thoſe commiſſionated by them, in baniſhing, impriſoning, or fining ſuch as refuſed to take and ſwear the oath of allegiance; and to aſſert the royal prerogatives in the utmoſt extent of them."

If what paſſed in Scotland in the reign of Charles I, and during the interregnum, be remembered, it will be eaſily perceived, this was not the general ſenſe of the Scots, but only the opinion of a parliament devoted to the king, and which viſibly abuſed their authority, to eſtabliſh a form of government directly contrary to the old conſtitution.

Encouraged by theſe great advantages, the king ſummoned the parliament of Scotland, to aſſemble the 29th of April this year, and wrote a letter to them, wherein "He recommends to their ſpecial care, his innocent Roman catholic ſubjects, who had always been aſſiſtant to the crown in the worſt of rebellions and uſurpations, though they lay under diſcouragements hardly to be named. Theſe he moſt heartily recommended to them, to the end, that as they had given good experience of their true loyalty and peaceable behaviour, ſo, by their aſſiſtance, they might have the protection of his laws, not ſuffering them to lie under obligations, which their religion could not admit of; by doing of which, they would give a demonſtration of their duty and affection towards him, and do him moſt acceptable ſervice. And this love he expected they would ſhew to their brethren, as they ſaw him an indulgent father to his people."

The earl of Murray, lord high commiſſioner, ſeconded this letter, with a particular account of the many advantages the king intended to procure his realm of Scotland, chiefly with reſpect to trade. He alſo endeavoured to perſuade them, that what the king deſired, tended as much to the honour and welfare of his ſubjects of Scotland, as to his own ſatisfaction. He concluded with ſaying, "By this you will ſhew yourſelves the beſt and moſt affectionate ſubjects, to the beſt, the incomparable, and moſt heroic prince in the world."

When the king's letter, and the lord commiſſioner's ſpeech came to be conſidered in the parliament, ſome members, without looking farther, were for complying with the king's deſires. But others, in greater numbers, moved and prevailed to have a committee appointed, to examine the ſtatutes againſt the papiſts. The committee finding the ſtatutes prohibited only the public exerciſe of the popiſh religion, drew up a bill to allow them the exerciſe of their religion in private. But when this bill was preſented to the parliament, it met with ſo much oppoſition, that the lord commiſſioner thought fit to adjourn the debate to another time, till he had received inſtructions from court. The king ſent him orders to diſſolve, or at leaſt prorogue the parliament, and ſome months after, by his ſole authority, he eſtabliſhed liberty of conſcience in Scotland.

Affairs in Ireland were upon another footing. The king's will met with no oppoſition there, and though the lord lieutenant was a proteſtant, his credit and authority were inſufficient to put a ſtop to the acts of injuſtice committed againſt thoſe of his religion. The new earl of Tyrconnel was no ſooner returned to Dublin, with the title of lieutenant-general of the army, but he began again to break the proteſtant officers and ſoldiers, and put Roman catholics in their places, without vouchſafing to aſk for the lord-lieutenant's order [u]. This bred a quarrel between them, wherein Tyrconnel behaved very haughtily, ever ſaying, he did nothing but by the king's expreſs order. When he had modelled the army according to the king's mind, he went over into England, where, by means of the queen, and father Petre the jeſuit, he ſupplanted the earl of Clarendon, and was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Upon his arrival at Dublin, he endeavoured by a proclamation to diſpel the fears of the proteſtants, who ſaw themſelves, to their great trouble, in ſubjection to a catholic. But his actions correſponded not with his promiſes. Wherefore, a great number of proteſtants choſe rather to quit their eſtates in Ireland, and withdraw into England, than remain under the government of one ſo juſtly odious to them. On the other hand, the Engliſh merchants who traded in Ireland, withdrew their effects, and by that the kingdom was reduced to great extremities. But all theſe diſadvantages were compenſated by the hopes of rooting out the proteſtant religion in that country.

But it was chiefly in England that the king deſired to eſtabliſh popery and arbitrary power. For, as I ſaid, one of thoſe things could not advance without the other. If he had only aimed at abſolute power, without meddling with religion, in all appearance, he would have eaſily ſucceeded, ſince paſſive-obedience was in a manner eſtabliſhed, and now reckoned an eſſential doctrine of the church of England, the members whereof made the body of the nation, and were poſſeſſed of all the offices and places of truſt. But as he had already diſcovered, that if he wiſhed to be freed from the yoke of the laws, it was chiefly to eſtabliſh his religion; the parliament, however devoted to him in all other reſpects, had not been ſo compliant as to abandon the intereſt of religion: notwithſtanding this, he hoped to attain his ends; firſt, by cauſing the judges to give it as their opinion, that he had a power to diſpenſe with the laws. Secondly, by gaining the members of parliament by degrees, being reſolved to have no ſeſſion till he had accompliſhed that deſign. In England, as in other places, there are men always ready to ſacrifice the public, to their private intereſt, and there were but too many, on the preſent occaſion, even among the clergy themſelves. Dr. Cartwright, dean of Rippon, ſpeaking, in a ſermon, of the king's promiſes made to the parliament, which were then the common topic of diſcourſe and complaint, ſaid, "That the king's promiſes "were free donatives, and ought not to be too ſtrictly exa- "mined or urged; and that they muſt leave his majeſty to "explain his own meaning in them." The king was ſo delighted with this gloſs, that he rewarded the author with the biſhopric of Cheſter, as an encouragement to other clergymen to follow ſo good an example.

As for the judges, the king took care to ſend for them one by one, and talk with them privately in his cloſet [e], in order to perſuade them to declare for his diſpenſing power, telling them, he would have twelve judges of his opinion [f]. Four abſolutely refuſed to comply, and were immediately diſplaced. The king appointed four others of more pliable and ſubmiſſive underſtandings, among whom there was one papiſt [g].

At the ſame time, the king made a call of ſerjeants at law, among whom were ſeveral Catholics, one of whom was knighted [h], and a little after, another lawyer of the ſame religion was made a judge [i].

The privy-council alſo underwent the like alteration, the king having received into it five zealous Catholics, namely, the earl of Powis, the lord Arundel of Wardour, and the lord Bellaſis, (who had been long confined in the Tower, being accuſed of the Popiſh plot) Henry Jermyn, lord Dover, and the earl of Tyrconnel. He likewiſe admitted the new biſhop of Cheſter, and Dr. Parker biſhop of Oxford, a reputed Papiſt. All theſe changes clearly diſcovered the king's intentions.

But it was not long before he gave more ſignal marks of them. It has been remembered, that he aſſumed a power to diſpenſe with the obſervation of the teſt-act in his Catholic officers. The parliament's refuſal of their conſent to this innovation, only exaſperated the king, and made him reſolve to exempt from the penal laws all his ſubjects in general, and conſequently the Papiſts. But as this was directly againſt law, he undertook to ſhew, by the means of his corrupt judges, "That a power in the king to diſpenſe with law, was law." For that purpoſe he took care firſt to have papers diſperſed through the kingdom, to prove this pretended right, and to prepare the people for his deſigns [k]. At laſt in a particular caſe [l], all the judges, except one, gave their opinions for the king, and made it a general rule in law: 1. That the laws of England are the king's laws. 2. That therefore it is an incident, inſeparable prerogative of the kings of England, as of all other ſovereign princes, to diſpenſe with all penal laws, in particular caſes, and upon particular neceſſary reaſons. 3. That of theſe reaſons and neceſſities the king is the ſole judge: conſequently, 4. That this is not a truſt inveſted in and granted to the king, but the ancient remains of the ſovereign power of the kings of England, which never was yet taken from them, nor can be.

In conſequence of this deciſion, the Papiſts, with the king's permiſſion, ſet up every where in the kingdom, the free and open exerciſe of their religion. The Jeſuits erected colleges and ſeminaries in all the conſiderable towns; and at the ſame time, four Popiſh biſhops were publicly conſecrated in the king's chapel, and ſent down to exerciſe their functions in their reſpective dioceſes; under the title of vicars apoſtolical. Their paſtoral letters addreſſed to the lay-Catholics, were printed at the king's printing-houſe, and diſperſed through the kingdom. Monks appeared in the habits of their order at Whitehall and St. James's, and ſcrupled not to tell the Proteſtants, "That they hoped in a little time, to walk "in proceſſion through Cheapſide." And as many converts were expected, that ſo plentiful a harveſt may not want labourers, a great number of prieſts and monks were ſent from foreign parts. From this time, the only way to preferment was to be a Papiſt, or a promoter of Popery. All affairs of the council were managed by Catholics, or ſome others who had but little regard to religion. Thus, by the deciſion of ten or twelve judges, nominated and corrupted by the king before their admiſſion, the laws of England were given up, and the conſtitution entirely altered. By a like practice it was, that Charles I. cauſed his judges to decide, that he had a right to impoſe taxes in caſes of neceſſity, of which neceſſity himſelf was ſole judge. Hence it may be perceived, that the laws of England would be ill ſupported, had they no firmer foundation than the deciſions of judges appointed by the king. But it is ſurprizing, that the precedent of ſhip-money, eſtabliſhed by Charles I, and in effect, the principal cauſe of his ruin, made ſo little impreſſion on James II. But the violence of his zeal for his religion, made every thing eaſy or poſſible to him, and, at all events, he was reſolved to run the riſk of the undertaking.

The king uſed another expedient for the advancement of his religion. He ſent a circular letter to the biſhops, with an order, prohibiting all the inferior clergy from preaching upon controverted points of divinity, for fear, as was pretended, of raiſing animoſities among the people. It was thus that the perſecution began in Queen Mary's reign, and it ought not to ſeem ſtrange, that a popiſh king ſhould imitate ſo zealous a popiſh queen. But on this occaſion, the clergy of the church of England clearly diſcovered their averſion to popery, of which they had hitherto ſtood accuſed by their enemies, on pretence of a ſcrupulous attachment to ſome modes and ceremonies, which the firſt reformers had not thought fit to retrench. For many of the dignified clergy, and the moſt diſtinguiſhed for their piety and learning, far from prevaricating in the diſcharge of their office, preached openly on controverted points, or rather made them the chief ſubject of their diſcourſes. They ſaw the tendency of this extraordinary inhibition, at a time when the proteſtant religion was openly attacked, as well in ſermons, as writings printed with licence, and induſtriouſly diſperſed through the nation. It is juſtice to do honour to theſe faithful miniſters of the goſpel, by tranſmitting to poſterity the names of the moſt diſtinguiſhed amongſt them. Theſe were Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Tenniſon, Wake, Patrick, Sharp, Sherlock, all famous for their writings, and all afterwards promoted to the firſt dignities of the church.

The king and his popiſh council were extremely offended with this boldneſs, and therefore, to force the proteſtant clergy to ſubmiſſion, the king erected a new court for eccleſiaſtical affairs, compoſed of various members, among whom were ſeveral catholics. A nomination of Papiſts to be judges of a proteſtant clergy in matters of doctrine and diſcipline, ſhewed that the king would no longer keep any meaſures. Among theſe commiſſioners were three biſhops, namely, William Sancroft of Canterbury, Crew of Durham, and Sprat of Rocheſter. The reſt were all laymen, of which the principal were Jefferies lord chancellor, the earl of Rocheſter lord treaſurer, the earl of Sunderland ſecretary of ſtate and preſident of the council, and the lord chief juſtice Herbert. The commiſſion was directed to any three of them, whereof the lord chancellor was always to be one, for a reaſon very obvious.

By this commiſſion they had a power to exerciſe and execute all manner of juriſdictions and pre-eminences, concerning any ſpiritual or eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions; to viſit, reform, redreſs, and amend all abuſes, offences, contempts, and

He not not only talked with his judges in this manner, but with many parliamentmen, about the affair of the teſt, ſome whereof gave him very flat and hardy denials; others, though more ſilent, yet were no leſs ſteady. So finding he could not bring the majority to a compliance, he diſſolved the parliament: of whom, Burnet ſays, in all England it would not have been eaſy to have found five hundred men ſo weak, ſo poor, and ſo devoted to the court. So happily was the nation taken out of their hands by this precipitated violence of a bigotted court. Burnet, p. 668.

enormities whatſoever, which by the ſpiritual or occleſiaſtical laws of the realm might be lawfully corrected. They were alſo to enquire of all offences, contempts and miſdemeanors committed, or hereafter to be committed; that they might be corrected and puniſhed by the cenſure of the church; they were to ſearch for, and call before them all eccleſiaſtical perſons of what degree or dignity ſoever, and to puniſh the offenders, by excommunications, ſuſpenſions, deprivations, or other eccleſiaſtical cenſures: they were empowered to ſend for all ſtatutes, rules, letters-patent of univerſities, colleges, grammar-ſchools, and all other eccleſiaſtical corporations, and the ſaid ſtatutes to correct, amend, and alter as they ſaw convenient, &c.

Many of the beſt lawyers thought this commiſſion illegal, and contrary to the act paſſed in the 17th year of Charles I, for aboliſhing the High-commiſſion-court. Others pretended, there was nothing in it contrary to that act. It ſeems however, that the court was conſcious of its illegality, ſince tho' it was granted in April, it was not opened till Auguſt. Beſides, the archbiſhop would never act in it.

Shortly after, Dr. Sharp, in a ſermon, vindicated the church of England in oppoſition to the errors of popery. The king being informed of it, pretended, that the preacher's intention was to beget an evil opinion of him and his government in the minds of the hearers, and to lead them into diſobedience and rebellion. On this ſuppoſition he ſent a letter to Henry Compton biſhop of London, commanding him forthwith to ſuſpend Dr. Sharp from farther preaching in any pariſh-church or chapel in his dioceſe, till he had given him ſatisfaction, and his farther pleaſure was known therein. On receipt of this order, the biſhop wrote to the earl of Sunderland, and prayed him to communicate his letter to the king. He repreſented, that he was to proceed according to law, and as a judge; and by the law no judge condemns a man before he has knowledge of the cauſe, and has cited the party. Dr. Sharp himſelf carried the letter, but could obtain no anſwer. Two days after, he waited on the king at Windſor, with a very humble petition, but without any effect. The king and his council had already reſolved to embrace this occaſion to puniſh the biſhop of London, who was odious to the court, becauſe he had moved in the houſe of lords to examine the king's ſpeech. Beſides, by ſo great an example, they were reſolved to eſtabliſh the authority of their new eccleſiaſtical court. The biſhop was therefore cited to appear before the commiſſioners the 4th of Auguſt, where he was treated in a manner unbecoming his birth [m] and dignity by Jefferies the chancellor, who uſed him with his wonted inſolence. The biſhop demanded a copy of the commiſſion, or at leaſt to hear it read. But this was refuſed, and he was anſwered by Jefferies, that the commiſſion might be had in every coffee-houſe for a penny. At laſt, with great difficulty, he obtained a delay of five days. The 9th of Auguſt he appeared a ſecond time before the court, and again on the 23d, when he diſowned its juriſdiction, alledging, that as a biſhop he had no other judge but his metropolitan: but his plea was rejected. At laſt, after two or three adjournments of the court, he was ſuſpended from the function and execution of his epiſcopal office, for his diſobedience and contempt, and the biſhops of Durham, Rocheſter, and Peterborough, were appointed commiſſioners within the dioceſe of London, during the biſhop's ſuſpenſion. Dr. Sharp was likewiſe ſuſpended, but it was only for a few days.

This affair convinced all the world, that the court was reſolved to ſilence all the proteſtant miniſters, to prevent their maintaining the proteſtant religion in their ſermons. It was alſo perceived, that the king was reſolved to keep no more meaſures, ſince in a time of profound peace, he had formed a camp of fifteen thouſand men upon Hounſlow-heath, under the command of the earl of Feverſham. In this camp was a public chapel, where maſs was ſaid every day.

Though the army had but very few popiſh officers and ſoldiers, it was feared, that the whole would be ſubſervient to the king in the execution of his deſigns, in conſequence of that blind obedience uſually profeſſed by an army. To obviate this danger, Samuel Johnſon a clergyman [n], addreſſed a writing to the Proteſtant officers and ſoldiers of the army, wherein he laid before them the reaſons which ought to prevent their being the inſtruments of the court, for the deſtruction of their religion, and the ſubverſion of the government. This writing was too oppoſite to the king's deſigns to eſcape unpuniſhed. Wherefore the author being tried at the king's-bench, was ſentenced to ſtand three times in the pillory, to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, and to pay a fine of five hundred marks. The ſentence, after Johnſon's ſolemn degradation, was executed with great rigour. But his writing made a ſtrong impreſſion upon the minds of both officers and ſoldiers, and very much promoted the great deſertion which happened two years after in the army.

About the ſame time, the goldſmith, Miles Prance, who had been a witneſs againſt the perſons tried for the murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, and had taken away three lives by his evidence, was tried upon an information exhibited againſt him for perjury, and ſentenced to pay a fine of a hundred pounds, to ſtand three times in the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. But becauſe he pleaded guilty, the whipping part of the ſentence was remitted. Some ſay, he was ſo intimidated by the example of Oates, that he pleaded guilty merely to eſcape puniſhment. Others again pretend to confirm his confeſſion from a declaration publiſhed by him afterwards, wherein he diſowned his depoſitions in 1678. But as he was a papiſt, ſome have ſuſpected he was induced by religious motives to publiſh this declaration. In a caſe of this nature every man is at liberty to form his own conjectures.

It is eaſy to diſcover from the king's whole conduct, that he had entirely pulled off the maſk, and was deſirous to have it thought, he intended to introduce the Roman catholic religion. Accordingly this was not doubted. His promiſe to the council and parliament to preſerve the proteſtant religion was entirely forgot, and there was no man ſo bold as to remind him of it. It was even dangerous to ſpeak of it in public converſation, for fear of ſome miſchievous conſequence. Nor was the king contented with acting openly in favour of his religion, but even privately uſed all poſſible endeavours to make proſelytes, chiefly among his courtiers and perſons of the firſt rank. He ſucceeded with reſpect to Robert Spenſer earl of Sunderland, who was willing to give him this proof of his devotion for him, though for ſome private reaſons he refuſed to make a public abjuration.

But he was not ſo ſucceſsful in his attempt upon his brother-in-law the earl of Rocheſter. For though the earl conſented to be preſent at a conference held by divines of both religions [o], the diſpute, it ſeems, only attached him more firmly to the proteſtant religion, ſince he bravely refuſed to forſake it. The king, mortified by his firmneſs, removed him from the treaſury, which was put in commiſſion, but withal aſſigned him a yearly penſion of five thouſand pounds upon the poſt-office. The earl of Clarendon his elder brother felt likewiſe the effects of the king's diſpleaſure upon the ſame account. Being recalled from his government of Ireland before the time, he was deprived, about the end of the year, of the privy-ſeal, which was given to the lord Arundel, a papiſt [p].

At laſt, the king gave an unqueſtionable proof of his zeal for the popiſh religion, by ſending the earl of Caſtlemain in embaſſy to the pope, "To reconcile the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the Holy See, from which for more than an age they had fallen off by hereſy." The embaſſador was received at Rome with a coldneſs which gave the king a ſenſible mortification. Innocent XI. not ſuffering himſelf to be impoſed on by this outward ſhew, conſidered the embaſſy was too much precipitated, ſince the converſion of the three kingdoms was yet far from being finiſhed, and therefore he reſolved to be no actor in a farce which would only render him ridiculous. And indeed to pretend to reconcile three kingdoms to the church of Rome, on pretence of a few late converſions, was it not expoſing the pope, the king, and the catholic religion to the mirth and inſults of their enemies? This embaſſy was owing, it is ſaid, to the influence of the jeſuits, who would have all Europe believe, they had converted the three kingdoms. But Innocent XI. was not ſo fond of the jeſuits, as to give them this ſatisfaction at the expence of his own honour. Beſides, being

And then told them, "He had taken much pains to bring himſelf to believe in God, who made the world and all men in ; but it muſt not be an ordinary force of argument, that could make him believe, that man was quits with God, and made God again." Colonel Kirk was alſo ſpoken to, to change his religion, but he briſkly replied, "He was pre-engaged, for he had promiſed the king of Morocco, that, if ever he changed his religion, he would turn Mahometan." then then engaged in a quarrel with France, and not ignorant of the cloſe union between Lewis XIV. and James II. he was pleaſed with giving ſome mortification to Lewis in the perſon of his friend and brother of England. To this was owing his treatment of the embaſſador with ſo much coldneſs, not to ſay, incivility. Whenever he granted him an audience, his holineſs had a fit of coughing at command, which ſpoiled the embaſſador's harangue, and obliged him to withdraw. This happened ſo often, that at laſt the earl of Caſtlemain threatened to be gone. The pope with his uſual coldneſs ſent him word, "That ſince he would be gone, he adviſed him to riſe early in the morning, that he might reſt himſelf at noon; for in thoſe countries it was dangerous to travel in the heat of the day." All the favour the embaſſador could obtain from the pope, was a licence to the marſhal d'Humiere's daughter to marry her uncle, and a diſpenſation of the ſtatutes of the jeſuits order, that father Petre might enjoy a biſhopric. It is ſaid, the archbiſhopric of York was kept vacant for him. But if the pope and moſt of the cardinals coldly received the Engliſh embaſſador, the jeſuits made him ſome amends by ſhewing him all poſſible reſpect. At laſt, the king recalled him, being unable to bear ſo many mortifications.

However, the ill ſucceſs of this embaſſy, diſcouraged not the king from purſuing his deſigns with ſuch ardour and openneſs, that it could not be miſtaken. Not only all vacant preferments were conferred upon papiſts, but, without any reaſon given, proteſtants were deprived of their places to make room for papiſts. So, it was eaſily ſeen, that none beſides papiſts, or proteſtants not attached to their religion, could pretend to any employments. The court was ſo open in their meaſures, that ſome of the principal catholics could not forbear repreſenting to the king, that his proceedings were more dangerous than advantageous to their religion. But the king was deaf to all but violent counſels, and ſuch as were agreeable to his temper and zeal. One may ſee in the following letter, dated the 2d of February 1684, from a jeſuit of Liege to a jeſuit of Fribourg, the king's diſpoſition with regard to religion.

[1686-7] "It is wonderful to ſee king James's great affection to our ſociety: he wiſhed proſperity to this whole college, by the reverend father, the provincial, and earneſtly recommended himſelf to our prayers. Upon father John Keynes's return to England, he gave him a moſt gracious reception, (while earls and dukes were commanded for ſome hours to wait for admittance) with whom, in the queen's preſence, he diſcourſed with all familiarity. He aſked him, 'How many candidates for orders he had, and how many ſtudents?' And upon the provincial's anſwer to his majeſty, who was urgent with him, 'That of the former and the latter he had above fifty;' he replied, 'There would be occaſion for double or treble that number, to effect what he deſigned for that ſociety's performance;' and ordered, that they ſhould be all exerciſed in the art of preaching:

'For now,' ſays he, 'England has need of ſuch.'

"I do not doubt but you have heard, that the king writing to father de la Chaiſe, the French king's confeſſor, concerning the affairs of the houſe among the Walloons, declared, That whatever was done to the Engliſh fathers of that houſe, he would look upon as done to himſelf. Father Clare, rector of the ſame houſe, being arrived at London to treat of that matter, got an eaſy acceſs to the king, and as eaſily gained his point. The king himſelf forbad him to kneel and kiſs his hand, according to cuſtom, ſaying, 'Reverend father, you have indeed, once kiſſed my hand, but if I had known then, as I do now, that you were a prieſt, I would rather myſelf, father, have kneeled down and kiſſed your hand.' After he had finiſhed his buſineſs, in a familiar converſation, his majeſty told this father, 'That he would either convert England, or die a martyr; and he had rather die the next day and convert it, than reign twenty years piouſly and happily, and not effect it.' Finally, he called himſelf, 'A SON OF THE SOCIETY, of whoſe good ſucceſs,' he ſaid, 'he was as glad as of his own.' And it can ſcarcely be expreſſed how much gratitude he ſhewed when it was told him, 'That he was made partaker,' by the moſt reverend our provincial, 'of all the merits of the ſociety;' out of which he is to nominate one for his confeſſor; but hitherto it is not known who it will be: ſome report, that it will be the reverend father the provincial, but ſtill there is no certainty of that. Many are of opinion, that father Edward R. Petre, who is chiefly in favour with the king, will obtain an archbiſhopric, but more believe it will be a cardinal's cap. To him has been granted, within this month or two, all that part of the palace, in which the king uſed to reſide, when he was duke of York, where there is not a day, but you may may ſee I know not how many courtiers waiting to ſpeak to his eminence, for ſo they ſay he is called. For the king adviſes with him, and with many catholic lords, who have the chief places in the kingdom, to find a method to propagate the faith without violence. Not long ſince, ſome of theſe lords objected to the king, 'That they thought he made too much haſte to eſtabliſh the faith.' To whom he anſwered, 'I am gowing old, and muſt take LARGE STEPS; elſe if I ſhould happen to die, I might perhaps leave you in a worſe condition than I found you.' When they aſked him, 'Why then he was ſo little concerned about the converſion of his daughters, who were the heirs of the kingdom?' He anſwered, 'God will take care of that; leave the converſion of my daughters to me; do you, by your example, convert your tenants and others to the faith.'

"He has catholic lord-lieutenants in moſt counties; and we ſhall have ſhortly catholic juſtices of the peace in almoſt all places. We hope alſo, that our affairs will have good ſucceſs at Oxford. In the public chapel of the vice-chancellor, who is a catholic, there is always one of our divines, who has converted ſome of the ſtudents to the faith. The biſhop of Oxford himſelf, ſeems to be a great favourer of the catholic faith; he propoſed to the council, Whether it did not ſeem to be expedient, that at leaſt one college ſhould be granted to the catholics at Oxford, that they might not be forced to ſtudy beyond ſea at ſuch great expences; but it is not yet known what anſwer he had. The ſame biſhop having invited two of our brethren, together with ſome of the nobility, drank the king's health to a certain heretic lord who was in company, 'wiſhing his majeſty good ſucceſs in all his undertakings:' adding alſo, 'That the religion of the proteſtants in England, did not ſeem to him in a better condition, than Buda was before it was taken; and that they were next to atheiſts, that defended that faith.' Many embrace the true religion, and four of the moſt conſiderable earls had lately made public profeſſion of it. Father Alexander Keynes, the provincial's nephew, to whom is committed the care of the chapel belonging to the elector Palatine's envoy, is continually taken up in ſolving and anſwering the queſtions of heretics, who doubt of their faith, of whom you may ſee two or three together walking by the chapel door, continually diſputing about ſome point of religion. As to prince George, it is yet uncertain what religion he profeſſes. We gradually begin to get footing in England; we teach human learning at Lincoln, Norwich, and York; and at Worceſter we have a public chapel, protected by a guard of the king's ſoldiers, and we are to buy ſome houſes at Wigan in Lancaſhire. The catholic intereſt grows very ſtrong; and at ſome churches granted to the catholics, upon holidays, there are often counted fifteen hundred preſent at the ſermon. At London alſo, our buſineſs is carried on with the ſame good ſucceſs: ſermons are preached upon every holiday, and there are ſo many that frequent the chapels, that they are not big enough to hold them. Two of our ſociety, Dormer and Bertue, preach continually before the king and queen; father Edward Neville, before the queen-dowager; father Alexander Keynes, in the chapel aforeſaid; others in other chapels. There are many houſes bought in the Savoy, near Somerſet-houſe, which is the queen-dowager's palace, towards erecting the firſt college in London, for about eighteen thouſand florins; and they are hard at work to bring them to the form of a college, that a ſchool may be opened before Eaſter.

"A catholic lord-lieutenant is ſhortly to go over to Ireland, becauſe the king cannot be ſatisfied with any other, to eſtabliſh the catholic intereſt in that kingdom. The parliament will certainly ſit in this month of February, of whom his majeſty is reſolved to aſk three things: firſt, That by a general act all the catholic peers may be admitted to ſit in the upper houſe: ſecondly, That the teſt may be aboliſhed: and thirdly, which is the chief point, That all penal laws againſt catholics ſhould be abrogated. And that he may the better obtain theſe things, he deſigns to let them all know, 'That he is reſolved to turn out all thoſe who will not heartily act for the obtaining of them; and likewiſe diſſolve the parliament.' At which reſolution ſome heretics being terrified, came to a certain earl to adviſe with him what might be done; to whom he anſwered, 'The king's mind is ſufficiently known; what he has once ſaid he will certainly perform: if you love yourſelves, ſubmit to the king's pleaſure.' There is to be a great preparation of war at London, and a fleet of above a hundred men of war is to be fitted out againſt the ſpring, but againſt whom it is uncertain. The Dutch are under great apprehenſions, but for what reaſon, although they are ſaid to make an armament, time will beſt diſcover."

are

The jeſuits of Fribourg made no ſcruple to ſhew this letter to ſeveral perſons, who taking copies of it, made it public in Switzerland, and at Geneva. Dr. Burnet ſays, he copied it from one in the hands of Monſ. Heidegger, a famous profeſſor at Zurich. One of the copies was ſent to Dickvelt, embaſſador of the States-general in England, who ſpoke of it to the king. Whereupon the king deſired to ſee it, ſaying, he ſhould ſoon know whether it was genuine, or forged to render the jeſuits odious. But though it was put into his hands, he ſpoke no more of it to Dickvelt.

The parliament, which, according to the laſt prorogation, was to meet the fifteenth of February, was farther prorogued to the 28th of April. Probably the king did not find things ripe enough (as he deſired) to be aſſured of the concurrence of the parliament in the execution of his deſigns. He choſe rather to take another courſe, which to him ſeemed more ſhort and eaſy, in eſtabliſhing liberty of conſcience by his own authority. He was, doubtleſs, perſuaded, that it would be more eaſy to obtain the conſent of the parliament to a thing already done, than the power to do it. But he thought proper to begin with Scotland, that the example of that kingdom might influence the Engliſh. For this purpoſe he ſent a proclamation into Scotland for an entire liberty of conſcience, with orders to the privy-council to publiſh it. In his opinion, this proclamation was more than capable to convince all his good ſubjects of his great moderation, and deſire that all ſhould live in quiet. He excluded, however, out of his favour, the field-conventiclers, whom he recommended to his council to proſecute with all the ſeverity of the laws. This proclamation contained in ſubſtance:

"That his majeſty being reſolved to unite the hearts and affections of his ſubjects, to God in religion, to him in loyalty, and to their neighbours in chriſtian love and charity; he had therefore thought fit, by his ſovereign authority, prerogative royal, and abſolute power, which all his ſubjects were to obey without RESERVE, to give and grant his royal toleration, to the ſeveral profeſſors of the chriſtian religion after named. Firſt, He allows and tolerates the moderate preſbyterians, to meet in their private houſes only; but it is his pleaſure that field-conventiclers be proſecuted according to the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws. In like manner he tolerates quakers to meet and exerciſe in their form, in any place or places appointed for their worſhip." Then the proclamation proceeds thus, "Conſidering the ſevere and cruel laws made againſt Roman catholics (therein called papiſts) in the minority of our royal grandfather of glorious memory, without his conſent, and contrary to the duty of good ſubjects, by his regents and other enemies to their lawful ſovereign, our great grandmother queen Mary of bleſſed and pious memory; wherein, under the pretence of religion, they cloathed the worſt of treaſons, factions, and uſurpations; and made theſe laws, not againſt the enemies of God, but their own: which laws have ſtill been continued of courſe, without deſign of executing them, or any of them, ad terrorem only, on ſuppoſition, that the papiſts, relying on an external power, were incapable of duty and true allegiance to their natural ſovereigns, and rightful monarchs: we of our certain knowledge and long experience, knowing that the catholics, as it is their principle to be good chriſtians, ſo it is to be dutiful ſubjects; and that they have likewiſe, on all occaſions, ſhewn themſelves good and faithful ſubjects to us, and our royal predeceſſors, &c. Do therefore, with the conſent of our privy-council, by our ſovereign authority, prerogative royal, and abſolute power, ſuſpend, ſtop, and diſable all laws or acts of parliament, made or executed againſt any of our Roman catholic ſubjects, in any time paſt, to all intents and purpoſes, making void all prohibitions therein mentioned, pains or penalties therein ordained to be inflicted: ſo that they ſhall in all things be as free in all reſpects as any of our proteſtant ſubjects whatſoever, not only to exerciſe their religion, but to enjoy all offices, benefices, and others, which we ſhall think fit to beſtow upon them in all time coming.———And whereas the obedience of our ſubjects is due to us by their allegiance, and our ſovereignty; and that no law, difference in religion, or other impediment whatſoever, can exempt the ſubjects from their native obligations to the crown; and conſidering that ſome oaths are capable of being wreſted by men of ſiniſter intentions, a practice in that kingdom as fatal to religion as loyalty: we therefore caſs, annul, and diſcharge all oaths whatſoever, by which any of our ſubjects are incapacitated from holding places or offices in our ſaid kingdom, diſcharging the ſame to be taken or given in any time coming, without our ſpecial warrant and conſent; and we do ſtop, diſable and diſpenſe with all laws, injoining the ſaid oaths, teſts, or any of them, &c." Towards the concluſion, the king repeats former promiſes in theſe words:———"For the encouragement of our proteſtant biſhops, and the regular clergy, and ſuch as have hitherto lived orderly, we think fit to declare, that it never was our principle, nor will we ever ſuffer violence to be offered to any man's conſcience, nor will we uſe force, or invincible neceſſity, againſt any man on the account of his perſuaſion, nor the proteſtant religion; but will protect our biſhops and other miniſters, in their functions, rights, and properties, and all our proteſtant ſubjects, in the free exerciſe of their proteſtant religion in the churches."

Though this proclamation concerned only Scotland, I thought proper to inſert it here, becauſe it diſcovers clearly the king's intentions and principles, and conſequently, how he pretended to deal with his Engliſh ſubjects, though hitherto he ſtill kept within ſome bounds, with regard to that abſolute power, which England had not aſcribed to him in ſo extenſive a manner as Scotland.

[1687] The council of Scotland blindly obeyed the king, not only by publiſhing his proclamation, but even by thanking him for it, as for a ſignal favour. This ought not to appear ſtrange, becauſe the council wholly conſiſted of men entirely devoted to the king, nor was there in Scotland any perſon in public office, who was not, or at leaſt pretended not, to be in the ſame principles. The parliament was compoſed in the ſame manner, and by acts paſſed, had obliged all the Scots to an unlimited obedience, ſo that no man could oppoſe the king's meaſures, under pain of high-treaſon. Accordingly, the council, in thanking the king for his proclamation, might boldly ſpeak for the whole kingdom: not that they were ignorant that it was not the general ſentiment of the nation, but becauſe they knew, no perſon would have the boldneſs to contradict it. It is not therefore to the whole Scotch nation, that this blind obedience is to be imputed, but to their governors, who were but a ſmall part of the people.

The king, charmed with the ready compliance of the Scots, and conſidering it as a favourable precedent for England, ſummoned his council, and told them, "it was his intention to publiſh the like declaration in England. He grounded his reſolution on his obſerving, that the endeavours to eſtabliſh an uniformity in the four preceding reigns, had proved ineffectual, and been very prejudicial to the nation. That beſides, it was his opinion, as moſt ſuitable to the principles of chriſtianity, "That no man ſhould be perſecuted for conſcience ſake; for he thought conſcience could not be forced." The council, compoſed like that of Scotland, approved of this reſolution, and magnified the king's indulgence to his ſubjects. The declaration for liberty of conſcience was therefore publiſhed the fourth of April. It was much the ſame with that publiſhed in Scotland, except that the king ſoftened his expreſſions concerning his abſolute power, and ſaid, "he made no doubt of the concurrence of his two houſes of parliament, when he ſhould think it convenient for them to meet." It was however manifeſt, from the frequent prorogations of this parliament, that he was far from being aſſured of their concurrence.

Very probably, there was not in the whole nation a ſingle perſon, who thought the king deſired to favour or eaſe the non-conformiſts. Every one clearly ſaw, that his aim in this declaration was to eſtabliſh the popiſh religion, upon the ruins of the proteſtant. For how could it be ſuppoſed, that the king, from a violent perſecutor, ſhould at once become a friend to the diſſenters? Or what aſſurance could there be, that his promiſes to the non-conformiſts would be better kept than thoſe he had made to the church of England? Nevertheleſs the non-conformiſts had hitherto been treated with ſo much rigour, that it is not ſtrange, they ſhould at firſt think themſelves happy in a deliverance from perſecution. For this reaſon, addreſſes of thanks, from the ſeveral ſects, were preſented to the king for his declaration. The anabaptiſts led the way; the quakers followed, and next came the independents; and laſtly, the preſbyterians. Some of theſe addreſſes, ſpeaking of the royal power, carried it to the higheſt degree, becauſe it was then advantageous to the non-conformiſts to maintain the authority by which they were freed from their conſtraint. The churchmen failed not to take notice of this change. But they could not juſtly blame an exceſs in a which themſelves had fallen. The truth is, the two parties neither did then, nor yet do, follow on all occaſions, their own principles, with relation to the royal power, which they extend or contract, as the king is more or leſs favourable to them.

Be

Be this as it will, the war then waged between the two parties was of no long continuance. They were quickly ſenſible, that the court aimed to revive their former animoſities, in order to weaken them both. The king, to ſucceed in this deſign, made the hardſhips and perſecutions which the non-conformiſts had ſuffered from the church of England, the topic of his diſcourſe in his common converſations. No greater pleaſure could be done him, than to entertain him with the particulars of thoſe oppreſſions. To give the church of England a ſtill more ſenſible mortification, he ordered the proceſſes in the eccleſiaſtical court againſt the diſſenters to be reviewed. But the preſbyterians who were moſt concerned, were ſo wiſe as not to improve ſo favourable an occaſion to mortify their enemies. On the other hand, though ſome paſſionate men among the diſſenters, publiſhed virulent invectives againſt the church, to retaliate their ill uſage, the epiſcopalians unanimouſly reſolved not to anſwer them, for fear of widening the breach between the two parties, at a time when their union was more than ever neceſſary. It cannot be denied, that herein their moderation and prudence were exemplary. In general, it may be affirmed, that if ſome of the non-conformiſts, whether preſbyterians or others, ſuffered themſelves to be tranſported by their paſſions into inſults upon the church of England, they were men of no note. The moſt ſenſible, and thoſe who had moſt credit in their party, obſerved a great moderation. The Epiſcopalians, on their ſide, did all that lay in their power to eſtabliſh union, ſolely capable of ſupporting them both. Writings were publiſhed from time to time, in which the churchmen acknowledged their error in driving the preſbyterians to extremities; that they were not ſufficiently aware of the artifices of the court, and promiſed to have for them great condeſcenſion, in caſe affairs were reſtored upon a good footing. It is true, they are accuſed of having been no leſs forgetful of this promiſe, than of that made when the reſtoration of Charles II. was tranſacting. But this concerns the following reigns.

If there were non-conformiſts who thought themſelves obliged to expreſs their gratitude for the king's declaration, by flattering addreſſes, there were likewiſe biſhops who, with much leſs foundation, prevailed with their clergy to ſend addreſſes of thanks to the king, as for a ſignal favour to the church of England. Of this number were Crew biſhop of Durham, Barlow of Lincoln, Cartwright of Cheſter, Wood of Litchfield, and Watſon of St. David's. As for Parker biſhop of Oxford he was not ſo ſucceſsful, ſince he could find but one clergyman in his whole dioceſe, who would ſign ſuch an addreſs. It may eaſily be imagined that, had the king's project ſucceeded, theſe biſhops would not have been the laſt to embrace the popiſh religion.

The ſteps already made by the king for the intereſt of the popiſh religion, were not thought ſufficient by thoſe who aſpired to greater advantages. Hitherto the papiſts had not been able to procure any preferments in either of the univerſities, and yet they were paſſionately deſirous to ſet up there maſters and profeſſors of their own religion, in order to become in time heads of ſome of the colleges. It had been propoſed to the king to found a college in each univerſity. But, whether the expence diſcouraged him, or whatever was the reaſon, it was thought more proper to introduce papiſts into the colleges already founded. The deſign was begun at Cambridge, where Dr. John Peachell the vice-chancellor received a letter from the king, commanding the univerſity to admit to the degree of maſter of arts, Alban Francis, a Benedictine monk, without adminiſtring any oath whatſoever, notwithſtanding any ſtatute or law to the contrary, which the king was pleaſed to diſpenſe with in favour of the ſaid Alban Francis. The vice-chancellor having communicated this letter to the congregation of regents and non-regents, it was unanimouſly agreed by the members, not to admit Francis, till the king had been petitioned to revoke the mandate. For this purpoſe, they applied to Chriſtopher Monk, duke of Albemarle, their chancellor, praying his interceſſion with the king; to which he returned for anſwer, "That he had tried, but to no effect." Upon this anſwer, the univerſity ſent deputies to London, who were to apply to the earl of Sunderland; but he refuſed to hear them. Shortly after the king ſent a ſecond letter to the univerſity, the ſame in ſubſtance with the former, with this addition, "To do it at their peril." As the univerſity continued to ſtand their ground, a ſummons was ſent from the new eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, commanding the vice-chancellor to appear in perſon before them, and the congregation, by themſelves, or their deputies. In ſhort, by ſentence of the court, the vice-chancellor was deprived of his office; but Francis was not admitted. This was the firſt avowed attempt to introduce papiſts into the univerſity. I ſay avowed, for ſome might have been received under the pretence of being proteſtants. But ſoon after, Magdalen-college in Oxford, the richeſt in revenue[a], had a more terrible ſtorm to encounter.

The preſidentſhip of that college being vacant the 31ſt of March, by the death of Dr. Clark, the vice-preſident gave notice for a new election the 13th of April. But before that day, the members of the college were informed, that the king had granted a particular mandate in favour of Anthony Farmer, a man of ill reputation, who had promiſed to declare himſelf a papiſt. Whereupon they preſented a petition to the king, praying him, either to leave them to the choice of their preſident, according to their founder's ſtatutes, or to recommend a perſon who might be more ſerviceable to his majeſty and the college. The anſwer received from the earl of Sunderland was, "That the king muſt be obeyed." Immediately after, the king's mandate was delivered to Robert Charnock[b], a new convert and fellow of the college. This mandate being read in the preſence of all the fellows, it was reſolved to keep to the day appointed for the election[c], on which day Dr. Hough was choſen by a great majority. The new preſident was preſented to the viſitor, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſwore and admitted him to his office.

The king was extremely provoked with this election, and notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the duke of Ormond, chancellor of the univerſity, the vice-preſident and fellows were cited to appear before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners at Whitehall. Accordingly, the 6th of June, ſix fellows, deputed by the ſociety, appeared before the commiſſioners, and to the queſtion, "Why they refuſed to obey the king's mandate?" they produced their ſtatutes, and the oaths they had taken for the obſervation of them, by which ſtatutes Farmer could have no pretenſion. They were ordered to attend again the 22d of the month, on which day they gave in ſo many allegations againſt Farmer, (who beſides was unqualified by the ſtatutes) that the commiſſioners were aſhamed of him. But as it was the king's cauſe they were maintaining, they deprived Dr. Hough of his preſidentſhip, and ſuſpended the vice-preſident and one of the fellows[d]. The king being informed of the allegations againſt Farmer, thought fit to drop his firſt mandate, and granted a ſecond in favour of Dr. Parker biſhop of Oxford.

The fellows of the college finding him no better qualified than Farmer, refuſed to obey the new mandate. This ſo incenſed the king, that he went himſelf to Oxford, bent at any rate to overcome their obſtinacy. He ordered them to attend him at Chriſt-church, and ſpoke to them in terms capable of intimidating men of leſs firmneſs and reſolution. He commanded them to be gone, and to admit the biſhop of Oxford their preſident, letting them know, that otherwiſe "they ſhould feel the weight of his hand." But inſtead of obeying, they offered a petition in vindication of their proceedings; but the king would not receive it. At laſt, after all his menaces, he was forced to leave Oxford, without gaining his point. Shortly after, the king appointed a commiſſion to viſit the college, namely, Cartwright, biſhop of Cheſter, Sir Robert Wright, chief-juſtice of the King's-Bench, and Sir Thomas Jenner, a baron of the Exchequer. Theſe commiſſioners treated the fellows very uncivilly, abſtaining not even from ſcurrilous and abuſive language. At laſt, ſeeing it was not poſſible to overcome them, they found an expedient to ſave in ſome meaſure the king's honour, by an ambiguous declaration, to which the fellows were willing to ſubmit. But this ſatisfied not the king, who, the commiſſioners ſaid, expected ſome farther ſubmiſſion, which they adviſed them to make, "by acknowledging their contempt to his ſacred majeſty in perſon, and to his letters; that they ſhould promiſe to behave themſelves loyally for the future; that they ſhould own the proceedings and legality of the court, implore his majeſty's pardon, and lay themſelves at his feet; and that they ſhould declare their entire ſubmiſſion to the biſhop of Oxford as their preſident." Of twenty-ſeven fellows, only Charnock and another[e] offered to ſign this ſubmiſſion.

At laſt, the commiſſioners, impowered by the king, deprived the twenty-five (who refuſed to ſubſcribe the declaration) of their fellowſhips, and expelled them from the college, for diſobedience to the king's commands. They all proteſted againſt the ſentence, declaring, "They would uſe all juſt and legal ways of being relieved." The ſentence, however, was confirmed by the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, and aggravated, by declaring the preſident and fellows incapable of being admitted to any eccleſiaſtical dignity or benefice. The preſident refuſed to put the biſhop of Oxford in poſſeſſion of his lodgings, which were therefore broken open. The college was filled with papiſts, and Charnock was made vice-preſident. Tho' this affair held from the beginning of June, to the end of October, I was willing, in order to avoid repetition, to finiſh the narrative at once.

The king diſcovered on all occaſions his extraordinary zeal for the advancement of his religion; but chiefly in the diſpoſal of all places and offices in his gift. For ſome time, he had ſcarce preferred any, but thoſe who were willing to purchaſe his favour by changing their religion, and often diſplaced thoſe who teſtified a zeal for the proteſtant religion, without regard to paſt ſervices or old offences. Many of thoſe who had been moſt active for the bill of excluſion, were careſſed and courted, provided they would embrace the king's religion; as for inſtance, the earl of Sunderland. But an adherence to the proteſtant religion, was a ſufficient cauſe to remove thoſe who had done him the moſt important ſervices on the ſame occaſion; witneſs his brothers-in-law the earls of Clarendon and Rocheſter. Charles Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, who ſome years before had turned proteſtant, loſt his regiment of horſe, for refuſing to return to popery. The lords-lieutenants of counties were almoſt all papiſts. As for the judges, ſome were papiſts, and the reſt, though proteſtants, were ready to obey all the king's commands. If any of them proved too ſcrupulous, they were immediately diſplaced, for others more compliant. Theſe mercenary judges, when they went their circuits, received orders from the chancellor, to uſe all their authority for confirming the right aſſumed by the king of diſpenſing with the laws, and to diſcourage, as much as poſſible, thoſe whom they ſhould find not diſpoſed to ſubmiſſion. Theſe orders were executed with great rigour and inſolence.

Every one plainly ſaw the tendency of theſe proceedings, for the king was open and undiſguiſed. Nevertheleſs, there were even among the lawyers themſelves, ſome that affected to approve of all his actions, and by their addreſſes, to encourage him to proceed. To ſhew the exceſſive flattery of theſe men, I ſhall here inſert an addreſs preſented to the king on the 11th of June, by the ſociety of the Middle Temple.

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"We, your majeſty's dutiful ſubjects, to our great joy, have received a happy occaſion of making this declaration of our gratitude: and as we know that your majeſty's goodneſs is the greateſt that ever was ſhewn by a prince to his ſubjects, ſo we wiſh the voice of men and angels, to return ſufficient thanks for your majeſty's condeſcenſion and clemency to all your ſubjects, in your gracious declaration for a toleration. And as for this compaſſion and goodneſs, thanks ought to be paid your majeſty by all your ſubjects; ſo we eſpecially of the profeſſion of the law, have moſt reaſon to be thankful for the honour you have done us, by aſſerting your own royal prerogatives, which is the very life of the law, and our profeſſion. Which prerogatives, as they were given by God himſelf, ſo we declare, That no power upon earth can diminiſh them, but they muſt always remain entire and inſeparable to your royal perſon. Which prerogatives, as we have ſtudied to know them, ſo we are reſolved to defend them, by aſſerting with our lives and fortunes that divine maxim, A Deo Rex, a Rege Lex. And now as a teſtimony of our perfect ſatisfaction in this our addreſs and acknowledgement, we have ſubſcribed our names, that your majeſty may know us to be yours; and that the reſt of our profeſſion may follow our example: and therefore we beg your majeſty will accept this addreſs from us, who in concluſion make bold to offer our beſt wiſhes, and hearty deſires, that your majeſty's councils may proſper in wiſdom, your kingdoms flouriſh in peace, and your royal perſon enjoy a long, happy, and glorious reign over us."

With all this, the king was diſappointed in an affair which he earneſtly laboured, and that was the gaining the parliament to approve of the power claimed by him of diſpenſing with the laws. The parliament ſhould have met the 28th of April, and it was expected accordingly. But the king, not finding things ſo ripe as he deſired, had prorogued it to the 22d of November. Some days before this prorogation a pamphlet had been diſperſed in London, tending to give the parliament a diſadvantageous idea of the king, in the ſuppoſition that they were going to ſit. Here is a ſhort extract of this pamphlet, which was aſcribed to Dr. Burnet, then in Holland.

"Our king has given ſuch teſtimonies of his zeal for his religion, that we ſee among all his other royal qualities, there is none for which he deſires and deſerves to be ſo much admired, ſince even the paſſion of glory, of making himſelf the terror of all Europe, and arbiter of Chriſtendom, (which as it is natural to all princes, ſo muſt it be moſt particularly ſo to one of his martial and noble temper) yields to his zeal for his church; and that he, in whom we might have hoped to ſee our Edward the third, our Henry the fifth revived, chuſes rather to merit the heightening his degree of glory in another world, than to acquire all the conqueſts that this low and vile world can give him: and that, inſtead of making himſelf a terror to his neighbours, he is contented with the humble glory of being a terror to his own people; ſo that inſtead of the great figure this reign might make in the world, all the news of England is now only concerning the practices on ſome fearful mercenaries."

In the mean time, the king continued to take infinite pains to gain the members of parliament. He cloſetted, one by one, all that were in London, and repreſented to them what he thought capable to convince them of the neceſſity to aboliſh the penal laws, for the good of the kingdom, and inforced his arguments with menaces and promiſes. It is not improbable, but ſome might be gained, but he could never be aſſured of a majority of voices. This determined him at laſt to diſſolve the parliament, by proclamation the 2d of July.

When the firmneſs of the members of this parliament, as ſoon as they believed the intereſts of religion were at ſtake, is compared with their extreme zeal for the king in the beginning of their ſeſſion, it muſt be inferred, that their compliance was owing purely to their miſtake in their good opinion of the king, and that their firmneſs proceeded from their being at laſt undeceived. They are therefore unjuſtly accuſed of intending to ſacrifice to the king, the intereſt of religion and their country. They demonſtrated the contrary in reſiſting the temptations the king laid before them, even in his preſence, and face to face. This, in my opinion, is the higheſt degree to which firmneſs can be carried. They were all, or almoſt all, members of the church of England; nay, for the moſt part, high-churchmen. I have before given the reaſon of their exceſſive zeal and condeſcenſion for the king, and therefore need not repeat it. But when they diſcovered that the point was not to curb the Diſſenters, but that the king's deſigns concerned the proteſtant religion, without any diſtinction of ſects, they evidently ſhewed, that they were as good proteſtants, as thoſe who accuſed them of being papiſts, or popiſhly inclined. This truth will ſtill more plainly appear, in the firm and unſhaken courage of the church of England, on the moſt important occaſion that ever was.

After the parliament was diſſolved, the king's grand affair was to have a new one entirely at his devotion. But he would not call one, till he was aſſured of having ſuch members returned as he ſhould think proper. For this purpoſe, quo warrantos were iſſued againſt ſeveral corporations, to the end, that when they were deprived of their charters, the king might grant ſuch new ones, as ſhould render him maſter of the elections. It may be imagined, that as the courts of juſtice were diſpoſed, the corporations could not but be deprived of their charters, and for obtaining new ones were obliged to comply with the king's deſires. This was one of the methods uſed by the king, to diſpoſe the people to elect ſuch members as would promote the deſign of abrogating the penal laws and teſt. It would be too tedious and difficult to relate all the king's ſecret methods, the emiſſaries he ſent into the counties and corporations, the inſtructions he gave them to gain the people, the arguments, promiſes, and menaces they uſed. All that can be ſaid in general, is, that nothing was forgot which he thought would contribute to the procuring a favourable parliament. To this end, magiſtrates and lord-lieutenants were diſplaced, but chiefly, particular men were cloſetted to engage them in the king's meaſures. It was alſo with this view that he made a progreſs through ſeveral counties, and ſtopped at the cities cities and great towns, to careſs or intimidate the people. But he every where met with ſuch coldneſs, or rather averſion to his deſigns, that he durſt not venture to call a parliament. As the people were convinced, that the king's deſign, with whatever pretence he diſguiſed it, was to deprive them of their liberty, and change the eſtabliſhed religion, they would not be the inſtruments of their own ruin. The affair of Magdalen college, which was in agitation during the king's progreſs, greatly contributed to open the eyes of the moſt blind, and exaſperate the nation. The king would have a parliament, which ſhould conſent to the abrogation of the penal laws and teſt, or grant him a power of diſpenſing with them, at a time when his whole conduct diſcovered a ſettled deſign of planting the popiſh upon the ruins of the proteſtant religion. Beſides, it was manifeſt he did not aſk this power as a favour, but inſiſted upon it as a right, which he had already aſſumed, without the concurrence of the parliament.

At laſt, the king ſhewed ſo open a contempt of the law, that no perſon could miſtake him. After ſending, as we have ſeen, a ſolemn embaſſy to Rome, he would have a nuntio in ordinary reſiding at his own court. The pope had, the laſt year, nominated for this employment, Ferdinando Dadda, domeſtic prelate to his holineſs, who had been about the king ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown, and was the queen's great favourite. He had been received as nuntio, but privately, and without the people's knowledge. But now the king having entirely pulled off the maſk, was for honouring him with a public reception; though to aſſume the character of the pope's nuntio was high-treaſon. To give more luſtre to the nuntio, he was firſt conſecrated archbiſhop of Amaſia in the royal chapel, after which, on the 3d of July, he made his public entry at Windſor, with great pomp and magnificence. It was a very ſurprizing ſpectacle to proteſtants, to ſee the nuntio from the pope in his pontificalibus, preceded by a croſs-bearer and a train of prieſts and monks, in the habits of their reſpective orders. Mean while, on this very occaſion, the king received an unexpected mortification; for having ordered Charles Seymour, duke of Somerſet, to attend the nuntio to his audience, he deſired his majeſty to excuſe him from an office which the laws of the land made criminal. This ſo incenſed the king, that he removed him from his places of gentleman of the bedchamber, and colonel of dragoons. Henry Fitz-roy, duke of Grafton, leſs ſcrupulous, accepted the office refuſed by the duke of Somerſet. Some have believed, that Dadda was one of the king's principal counſellors in affairs of religion. But it is not likely he would act ſo contrary to the ſentiments of the pope, who by no means approved the king's conduct. The ſame thing cannot be ſaid of father Petre, or Peters, the king's confeſſor, who was the firſt mover of all the engines to advance the progreſs of Popery. He was publicly received into the council the 11th of November, contrary to the opinion of the moſt eminent papiſts, who juſtly feared the king's affairs would thereby be very much prejudiced.

Though the king had given convincing proofs of his averſion to the proteſtant religion, he favourably received the French proteſtants, who took ſanctuary in England on account of the rigours exerciſed againſt them in France. He not only granted them his protection, but alſo large ſums, beſides his licence to encourage a public collection. Some aſcribe this to policy, in order to intimate to the Engliſh, how little ground they had to fear ſuch treatment in England, from a king, who was ſo charitably compaſſionate to the misfortunes of foreigners, perſecuted in their own country. But as the king himſelf did not diſcover the motives of this conduct, they can only be conjectured. Thus much is certain, the French preachers thought themſelves under ſuch obligations to the king, that they were amongſt the moſt forward to diſplay his virtues in their ſermons, whenever an occaſion offered. I myſelf remember to have heard a preacher in the church of the Savoy launch out into the profaneſt flattery [f].

George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, who now made a contemptible figure, died this year in Yorkſhire, juſt as he had lived, that is, without any ſenſe of religion. This ſame year death likewiſe ſeized the famous ſir William Petty, phyſician and fellow of the Royal Society, after having publiſhed ſeveral uſeful and valuable writings.

[1688] I am now come to the year 1688, a critical year to England, the firſt half of which portended to the Engliſh the loſs of their religion and liberties. James II. had promoted his great work in the three years he had been on the throne, with a ſurprizing rapidity and ſucceſs. He had inveſted himſelf with an abſolute power, that hardly ſuffered any contradiction. The laws of the land were openly violated. The privy-council was almoſt wholly popiſh, and under the direction of a jeſuit. The moſt conſiderable places in the court and kingdom were poſſeſſed by men of the ſame religion. The teſt and penal laws were inſufficient fences to ſecure religion, for which they were intended. In a word, the king was reſolved to complete his work at all events, and an army of fifteen thouſand men, encamped within a few miles of London, beſides the aſſiſtance of France, ſeemed to promiſe him ſucceſs. But what was more extraordinary was, that proteſtant corporations, when their religion was ſo violently attacked, ſent their addreſſes of thanks to the king, as for a great favour, publicly promiſing to chuſe ſuch members for the enſuing parliament, as ſhould concur with his meaſures. All this gave juſt occaſion to fear, that no remedy could poſſibly be found for the miſeries of the nation, which daily increaſed. The only refuge which ſeemed to be left, was the princeſs of Orange, preſumptive heir of the crown, who, like another Elizabeth, would reſtore things to their former ſtate, when ſhe ſhould aſcend the throne. But, beſides that the king, who was but in his fifty-fifth year, might yet live a great while, an aſtoniſhing proclamation, publiſhed the 2d of January, to notify the queen's being with child, and to order public thankſgiving to God, entirely deſtroyed the hopes which had been entertained.

The papiſts were tranſported with this agreeable news. Some even began to debate the queſtion, whether a daughter born ſince the king's advancement to the throne, ought not to take place before the princeſs of Orange, born while he was duke of York? But this queſtion was very needleſs. Every one was perſuaded, the papiſts through hope, and the proteſtants through fear, that the queen would be delivered of a prince. It is very certain, the proteſtants from this time began to form ſuſpicions about the queen's pregnancy. This appeared in ſeveral pamphlets, diſperſed thro' London, ſome of which were even dropped in Whitehall. Hitherto, the ſole foundation of the ſuſpicion, that the queen's pregnancy was a cheat, conſiſted in her having been ſo many years childleſs. But this foundation was too weak to prove the certainty of an impoſture. It was not impoſſible for the queen to be with child; but on the other hand, neither was it impoſſible that the queen ſhould be willing to ſuppoſe an heir. The extreme zeal of the king and queen, and of moſt of their counſellors and confidents, for their religion, rendered ſuch a ſuſpicion plauſible to the proteſtants. Hiſtories have recorded inſtances of the like impoſtures, as in Spain, and in England itſelf, where it is pretended, that queen Mary, to deprive her ſiſter Elizabeth of the ſucceſſion, would have ſuppoſed an heir, had not her huſband king Philip prevented it. For this reaſon, the ſtory of queen Mary's ſham-conception, as delivered by Fox, was reprinted and diſperſed through the kingdom, with this title, "Idem Iterum, or queen Mary's Big-Belly." Another cauſe which contributed greatly to corroborate this ſuſpicion, was the indiſcretion of ſome jeſuits, who publiſhed that ſhe would certainly be delivered of a prince. They pretended, that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a ſolemn petition, which the late deceaſed ducheſs of Modena had put up in Heaven to the bleſſed Virgin Mary, or of a vow the queen had made to our Lady of Loretto, with the preſent of a golden image, enriched with precious ſtones. As on pretence that the queen had been ſeveral years childleſs, her pregnancy could not be deemed ſupernatural, there was no neceſſity to aſcribe it to a miracle, of which there could be no certainty. So this needleſs precaution ſerved only to confirm the ſuſpicion.

The queen's pregnancy produced many congratulatory addreſſes. Some of theſe carried their compliments and flattery to the laſt exceſs. This is no wonder. Moſt of the lords-lieutenants, juſtices, and magiſtrates of the towns, being devoted to the king, it was not difficult for them to perſuade the corporations, that theſe congratulations to the king were the juſt tribute of their duty. This being once inculcated, they drew up the addreſſes themſelves, and procured ſuch ſubſcriptions as they thought proper, thereby cauſing the corporations to ſay what they pleaſed. Were addreſſes to be conſidered, as containing the real ſentiments of the people, it might be ſaid, that all the Engliſh nation was tranſported with joy, through the hopes of a popiſh

[f] It is thought, that the king's favours to the French refugees, were chiefly to engage them to eſpouſe and abet the king's power of diſpenſing with all penal laws in religion. See Kennet, p. 499. Note [a].

About

ſucceſſor. But the nation ſoon diſcovered directly oppoſite ſentiments. Beſides, it appears, the king did not rely on this general concurrence of his ſubjects, ſince he dared not to call a parliament, whoſe approbation and compliance were the great object of his deſires.

Beſides the forementioned methods, which the king uſed to advance the popiſh religion, there was ſtill another from which he promiſed himſelf great ſucceſs. Some time ſince, the Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits had printed and diſperſed a great number of controverſial writings, which had been anſwered by Tillotſon, Tenniſon, Stillingfleet, Sherlock, and others, in a manner which in all appearance was not agreeable to the papiſts. The king fearing, without doubt, that his doctors would not be a match for the champions of the church of England, publiſhed a proclamation, grounded upon a ſtatute made the 14th of Charles II. "prohibiting the printing and ſelling all unlicenſed and treaſonable books and pamphlets, under the pains and penalties provided by the ſaid act." Under this name were comprehended the controverſial books publiſhed by the proteſtants, on a pretence, that they encouraged and fomented animoſities amongſt his ſubjects [a].

The king's grand deſign, as has been ſeen, was to repeal the teſt and penal laws, and for that purpoſe he wiſhed to have a parliament at his devotion. He had already abrogated theſe laws by his own authority, but he daily found, that this did not ſuffice to lead his ſubjects to the degree of compliance he deſired. He thought therefore, if the conſent of the prince and princeſs of Orange could be obtained, it would be a great ſtep towards obtaining the ſame thing of the parliament. To that end, he reſolved to ſound the inclinations of the prince of Orange, without his appearing in it. He employed Mr. James Stewart [b], penſionary Fagel's acquaintance, who writ to that miniſter, endeavouring to perſuade him, that it was the intereſt of England, and of the prince and princeſs of Orange, that the teſt ſhould be abrogated, and the laws againſt the catholics repealed. This letter coming only from a private man, the prince would not allow Mr. Fagel to return an anſwer. Mr. Stewart in vain renewed his inſtances for an anſwer, till at laſt, he was obliged to acquaint Mr. Fagel, that his firſt letter was writ by the king's direction, who deſired to have the opinion of the prince and princeſs upon the affair. This, joined to the falſe report propagated in London, that the prince and princeſs of Orange had given their conſent to the abrogation of the teſt and penal laws, forced Mr. Fagel at laſt to anſwer Mr. Stewart, and let him know the ſentiments of the prince and princeſs of Orange.

The letters of theſe gentlemen have made ſo much noiſe in the world, and are ſo univerſally known, that I do not think it neceſſary to inſert them. I ſhall content myſelf with briefly refreſhing the reader's memory with the ſubſtance of Mr. Fagel's anſwer. He told Mr. Stewart, "That it was the opinion of the prince and princeſs, that no chriſtian ought to be puniſhed for his conſcience, or ill uſed becauſe he differed from the eſtabliſhed religion, and therefore could conſent, that the Roman catholics ſhould enjoy a full liberty of conſcience. That as to the non-conformiſts, their highneſſes did not only conſent, but heartily approved of their having an entire liberty of conſcience, for the exerciſe of their religion, without any trouble, hindrance, or moleſtation on that ſcore.———But their highneſſes could not by any means agree to the repeal of the teſt, and thoſe other penal laws, that tended to the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, ſince the Roman catholics received no other prejudice from theſe, than their being excluded from parliament and public employments; and that by them the proteſtant religion is ſheltered from all the deſigns of the Roman catholics againſt it, or againſt the public ſafety."

This anſwer was ſupported with reaſons ſo clear and ſolid, that Mr. Stewart finding himſelf too weak for ſuch an adverſary, thought it more adviſeable to deny all correſpondence with Mr. Fagel on this ſubject, in order to deſtroy the authority of Mr. Fagel's anſwer, which had been printed and diſperſed through England and all Europe. The penſionary, provoked at this proceeding, ſent a letter to the marquis of Albyville, the Engliſh embaſſador at the Hague, wherein he called him to witneſs, that the prince and princeſs of Orange had declared their thoughts to him concerning the penal laws, in the ſame manner as he had repreſented them; and that Albyville had acquainted the king with it long before he wrote his letter. He complained of the earl of Sunderland, for having aſſigned an allowance to print a pamphlet [c], which aſſerted, that the anſwer of Mr. Fagel to Mr. Stewart was ſuppoſititious, though he himſelf had ſent the original, and knew that the king had alſo ſeen it. This laſt letter was likewiſe printed in French and Engliſh, and diſperſed. All this was extremely injurious to the king, and began to give the Engliſh hopes, that the prince and princeſs of Orange would not abandon them in their preſſing neceſſities. It muſt be obſerved, that Mr. Fagel's letter to Mr. Stewart was writ on November the 4th, the laſt year before the queen's pregnancy was divulged. But this affair became not public, till the beginning of the year 1688.

The refuſal of the prince and princeſs of Orange to conſent to the abrogation of the teſt and penal laws, ſerved only to inflame the king's zeal, and oblige him to uſe freſh endeavours to have a parliament at his devotion. He ſent therefore emiſſaries into the ſeveral counties, to try to ſecure the elections, before he ventured to call a parliament. But the more ſollicitous he was to gain this point, the leſs inclination he found in the people, who, on ſo important an occaſion, were unwilling to truſt their intereſts with men devoted to the court, as the king deſired. Wherefore the king, foreſeeing all his artifices would prove unſucceſsful, and that he ſhould at laſt be obliged to uſe force, gave out commiſſions for raiſing new troops, for the increaſing of his ſtanding army; and likewiſe cauſed a larger fleet to be equipped. The new commiſſions were almoſt all given to Iriſh and popiſh officers.

Moreover, he wrote, the 17th of January, to the States-General, to demand the ſix Engliſh and Scotch regiments that were in their ſervice. The 2d of March he iſſued out a proclamation, "Forbidding his natural born ſubjects to enter or liſt themſelves in the ſervice of any foreign prince or ſtate, either by ſea or land."

The ſtates did not think proper to ſend theſe regiments to the king in the preſent juncture. They returned a civil anſwer, and declared, That having examined their engagements, they could find no agreement or capitulation that could oblige them to grant his majeſty's demands, except when he was in war with ſome of his neighbours, or there was an inſurrection at home. That they had accordingly ſent the ſix regiments into England in the year 1685, at the time of the duke of Monmouth's rebellion. But that now the king being in peace with his neighbours, and free from diſturbances at home, they ſaw no reaſon that could oblige them to ſend back thoſe troops. The king, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, renewed his inſtances. But the ſtates, in ſhewing how theſe regiments were formed, and the treaties which had been made about them, inſiſted, that they were obliged to ſend them back only in the two caſes above-mentioned, and that the king was not at preſent in either. At laſt, after a third fruitleſs attempt, the king, by a proclamation, called home all his ſubjects, which were in the ſervice of the States-General. Whereupon, the prince of Orange offered paſſes to all the officers of the ſix regiments that were willing to return home, which about forty of them accepted.

Though the king had publiſhed laſt year a declaration, for an entire liberty of conſcience to all his ſubjects, and, by virtue thereof, had filled almoſt all the offices with catholics, he thought fit to publiſh a ſecond upon the ſame ſubject, the 27th of April this year. Perhaps he had a mind to ſhew, that though he was deſirous of having what he had done, confirmed by parliament, he could, however, proceed without their concurrence, and act by abſolute power. Perhaps too, he intended to bring things to a criſis, being inceſſantly puſhed by his popiſh counſellors, who were for improving the occaſion offered them by the king's zeal. The declaration was as follows:

"James Rex,

"OUR conduct has been ſuch in all time, as ought to have perſuaded the world, that we are firm and conſtant to our reſolutions; yet that eaſy people may not be abuſed by the malice of crafty wicked men, we think fit to declare, that our intentions are not changed ſince the 4th of April 1687, when we iſſued out our declaration for liberty of conſcience in the following terms:" (Here the declaration was recited verbatim, and then it follows) "Ever ſince we granted this indulgence, we have made it our principal care to ſee it preſerved without diſtinction, as we are encouraged to do daily by multitudes of addreſſes, and many other aſſurances we receive from our ſubjects of all perſuaſions, as teſtimonies of their ſatisfaction and duty; the effects of which we doubt not but the next parliament will plainly ſhew; and that it will not be in vain, that we have reſolved to uſe our uttermoſt endeavours to eſtabliſh liberty of conſcience, on ſuch juſt and equal foundations, as will render it unalterable, and ſecure to all people the free exerciſe of their religion for ever; by which future ages may reap the benefit, of what is ſo undoubtedly for the general good of the whole kingdom. It is ſuch a ſecurity we deſire, without the burthen and conſtraint of oaths and teſts, which have been unhappily made by ſome governments, but could never ſupport any: nor ſhould men be advanced by ſuch means to offices and employments, which ought to be the reward of ſervices, fidelity, and merit. We muſt conclude, that not only good chriſtians will join in this, but whoever is concerned for the increaſe of the wealth and power of the nation. It would, perhaps, prejudice ſome of our neighbours, who might loſe part of thoſe vaſt advantages they now enjoy, if liberty of conſcience were ſettled in theſe kingdoms, which are, above all others, moſt capable of improvements, and of commanding the trade of the world. In purſuance of this great work we have been forced to make many changes both of civil and military officers throughout our dominions, not thinking any ought to be employed in our ſervice, who will not contribute towards eſtabliſhing the peace and greatneſs of their country, which we moſt earneſtly deſire, as unbiaſſed men may ſee by the whole conduct of our government, and by the condition of our fleet, and of our armies, which, with good management, ſhall be conſtantly the ſame, and greater, if the ſafety or honour of the nation require it. We recommend theſe conſiderations to all our ſubjects, and that they will reflect on their preſent eaſe and happineſs, how for above three years that it hath pleaſed God to permit us to reign over theſe kingdoms, we have not appeared to be that prince, our enemies would have made the world afraid of; our chief aim having been not to be the oppreſſor, but the father of our people; of which we can give no better evidence, than by conjuring them to lay aſide all private animoſities, as well as groundleſs jealouſies, and to chuſe ſuch members of parliament, as may do their parts to finiſh what we have begun for the advantage of the monarchy, over which Almighty God has placed us; being reſolved to call a parliament, that ſhall meet in November next at fartheſt."

The king was not ſatisfied with publiſhing this declaration in the uſual method, but thinking, without doubt, that, in ſo important an affair, extraordinary formalities were to be obſerved, he iſſued out an order of council, enjoining the biſhops to cauſe it to be ſent and diſtributed throughout their ſeveral dioceſes, to be read at the uſual times of divine ſervice, in all churches and chapels, on certain days named in the order. Some believed, the king had two views in this order; firſt, to mortify the church of England, againſt which he had for ſome time ſhewed great reſentment: ſecondly, to lay the biſhops under a neceſſity, either of making themſelves in ſome meaſure the inſtruments of his deſigns againſt the proteſtant religion, or of incurring the penalties of their diſobedience in caſe of refuſal.

Upon the receipt of this order, ſeveral biſhops, who were in London, aſſembled at the archbiſhop's palace at Lambeth, to conſult how they were to behave upon ſo nice an occaſion. For they were neceſſarily, either in obeying the king, to approve by their conduct this violation of the laws, and betray the intereſts of the proteſtant religion, or in refuſing to obey, to draw upon themſelves the penalties which, in all appearances, would be inflicted for their diſobedience. Theſe difficulties were debated in this aſſembly with all the care ſo important an affair required, after they had implored the divine aſſiſtance by extraordinary prayers. The reſult of their conference was, that it was better to obey God than man, and their caſe being ſuch, that they could not obey the king without betraying their own conſciences, they ought without further conſideration to expoſe themſelves to the approaching ſtorm, rather than ſacrifice the intereſts of God and the church. This reſolution was grounded upon four conſiderations. 1. That many would juſtly deem the clergy either cowards or hypocritical time-ſervers, in publiſhing what they thought illegal, and illegally ſent to them. 2. That many who had votes for parliament-men, would take this for the conſent of the publiſhers, and be ſtrengthened in the chuſing ſuch men as ſhould be friends, not only to the indulgence, but to the foundation of it, the diſpenſing power. 3. That the world would have reaſon to take their publication for an approbation, becauſe there could be no other intention in ordering it to be publiſhed, but to make the clergy parties to it. 4. That after this they muſt expect farther things to be publiſhed by them, at which they muſt make a ſtand; and their making a ſtand when they had loſt their reputation, would be of no force.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the conſulting biſhops, being ſeven, before they parted, drew up a petition, and ſubſcribing it the ſame day, the 18th of May, ſix of them croſſed[d] the water to Whitehall, to preſent it to the king, without acquainting any perſon with their deſign. Their names were Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lloyd biſhop of St. Aſaph, Kenn of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chicheſter, White of Peterborough, and Trelawny of Briſtol. Their petition ran thus:

To the King's moſt Excellent Majeſty.

The humble petition of William archbiſhop of Canterbury, and divers of the ſuffragan biſhops of that province, now preſent with him, in behalf of themſelves and other of their abſent brethren, and of the inferior clergy of their reſpective dioceſes.

"Humbly ſheweth,

"THAT the great averſeneſs they find in themſelves, to the diſtributing and publiſhing in all their churches, your majeſty's late declaration for liberty of conſcience, proceeds neither from any want of duty and obedience to your majeſty, (our holy mother the church of England being, both in her principles, and in her conſtant practice, unqueſtionably loyal, and having, to her great honour, been more than once publicly acknowledged to be ſo by your gracious majeſty) nor yet from any want of tenderneſs to diſſenters, in relation to whom we are willing to come to ſuch a temper, as ſhall be though fit, when the matters ſhall be conſidered and ſettled in parliament and convocation: but among many other conſiderations, from this eſpecially, becauſe that declaration is founded upon ſuch a diſpenſing power, as hath been often declared illegal in parliament, and particularly in the years 1662, and 1672, and in the beginning of your majeſty's reign; and is a matter of ſo great moment and conſequence to the whole nation, both in church and ſtate, that your petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or conſcience, ſo far make themſelves parties to it, as the diſtribution of it all over the nation, and the ſolemn publication of it once and again, even in God's houſe, and in the time of his divine ſervice, muſt amount to, in common and reaſonable conſtruction. Your petitioners therefore moſt humbly and earneſtly beſeech your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed not to inſiſt upon their diſtributing and reading your majeſty's ſaid declaration; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, ſhall ever pray, &c."

The king, ſurprized, and incenſed at this petition, anſwered in a very angry tone: "I have heard of this before, but did not believe it: I did not expect this from the church of England, eſpecially from ſome of you. If I change my mind, you ſhall hear from me; if not, I expect my command ſhall be obeyed." The biſhops replied, "We reſign ourſelves to the will of God," and then immediately retired.

The biſhops of Durham and Rocheſter, both eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners[e], cauſed the declaration to be read in their dioceſes. But it generally happened, wherever it was read, that the congregation immediately left the church. One miniſter, before he began to read it, told his flock, "That he could not refuſe the order ſent him to read the declaration, but that he knew no order which obliged them to hear it." In London it was read but in four or five churches[f].

Mean time, the court was unreſolved what courſe to take with the biſhops. Not but that they were determined to come to extremities, rather than quit their deſigns. However, they did not care to begin with the biſhops, becauſe of the people's reverence for them. Though the king's council perſuaded him to do all things with a high hand, they trembled, however, when they met with any oppoſition, ſeeing the great diſproportion between the number of proteſtants and papiſts. They conſidered, that while every one was ſubmiſſive, the lords-lieutenants of counties, and the magiſtrates, all creatures of the king, had great credit and authority: but ſhould the people happen to grow weary of their obedience, and openly reſiſt, their authority would vaniſh; and it was not probable, the leſſer number ſhould ſubdue the greater. This had been the caſe in the reign of Richard II. and very lately in that of Charles I. It ſeems therefore, that prudence required the king carefully to avoid what might produce a certain revolution, and not to enter upon violent meaſures, till he had taken greater precautions. For, upon ſuppoſition of a rebellion, which was not impoſſible, if the biſhops were proceeded againſt with rigour, was it not a groſs error, to rely on a proteſtant army to introduce popery, and force proteſtants to ſubmiſſion? But on the other hand, thoſe who directed the king in his councils and undertakings, had not his intereſt chiefly in view, but that of the catholic religion. They conſidered the king only as an inſtrument to be uſed, at all events, whilſt he was alive, for fear they ſhould ſudenly loſe him. God ſeems to have blinded this prince, to prevent his ſeeing what every one elſe clearly ſaw, in order to throw him upon his ruin. He was therefore reſolved to proceed with the utmoſt rigour againſt the biſhops, and for that purpoſe they were ſummoned to appear before the council the 8th of June.

On their appearance, they were aſked, "Whether they owned the petition?" The biſhops ſurpriſed at this queſtion, ſince they themſelves had preſented the petition, feared ſome ſnare was laid for them, and therefore at firſt forbore to give a direct anſwer[g]. At laſt, the archbiſhop confeſſed, that it was written with his own hand, and that the reſt had ſigned it; adding withal, they had done nothing but what they were ready to juſtify. The chancellor endeavoured to make them ſenſible of the ill conſequences of their diſobedience, which tended to diminiſh the king's authority, and to diſturb the peace of the kingdom. At laſt, he aſked them, whether they would give their recognizances to appear before the court of King's-Bench to anſwer this high miſdemeanour? This they all refuſed, inſiſting on the privilege of their peerage, which they were reſolved to maintain, as well as the rights of the church, being equally bound by their callings to oppoſe all innovations both in government and religion. The chancellor, ſurpriſed at their conſtancy, threatened to ſend them to the Tower, and to proſecute them to the utmoſt rigour of the law, unleſs they immediately recanted, and withdrew their petition. They unanimouſly anſwered, That they were ready to go wherever his majeſty was pleaſed to ſend them; that they hoped the king of kings would be their protector and their judge; that they feared nothing from men; and that having acted according to law and their own conſciences, no puniſhments ſhould ever be able to ſhake their reſolutions.

Upon this anſwer, eighteen privy-councillors, ſeveral of them papiſts[h], were for ſending the biſhops to the Tower. A warrant was immediately drawn and ſigned for their commitment, the reaſon given being, "For contriving, making, and publiſhing a ſeditious libel againſt his majeſty and his government." It is difficult to conceive upon what foundation, they could be accuſed of publiſhing a petition which they had only delivered to the king himſelf. However, the attorney and ſollicitor-general, were ordered to proſecute them for the ſame the next term. It was not thought proper to ſend them to the Tower through London, for fear it might occaſion a tumult. They were therefore in the moſt private manner conveyed by water. But people hearing of it, flocked in multitudes to the river-ſide, and upon their knees defired their bleſſing, with loud acclamations extolling their conſtancy. The ſame ſpectacle was ſeen at the Tower, where the ſoldiers of the garriſon fell on their knees to beg their bleſſing.

This was a great mortification to the king, and might have convinced him, that he was yet very far from his aim. But, as I ſaid, the deſign of his counſellors was to make haſte and finiſh the work begun, for fear ſome accident ſhould deprive them of their inſtrument.

Two days after the biſhops had been ſent to the Tower, the 10th of June, the queen was delivered of a prince, who, during the life of his father was known by the name of the "prince of Wales," and afterwards, by ſome was called the "Pretender." His birth was an occaſion of triumph to the papiſts, but of aſtoniſhment and terror to the proteſtants, who ſaw their hopes defeated, that their misfortunes would end with the death of the king. It is univerſally known, that the birth of this prince has been very much ſuſpected, and that many did then, and ſtill do, believe it ſuppoſititious. Multitudes of papers have been publiſhed for and againſt, ſome containing the grounds of the ſuſpicions, and others, arguments to remove them. The reader, doubtleſs, expects not from a foreigner, the deciſion of a fact which was never perfectly cleared, the impoſture whereof reſts only upon conjectures and probabilities, and the truth upon ſuppoſitions, which indeed are generally true, but of which it cannot be ſaid, that it is impoſſible they may be ſometimes falſe. In general, it is very certain, the queen, during the whole time of her pregnancy, was ſuſpected of a deſign to impoſe an heir upon the kingdom, and this ſuſpicion was very public. It is alſo certain, that though the king and queen knew of this ſuſpicion, they took no care to remove it. On the contrary, their whole conduct, as well during the queen's pregnancy, as her labour, gave ſtill greater ſtrength to the ſuſpicion. For a negligence which ſignifies nothing when there is no ſuſpicion, muſt be remarked when an impoſture is ſuſpected. On the other hand, it ſeems a ſtanding rule, that, when both parents expreſs not any doubt concerning the birth of their child, no perſon can be ſure they are deceived. But this rule is perhaps not ſo general and certain as many imagine. It is very good where there is no ſuſpicion of a cheat. But in caſe a preſumptive heir, diſinherited by the birth of a child, who comes to take his place, has good proofs that the child is ſuppoſititious, certainly the bare owning of this child by both parents, will not invalidate proofs, which I ſuppoſe to be full. It is not impoſſible for a man and wife to ſuppoſe a child, through revenge, or ſome other intereſt, in order to deprive a preſumptive heir of their inheritance. I ſay, it is not impoſſible, though it rarely happens. There are however inſtances to prove the poſſibility. Indeed, to decide by law, that a child is ſuppoſititious, very convincing proofs muſt be alledged, becauſe the judges, who are obliged to follow the rules of law, are not determined by appearances, however probable they may be. But the caſe is not the ſame with the public, on whom very often conjectures grounded upon great probabilities, make as much impreſſion as the ſtrongeſt proofs. The affair in queſtion having never been legally decided, I can only preſent the reader with what has been moſt probably urged pro and con, in order to aſſiſt him either to be determined for or againſt the pretended ſuppoſition of the prince of Wales, or to ſhew him, that he ought to ſuſpend his judgment, till the thing is more plainly diſcovered. This I propoſe to do with impartiality, in producing the arguments alledged on both ſides.

There are three opinions concerning the real or pretended birth of the prince of Wales.

The firſt is, that the queen was not with child when ſhe pretended to be ſo, and that at the time of her pretended delivery, a ſon was ſuppoſed to be born of her. The ſecond is, that ſhe was really with child, but that having the misfortune of a miſcarriage, ſhe continued ſtill to feign herſelf big, and at laſt ſuppoſed, or cauſed to be ſuppoſed, a child as born of her body, and that this child dying ſhortly after, another was ſubſtituted in his room, and to this, dying ſeven weeks after, ſucceeded another child. The third opinion is, that the queen was really with child, and delivered the 10th of June of a ſon, the ſame who is ſince called the pretender, and is now at Rome. In confirmation of the firſt of theſe opinions it is alledged: 1. That the king, for certain reaſons, was become incapable of children. 2. That the queen had been ſeven years without being with child. 3. That now ſhe had never a conſtant reckoning. 4. That her delivery was ſudden, and immediately after the removing of her lodgings. 5. That it was on a Sunday morning, when all the proteſtant court ladies were at church. 6. That neither the princeſs Anne of Denmark, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, nor the [g] It ſeems, as the biſhops were going to the council, they were adviſed to remember, that no man was obliged by the law to accuſe himſelf. Accordingly, when the king in council, holding the petition in his hand, aſked them whether they had ſigned that paper? they made a low bow, and ſaid nothing. What, ſays the king, do you deny your own hands? upon which they ſilently bowed again. Then the king told them, if they would own it to be their hands, upon his royal word not a hair of their heads ſhould be touched. Whereupon the archbiſhop ſays, "Relying on your Majeſty's word, I confeſs it to be my hand:" and ſo ſaid all the reſt. Then being ordered to withdraw, when they were called in again, they found the king vaniſhed, and Jefferies in the chair, who uſing them very roughly, ſent them to the Tower. The tranſlator had theſe particulars from the late biſhop of Durham's own mouth.

[h] They were, chancellor Jefferies, the marquis of Powis, the earls of Sunderland, Mulgrave, Huntingdon, Peterborough, Craven, Murray, Middleton, Melfort, and Caſtlemain; the lords Arundel, Darthmouth, Godolphin, and Dover; Sir John Erely, Sir Edward Herbert, and Sir Nicholas Butler. Dutch embaſſador, were preſent at her labour, though they were the three perſons who ought principally to have been there. 7. That during the labour, her bed was not left ſo open as it ſhould have been. 8. That while ſhe went with child, ſhe never ſatisfied the princeſs Anne, and many proteſtant ladies about her, of her pregnancy, either by letting them feel her belly, or ſee her breaſts. 9. Neither did ſhe ſhew the princeſs any of her milk after her lying-in. 10. That during her labour, a warming-pan was brought into the room, though the weather was extreme hot, and the room heated by a vaſt crowd of people. Laſtly, It was alledged, that though the king, queen and courtiers, ſufficiently knew before the delivery, that the nation ſuſpected an impoſture, they did not uſe thoſe precautions as they might and ought to have done in ſuch a caſe; and, inſtead of putting it beyond all poſſibility of doubt, they left ſo many marks of ſuſpicion, as cauſed infinite doubts and diſputes: inſomuch, that ſome Roman catholics themſelves owned, "That ſo important an affair had been managed with great ſupineneſs and imprudence." This is what Mr. Echard ſays, one of the moſt moderate hiſtorians, who is not to be ſuſpected by the king's adherents.

Dr. Welwood is very ſhort in his account of this matter, and contents himſelf with giving the general opinion, without any thing of his own. Theſe are his words:

"While the biſhops were in the Tower, the Roman catholics had their hopes crowned with the birth of a pretended prince of Wales. The fears of a proteſtant ſucceſſor, had been the only allay that rendered their proſperity leſs perfect. Now the happineſs of having an heir to the crown, to be bred up in their own religion, quaſhed all thoſe fears, and atoned for the uncertainty of the king's life. It was ſo much their intereſt to have one, and there were ſo many circumſtances that ſeemed to render his birth ſuſpicious, that the nation in general were inclinable to believe, that this was the laſt effort of the party, to accompliſh our ruin."

But the moſt circumſtantial account of this affair, is that of Dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, in the "Hiſtory of his own times," publiſhed ſince his death. As I am to make ſome remarks on his teſtimony, it will be neceſſary to inſert the following paſſage, wherein he expreſly ſpeaks of the birth of the prince of Wales.

"I muſt now look back to England, where the queen's delivery was the ſubject of all men's diſcourſe. And ſince ſo much depends on this, I will give as full and as diſtinct an account of all that related to that matter, as I could gather up, either at that time or afterwards. The queen had been for ſix or ſeven years in ſuch an ill ſtate of health, that every winter brought her very near death. Thoſe about her ſeemed well aſſured, that ſhe, who had buried all her children ſoon after they were born, and had now for ſeveral years ceaſed bearing, would have no more children. Her own prieſts apprehended it, and ſeemed to wiſh for her death. She had great and frequent diſtempers, that returned often, which put all people out of their hopes or fears of her having any children. Her ſpirits were now much on the fret. She was eager in the proſecution of all the king's deſigns. It was believed, that ſhe had a main hand in driving him to them all. And he, perhaps, to make her gentler to him in his vagrant amours, was more eaſy to her in every thing elſe. The lady Dorcheſter was come back from Ireland; and the king went often to her. But it was viſible, ſhe was not like to gain that credit in affairs, to which ſhe had aſpired: and therefore this was leſs conſidered.

"She had another mortification, when Fitz-James the king's ſon was made duke of Berwick. He was a ſoft and harmleſs young man, and was much beloved by the king; but the queen's diſlike kept him from making any great figure. He made two campaigns in Hungary, that were little to his honour: for, as his governor diverted the allowance that was given for keeping a table, and ſent him always to eat at other tables, ſo, though in the ſiege of Buda there were many occaſions given him to have diſtinguiſhed himſelf, yet he had appeared in none of them. There was more care taken of his perſon, than became his age and condition. Yet his governor's brother was a jeſuit, and in the ſecret: ſo every thing was ventured on by him, and all was forgiven him.

"In September the former year, the queen went to the bath, where the king came and ſaw her, and ſtaid a few days with her. She after that purſued a full courſe of bathing: and having reſolved to return in the end of September, an accident took her to which the ſex is ſubject; and that made her ſtay there a week longer. She came to Windſor on the 6th of October. It was ſaid, that at the very time of her coming to the king, her mother, the ducheſs of Modena, made a vow to the lady Loretto, that her daughter might by her means have a ſon. And it went current, that the queen believed herſelf to be with child in that very inſtant in which her mother made her vow: of which, ſome travellers have aſſured me, there was a ſolemn record made at Loretto. A conception ſaid to be thus begun, looked ſuſpicious. It was now fixed to the 6th of October: ſo the nine months were to run to the 6th of July. She was, in the progreſs of her big belly, let blood ſeveral times: and the moſt aſtringent things that could be propoſed were uſed.

"It was ſoon obſerved that all things about her perſon were managed with a myſterious ſecrecy, into which none were admitted but a few papiſts. She was not dreſſed nor undreſſed with the uſual ceremony. Prince George told me, that the princeſs went as far in deſiring to be ſatisfied, by feeling the motion, after ſhe ſaid ſhe was quick, as ſhe could go without breaking with her: and ſhe had ſometimes ſtaid by her even indecently long in mornings to ſee her riſe, and to give her her ſhift: but ſhe never did either. She never offered any ſatisfaction in that matter by letter to the princeſs of Orange, nor to any of the ladies of quality, in whoſe word the world would have acquieſced. The thing, upon this, began to be ſuſpected: and ſome libels were writ, treating the whole as an impoſture. The uſe the queen made of this, was, to ſay, that ſince ſhe ſaw ſome were ſuſpecting her capable of ſo black a contrivance, ſhe ſcorned to ſatisfy thoſe who could entertain ſuch thoughts of her. How juſt ſoever this might be, with relation to the libellers, yet certainly if ſhe was truly with child, ſhe owed it to the king and herſelf, to the king's daughters, but moſt of all to the infant ſhe carried in her belly, to give ſuch reaſonable ſatisfaction, as might put an end to jealouſy. This was in her power to do every day, and her not doing it, gave juſt grounds of ſuſpicion.

"Things went thus on till Monday in Eaſter week. On that day the king went to Rocheſter, to ſee ſome of the naval preparations; but was ſoon ſent for by the queen, who apprehended ſhe was in danger of miſcarrying. Dr. Scarborough was come to Knightſbridge to ſee biſhop Ward, my predeceſſor, who had been his ancient friend, and was then his patient: but the queen's coach was ſent to call him with all haſte, ſince ſhe was near miſcarrying. Dr. Windebank, who knew nothing of this matter, ſtaid long that morning upon an appointment with Dr. Walgrave, another of the queen's phyſicians, who, the next time he ſaw him, excuſed himſelf; for the queen, he ſaid, was then under the moſt apparent ſigns of miſcarrying. Of this the doctor made oath, and it is yet extant.

"On the ſame day, the counteſs of Clarendon, being to go out of town for a few days, came to ſee the queen before ſhe went, knowing nothing of what had happened to her. And ſhe, being a lady of the bed-chamber to the queen-dowager, did, according to the rule of the court, go into the queen's bed-chamber, without aſking admittance. She ſaw the queen a-bed, bemoaning herſelf in a moſt doleful manner, ſaying often, 'Undone, undone:' and one that belonged to her, carried ſomewhat out of the bed, which ſhe believed was linen taken from the queen. She was, upon this, in ſome confuſion: and the counteſs of Powis coming in, went to her, and ſaid with ſome ſharpneſs, What do you do here? and carried her to the door. Before ſhe had got out of the court, one of the bed-chamber women followed her, and charged her not to ſpeak of any thing ſhe had ſeen that day. This matter, whatever was in it, was huſhed up: and the queen held on her courſe.

"The princeſs had miſcarried in the ſpring. So, as ſoon as ſhe had recovered her ſtrength, the king preſſed her to go to the Bath, ſince that had ſo good an effect on the queen. Some of her phyſicians, and all her other friends, were againſt her going. Lower, one of her phyſicians, told me, he was againſt it: he thought ſhe was not ſtrong enough for the bath, though the king preſſed it with an unuſual vehemence. Millington, another phyſician, told the earl of Shrewſbury, from whom I had it, that he was preſſed to go to the princeſs, and adviſe her to go to the Bath. The perſon that ſpoke to him told him, the king was much ſet on it; and that he expected it of him, that he would perſuade her to it. Millington anſwered, He would not adviſe a patient according to direction, but according to his own reaſon: ſo he would not go. Scarborough and Witherby took it upon them to adviſe it: ſo ſhe went thither in the end of May.

"As ſoon as ſhe was gone, thoſe about the queen did all of the ſudden change her reckoning, and began it from the king's being with her at Bath. This came on ſo quick, that though though the queen had ſet the fourteenth of June for her going to Windſor, where ſhe intended to lie-in, and all the preparations for the birth, and for the children were ordered to be made ready by the end of June, yet now a reſolution was taken for the queen's lying-in at St. James's, and directions were given to have all things quickly ready. The Bath water either did not agree with the princeſs: or the advices of her friends were ſo preſſing, who thought her abſence from the court at that time of ſuch conſequence, that in compliance with them ſhe gave it out it did not, and therefore ſhe would return in a few days.

"The day after the court had this notice, the queen ſaid ſhe would go to St. James's, and look for the good hour. She was often told, that it was impoſſible upon ſo ſhort a warning to have things ready. But ſhe was ſo poſitive, that ſhe ſaid, ſhe would lie there that night, though ſhe ſhould lie upon the boards. And at night, though the ſhorter and quicker way was to go from Whitehall to St. James's thro' the Park, and ſhe always went that way, yet now, by a ſort of affectation, ſhe would be carried thither by Charing-Croſs through the Pall-Mall. And it was given out by all her train, that ſhe was going to be delivered. Some ſaid it would be next morning: and the prieſts ſaid very confidently, that it would be a boy.

"The next morning about nine o'clock, ſhe ſent word to the king that ſhe was in labour. The queen dowager was next ſent to. But no ladies were ſent for: ſo that no women were in the room, but two dreſſers, and one under-dreſſer, and the midwife. The earl of Arran ſent notice to the counteſs of Sunderland; ſo ſhe came. The lady Bellaſis came alſo in time. The proteſtant ladies that belonged to the court were all gone to church, before the news was let go abroad: for it happened on Trinity Sunday, it being that year on the 10th of June. The king brought over with him from Whitehall a great many peers and privy councillors. And of theſe, eighteen were let into the bed-chamber; but they ſtood at the fartheſt end of the room. The ladies ſtood within the alcove. The curtains of the bed were drawn cloſe, and none came within them but the midwife, and an under-dreſſer. The queen lay all the while a-bed: and in order to the warming one ſide of it, a warming-pan was brought, but it was not opened, that it might be ſeen that there was fire and nothing elſe in it. So here was matter for ſuſpicion, with which ll people were filled.

"A little before ten the queen cried out as in a ſtrong pain, and immediately after the midwife ſaid aloud, ſhe was happily brought to bed. When the lords all cried out, of what? the midwife anſwered, the queen muſt not be ſurprized; only ſhe gave a ſign to the counteſs of Sunderland, who upon that touched her forehead, by which, it being the ſign before agreed on, the king ſaid, he knew it was a boy. No cries were heard from the child; nor was it ſhewed to thoſe in the room. It was pretended more air was neceſſary. The under-dreſſer went out of the room with the child, or ſomewhat elſe in her arms, to a dreſſing-room, to which there was a door near the queen's bed; but there was another entry to it from other apartments. The king continued with the lords in the bed-chamber for ſome minutes, which was either a ſign of much phlegm upon ſuch an occaſion; for it was not known whether the child was alive or dead: or it looked like giving time for ſome management. After a little while they went all into the dreſſing-room, and then the news was publiſhed. In the mean while, no body was called to lay their hands on the queen's belly, in order to a full ſatisfaction. When the princeſs came to town, three days after, ſhe had as little ſatisfaction given her. Chamberlain the man-midwife, who was always ordered to attend her labour before, and who brought the plaiſters for putting back the milk, wondered that he had not been ſent to. He went according to cuſtom with the plaiſters: but he was told they had no occaſion for him. He fancied that ſome other perſon was put in his place; but he could not find any that had it. All that concerned the milk, or the queen's purgations, was managed ſtill in the dark. This made all people inclined more and more to believe, there was a baſe impoſture now put on the nation. That ſtill increaſed. That night one Hemings, a very worthy man, an apothecary by his trade, who lived in St. Martin's Lane, the very next door to a family of an eminent papiſt, (Brown, b other to the viſcount Montacute, lived there) the wall between his parlour and theirs being ſo thin, that he could eaſily hear any thing that was ſaid with a loud voice; he (Hemings) was reading in his parlour late at night, when he heard one coming into the neighbouring parlour, and ſay with a doleful voice, the prince of Wales is dead: upon which a great many that lived in the houſe came down ſtairs very quick: upon this confuſion he could not hear any thing more; but it was plain, they were in a great conſternation. He went with the news next morning to the biſhops in the Tower. The counteſs of Clarendon came thither ſoon after, and told them, ſhe had been at the young prince's door, but was denied acceſs: ſhe was amazed at it; and aſked if they knew her: they ſaid they did, but that the queen had ordered that no perſon whatſoever ſhould be ſuffered to come in to him. This gave credit to Hemings's ſtory, and looked as if all was ordered to be ſhut up cloſe, till another child was found. One, that ſaw the child two days after, ſaid to me, that he looked ſtrong, and not like a child ſo newly born. Windebank met Walgrave the day after his birth, and remembered him of what he had told him eight weeks before. He acknowledged what he had ſaid, but added, that God wrought miracles: to which no reply could or durſt be made by the other: it needed none. So healthy a child being ſo little like any of thoſe the queen had borne, it was given out, that he had fits and could not live. But thoſe who ſaw him every day obſerved no ſuch thing. On the contrary, the child was in a very proſperous ſtate. None of thoſe fits ever happened, when the princeſs was at court; for ſhe could not be denied admittance, though all others were. So this was believed to be given out to make the matter more credible. It is true, ſome weeks after that, the court being gone to Windſor, and the child being ſent to Richmond, he fell into ſuch fits, that four phyſicians were ſent for. They all looked on him as a dying child. The king and queen were ſent for. The phyſicians went to a dinner prepared for them; and were often wondering that they were not called for. They took it for granted, that the child was dead. But, when they went in after dinner to look on him, they ſaw a ſound healthy child, that ſeemed to have had no ſort of illneſs on him. It was ſaid that the child was ſtrangely revived of a ſudden. Some of the phyſicians told Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph, that it was not poſſible for them to think it was the ſame child. They looked on one another, but durſt not ſpeak what they thought.

"Thus I have related ſuch particulars as I could gather of his birth: to which ſome more ſhall be added, when I give an account of the proof that the king brought afterwards to put this matter out of doubt; but by which it became indeed more doubtful than ever. I took moſt of theſe from the informations that were ſent over to the prince and princeſs of Orange, as I had many from the vouchers themſelves. I do not mix with theſe, the various reports that were, both then and afterwards, ſpread of this matter, of which biſhop Lloyd has a great collection, moſt of them well atteſted. What truth ſoever may be in theſe, this is certain, that the method in which this matter was conducted from firſt to laſt was very unaccountable. If an impoſture had been intended, it could not have been otherwiſe managed. The pretended excuſe that the queen made, that ſhe owed no ſatisfaction to thoſe who could ſuſpect her capable of ſuch a baſe forgery, was the only excuſe that ſhe could have made, if it had been really what it was commonly ſaid to be. She ſeemed to be ſoon recovered, and was ſo little altered by her labour, either in her looks or voice, that this helped not a little to increaſe jealouſies. The rejoicings over England upon this birth, were very cold and forced. Bonfires were made in ſome places, and a ſet of congratulatory addreſſes went round the nation. None durſt oppoſe them. But all was formal, and only to make a ſhew."

After having related what has been ſaid by Echard, and the biſhop of Saliſbury, on the birth of the prince of Wales, I ſhall make ſome remarks on this ſubject.

1. If the accounts of theſe two famous writers be carefully examined, it will doubtleſs be ſurpriſing, to find a ſort of contradiction between them. For the ſuſpicions mentioned by Echard are, that the queen, though ſhe pretended to be, yet was not with child. Nay, the biſhop of Saliſbury ſeems at firſt to ſupport this ſuſpicion, by ſpeaking of her "great and frequent diſtempers;" of her having "for ſeveral years ceaſed bearing;" of her having "buried all her children ſoon after they were born;" of her refuſing to give ſatisfaction to the princeſs of Denmark, and the proteſtant ladies of the court. Nevertheleſs, he ſays poſitively afterwards, that ſhe was really with child the 6th of October[1], and that in Eaſter week ſhe had a miſcarriage, that is, ſix months after conception. If this be true, it very plainly follows, that all the ſuſpicions entertained of the queen from the beginning of January (the time of her declared pregnancy) to Eaſter week, ought to vaniſh, though ſhe had been leſs careful of giving ſatisfaction to the public, than ſhe was. Aſſuredly this negligence is not capable to invalidate the reality of her pregnancy, if ſhe had a miſcarriage in the beginning of her ſeventh month. What the prince of Denmark told Dr. Burnet of his princeſs's fruitleſs endeavours to ſee the queen riſe, cannot ſerve to confirm the ſuſpicion of an impoſture, unleſs it appears that this was from the Monday before Eaſter, to the 10th of June[k]. But the biſhop fixes no time. It might even be inferred from the order obſerved by the biſhop in his ſtory, that what he ſays concerning the princeſs of Denmark, paſſed between January and Eaſter week. But ſuppoſing the reality of the pregnancy, it is clear, that the queen might have given ſatisfaction to the princeſs, and the proteſtant court-ladies. And it cannot be denied, that ſhe committed a great error in refuſing to do it. But it is certain, this refuſal proves nothing, if it be true that ſhe was with child, at leaſt till Eaſter week. The times are therefore carefully to be diſtinguiſhed. Her obſtinacy to give no ſatisfaction from January, when ſhe declared herſelf with child, to Eaſter week, can be aſcribed only to an unſeaſonable and prepoſterous haughtineſs. But it may be ſuſpected, that from Eaſter week to the 10th of June, ſhe ſtill pretended to be with child, when ſhe was no longer ſo, and that ſhe produced another at the time of her pretended delivery. Thus all the ſuſpicions concerning the reality of her pregnancy, are to be included within the ſpace of two months. For in the year 1688, Eaſter-day was the 15th of April; the queen had a miſcarriage the Monday before Eaſter, on the 9th of April; and ſhe was delivered the 10th of June. But no time is fixed for this refuſal of ſatisfaction to the public, though, the queen being ſix months gone when ſhe miſcarried, ſhe might, for ſome time, have cauſed the motion of the child to be perceived.

[1] He only ſays, "it went current, that the queen believed herſelf to be with child on October 6." p. 749.

2. In the biſhop of Saliſbury's account, are four ſeveral children. The firſt, which really belonged to the queen, was an untimely birth of ſix months. The ſecond was ſuppoſed at the time of her pretended delivery, and died the ſame day. The third was brought in the room of the dead child, and died alſo ſome weeks after at Richmond. The fourth, ſubſtituted in the room of the third, muſt be the preſent pretender. It is ſurprizing, that Echard, who probably writ the hiſtory of this reign, but twenty or twenty five years after the time I am ſpeaking of, ſhould have heard nothing of theſe two laſt impoſtures, but confines himſelf to one, in what he relates concerning the public ſuſpicions.

3. Fuller, who pretended to give an exact account of the cheats, agrees not with the biſhop of Saliſbury. But I ſhall not inſiſt on his teſtimony, becauſe his pretended diſcovery has been little regarded.

4. It remains therefore to examine what the biſhop of Saliſbury ſays, to make us ſuſpect the ſuppoſition of the three laſt children. For, the firſt, which was but a miſcarriage, according to this author, was really the queen's. To this end, we are to diſtinguiſh three different times, namely, before, at, and after her delivery. I ſhall make ſome obſervations upon the moſt remarkable circumſtances of each of theſe times.

1. The king's preſſing the princeſs to go to the Bath, agrees very well with the deſign of ſuppoſing an heir. For the preſence of the princeſs at the queen's pretended delivery, muſt have been perplexing, on account of her intereſt to detect the impoſture. Had the king contented himſelf with barely adviſing her to go to Bath, nothing could have been inferred from it, but that he thought the Bath good for her health. But his preſſing it with an unuſual vehemence, and cauſing a phyſician to be told, that he expected it of him that he would perſuade her to it, ſeem to diſcover ſome ſecret deſign, eſpecially, when it is conſidered, that an impoſture was already ſuſpected. This ſuſpicion is farther confirmed by the change of the queen's reckoning, and by her delivery two days after it was known that the princeſs was upon the point of returning from the Bath. But there muſt not be given to this cauſe of ſuſpicion, more ſtrength than it really has. For as it is very poſſible for the king to have believed, that the Bath would be of ſervice to the princeſs his daughter, the ſuſpicion of his acting from another motive, is founded only upon the ſuppoſition of an impoſture. If this was well proved, the king's proceeding would become a ſort of new proof. But as it is not, it ſeems that the ſuſpicion ought not to be ſupported by the ſuppoſition of the fact in queſtion.

2. If it is true, that the queen did not believe herſelf with child till the 6th of October, and that ſhe afterwards ſuddenly changed her reckoning, there is reaſon to ſuſpect ſome myſtery in it. And indeed, by this new reckoning ſhe was to be brought to bed during the abſence of the princeſs of Denmark, whereas by the firſt ſhe could not be delivered till after her return. To this may be added, that if it is true, that about the end of September ſhe was ſtopped at the Bath, one week longer than ſhe intended, by an accident to which the ſex is ſubject, ſhe could not be with child from the 10th of September, nor conſequently brought to bed the 10th of June. To this it is anſwered, that theſe miſreckonings are common to the whole ſex. But this reaſon cannot take place here, becauſe it did not appear that the queen thought herſelf miſtaken.

3. It cannot be denied, that that there is ſomething extraordinary in the queen's ſudden reſolution, of going to lye-in at St. James's, when things were not ready. Hitherto no probable reaſon has been given of this ſudden change, to ſhew that ſhe could lye-in more commodiouſly at St. James's than at Whitehall, nor why ſhe at firſt choſe Windſor for the place, and fixed the time to the beginning of July.

4. I own I ſee nothing in the queen's affectation of being carried to St. James's by Charing-Croſs, through the Pall-Mall, to confirm the ſuſpicion of an impoſture.

5. I never heard, that the preſence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury is abſolutely neceſſary at the delivery of the queens of England, eſpecially at that of a popiſh queen, who could have no great need of his aſſiſtance.

As for the time of the queen's delivery, there are many things to be examined.

1. The queen, after having declared her intention to lye-in at St. James's, without any apparent neceſſity, was bent to go thither on the Saturday, though nothing was ready. This is a ſign, ſhe thought it would be too late if ſhe deferred going till the next day. It is therefore clear, that ſhe expected the moment of her delivery every hour, and yet when ſhe began to find herſelf ill, "No women were in the room but two dreſſers, one under-dreſſer, and the midwife." Not one foreign lady was in the palace. It cannot be denied, that this was very extraordinary for a queen, ſince it was ſo eaſy to have other ladies at hand to aſſiſt her, and the more, as ſhe hourly expected the moment of her delivery. It is no leſs extraordinary, that none of the court-ladies were called beſides the counteſs of Sunderland, by the particular care of the earl of Arran; and the queen-dowager, who lodged in Somerſet-houſe, a great way from St. James's. All this ſeems to diſcover, it was not deſired that many ladies ſhould be preſent at the labour. To this it is anſwered, that the queen was ſurprized, as women frequently are, and that the proteſtant ladies were at church. But ſome take occaſion from hence to confirm their ſuſpicion. They ſuppoſe, the queen would not have gone with ſo much precipitation on Saturday night, to St. James's, if ſhe had not known ſhe ſhould be delivered the next morning, while the proteſtant ladies were employed at their devotions. But after all, this is only a ſuſpicion. For, who can be ſure, that the queen acted by the motive aſcribed to her? All that can be ſaid, is, that the point in queſtion being a child, who, if a boy, was to take place of a princeſs, preſumptive heir of the king her father, the king and queen ought to have put his birth out of all doubt. Inſtead of this, they confirmed, by a myſterious conduct, ſuſpicions which were already but too far ſpread, and of which they could not be ignorant. The empreſs Conſtantia, wife of Henry VI, proving with child at the age of fifty-two years, choſe a place the moſt public for her labour, and thereby removed all ſuſpicion of the birth of her child. On the contrary, the queen of king James II, for having neglected all precautions, has left upon her ſon, real or pretended, a blot which has not yet been effaced.

2. The king's being at the farther end of the room with eighteen peers and privy-councillors, is a circumſtance which proves nothing at all. It is well known, that on theſe occaſions men approach not the bed, to be eye-witneſses of what paſſes there. All they can do, is to be attentive to the cries of the mother, or the infant. Beſides, the king himſelf was not leſs ſuſpected than the queen.

3. As to the warming-pan brought into the queen's chamber, and which is ſuppoſed to have in it a new-born child, this is only a conjecture founded upon the ſeeming uſeleſſneſs of a warming-pan on the 10th of June, which proved an

[k] It is here proper to take notice of this paſſage in Biſhop Burnet. "That the princeſs went as far in deſiring to be ſatisfied by feeling the motion, after the queen ſaid ſhe was quick, as ſhe could go without breaking with her." Ibid.

exceſſive hot day. To this it is anſwered, that a labour is often attended with a quaking and trembling like an ague, which begins with a cold fit. This is what I know nothing of. It is alſo pretended, that it was impoſſible to put a new-born child, in the narrow compaſs of a warming-pan, without ſtifling it.

4. It is very extraordinary, that the queen was not a full hour in labour; for the king was ſent for at nine of the clock, and before ten the queen was delivered. She cried out but once, in the moment of her delivery. When the mind is filled with ſuſpicions, ſuch circumſtances help to confirm them. Thoſe who are not in the ſame diſpoſition, find nothing extraordinary in this; becauſe the queen had ever had eaſy and quick labours.

5. It is commonly true, that children, the moment they are born and expoſed to the air, are heard to cry. But I know not whether this can be conſidered as infallible. However, the queen having neglected to give undoubted proofs of her pregnancy, every little uncommon circumſtance was capable to confirm the ſuſpicion of an impoſture.

6. As to the ſtreſs that is laid upon the curtains of the bed being cloſe drawn, this cannot ſeem ſtrange, ſince there were eighteen lords in the room.

7. The circumſtance of the child's being not ſhewn, can cauſe no ſuſpicion, but on ſuppoſition of the ſuſpicion itſelf, which ought to have been removed, by ſhewing the child as it came from the womb. For, otherwiſe, it is not uſually done, till the midwife has taken due care of the child. But if this is urged to prove, that a child was not taken out of the queen's bed, the ſuſpicion of the warming-pan muſt neceſſarily be ſuppreſſed, for had a child been put in the pan, it could alſo be taken out of it.

8. What is ſaid of the "king's continuing with the lords ſome minutes in the bed-chamber," and that "it looked like giving time for ſome management," is a gloſs which deſerves little or no notice.

9. Thoſe who believe the child in queſtion not born of the queen, would have had her take all the precautions which they themſelves imagine, to deſtroy all ſort of doubt, and the omiſſion of one of theſe precautions is, with them, ſufficient to confirm their ſuſpicions.

10. If no ſatisfaction was given to the princeſs of Denmark after her return from Bath, it may be alledged, that ſhe diſcovered no jealouſy concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, and as ſhe appeared convinced of the truth, there was no neceſſity of giving her proofs.

11. The refuſal of Chamberlain's plaiſters would be very apt to cauſe a ſuſpicion, if it was impoſſible for the queen's breaſts not to want them. But how many labours are there which have no need of remedies for putting back the milk? However, the biſhop of Saliſbury obviates this anſwer, by ſaying, that in her former labours, the queen had always great plenty of milk.

12. What is ſaid of the queen's recovering ſo ſoon after her delivery, proves nothing. Some mothers have ſo eaſy labours, that in a few days one can hardly perceive any alteration in them. Beſides, it is too general an expreſſion to ſay, "the queen ſeemed to be ſoon recovered." The preciſe time ſhould have been marked, that it might be judged, whether there was any thing extraordinary in it.

However, all theſe reaſons of ſuſpicions laid together, make an impreſſion upon many men, which each in particular would not be able to do. We muſt always recur to this point, that the king and queen, knowing that they were ſuſpected of an impoſture, ought to have taken juſt meaſures to remove the ſuſpicion, and not having done it, it is not very ſtrange it ſhould continue to this day.

As to what paſſed after the delivery, I mean the ſuppoſition of two children, when the firſt was dead, the biſhop of Saliſbury's account reſts only upon the credit of ſome perſons whom he has given for vouchers, and of others not named by him. There are beſides ſeveral particulars, in proof of which he produces no teſtimony.

He ſuppoſes, that the child of which it was pretended the queen was delivered, died the ſame day. This ſuppoſition is grounded upon what Hemings heard through the wall of his parlour, and upon the denial of acceſs at the young prince's door to the counteſs of Clarendon. All this may be of ſome weight, when a bare ſuſpicion only is meant to be eſtabliſhed. But if it is produced as a proof, the inſufficiency of of it is eaſily ſeen.

The death of the ſecond child at Richmond ſtands only upon the report of four phyſicians, who were ſent for to viſit him. The biſhop does not make the phyſicians poſitively ſay that the child died, but only that, "They all looked on him as a dying child;" and as they were not called for after dinner, "they took it for granted that the child was dead." But this conſequence is not abſolutely neceſſary; for poſſibly they were not called, becauſe the child grew better. But, ſays the biſhop, "When they went in after dinner to look on the child, they ſaw a ſound healthy child, that ſeemed to have had no illneſs on him." They inferred from this, that this was not the ſame child, and the biſhop concludes that the firſt was dead, and another put in his room. What is particular in this fact, is, that theſe four phyſicians doubted this was the ſame child, only becauſe the firſt had been ſick, and this was ſound and healthy; as if all children at ſuch an age were ſo like one another, that no feature could diſtinguiſh them. And yet, theſe phyſicians thought it was not the ſame child only by the difference between a ſtate of health and ſickneſs. This is very ſurpriſing, ſince naturally the faces of the two children muſt have been ſo different, is not to need other remarks[l].

In ſhort, the biſhop of Saliſbury's whole account of theſe three impoſtures, reſts either upon hearſay, or what he read in the informations ſent to the prince and princeſs of Orange; for he was then at the Hague. The ſenders of theſe informations were, probably, no friends of king James. It is therefore very poſſible, not to ſay likely, that they have aggravated their reports, and collected every circumſtance, true or falſe, which was apt to perſuade the prince and princeſs, that the prince of Wales was ſuppoſititious. As for the biſhop of Saliſbury, I am perſuaded, he has related nothing but what he either heard, read, or believed to be true. But who can ſay he was not deceived by prejudiced perſons, who looked upon their ſuſpicions as ſo many convincing proofs? I am aware, that all the Engliſh have not the ſame opinion of Dr. Burnet as I have. Volumes of remarks upon his hiſtory, in which he is violently abuſed, demonſtrate, that the jacobites conſider him as the ſworn enemy of James II. and as deſerving no credit. But as, for very good reaſons, they have not thought proper to make remarks upon what he ſays of three ſuppoſititious children, it is not my buſineſs to gueſs what they could have ſaid. I preſume therefore he has invented nothing, without pretending, however, to warrant what he ſays upon the teſtimony of others.

I have enlarged upon the birth of the prince of Wales, becauſe there ſeemed to me to be great confuſion, as well in the books, as in the diſcourſes on this ſubject. My intent was to help the reader, to determine for or againſt, or to ſuſpend his judgment till the thing is more fully cleared. As the principal deſign of hiſtory is to eſtabliſh facts that are certain, to deſtroy thoſe that are falſe, and to inform the readers of the grounds of doubting with regard to ſuch as are dubious, I imagined, that in an affair ſo important as this, which has made ſo much noiſe, and will, doubtleſs, yet long be talked of, the reader would be glad to know what to rely on. Thus much is certain, that moſt proteſtants believed the prince of Wales ſuppoſititious, chiefly becauſe it would have been very diſadvantageous to them, that James II. ſhould have had a popiſh ſucceſſor. The papiſts, on the contrary, queſtioned not this prince's birth, becauſe nothing could be more ſerviceable to their religion. I am perſuaded, there were few, either papiſts or proteſtants, but what were determined on this point, by their prejudices. But things having taken an unexpected turn, the truth or falſity of this prince's birth have hitherto produced none of the effects which were hoped or feared[m].

The aſſurance of a popiſh ſucceſſor, made the king hope he ſhould more eaſily accompliſh his deſigns. But he wiſhed, above all things, for the concurrence of a parliament. It was with this view, that cloſettings were once more put in practice. He cloſetted ſuch as he intended to gain. Promiſes and menaces were employed, and thoſe who refuſed to ſerve the king "in his own way," as the word was, might aſſure themſelves of his heavieſt diſpleaſure.

[l] Colonel Sands, who died in 1728, being in 1688 gentleman-waiter to the princeſs Anne, was ſent by her from Tunbridge (where ſhe then was) to court, to enquire after her brother's health; going up immediately to the king without ceremony or interruption, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, he came into the room where the prince lay: he ſaw there a pale, long-viſaged child, with red ſpots in his face, and other marks of weakneſs. This ſtruck him ſo, that he took very particular notice of it; but preſently after the ladies in the room came and turned him out, ſaying, the prince was a-ſleep. At his going out he met the king, who aſked him with a diſturbed countenance, whether he had ſeen the prince? Sands, fearing he had done ſomething amiſs, denied it; upon which the king's countenance cleared up. Some time after he was called to look at the prince, but ſaw a child of very different looks and complexion from that which he found before. All theſe particulars he committed to writing, and carried them to the princeſs. Continuation of Baker's Chron. Edit. 1730, p. 752.

Allybone's

However, he neglected not more effectual means to force his ſubjects to compliance. He ordered ſome entire regiments out of Ireland; and filled many vacancies in his Engliſh regiments, with Iriſh and popiſh officers. This gave ſo great a diſguſt to the whole army, that lampoons and ballads were vented upon the Iriſh, who were mortally hated by the Engliſh, eſpecially ſince the maſſacre in 1641.

Mean while, that the king's deſigns in augmenting his forces might not be doubted, an addreſs, ſuppoſed to be drawn by a jeſuit, was procured from the city of Carliſle, particularly, "To thank his majeſty for his royal army, which really was both the honour and ſafety of the nation; let the Teckelites think and ſay what they would." And upon this occaſion the addreſſers aſſured his majeſty, "That when, in his great wiſdom, he ſhould think fit to call a parliament, they would chuſe ſuch members as would certainly concur with his majeſty, in taking off the penal laws and teſts, and not hazard the election of any perſon, who had any ways declared in favour of thoſe cannibal laws. Surely, ſaid they, theſe men that oppoſe your majeſty in ſo gracious and glorious a work, do not conſider what a ſovereign prince, by his royal power, may do. A work which heaven ſmiles upon, and will reward with no leſs a bleſſing, we hope, than a prince of Wales."———

During the public rejoicings for the birth of the prince of Wales, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other ſix biſhops, priſoners in the Tower, were brought to their trial at the King's-Bench bar the 15th of June. But upon their motion for a delay, the trial was put off to the 29th of the ſame month, and in the mean time they were ſet at liberty upon their own recognizance. The 29th of June, Weſtminſter-Hall was crowded with great numbers of lords, gentlemen, and others, to be ſpectators of this famous trial. The king's counſel pleaded, That the petition preſented by the biſhops was a real and ſeditious libel, tending to diminiſh the king's prerogative, and excite ſedition amongſt the people. The counſel for the biſhops, on the other ſide, retorted the arguments of their adverſaries with great force and freedom; proving, that the king having no power to diſpenſe with penal laws, a petition humbly preſented to remonſtrate to him that he had no ſuch power, ought not to be eſteemed a libel: that it was injurious to the biſhops, to accuſe them of having publiſhed a petition, which they had reſpectfully preſented to the king in private and alone: that the occaſion of preſenting it was not ſought by them, but preſſed upon them: nor could it be called a libel, becauſe the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds ſet by act of parliament. After long pleadings on both ſides, the judges, in giving directions to the jury, were not unanimous. There were four, of whom Wright the chief-juſtice, and Holloway, were the king's creatures. Powel was reckoned a man of perfect integrity, and Allybone was a papiſt. Wright gave his opinion, That the petition preſented by the biſhops was a libel. Holloway ſaid, That if the jury were ſatisfied that the petition was preſented with no ill intention, but only to ſhew the reaſons of the petitioners diſobedience to the king's command, he could not think it to be a libel. Powel maintained, That the petition could not be a libel, becauſe it was founded upon the king's incapacity to diſpenſe with laws, which was very true. Allybone aſſerted, That the crime of the biſhops was next door to treaſon [n].

The jury withdrawing, ſat up all night; whether they could not agree, or to render their verdict more ſolemn. The next morning the court being aſſembled, and the hall filled with crowds of people, the jury pronounced the biſhops Not Guilty. Immediately ſhouts of joy were heard through the crowd, and the loudeſt acclamations reſounded through the cities of Weſtminſter and London. For ſeveral hours nothing was heard but repeated ſhouts of both cities, tranſported with the news of the biſhops acquittal. Nor was this all. For the king being gone that morning to the army on Hounſlow-heath, and dining in the earl of Feverſham's tent, the news flew to the camp, where the whole army ſhouted ſo loud, that it ſtartled the king and his whole company. The earl of Feverſham being ſent to know what was the matter, immediately returned, and told the king, "It was nothing but the ſhouts of the ſoldiers upon the news of the biſhops being acquitted." "Do you call that nothing?" ſaid the king, "but ſo much the worſe for them." Notwithſtanding the reſentment expreſſed by the king, and his ſevere prohibitions againſt all riotous aſſemblies, the whole city was that night illuminated, and numberleſs bonfires proclaimed the general joy. This was followed by almoſt all the great towns in the kingdom, and at Norwich particularly the joy was exceſſive. This was a ſenſible mortification to the king. He at firſt threatened to deliver the biſhops to the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners; and to ſhew his indignation, he diſmiſſed Sir Richard Holloway and Sir John Powell, and filled their places with others [o].

The king perceiving the people's diſpoſition was not favourable to him, he reſolved at laſt to come to open force. But as he could only make uſe of his army, he was willing firſt to try how far he might depend upon their obedience. For this purpoſe, he thought fit to communicate his deſign to every regiment ſingly, not doubting, that if two or three ſubmitted, the reſt would follow their example. Accordingly, the major of the lord Litchfield's regiment was ordered to tell the officers and ſoldiers, that thoſe who were unwilling to contribute to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws, ſhould lay down their arms. But it was with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment that he ſaw the whole regiment, two captains and a few popiſh ſoldiers excepted, inſtantly lay down their arms. He remained for ſome time ſpeechleſs, but at laſt recovering his ſurpriſe, he commanded the ſoldiers to take up their arms again, and ſullenly told them. "That for the future he would not do them the honour to aſk their advice."

It was now eaſy to foreſee, that with a proteſtant army he ſhould never be able to introduce popery. Wherefore he reſolved to caſhier many proteſtant officers and ſoldiers, and to put papiſts in their room. Accordingly he began with ſome regiments; but it gave a diſguſt to the whole army. Shortly after, reſolving to put thirty Iriſh ſoldiers into the duke of Berwick's regiment, lieutenant-colonel Beaumont, and other officers, remonſtrated to the duke, "That neither thoſe gentlemen nor himſelf thought it conſiſtent with their honours, to have foreigners impoſed upon them,———and therefore humbly petitioned, that they might have leave to fill up their companies with ſuch men of their own nation, as they ſhould judge moſt ſuitable to the king's ſervice; or otherwiſe, that they might be permitted, with all imaginable duty and reſpect, to lay down their commiſſions." An account of this being committed to the king, he immediately ordered the lieutenant-colonel, and five captains, to be taken into cuſtody, and tried by a court-martial as mutineers. It was at firſt believed, that his intention was to cauſe them to be condemned to die, but ſome news from abroad altered the ſentence, and they were only caſhiered. The fleet was no better diſpoſed than the army to aſſiſt the king in his deſigns. This appeared, in that vice-admiral Strickland ordering maſs to be ſaid on board his ſhip, there aroſe ſuch a mutiny and diſorder among the ſailors, that the officers could hardly ſave the prieſt from being thrown overboard.

The king's ſituation was ſuch, that it ſeemed he could neither advance, nor recede. His zeal for his religion, his principles of government, his temper naturally obſtinate, his condeſcenſion to the queen, prieſts, and jeſuits, who inceſſantly ſurrounded him, allowed him not time to leave his work unfiniſhed. Beſides, he muſt have changed his whole ſyſtem, as well as his whole council, and nothing is more rare than to ſee a prince proceed in that manner, before he is forced to it. But, on the other hand, he could eaſily perceive, how far he ſtill was from his end, by the diſpoſition of his ſubjects, his fleet, and his army. He hoped, however, to ſurmount all obſtacles, becauſe, though one part of his people ſhewed a reluctance to ſubmit to his will, another part ſeemed diſpoſed to receive the yoke with ſubmiſſion. There were biſhops who had cauſed the declaration for liberty of conſcience to be read in their dioceſes, as the biſhops of Durham, Cheſter and Rocheſter. Nay, the firſt had ſuſpended thirty of his clergy, for refuſing to read it [p]. In Cheſhire, ſome curates, rectors, and others, not contented to read the declaration, preſented alſo an addreſs, wherein they tell his majeſty,———"That if the matter of the declaration were not according to their wiſhes, yet the publiſhing of it was according to their duty, ſince it iſſued out from the [n] Allybone's opinion is not here truly repreſented. What he affirmed was, that neither the biſhops, nor any other men, had power to meddle with matters relating to the government. And he confirmed his aſſertion by an inſtance in James I's time, when it was declared to be high miſdemeanor, and next to treaſon, to petition the king to put the penal laws in execution. In which it ſeems he was miſtaken; for the petition referred to, was a petition againſt the penal laws. See State-Trials, tom. IV. p. 391.

[o] Sir Robert Baldock, one of the king's counſel in this trial, was made judge in the room of the latter; and Sir Thomas Powel of the former. Sir Chriſtopher Milton, one of the juſtices of the Common-Pleas, having about this time his writ of eaſe, was ſucceeded by Sir Thomas Jenner; in whoſe room, and in Sir Thomas Powell's, ſerjeant Ingleby and ſerjeant Rotherham were made barons of the Exchequer. expreſs prerogative of his ſupremacy over them; ſo that they could not but with trouble of mind hear of the proceedings of the ſeven biſhops, who, though they tenderly promiſed the diſſenters ſomething, yet refuſed to do their part about the declaration, leſt they ſhould be parties to it, which reaſon the addreſſers eſteem inſufficient. They therefore, in all ſubmiſſion, become earneſt, though too mean, interceſſors to his majeſty, in behalf of the church of England, that the faults of theſe and others may not be laid to her charge, in whoſe communion there were many, and they hoped there would be more, who concurred in promoting the purpoſes of his mild government: and ſo conclude with begging leave to make their congratulations for the happy birth of the young prince in his hereditary ſucceſſive kingdom."—

The king, flattered by ſuch addreſſes, and imagining that terror would by degrees oblige his ſubjects to ſubmit to his pleaſure, reſolved to puſh his point at all events. But, on the other hand, he had the mortification to hear, that a ſon of Cartwright, biſhop of Cheſter, who had procured this addreſs, was refuſed to be admitted to a fellowſhip of one of the colleges at Oxford; and that Gifford, nominated by him to the ſee of that city, was likewiſe denied his doctor's degree.

But the reſolution taken by the king and his council was not to be ſhaken by any obſtacles. Though the ſeven biſhops had been acquitted of the pretended crime laid to their charge, the new eccleſiaſtical court did not think itſelf bound by that precedent. Wherefore, the commiſſioners, by an order made the 12th of July, "Command all chancellors, archdeacons, commiſſaries, and officials, to enquire in what churches and chapels his majeſty's declaration was read, and to tranſmit an account thereof upon the 16th day of Auguſt next." But the greateſt part of thoſe to whom the order was directed, never took any notice of it. The commiſſioners being met on that day, were not a little puzzled how to proceed. At laſt, after a long conſultation, they were contented to renew their firſt order, "Requiring all perſons having eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, to tranſmit to them, upon the 6th day of December next, an account of the enquiry they are hereby commanded to make in their viſitations, together with the names of the parſons, rectors, vicars, and curates, that had either obeyed, or diſobeyed his majeſty's command." The affairs which happened before the expiration of that term, hindered its being known what the eccleſiaſtical court intended to do, or whether this order would have been better obeyed than the former.

Doctor Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter, one of the biſhops of the new eccleſiaſtical court, now thought it time to withdraw. Wherefore he writ to his colleagues a letter, wherein he told them: "That ſince their lordſhips were reſolved to proceed againſt thoſe who had not complied with the king's command in reading his declaration, it was abſolutely impoſſible for him to ſerve his majeſty any longer in that commiſſion." He proceeds farther and ſays, "That though I myſelf did ſubmit in that particular, yet I will never be any ways inſtrumental in puniſhing thoſe my brethren who did not; for, as I call God to witneſs, that what I did was merely upon a principle of conſcience, ſo I am fully ſatisfied, that their forbearance was upon the ſame principle." This biſhop was one of thoſe on whom the court relied, and therefore his defection could not but trouble the king extremely. Several have thought, that the principal motive of this proceeding, was to ſcreen himſelf in time from the approaching ſtorm, of which he had received ſome intimation.

After the prince's birth, thoſe who had any concern for their religion or country, ſaw clearly the danger with which both were threatened. It was evident, that the king no longer pretended to govern by the laws of the land, but according to his will and pleaſure. He had ſufficiently diſcovered his intention; ſo that nothing leſs than a total ſubverſion of the government in church and ſtate could be expected. If this did not ſufficiently authorize the moſt conſiderable members of the ſtate to take meaſures for the prevention of ſuch a deſign, it is hard to conceive, what difference there can be between a government, like that of England, limited by laws, and an abſolute monarchy. And yet it cannot be doubted, that the government of England is different from that of moſt other ſtates. I am very ſenſible this point is not without difficulty, and that it is not eaſy in England to fix the limits of the ſubjects obedience. Whilſt the church of England prepoſterouſly believed, that the king had no deſign to alter the form of the government, but intended only to enlarge his prerogative, inſtead of thinking proper to oppoſe it, ſhe believed it for her advantage, as it might prevent attempts like thoſe which had occaſioned ſo many miſchiefs in the reign of Charles I. The preſbyterians, the independents, the anabaptiſts, had carried the principles of the republicans ſo far, and drawn ſuch terrible conſequences from them, that after the reſtoration of Charles II, it was thought in ſome manner neceſſary to run into the other extreme, by inveſting the king with a power, which, rightly conſidered, might have had conſequences not leſs dangerous than the republican-principles. But herein the ſole aim was to curb the non-conformiſts by the king's authority, without foreſeeing that a time might come, when the king would uſe the power aſcribed to him, againſt all his ſubjects in general, and the church of England in particular. That time being come under James II, the church of England opened her eyes, though a little too late, and ſaw that ſhe had been labouring for her own deſtruction, in maintaining and even openly preaching paſſive-obedience without any reſtriction. It was from this doctrine, inculcated ſo carefully, and ſo long upon the minds of the Engliſh, as eſſential to the church, that thoſe ſubmiſſive addreſſes proceeded, which were daily preſented to the king. And indeed, as no bounds had been ſet to paſſive-obedience, many people did not conceive that they could, with a ſafe conſcience, refuſe an unlimited obedience to the ſovereign. But at laſt, the danger of the kingdom convinced men of ſenſe, that the royal authority was neceſſarily to be bounded, otherwiſe the church and ſtate were going to be ruined.

Such being the ſituation of affairs, ſeveral church of England men, both of the clergy and laity, thought it time to take meaſures for ſtopping the king's progreſs, and bounding his power. Though they had themſelves carried it very high, they choſe rather to retract, than by their obſtinacy to throw the church and ſtate into imminent danger, in continuing to maintain a doctrine which could juſtly be conſidered as the principal fountain of the kingdom's calamities.

The firſt and moſt neceſſary precaution taken by them, was to form a ſtrict union between the church of England and the non-conformiſts for their common ſecurity. This union was become more eaſy than ever. The two parties agreed, that their diviſion had been the ſole cauſe of their ruin. This was a ſtrong motive for their union. The churchmen acknowledged, they had carried paſſive-obedience too far, and that it had produced ill effects. They ſhewed a readineſs to comply with the ſcruples of the preſbyterians, in relinquiſhing the ceremonies which might be conſidered as indifferent, or at leaſt to leave every man at liberty to practiſe or not practiſe them. This was all the preſbyterians could reaſonably expect. In ſhort, as the churchmen appeared touched with the calamities occaſioned by their exceſſive rigour, ſo they ſeemed diſpoſed to more condeſcenſion, if things were reſtored to their former ſtate. The preſbyterians, who had hitherto groundleſsly accuſed the church of England of leaning to popery, could not forbear acknowledging their error, after the firmneſs of the ſeven biſhops had diſcovered the injuſtice of that accuſation. Theſe diſpoſitions being well managed by the prudent and well-meaning men of both parties, produced at laſt an uniformity of ſentiments, with regard to the principal point in queſtion, namely, That it was abſolutely neceſſary to think of means for the preſervation of religion and the ſtate, from the impending danger. The leading men on both ſides, took great pains to curb the paſſionate, whoſe views were very narrow. In a word, without the king's knowledge, the whigs and tories were reconciled, and reſolved to labour jointly for the preſervation of their country. But unfortunately this union ended with the danger. However, it may be affirmed, that this reconciliation of the two parties was the moſt fatal blow that could be given to the king's affairs, ſince his greateſt ſtrength lay in their diviſion. Father Orleans calls this union a league againſt the king. It would be needleſs to diſpute about this term. The queſtion is only to know, whether this union, this league, or whatever elſe it may be called, was contrary to law, to conſcience, or to the duty which ſubjects owe to their ſovereign. But to decide this queſtion, the government of England muſt be diſtinguiſhed from that of other ſtates, and on pretence of the name of king, common to ſo many princes, the rights of one ſovereign not be confounded with thoſe of another, in order to apply to a king of England whatever is aſſerted of ſovereignty in general. This was an artifice frequent with James I. The queſtion therefore is to know, whether, in ſuppoſing the conſtitution of England ſuch as it appears in this hiſtory, James II. had violated it in the moſt eſſential parts; whether he had now changed or conſiderably altered it; whether there was ground to fear an entire ſubverſion; and and whether the Engliſh were obliged to ſuffer it without oppoſition. Of this the readers may judge, from what they have hitherto ſeen. But in ſuppoſing even that James II. had changed, or deſigned to change the conſtitution, a ſtrong objection laid againſt thoſe, who believed it proper to oppoſe the entire execution of his deſigns; namely, the frequent declarations of the parliament and church of England, ſince the reſtoration, that an unlimited obedience was due to the king. This objection was ſo ſtrongly impreſſed on the minds of ſome churchmen, that they could not reſolve to oppoſe the king's deſigns, becauſe they looked on ſuch oppoſition as an act of rebellion. Nay, many perſiſt in this opinion even to this day, and, with the papiſts, form the party of the jacobites. Happily for England, moſt of the clergy and laity of the eſtabliſhed church were of a contrary opinion, and laboured effectually for the preſervation of religion and the government in conjunction with the whigs, who made no ſcruple of uniting with them in the ſame deſign.

The union between the whigs and tories being effected, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, as well amongſt the clergy as the laity, began to form a ſcheme for the execution of the great deſign to preſerve the church and ſtate. They ſaw no expedient more proper, than to put the prince of Orange at the head of the party againſt the king. That prince was ſo intereſted in the affair, that it was not doubted he would contribute whatever lay in his power, both to ſave England, and ſecure the ſucceſſion to the princeſs his wife, lately defeated of her right by a prince, who generally paſſed for ſuppoſititious. Theſe were very powerful motives to actuate the prince of Orange. But there was ſtill another, which was naturally to have a great effect upon him; namely, the extreme danger to which Holland would be expoſed, in caſe the king accompliſhed his deſign, by reaſon of the cloſe union between the kings of England and France. It was with this view that ſeveral great men timely repaired to the Hague, on divers pretences, to confer with the prince of Orange. The firſt were, Mr. Sidney (brother to Algernon Sidney, beheaded in the laſt reign) afterwards earl of Rumney, Sir Robert Peyton, Sir Rowland Gwin, Dr. Burnet, and others. It is to be preſumed, that aſſurances were tranſmitted from them to their friends in England, of the good inclination of the prince to the common cauſe. In July, one Joſeph Flight brought over into England about fourſcore letters from perſons of quality and credit, and carried back anſwers to the Hague. The affair being thus begun, the old lord Wharton pretending a journey into Germany, paſſed through the Hague. Colonel Sidney, uncle to the earl of Sunderland, went to the Spa, on pretence of only drinking the waters. The lord Dunblain, ſon to the earl of Danby, and commander of an independent frigate, croſſed and re croſſed the ſeas, to carry ſeveral diſpatches and reſolutions. The earl of Shrewſbury mortgaged his eſtate for forty thouſand pounds, and went over to the prince to offer him both his purſe and ſword. He was quickly followed by admiral Herbert, his couſin Mr. Herbert, Mr. Ruſſel, the lord Mordaunt, and the earl of Wiltſhire. The principal perſons with whom they held correſpondence in England, were the earls of Danby, Devonſhire, and Dorſet, the lords Lovelace and Delamere, the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Hallifax, his ſon the lord Eland, the marquis of Wincheſter, his ſon the lord Pawlet, the lord Willoughby ſon to the earl of Lindſey, Mr. Leſter, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Powle, and many others, beſides ſeveral eminent citizens of London [b].

The prince of Orange being fully determined to head the party, it was, after ſeveral conſultations, reſolved, that the Engliſh lords at the Hague ſhould demand aſſiſtance of the States, in the name of all England. But to prevent the ſecret from being divulged, they applied at firſt only to perſons of the greateſt credit and influence, who promiſed to uſe all their intereſt, at a proper time, to promote the deſign. There was no need of many arguments to prevail with the States to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed Engliſh. They were equally concerned in the affair with the Engliſh themſelves; for the ruin of Holland would doubtleſs have ſoon followed the ſlavery of England. Of this the deſigns of Lewis XIV, and his union with James II [c], left no room to doubt. All the difficulty lay in making preparations, in concealing the deſign of them, in raiſing forces in the room of thoſe which the prince ſhould lead into England, and in ſecuring a timely relief, in caſe the king of France ſhould attack Holland. But all theſe things were taken care of, with great addreſs and ſecrecy. The difference at that time, about the election of an archbiſhop of Cologne, between prince Clement of Bavaria and the cardinal of Furſtemburg, furniſhed the States with a pretence to aſſemble an army near Nimeguen. On the other hand, the prince of Orange, by his intrigues, prevailed to have the direction of affairs then on the carpet, committed to the management of three or four members of the States, on pretence of the correſpondence the count d'Avaux, the French embaſſador, had in Holland, who might inform him of their reſolutions. Theſe commiſſioners, all in the prince of Orange's confidence, under colour of the Cologne affair, gave orders for encamping an army and preparing a fleet. At laſt, the prince of Orange, on pretence of providing for a war againſt France, which ſeemed to be ſo near, had an interview at Minden in Weſtphalia, with the electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the princes of the houſe of Lunenburgh, and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and ſecured their aſſiſtance, in caſe France ſhould attack Holland or the Low-Countries, while he was engaged in the Engliſh expedition. All this was tranſacted with ſuch ſecrecy, that the embaſſadors of France and England at the Hague could get no certain intelligence. They were forced to recur to conjectures, though the firſt had uſually been informed of the reſolutions of the States, as ſoon as they were taken.

When the prince of Orange had ſecured to the States, in caſe of need, the aſſiſtance of theſe princes, he concerted his expedition with ſuch prudence and ſecrecy, that his ſcheme was not known till after the execution; namely, that the States, under colour of being ready to ſupport the election of the prince of Bavaria, ſhould form a camp on the heath near Nimeguen, a place too remote from the ſea, to give any ſuſpicion that theſe troops were deſigned for an embarquement: that a fleet of fifty men of war ſhould be prepared, with a ſufficient number of tranſports, for the embarkation of twelve or thirteen thouſand men: that, to prevent the alarm which theſe tranſports might give, the merchants of Amſterdam, Rotterdam, and other maritime places, ſhould freight as many as they could on divers pretences: that theſe ſhips ſhould repair to ſeveral ports, at a time aſſigned, to take the forces abroad, and afterwards to the Goree, where the men of war ſhould expect them: that the prince of Orange ſhould put himſelf on board this fleet, and at his landing in England, the Engliſh perſons of quality, by whom he was invited, ſhould diſperſe themſelves into divers parts of the kingdom, to excite inſurrections, and levy troops, while the prince, with his little army, ſhould make head againſt the king. It was not doubted, but the prince's army would conſiderably increaſe when he ſhould be in England, and the people in general be ready to ſecond the efforts of thoſe, who were labouring for their deliverance. This whole ſcheme was executed in the manner it had been reſolved, without the embaſſadors of England and France being able to learn any thing certain. They conjectured, however, by the naval preparations, that ſomething was ſecretly contriving againſt England. Indeed it was difficult to prepare four or five hundred tranſports and fifty men of war ſo privately, that they ſhould have no intelligence from their ſpies. The count d'Avaux failed not to ſend his conjectures to the court of France, which were immediately tranſmitted to England. Moreover, Mr. Skelton, king James's envoy at the Hague, had before informed him of an intercepted letter, which intimated that a great project was ſecretly carrying on againſt him. But the king was then ſo ſecure of ſucceſs, that he neglected this intelligence, believing it only an artifice to divert him from his deſigns.

A little before, Mr. Budé de Verace, a proteſtant at Geneva, gentleman-uſher to the princeſs of Orange, having been diſmiſſed, was returned to his own country. When he heard of the great preparations in Holland, he writ to Mr. Skelton, then envoy at Paris, that he had things to communicate to the king of England, that were of no leſs concern than his crown, but would not diſcover the ſecret to any but the king himſelf; and that if his majeſty would let him know his pleaſure, he would immediately repair to London. Skelton was not wanting to give information to the court of England, and to repeat it by five or ſix letters. But no notice was taken of it, whether through a too great ſecurity, or that the earl of Sunderland, to whom the letters were addreſſed, did not think proper to communicate them to the king.

Mean while, as the armament in Holland could hardly be concealed any longer, and the king received repeated advices of it, he judged it convenient, at all events, to flatter the people with the expectation of a parliament. So, the 24th of Auguſt, he declared in council his intention to call a parliament for the 27th of November, and the chancellor had orders to iſſue out the writs the 5th of September. However, the writs were not ſent, which gave occaſion to think the king only deſigned to amuſe the public.

The next day, Mr. de Bonrepos arrived at London from Paris, and had ſeveral conferences with the king. It is pretended, that he offered him, from the king of France, a fleet, and an army of thirty thouſand men, but that the earl of Sunderland prevented the offer from being accepted. He is ſaid to repreſent to the king, "That it would be very dangerous to introduce a foreign army into England, at the very time he was preparing to hold a parliament: That he would entirely loſe the hearts of his ſubjects, and even of thoſe who were moſt devoted to him: That if the French ſhould have a mind to render themſelves maſters of the kingdom, he would find but very few who would join to deliver him from ſuch troubleſome gueſts, and that in accepting ſo powerful an aid, he would quickly become only a viceroy to Lewis XIV." Some have pretended, that this advice was evident treachery in the earl of Sunderland, who was gained by the prince of Orange. But this accuſation reſts only upon the ill ſucceſs of the king's affairs afterwards, and upon the ſuppoſition that he would have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had the king of France's offer been accepted. However the king refuſed the aid, becauſe he thought it unneceſſary, and yet it is pretended, that he made at this very time a new alliance with Lewis, but which was never publiſhed.

In the mean time, the king hearing from ſeveral parts, that an armament was making in Holland, he ordered the marquis of Albyville, his embaſſador, to preſent a memorial to the States, to demand what they meant by their warlike preparations, eſpecially by ſea, at that time of the year. The States anſwered, That they armed in imitation of his Britannic majeſty, and might with more reaſon demand an explanation about the alliance into which he was lately entered. This anſwer increaſing the king's ſuſpicions, he now began to take the neceſſary meaſures for putting himſelf in a poſture of defence. With this view, he gave the governments of Portſmouth and Hull, the two keys of the kingdom, to papiſts, and took care to have the majority of the officers and ſoldiers of theſe garriſons of that religion.

After all, he could not yet believe, the prince of Orange would venture to attack him. He ſtill relied on his fleet and army, though he had now had ſeveral demonſtrations of their diſaffection. The court of France could not conceive the cauſe of ſo ſtrange an indolence; nor was Skelton leſs puzzled to anſwer the queſtion ſo often aſked, why the king his maſter refuſed the aſſiſtance of France? He could only ſay, that he had no orders about it. At laſt, in a conference one day with Monſieur de Croiſſy upon this ſubject, he told him, it was his private opinion, that if France would threaten to attack the States-General, in caſe any thing was attempted by them againſt the king of England, ſuch a declaration would break all the prince of Orange's meaſures. The court of France approving of this propoſal, the count D'Avaux preſented a memorial to the States the 30th of Auguſt, declaring, "That all circumſtances inclined the king his maſter to believe, with reaſon, that the arming in Holland threatened England, therefore his majeſty had commanded him to declare to them, on his part,—"That the ties of friendſhip and alliance between him and the king of Great-Britain, would oblige him not only to aſſiſt him, but alſo to look on the firſt act of hoſtility that ſhould be committed by their troops or their fleet, againſt his majeſty of Great-Britain, to be a manifeſt rupture of the peace, and a breach with his crown."—The States, after an ambiguous anſwer to this memorial, demanded of the marquis of Albyville the meaning of the new alliance between the two kings. The ſame demand was made to the court of England by the States embaſſador, Van Citters, to whom they ſent a copy of the memorial. Whereupon the king ſummoned a council, and by the earl of Sunderland's means it was reſolved, to diſown the proceedings of the count D'Avaux. This reſolution was immediately communicated to the embaſſador of the States, and to all the king's miniſters in foreign courts. Moreover, to convince the public, that the king was not concerned in the memorial preſented by the count D'Avaux, Skelton was recalled, and immediately ſent to the Tower.

On this occaſion, the earl of Sunderland reaſoned upon the ſame principle advanced by him, when the aſſiſtance offered by France was in debate. It cannot be denied, that his reaſons appeared plauſible to the king. But it is ſuppoſed by ſome, that the king was deceived, and that it was not poſſible for the earl of Sunderland to be deceived alſo. Wherefore they aſcribe his counſels to an expreſs deſign of betraying his maſter. Thoſe who talk thus, are, 'tis likely, very ſorry the king did not follow the contrary opinion, and embrace the offer of France. They are perſuaded, in that caſe, the prince of Orange's meaſures would have been diſconcerted, his undertaking relinquiſhed, and the king, with the aſſiſtance of thirty thouſand men, been abſolute maſter of his kingdom. But it muſt be conſidered, that this is ſuppoſing an uncertain event; that the prime miniſter's advice preceded the king's diſaſter ſome months; and, to accuſe him of an intention to betray the king, it muſt be ſuppoſed, that he could have foreſeen what the king himſelf did not: in a word, that he was ſecretly engaged with the prince of Orange, of which however there is no poſitive proof. The moſt plauſible ground of ſuſpicion againſt him is, his admiſſion into that prince's council and confidence, when on the throne. But he was not the only miniſter of king James, who was thus favoured by king William. It is however certain, though the earl of Sunderland embraced the popiſh religion, he was, and ſtill is, ſuſpected by the papiſts. There are even proteſtants, who owning that he betrayed his maſter, count this pretended treachery an honour to him, ſince it tended to the good of the kingdom.

Though the king, as I ſaid, had ordered writs to be iſſued out for a new parliament, the order had not been executed. This appears clearly in a proclamation of the 21ſt of September, wherein the king ſuppoſed the elections were not yet begun. It imported:

"That his majeſty having already ſignified his pleaſure to call a parliament, leſt thoſe whoſe right it was to chuſe members, ſhould lie under any prejudices and miſtakes, through the artifices of diſaffected perſons, he thought it fit to declare, that as it was his royal purpoſe to endeavour a legal eſtabliſhment of an univerſal liberty of conſcience for all his ſubjects, it was alſo his reſolution inviolably to preſerve the church of England, by ſuch a confirmation of the ſeveral acts of uniformity, that they ſhould never be altered any other ways than by repealing the ſeveral clauſes, which inflict penalties upon perſons not promoted, or to be promoted to any eccleſiaſtical benefices within the meaning of the ſaid acts, for exerciſing their religion contrary to the purport of the ſaid acts of uniformity. And that for the further ſecuring, not only the church of England, but the proteſtant religion in general, he was willing the Roman catholics ſhould remain incapable to be members of the houſe of commons; whereby thoſe fears and apprehenſions would be removed, which many perſons had had, "That the legiſlative authority would be engroſſed by them, and turned againſt proteſtants."———

This proclamation was too obſcure and ambiguous to produce any great effect. There was even a manifeſt contradiction in the deſign to repeal the penal laws, and at the ſame time to preſerve the acts of uniformity. Beſides, the king ſpoke only of excluding papiſts from the houſe of commons, and not from that of the lords. But what ſtill more plainly diſcovered the king's intention to amuſe the people, was, that the writs for a new parliament were not iſſued.

In the mean time, having received ſo many concurring advices of the prince of Orange's deſigns, he gave out commiſſions for augmenting his forces, and ſent for ſome regiments out of Ireland. At the ſame time, he ordered the fleet to be equipped with all expedition. Monſieur Barillon, the French embaſſador, propoſed that the king his maſter ſhould be deſired to abandon the ſiege of Philipſburg, undertaken by the dauphin, and carry the war into Holland. This propoſal was approved by ſeveral of the council, but oppoſed by others, on pretence that ſuch a proceeding would alienate the minds of all the Engliſh proteſtants from the king. This reaſon prevailed the more eaſily, as the prince of Orange's friends had ſpread a report, that the armament of Holland was only deſigned to prevent the French from landing in England.

At laſt, the king, as he he could no longer doubt the prince of Orange's intention, appointed the earl of Feverſham to command his army, after that poſt had been declined by the count de Roye. The command of the fleet was given to the lord Dartmouth. As the king was not ignorant how prejudicial to him was the report of his ſtrict alliance with Lewis XIV, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to ſtifle it. For this purpoſe he ordered the marquis of Albyville to preſent a memorial to the States, to aſſure them from him, that there was no other treaty between him and France than thoſe that were public. He moreover offered the States to take ſuch meaſures with them, as might beſt ſerve to maintain the peace of Nimeguen, and the twenty years truce concluded in 1684. But the States, whether better informed than the king imagined, gined, or for other reaſons, took no notice of the memorial. On the contrary, the penſionary of Holland frankly owned to the marquis of Albyville, that the prince of Orange being invited by the Engliſh nobility, was preparing to carry them aſſiſtance for reſtoring the government to its ancient ſtate, the king having entirely changed it ſince his acceſſion to the crown.

It ſeems that the king had hitherto preſerved ſome hope, either that the States had ſome other deſign, or that the prince only intended to deter him from finiſhing his work. But after this advice received from his embaſſador, who added, that many Engliſh were at the Hague ready to accompany the prince in his expedition, he diſcovered the utmoſt conſternation, as well as his whole council. Indeed, it was eaſy to conceive, that the prince had projected this undertaking, upon private aſſurances of encouragement from the Engliſh. This reflection made the king begin to ſee the great diſproportion between the number of the proteſtants, and that of the papiſts, and conſequently the ſmall hopes of being ſupported by the latter. In theſe melancholy thoughts, he believed his beſt refuge was to recover the church of England to his intereſt. He ſtill reckoned, ſhe was unſhaken in her principle of paſſive-obedience, and that by giving her ſome ſatisfaction, he ſhould ſecure her allegiance, after which, he ſhould have no further cauſe to fear the efforts of the prince of Orange. To this end, he ſent for the biſhops that were then in London, namely, Wincheſter, Chicheſter, Peterborough, Rocheſter, Ely, Bath and Wells, and told them, that he deſired their advice in the preſent conjuncture. He aſſured them of his readineſs to do whatever ſhould be thought neceſſary for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion and the liberties of his ſubjects, without derogating from his own prerogative. He concluded with ſaying, this affair required a mature examination, and therefore prayed them to conſult together, in order to give him their advice. The biſhops withdrew, and immediately repaired to Lambeth, to form, with the archbiſhop (then indiſpoſed) a plan of what they were to counſel the king.

The 28th of September, the king publiſhed a proclamation to inform his ſubjects, "That his majeſty had received undoubted advice, that a great and ſudden invaſion from Holland with an armed force of foreigners, would ſpeedily be made in an hoſtile manner upon this kingdom; and although ſome falſe pretences, relating to liberty, property, and religion, contrived and worded with art and ſubtlety, might be given out, it was manifeſt, however, that no leſs matter by this invaſion was propoſed, "that an abſolute conqueſt of theſe his majeſty's kingdoms, and the utter ſubduing and ſubjecting them, and all his people, to a foreign power," which was promoted by ſome of his ſubjects, being perſons of wicked and reſtleſs ſpirits, implacable malice, and deſperate deſigns; who having no ſenſe of the miſery of former inteſtine diviſions, nor being moved by his majeſty's reiterated acts of grace and mercy, did again endeavour to embroil this kingdom in blood and ruin, to gratify their own ambition and malice, propoſing to themſelves a prey and booty in ſuch a public confuſion. That though his majeſty had notice, that a foreign force was preparing againſt him, yet he had always declined any foreign ſuccours, but rather had choſen to rely upon the true and ancient courage, faith and allegiance of his own people, with whom he had often ventured his life for the honour of this nation, and in whoſe defence againſt all enemies, he was firmly reſolved to live and die; and therefore his majeſty ſolemnly conjured his ſubjects to lay aſide all animoſities, jealouſies, and prejudices, and heartily and chearfully to unite together, in the defence of him and their native country.——That albeit the deſign had been carried on with all imaginable ſecrecy, and endeavours to ſurpriſe and deceive his majeſty, yet he had not been wanting on his part, to make ſuch proviſions as did become him, and made no doubt of being found in ſo good a poſture, that his enemies might have cauſe to repent their raſh and unjuſt attempts." In the concluſion, his majeſty declared, "That he did intend to have met his parliament in November next, and that the writs were iſſued forth accordingly, propoſing to himſelf, amongſt other things, That he might be able to quiet the minds of all his people in matters of religion, but that in regard of this ſtrange attempt, deſigned to divert his ſaid gracious purpoſes, he found it neceſſary to recall his aforeſaid writs, &c."——

Though the king pretended an entire reliance on the allegiance of his ſubjects, he knew however he had given them too much cauſe of diſcontent, to be aſſured of their affection. Wherefore he thought it neceſſary to give them other proofs of his ſincerity than bare words. To this end, he took off the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion, and appointed Sir John Chapman, a churchman, to ſucceed Sir John Eyles, the preſent lord-mayor of London, who was an anabaptiſt. Moreover, being informed that the biſhops would adviſe him to reſtore the city charter, he ſent for the lord-mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs, and told them, "That he reſolved to reſtore to them their ancient charter and privileges, and put them into the ſame condition they were in at the time of the judgment pronounced againſt them, upon the Quo Warranto." The ſame day, the 2d of October, he publiſhed a general pardon by proclamation, out of which were excepted, Robert Parſons, Edward Matthews, Samuel Venner, Andrew Fletcher, colonel John Rumſey, major John Manley, Iſaac Manley, Francis Charleton, John Wildman, Titus Oates, Robert Ferguſon, Gilbert Burnet, Sir Robert Peyton, Laurence Braddon, Samuel Johnſon, Thomas Tipping, and Sir Rowland Guynne. But all this was not capable to ſatisfy the people, who aſpired to a more ample and more certain deliverance.

The day after, the 3d of October, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, attended by eight biſhops, repaired to Whitehall, and was admitted to an immediate audience. After a ſhort ſpeech, he preſented to the king the reſult of their conferences drawn up in ten articles, which were ſo many advices, and withal, reproaches upon his paſt government. Theſe advices were:

I. "To put the whole management of his government, in the ſeveral counties, into the hands of ſuch of the nobility and gentry there, as were legally qualified for it.

II. "To annul his commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs; and that no ſuch court be erected for the future.

III. "That no diſpenſation might be granted or continued by virtue whereof any perſon not duly qualified by law, had been put into any place, office, or preferment in church or ſtate, or in the univerſities, or continued in the ſame, eſpecially ſuch as had cure of ſouls annext to them; and particularly, that he would reſtore the preſident and fellows of St. Mary Magdalen college in Oxford.

IV. "To ſet aſide all licences or faculties, by which any perſons of the Romiſh communion might pretend to be enabled to teach public ſchools.

V. "To deſiſt from the exerciſe of his diſpenſing power, and to permit that point to be calmly and freely debated, and finally ſettled in parliament.

VI. "To inhibit the four foreign biſhops, who ſtiled themſelves vicars apoſtolical, from farther invading the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, which by law, was veſted in the biſhops of the church of England.

VII. "To fill the vacant biſhoprics, and other eccleſiaſtical promotions, within his gift, both in England and Ireland, with men of learning and piety: and in particular, (which the archbiſhop owned to be his peculiar boldneſs, ſince it was done without the privity of his brethren) forthwith to fill the archiepiſcopal chair of York (which had ſo long ſtood empty, and upon which a whole province depended) with ſome very worthy perſon: for which he was ſo bold to ſay, his majeſty had then before him a very fair choice.".

VIII. "To ſuperſede all farther proſecutions of Quo Warrantos againſt corporations, and to reſtore to them their ancient charters and privileges; as they heard God had put into his heart for the city of London, which they intended otherwiſe to have made one of their principal requeſts.

IX. "That writs might be iſſued out with convenient ſpeed, for calling of a free and regular parliament, in which the church of England might be ſecured according to the acts of uniformity: proviſion might be made for a due liberty of conſcience, and for ſecuring the liberties and properties of all his ſubjects, and a mutual confidence might be eſtabliſhed between his majeſty and all his people.

X. "Above all, That his majeſty would be pleaſed to permit his biſhops, to offer ſuch motives and arguments, as (they truſted) might, by God's grace, be effectual to perſuade his majeſty to return to the communion of the church of England, into whoſe moſt holy catholic faith he was baptized, in which he was educated, and to which, it was their daily earneſt prayer to God, that he might be re-united."

Theſe advices clearly ſhew, that what has hitherto been ſeen concerning king James's government, is not grounded upon calumnies ſpread by his enemies. For how, on the 3d of October (a month before the prince of Orange's arrival, and at a time when the events were yet uncertain) could theſe nine biſhops conſpire together to reproach the king with a violation of the laws in all theſe articles, under colour of giving him counſel? Beſides, theſe advices agree, for the moſt part, with the prince of Orange's declaration, ſigned at the Hague, Hague, at the very time the biſhops were conſulting together at London. In ſhort, the king's proceedings two days after, invincibly prove the truth of theſe facts. So, the advocates for king James can only plead, either that he had a right to act as he did, or, though he had no ſuch right, his ſubjects were bound to ſubmit to his will. But this is not the place to examine theſe queſtions.

The king perceiving that a refuſal to comply with the advice of the biſhops, would only increaſe the people's jealouſy, reſolved, though probably with regret, to redreſs moſt of the grievances complained of. For this purpoſe, the commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical cauſes was diſſolved. The next day, the lord chancellor had orders to carry back in perſon the charter of London. The lord-lieutenants of the ſeveral counties were required to inform themſelves of the abuſes and irregularities committed in the late regulations of corporations, in order to redreſs the ſame. The biſhop of Wincheſter, viſitor of Magdalen college in Oxford, was ordered to ſettle that ſociety regularly, and according to their ſtatutes. A proclamation was iſſued out for reſtoring corporations to their ancient charters, liberties, rights, and franchiſes. The lord-lieutenants were diſplaced in ſeveral counties. Popiſh juſtices of the peace, mayors, recorders, and other magiſtrates, were removed, and proteſtants put in their places. Thus, in the ſpace of about twelve days, that formidable fabric was in effect, or in a great meaſure demoliſhed, which the Romiſh cabal had ſpent near four years in erecting.

But all theſe proceedings were not capable to reſtore the king to the confidence of his ſubjects, becauſe they came too late, and ſeemed rather the effect of neceſſity than inclination. No other motive could be imagined of the king's deſtroying his own work, than his fear of being deſerted on the arrival of the prince of Orange, who was daily expected. Whence it was inferred, that the king's condeſcenſion would laſt no longer than the danger. What had been only ſuſpected, was ſoon found to be true. The biſhop of Wincheſter, purſuant to the king's order, having cauſed a citation to be fixed on the gates of Magdalen college, to recall Dr. Hough and the ejected fellows of that ſociety, upon the news of the diſperſion of the prince's fleet by a tempeſt, was recalled on ſome frivolous pretence, and the reſtoration of the college deferred. But afterwards, the news proving falſe, the king reſumed his pretended affection for the univerſity, and the college was reſtored. This extremely prejudiced the king, as it manifeſtly ſhewed, that in his late changes in favour of the proteſtants, his aim had been only to amuſe them, till he ſhould be able to retract. Such as had fallen into the ſnare, and believed the king to have acted with ſincerity, loſt all their former confidence in him. So, James ſaw himſelf at once reduced to the aſſiſtance of his popiſh ſubjects alone, who were incapable to reſtore his ſinking affairs.

As all his hope was placed in his army, he applied himſelf, as far as lay in his power, to augment and ſtrengthen it with troops, which ſhould wholly depend on him. In obedience to orders already given, two thouſand five hundred men landed at Cheſter from Ireland, and three thouſand Scots were advanced to Carliſle. Beſides this, new commiſſions were granted[a], for levying ten regiments of horſe and foot, not to mention ſeveral independent companies. All the militia had orders to be in readineſs to march. Laſtly, a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all horſes, oxen, and cattle, to be driven and removed to the ſpace at leaſt of twenty miles, from the places where the enemy ſhould attempt to land. This was all he could do. But it was not in his power to cauſe his ſubjects to ſecond him with affection, or his troops to ſerve him faithfully. Accordingly, it was not upon an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men that the prince of Orange relied, but upon the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, who impatiently expected his arrival. Without this, ſo ſmall an army would not have been capable of conquering England.

In the mean time, the populace of London growing inſolent, by the hopes of the prince's coming, began to inſult the popiſh chapels: wherefore the king ordered them to be ſhut up, for fear of an inſurrection in ſo dangerous a juncture. On the other hand, many Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits perceiving the gathering ſtorm, and preſaging nothing good from the diſpoſition of the people, and the court's conſternation, began gradually to diſappear, and to conſult their own ſafety by a timely retreat into foreign parts.

In the midſt of all theſe diſtractions, the king cauſed the prince of Wales to be ſolemnly baptized; the pope, repreſented by his nuntio, being godfather, and the queen-dowager godmother. Father Saban officiated, and named him James-Francis-Edward.

At the ſame time the court received a pamphlet, publiſhed in Holland, and entitled, "A Memorial of the Engliſh proteſtants, preſented to their Highneſſes, the prince and princeſs of Orange." It was aſcribed to Dr. Burnet, or major Wildman, wherein, after a long narrative of the grievances of the nation, the author complained of king James's obliging his ſubjects to own a ſuppoſititious child for the prince of Wales, adding, "That his majeſty would never ſuffer the witneſſes that were preſent at the queen's delivery to be heard and examined." The king was no ſtranger to the ſuſpicions entertained by the people on this account, but hitherto had pretended to be ignorant of, or at leaſt to deſpiſe, them. He perceived however, that on this occaſion, he could not, without great prejudice to himſelf, help anſwering ſo public a challenge. He therefore held an extraordinary council the 22d of October, to which were called the queen-dowager, all the lords ſpiritual and temporal then in town, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, the judges, and ſeveral of his majeſty's learned council. All theſe being aſſembled, the king told them, "He had called them together upon a very extraordinary occaſion; but that extraordinary diſeaſes muſt have extraordinary remedies: that the malicious endeavours of his enemies had ſo poiſoned the minds of ſome of his ſubjects, that by the reports he had from all hands, he had reaſon to believe, that very many did not think this ſon, with which God had bleſſed him, to be his, but a ſuppoſed child. But, he might ſay, that by a particular providence, ſcarce any prince was ever born, where there were ſo many perſons preſent. That he had taken this time to have the matter heard and examined there, expecting that the prince of Orange, with the firſt eaſterly wind, would invade this kingdom: and as he had often ventured his life for the nation before he came to the crown, ſo he thought himſelf more obliged ſo to do now he was king, and did intend to go in perſon againſt him, whereby he might be expoſed to accidents; and therefore he thought it neceſſary to have this now done, in order to ſatisfy the minds of his ſubjects, and to prevent the kingdom's being engaged in blood and confuſion after his death: that he had deſired the queen-dowager to give herſelf the trouble to come hither, to declare what ſhe knew of the birth of his ſon; and that moſt of the ladies, lords, and other perſons who were preſent, were ready to depoſe upon oath their knowledge of the matter."

After this ſpeech, depoſitions were taken, firſt of the queen-dowager, who only ſaid, "That ſhe was in the room when the queen was delivered," without any thing more poſitive or particular. After her followed forty witneſſes, of which ſeventeen were papiſts, and it was begun with proving, that the queen was brought to bed while many perſons were in the room. To this tended the teſtimonies of the eighteen lords who accompanied the king thither. This proof ſignified nothing, or was very ambiguous. It was well known, there were a great many perſons in the room at the time the queen was ſaid to be delivered; which doubtleſs, was all that was meant by this proof. But it was not ſufficient to prove the reality of the delivery. Some of the ladies depoſed, that they ſaw the child ſoon after in the arms of the midwife. But as no man in the council durſt put any queſtions to the witneſſes, concerning ſeveral circumſtances, theſe general depoſitions were incapable to remove all ſuſpicions. The midwife depoſed poſitively, that ſhe took the child from the queen's body. The counteſs of Sunderland depoſed, that the queen called her to give her her hand, that ſhe might feel how the child lay, "which (added ſhe) I did," but ſhe did not ſay whether ſhe felt the child or not. The biſhop of Saliſbury adds, That the counteſs of Sunderland told the ducheſs of Hamilton, (from whom he had this particular) that when ſhe put her hand into the bed, the queen held it, and let it go no lower than her breaſts, ſo that really ſhe felt nothing. Many ladies depoſed, That they had often ſeen the marks of milk on the queen's linen near her breaſts. Two or three depoſed, That they ſaw it running out at the nipple. But what is remarkable, none of theſe ladies named the time in which they ſaw the milk, except one, who named the month of May. Now if it be true, as was before related, that the queen was really with child till the ninth of April, and that ſhe miſcarried that day, all that was mentioned of milk in the queen's breaſts, particularly by her that fixed it to the month of May, might have followed upon that miſcarriage, and be no proof concerning the late birth. Mrs. Pierce the laundreſs depoſed, That ſhe took linen from the queen's body once, which carried the marks of a delivery. The biſhop objects here, that it is ſtrange ſhe ſhould ſpeak only to one time. The lady Wentworth was the ſingle witneſs that depoſed, That ſhe had felt the child move in the queen's belly, but ſhe fixed it to no time.

In general, this briefly is the uſe that may be made of the ſuſpicions mentioned by ſeveral authors, and of theſe depoſitions, namely, There being three caſes, in none of which the two parties agree, the depoſitions are not applicable to any of the caſes, without being contradicted by thoſe who maintain one of the other two caſes. Let us take, for inſtance, the two depoſitions, which, next to that of the midwife, appear moſt convincing, namely, That of the lady who had ſeen milk run from the queen's breaſts: and that of the lady Iſabella Wentworth, who had felt the child in the womb. Theſe two teſtimonies are ſufficient againſt thoſe who maintain, that the queen was not with child from January, the time of her declared pregnancy, to the 10th of June, the time of her delivery. But they are inſufficient againſt thoſe who pretend ſhe was really with child, from the 6th of October to the ninth of April, when ſhe had a miſcarriage for the reaſons before mentioned. To be able therefore to give a certain judgment concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, it is neceſſary, 1. That facts ſhould be agreed in, I mean, whether it be true, that the queen was really with child, and that ſhe had a miſcarriage. 2. That thoſe who derive their ſuſpicions from the queen's obſtinate refuſal to give ſatisfaction to the public, ſhould fix the time of this obſtinacy to the interval between the 9th of April, the day of her pretended miſcarriage, and the 10th of June, the day of her delivery. For in ſuppoſing the reality of her pregnancy till Eaſter-week, the ſuſpicions ariſing from the queen's obſtinacy, cannot but be ill grounded, unleſs this obſtinacy is confined to the ſpace of time, between the miſcarriage and the delivery, which it is not. 3. That the two ladies who depoſed concerning the milk and the motion of the child, ſhould have fixed the time to the ſame interval, otherwiſe their teſtimony proves nothing againſt thoſe who maintain, that the queen was really with child till Eaſter-week, and had then a miſcarriage; but this is what does not appear. As to the teſtimony of the midwife, which is the principal and moſt poſitive, all that can be objected to it, is, that it is a ſingle teſtimony, and that beſides, ſhe being a papiſt, might have been corrupted. But this is only a conjecture, a bare poſſibility. It is therefore clear, that to decide this queſtion in a manner capable to ſatisfy thoſe who only ſeek the truth, a more perfect knowledge muſt be had of many circumſtances which as yet lie concealed.

The king's precaution produced not the expected effect. The ſuſpicion of an impoſture was ſo deeply rooted in the minds of moſt of the Engliſh, that it was rather confirmed than removed by this examination. The myſterious conduct obſerved at a time when, conſidering the general ſuſpicion, all poſſible precautions ought to have been taken to render the birth unqueſtionable, made a ſtronger impreſſion than all theſe teſtimonies, and the rather, as they were found to be very defective. Before this examination, the preſumption of law was for the prince, ſince he was owned by both parents, ſo that the proof lay on the other ſide, and ought to be offered by thoſe who queſtioned it. But after the king had undertaken to prove the reality of his ſon's birth, by forty witneſſes, of which more than thirty ſaid nothing material, and the reſt fixed no time to what they depoſed, he left room to his enemies to object againſt theſe very depoſitions.

The king's own teſtimony was not more effectual. After the witneſſes were examined, he told the aſſembly, "That the princeſs Anne of Denmark would have been preſent; but that ſhe being with child likewiſe, and having not lately ſtirred abroad, could not come ſo far without hazard." Adding further, "That though he did not queſtion but every perſon there preſent was ſatisfied before in this matter, yet by what they had heard, they would be better able to ſatisfy others: that beſides, if he and the queen could be thought ſo wicked as to endeavour to impoſe a child upon the nation, they ſaw how impoſſible it would have been; neither could he himſelf be impoſed upon, having conſtantly been with the queen during her being with child, and the whole time of her labour. That there was none of them but would eaſily believe him, who had ſuffered ſo much for conſcience ſake, uncapable of ſo great a villainy, to the prejudice of his own children; and that he thanked God, that thoſe who knew him, knew well, that it was his principle to do as he would be done by, for 'that was the law and the prophets;' and he would rather die a thouſand deaths, than do the leaſt wrong to any of his children."

The reaſons alledged by the king in this ſpeech were far from being convincing, ſince thoſe who believed the impoſture, were perſuaded that the king was chiefly concerned in it, notwithſtanding all his aſſeverations, which were but little regarded. It is a ſad thing for a king not to be credited by the body of his ſubjects. The depoſitions were ſolemnly enrolled in chancery, and afterwards printed and diſperſed among the people. But this did not prevent a general belief that the prince of Wales was ſuppoſititious. So this birth remains hitherto in uncertainty, and probably will long remain ſo. For it muſt be obſerved, that after the king and queen had withdrawn into France, there was no finding either the midwife or the queen's ladies, who had depoſed the moſt material circumſtances of the pregnancy or the delivery.

The 28th of October, the earl of Sunderland was ſuddenly removed from his places of preſident of the council, and principal ſecretary of ſtate. It is believed that his neglect of Skelton's letters to him, was the principal cauſe of his diſgrace. He ſaid upon this ſubject, "If he gave no account of theſe letters to the king, it was becauſe Skelton never wrote but ſecond-hand news." But theſe were not mere letters of news. One Wickſtead, formerly a monk, being ſeized for holding correſpondence with the king's enemies, charged the earl of Sunderland to his face, with revealing his majeſty's ſecrets to the prince of Orange. But being committed to the cuſtody of a meſſenger, he made his eſcape the next day.

However, it is certain, Sunderland had been ſome time ſuſpected by the papiſts, who, in all appearance, perſuaded the king of his ſecret intelligence with the prince of Orange. He publiſhed afterwards an apology, but the diſcuſſion of this affair would be too great a digreſſion.

As the prince of Orange was expected with the firſt eaſterly wind, ſome of the moſt devoted to the king during his proſperity, thought proper to ſecure themſelves by letters of pardon for their illegal actions. Amongſt theſe were chancellor Jefferies, ſir Nicholas Butler, the biſhop of Cheſter, the biſhop of Durham, and about twenty more, to whom the king readily granted the favour they deſired.

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the neceſſary diſpoſitions were making in Holland for the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. For it was upon this foot that the States let their troops to the prince of Orange; and what the king called in England an invaſion, in Holland was termed, "a brotherly aſſiſtance lent by the States and the prince to the diſtreſſed Engliſh." It can hardly be thought, that the prince of Orange, with an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men, would have undertaken a deſcent into England, had he not been aſſured of a favourable reception from the generality of the people. But as it was neceſſary to remove the ſuſpicion fomented by the king, that the prince was coming to conquer and ſubdue England, he thought proper, in a declaration, to ſhew the true motives of his undertaking. This declaration, dated the 10th of October, new ſtile, was divided into twenty-ſix articles, reducible to theſe three general heads:

"The firſt contained a particular enumeration of the grievances of the Engliſh nation, eſpecially the king's arrogating to himſelf a diſpenſing power: his advancing papiſts to civil, eccleſiaſtical, and military employments, and allowing them to ſit in the privy-council: his ſetting up an illegal commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs, in which there was one of his miniſters of ſtate, who made public profeſſion of the popiſh religion, and who, at the time of his firſt profeſſing it, declared, 'That for a great while before, he had believed that to be the only true religion;' and by which not only the biſhop of London was ſuſpended, but the preſident and fellows of Magdalen college arbitrarily turned out of their freeholds, contrary to that expreſs proviſion in Magna Charta, 'That no man ſhall loſe his life or goods but by the laws of the land:' his allowing popiſh monaſteries and colleges of jeſuits to be created: his turning out of public employments, all ſuch as would not concur with him in the repeal of the teſt and penal laws: his invading the privileges, and ſeizing on the charters of moſt corporations, and placing popiſh magiſtrates in ſome of them: his ſubjecting the courts of judicatory to his arbitrary and deſpotic power, and putting the adminiſtration of juſtice into the hands of papiſts: his not only arming the papiſts, in contempt of the laws, but likewiſe raiſing them up to the greateſt military truſts, both by ſea and land, ſtrangers as well as natives, and Iriſh as well as Engliſh, that he might be in a capacity to enſlave the nation: his putting the whole government of Ireland into the hands of papiſts: his aſſuming an abſolute and arbitrary power in the kingdom of Scotland; from which it was apparent, what was to be looked for in England."

Secondly, His highneſs alledged, "That thoſe great and inſufferable oppreſſions, and the open contempt of all law, together with the apprehenſion of the ſad conſequences that muſt certainly follow upon it, had made the ſubjects to look after ſuch remedies as are allowed of in all nations, and in the moſt abſolute monarchies, all which had been without effect; his majeſty's evil counſellors having endeavoured to make all men apprehend the loſs of their lives, liberties, honours, and eſtates, if they ſhould go about to preſerve themſelves from this oppreſſion, by petitions, and repreſentations; an inſtance of which was, the proſecution of the ſeven biſhops: that a peer of the realm (the lord Lovelace) was treated as a criminal, only becauſe he ſaid, 'That the ſubjects were not bound to obey the orders of a popiſh juſtice of peace;' though it is evident, that they being by law rendered incapable of all ſuch truſts, no regard is due to their orders: that both he, and his conſort the princeſs, had endeavoured to ſignify, with terms full of reſpect, to the king, the juſt and deep regret, which all theſe proceedings had given them, and declared what their thoughts were, touching the repealing of the teſt and penal laws: but that theſe evil counſellors had put ſuch ill conſtructions on their good intentions, that they had endeavoured to alienate the king more and more from them. That the laſt and great remedy for all theſe evils, was, the calling of a parliament, which could not yet be compaſſed, nor could be eaſily brought about; for thoſe men apprehending that a lawful parliament would bring them to account for all their open violations of law, and for their conſpiracies againſt the proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the ſubjects, they had endeavoured, under the ſpecious pretence of liberty and conſcience, firſt to ſow diviſions between thoſe of the church of England, and diſſenters, with deſign to engage proteſtants, who are equally concerned to preſerve themſelves from popiſh oppreſſion, into mutual quarellings; that ſo by theſe, ſome advantage might be given them to bring about their deſigns; and that both in the elections of members of parliament, and afterwards in the parliament itſelf: that they had alſo made ſuch regulations, as they thought fit and neceſſary, for ſecuring all the members that were to be choſen by the corporations; by which means they hoped to avoid the puniſhment they deſerved, though it was apparent, that all acts, made by popiſh magiſtrates, were null and void of themſelves; ſo that no parliament could be lawful, for which the elections and returns were made by popiſh magiſtrates, ſheriffs and mayors of towns; and therefore as long as the magiſtracy was in ſuch hands, it was not poſſible to have a free parliament legally called and choſen. That there were great and violent preſumptions, inducing his highneſs to believe, that thoſe evil counſellors, in order to the gaining the more time for the effecting their ill deſigns, had publiſhed, 'That the queen had brought forth a ſon;' though there had appeared, both during the queen's pretended bigneſs, and in the manner wherein the birth was managed, ſo many juſt and viſible grounds of ſuſpicion, that not only he himſelf, but all the good ſubjects of the kingdom, did vehemently ſuſpect, 'That the pretended prince of Wales was not born of the queen;' and though many both doubted of the queen's bigneſs, and of the birth of the child, yet there was not any thing done to ſatisfy them, or put an end to their doubts. That ſince his conſort the princeſs, and likewiſe he himſelf, had ſo great an intereſt in this matter, and ſuch a right as all the world knew, to the ſucceſſion of the crown: ſince all the Engliſh did in the year 1672, when Holland was invaded with a moſt unjuſt war, uſe their utmoſt endeavours to put an end to that war, and that in oppoſition to thoſe who were then in the government; ſince the Engliſh nation had ever teſtified a moſt particular affection and eſteem, both to his highneſs's deareſt conſort, and to himſelf, he could not excuſe himſelf from eſpouſing that intereſt, in a matter of ſuch high conſequence, and for contributing all that in him lay, for the maintaining both of the proteſtant religion and the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms: to the doing of which, his highneſs 'was moſt earneſtly ſollicited by a great many lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and other ſubjects of all ranks."

In the laſt place his highneſs declared, "That for the forementioned reaſons, he has thought fit to go over to England, and to carry with him a force ſufficient to defend him from the violence of thoſe evil counſellors: that his expedition was intended for no other deſign, but to have a free and lawful parliament, aſſembled as ſoon as it was poſſible; and that in order to this, all the late charters, by which the elections of burgeſſes are limited, contrary to the ancient cuſtom, ſhould be conſidered as null and of no force: that to this parliament he would refer the enquiry into the birth of the pretended prince of Wales, and of all things relating thereto, and to the right of ſucceſſion: that he would concur in every thing that might procure the peace and happineſs of the nation, under a juſt and legal government: that he would keep the forces under his command, under all the ſtrictneſs of martial diſcipline, and promiſed, that he would ſend back all thoſe foreign forces, as ſoon as the ſtate of the nation would admit of it: that therefore he invited and required all perſons whatſoever to come and aſſiſt him, in order to the executing his deſigns againſt all ſuch as ſhall endeavour to oppoſe him: that he would likewiſe take care, that a parliament ſhould be called in Scotland, for reſtoring the ancient conſtitution of that kingdom, and for bringing the matters of religion to ſuch a ſettlement, that the people might live eaſy and happy: that he would alſo ſtudy to bring the kingdom of Ireland to ſuch a ſtate, that the ſettlement there might be religiouſly obſerved, and that the proteſtant and Britiſh intereſt there might be ſecured."

This declaration being printed, and ready to be ſent over to England to be diſperſed among the people, the prince was informed, that the king, by the advice of the biſhops, had redreſſed ſeveral grievances mentioned in his declaration. Wherefore he thought fit to make the following addition to it.

"After we had printed our declaration, we have underſtood, that the ſubverters of the religion and laws of theſe kingdoms, hearing of our preparations to aſſiſt the people againſt them, have begun to retract ſome of the arbitrary and deſpotic power that they had aſſumed, and to vacate ſome of their unjuſt judgments and decrees: the ſenſe of their guilt, and the diſtruſt of their force, have induced them to offer to the city of London ſome ſeeming relief from their great oppreſſions; hoping thereby, to quiet the people, and to divert them from demanding a re-eſtabliſhment of their religion and laws, under the ſhelter of our arms: they did alſo give out, 'That we do intend to conquer and enſlave the nation;' and therefore it is, we have thought fit to add a few words to our declaration.

"We are confident, that no perſons can have ſuch hard thoughts of us, as to imagine, we have any other deſign in this our undertaking, than to procure a ſettlement of the religion, and of the liberties and properties of the ſubject, upon ſo ſure a foundation, that there may be no danger of the nation's relapſing into the like miſeries at any time hereafter. And as the forces we have brought along with us are utterly diſproportioned to that wicked deſign of conquering the nation, if we were capable of intending it; ſo the great numbers of the principal nobility and gentry, that are men of eminent quality and eſtates, and perſons of known integrity and zeal, both for the religion and government of England; many of them being alſo diſtinguiſhed by their conſtant fidelity to the crown, who do both accompany us in this expedition, and have earneſtly ſollicited us to it, will cover us from all ſuch malicious inſinuations: for it is not to be imagined, that either thoſe who invited us, or thoſe who are already come to aſſiſt us, can join in a wicked attempt of conqueſt, to make void their own lawful titles to their honours, eſtates, and intereſts. We are alſo confident, that all men ſee how little weight there is to be laid on all promiſes and engagements that can be now made, ſince there has been ſo little regard had in the time paſt, to the moſt SOLEMN PROMISES. And as that imperfect redreſs that is now offered, is a plain confeſſion of thoſe violences of the government that we have ſet forth, ſo the defectiveneſs of it is no leſs apparent; for they lay down nothing but which they may take up at pleaſure, and they reſerve entire, and not ſo much as mention their claims and pretences to an arbitrary and deſpotic power, which has been the root of all their oppreſſion, and the total ſubverſion of the government. And it is plain, that there can be no redreſs, no remedy offered but in parliament, by a declaration of the rights of the ſubjects that have been invaded, and not by any pretended acts of grace, to which the extremity of their affairs have driven them. Therefore it is that we have thought fit to declare, that we will refer all to a free aſſembly of this nation, in a lawful parliament."

About the ſame time was publiſhed, "The reſolution of the States-General, containing the reaſons that had obliged them to aſſiſt his highneſs the prince of Orange with ſhips, men, and ammunition, in his intended expedition into England." The two principal reaſons were: 1. That the prince of Orange had been invited to this expedition by the Engliſh nobility, gentry, and clergy: 2. That the States had juſt cauſe to fear, that in caſe the king of England became abſolute in his own kingdom, he would, in conjunction with the king of France, endeavour to bring their ſtate to confuſion, and, if poſſible, totally to ſubject it. This fear was founded upon the earl of Caſtlemain's preſſing the pope, and the patron cardinal Cibo, (during his embaſſy at Rome) to admit his maſter to mediate a reconciliation between the courts of Rome and Verſailles, aſſuring, "When that reconciliation was brought about, the two kings would effectually ſerve the cauſe of the church, and begin with the deſtruction of Holland." The pope, to whom ſuch projects were not agreeable, informed the emperor of it, who communicated it to the prince of Orange. This is at leaſt what Dr. Burnet ſays in one of his letters.

Every thing being ready for the projected expedition, the prince of Orange went into the aſſembly of the States-General the 16th of October, to take a ſolemn leave of them. This was done in ſo tender and moving a manner, that both himſelf and the States melted into tears. He embarked the 19th of October, on a frigate of about thirty guns. The fleet conſiſted of fifty men of war, twenty-five frigates, as many fire-ſhips, with near four hundred victuallers, and other veſſels, for the tranſportation of above four thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand foot. The moſt conſiderable of the Engliſh, who accompanied the prince, were, the earls of Shrewſbury and Macclesfield, the lords Mordaunt, Wiltſhire, Paulet, Elan, Dunblain, admiral Herbert, Mr. Herbert, colonel Sidney, Mr. Ruſſel, ſir Rowland Gwin, major Wildman, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Harbord, Mr. Ferguſon, and many others leſs known. The prince had with him, beſides the general officers of the Dutch forces, count Schomberg, marſhal of France, who had laſt ſerved the elector of Brandenburgh, count Charles his ſon, monſieur Caillemotte, younger ſon to the marquis of Rouvigny, and about three hundred French officers, who had left their country for their religion. Admiral Herbert led the van of the fleet, vice-admiral Evertzen brought up the rear, and the prince placed himſelf in the main body, carrying a flag with Engliſh colours, and their Highneſſes arms ſurrounded with this motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION AND LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND; and underneath, the motto of the houſe of Naſſau, JE MAINTIENDRAI, i. e. "I will maintain."

This numerous fleet had been but few hours under ſail, when ſuddenly the wind coming more weſterly, there aroſe ſuch a ſtorm, that in leſs than two hours the whole fleet was ſo diſperſed, that the next day ſcarce two ſhips could be ſeen together. The ſtorm continued two days, during which time, the ſhips endeavoured to gain, ſome one port, ſome another. Many were driven northward, and could not reach the appointed rendezvous till eight days after. Nevertheleſs, the damage was ſo inconſiderable, that there was properly only loſs of time. But, on this occaſion, the States made uſe of an artifice, which did the king great prejudice: they ordered the Harlem and Amſterdam Gazettes to aggravate the damage ſuſtained by the fleet, and to inſinuate, that the prince could not poſſibly be in a condition to purſue his deſign till the next ſpring [b]. This was intended to amuſe the court of England, and make them more remiſs in their preparations. But beſides this advantage, they received from that artifice another ſtill more conſiderable, which was, that the king, hearing the news with great pleaſure, flattered himſelf, that he had now nothing more to fear, and that before the ſpring, he ſhould infallibly be able to break all the prince of Orange's meaſures. In this belief, he revoked ſome of his acts of grace granted to his ſubjects, and thereby clearly ſhewed, that theſe acts were extorted by neceſſity, and that conſequently, no change was to be expected in his conduct for the future.

It was in this critical juncture that captain Langham, an Engliſhman in the ſervice of the States, was ſeized on his arrival in England. In his portmanteau were found many copies of the prince's declaration, which were ſent to court. The king having read the declaration, was ſurprized at that expreſſion, "That the prince was moſt earneſtly invited over by divers of the lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and others." Immediately he ſent for the archbiſhop, and four or five biſhops then in London, and demanded of them, "Whether the contents of the prince's declaration, relating to their inviting him over, were true?" The biſhops contented themſelves with promiſing in general, their faithful allegiance to his majeſty. But the king, little ſatisfied with this anſwer, required them to juſtify themſelves to the world, as to their part in that invitation. At the ſame time he fixed a day, whereon he obliged them to preſent a paper under their own hand, ſignifying their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's intended invaſion. He farther let them know, "That a declaration was then in the preſs againſt the prince of Orange, and was only deferred, to have their paper of abhorrence put into it."

On the day appointed, the biſhops repaired to Whitehall, and as ſoon as they were in the king's preſence, he called for their paper. But with all ſubmiſſion, "They begged to be excuſed from writing any thing of that nature, and for making a particular defence to a general accuſation, leſt they ſhould give the firſt precedent of that kind againſt the privilege of peers: beſides, that their profeſſion being to promote peace, they thought it belonged not to them to declare war, eſpecially againſt a prince ſo nearly allied to the crown." This anſwer threw the king into a violent rage. However, they perſiſted in their refuſal, in as dutiful terms as poſſible. The king, not being able to prevail with them, ordered them to withdraw with great indignation. They were afterwards informed, that one of the principal members of the council and jeſuited party, adviſed the king, "To impriſon them all, and extort the truth from them by violence."

Mean time, the king being deſirous to conceal the prince of Orange's declaration from the people, forbad the publiſhing and diſperſing of it by proclamation. But being afterwards informed, that a great number of copies were handed about the kingdom, and ſenſible that his prohibition would be to no purpoſe, he choſe to print the declaration with remarks, tending to juſtify his own, and render odious the prince of Orange's conduct.

About the ſame time was printed a letter from the prince of Orange to the officers of the Engliſh army, and another from admiral Herbert to the Engliſh fleet. The deſign of theſe two letters was the ſame, namely to inform the army and the fleet of the true intentions of the prince, and to repreſent to them, that in being the king's inſtruments to accompliſh his deſigns, they were labouring their own ruin. Wherefore the officers, ſoldiers, and ſailors, were conjured not to ſuffer themſelves to be abuſed by a falſe nation of honour, to ſerve the king, contrary to the manifeſt intereſt of their religion and country. Theſe two letters had a wonderful effect upon officers, ſoldiers, and ſeamen; ſo that from this time many of them reſolved not to draw their ſwords in this quarrel, till they had a free parliament to ſecure their religion and liberties.

The king's fleet conſiſted of ſixty one men of war, of which thirty eight were of the line of battle. Several Engliſh authors venture to affirm, this fleet was more than ſufficient to defeat that of the States. I know not upon what their aſſertion is grounded: but it ſeems to me, it is as likely, that in caſe the fleets had engaged, the king's would have ſhared the danger. While the Engliſh fleet lay at anchor at the Gunfleet, the lord Dartmouth, the admiral, called a council of war, wherein it was debated, whether it was proper to put to ſea, and engage the enemy? An author who has writ the naval tranſactions of the Engliſh, ſays on this occaſion, "That this propoſal carried the greateſt weight with it, had there been a real deſign of obſtructing the prince of Orange in his paſſage to England. But inſtead of that, (continues he) matters were ſo concerted and agreed among the flag-officers and commanders, that had the admiral come fairly up with the Dutch, it would not have been in his power to have done them much damage." Wherefore, by a great majority, it was reſolved to continue there, in order to intercept the Dutch fleet.

The damage ſuſtained by the prince's fleet in the late ſtorm was ſo inconſiderable, and ſo eaſily repaired, that in eleven days it was in condition to put to ſea again. The firſt of November, in the afternoon, the prince embarked on a new veſſel called the Brill, and the fleet at firſt ſteering northward, it was thought the deſign was to land ſomewhere in the north of England, and Burnet ſays, the firſt ſcheme was to anchor in the mouth of the Humber. But during the night, whether the prince had changed his mind, or was hindered from purſuing this courſe by a violent eaſt wind, all the fleet ſteered towards the eaſtern coaſts of England; after which they ſhortened ſail for fear of accidents in the night. The next morning the fleet ſailed towards the

They

Channel, without meeting any Engliſh ſhip, and in their paſſage diſcovered the coaſts of Eſſex and Kent. The 3d of November, the fleet entered the Channel[c], and lay between Calais and Dover, to ſtay for the ſhips that were behind. Here the prince called a council of war. It is eaſy to imagine, what a glorious ſhow the fleet made. Five or ſix hundred ſhips in ſo narrow a channel, and both the Engliſh and French ſhores covered with numberleſs ſpectators, are no common ſight. For my part, who was then on board the fleet, I own it ſtruck me extremely.

The king, upon advice of the prince's deſign to land in the north, had ſent part of his army that way. But it was with the utmoſt ſurpriſe that he received ſeveral expreſſes, with the news that the enemy's fleet was ſailing weſtward. He however flattered himſelf that the lord Dartmouth would purſue and give a good account of them. But, for what reaſon I know not, the Engliſh fleet remained in their ſtation, till the enemy's ſhips had paſſed by[d].

The fourth of November being Sunday, and the prince's birth-day, now thirty-eight years of age, was by him dedicated to devotion, the fleet ſtill continuing their courſe, in order to land at Dartmouth or Torbay. But in the night, whether by the violence of the wind, or the negligence of the pilot[e], the fleet was carried beyond the deſired ports, without a poſſibility of putting back, ſuch was the fury of the wind. This accident gave them the melancholy proſpect of being forced to ſail on to Falmouth, or ſome other inconvenient place. But ſoon after, the wind turned to the ſouth, which happily carried the fleet into Torbay, the moſt convenient place for landing the horſe of any in England. The forces were landed with ſuch diligence and tranquillity, that the whole army was on ſhore before night. The next morning, the wind turning weſt, blew ſo tempeſtuouſly, that had the landing been deferred a few hours, probably, it would not have been poſſible to diſembark the troops. This wind prevented the lord Dartmouth, who was come in ſight of the Dutch fleet, from attacking it, and obliged him to go into Portſmouth. Upon this occaſion theſe two famous verſes of Claudian were applied to the prince of Orange:

" O nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat æther,
" Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti."

Heaven's favourite! to whom the ſkies aſſiſtance lend,
Whilſt on thy ſails conſpiring winds attend.

It was thus, the prince of Orange landed in England, without any oppoſition, the fifth of November, whilſt the Engliſh were celebrating the memory of their deliverance from the powder-plot, about fourſcore years before. This is one of the moſt remarkable æras in the Engliſh hiſtory, and which probably will never be forgot by that nation.

The prince's army marched from Torbay about noon the next day in very rainy weather and bad roads. The ſoldiers, before they landed, were ordered to bring three days bread with them, and they carried the tents themſelves. But the officers, even the moſt conſiderable, were in a very uneaſy ſituation, at their firſt encampment, being wet to the ſkin, and having neither clothes for change, nor bread, nor horſes, nor ſervants, nor other bed than the earth all drenched with rain, their baggage being yet in the ſhips. Had this ſituation laſted two days more, the officers, as well principal as ſubaltern, would have been reduced to great extremities. But the prince did all that was in his power to procure them refreſhment. He ordered horſes, carriages, and proviſions from the neighbouring country, and in this ſtate purſued his march to Exeter, about twenty miles from Torbay.

As ſoon as the king heard the prince was landed, his firſt care was to order his army to rendezvous in ſome convenient place. He choſe Saliſbury-Plain, whither his army repaired from ſeveral parts, with all poſſible diligence. They who have ſaid that he ought to have marched directly to Torbay at the head of his army, did not conſider, that the thing was impracticable. The greateſt part of his army was as yet diſperſed in different quarters. Part had marched to the north, and part to Portſmouth to ſecure that place, which was of great conſequence. The Iriſh forces were ſtill in and about Cheſter, and the Scotch at Carliſle. The king, when he quitted London, could not avoid leaving there a good body of troops, unleſs he would have hazarded the ſeeing that powerful city, where he was not beloved, declare for the enemy. But it is ſtrange, that the king, though he had two month's notice of the prince's intended invaſion, had neglected to form a camp of twenty thouſand men in the heart of the kingdom, to be ready to march againſt him on the firſt news of his landing. This was a precaution taken by ſome of his predeceſſors on the like occaſion, when they expected a deſcent without knowing in what place, and which might have ſerved him for an example. His negligence therefore ſeems inexcuſable, ſince, after the prince's arrival at Torbay, he was obliged to loſe much time in aſſembling his army of more than thirty thouſand men. Very probably, if his forces had been ready, and he had marched into the weſt, the prince would have been extremely embarraſſed, who ſtayed ten days at Exeter, without any great increaſe of his army. Had he ſhewn ſo much firmneſs as Richard III, on the like occaſion, he would doubtleſs have prevented the deſertion of numbers, who perhaps were not yet determined to abandon him, and only reſolved it becauſe they ſaw in his conduct a conſternation which to them ſeemed ominous. But this is all conjecture.

However, the king having ſent a reinforcement to Portſmouth under the duke of Berwick, vainly amuſed himſelf with endeavouring to perſuade the people, that the prince's forces were too contemptible to inſpire him with fear. He printed a liſt of the regiments of the prince's army, with the companies, troops, officers and ſoldiers belonging to each[f]. But the prince's declaration was more relied on than this liſt, wherein it was ſaid, he would not have come with ſo ſmall a number of troops, had a conqueſt of England been intended; from whence it was inferred, that he was aſſured of aſſiſtance, which would appear in due time.

The king affected to expreſs a great confidence, as being ſuperior in number of forces. The better to ſhew he was incapable of fear, hearing that the counties of Kent and York, and the city of London, were preparing to addreſs him for an accommodation with the prince of Orange, he publicly declared, " That he would look upon all thoſe as his enemies, who ſhould pretend to adviſe him to treat with the invader of his kingdoms." At the ſame time, he publiſhed a declaration, endeavouring to demonſtrate, that the prince's ſecret deſign was to uſurp the crown. But for ſuch a declaration to have any effect, it muſt have come from a prince believed innocent, and unjuſtly attacked. But the people were far from this belief. They rather looked on the king as intending to ſubvert their religion and liberty, and on the prince of Orange, as the nation's deliverer.

Mean while, the prince, now at Exeter, found not at firſt the encouragement that he expected. The biſhop, Dr. Lamplugh, on the firſt news of his landing, poſted to court, where he was rewarded with the archbiſhopric of York, which had been kept long vacant, with intention, as it was thought, to confer it on father Petre, the king's confeſſor. The Sunday after the prince's arrival at Exeter, Dr. Burnet mounting the pulpit to read his declaration, all the canons and part of the congregation left the church, not to be preſent at the reading. On the other hand, few came to offer their ſervice to the prince, and the levy of three regiments of foot, for which he had granted commiſſions[g], went on but ſlowly. Not but that in general the people of the country were inclined to the prince, and wiſhed well to his undertaking. But the memory of the ſeverities againſt the duke of Monmouth's adherents, was yet ſo recent, that every one feared to engage in a like enterprize, the ſucceſs whereof was uncertain. In ſhort, the prince remained nine days at Exeter, without being joined by any perſon of diſtinction. It is even pretended that in a council of war, held at Exeter, he ſuffered it to be propoſed to him to reimbark for Holland. But on the tenth day ſome of the principal gentlemen of the country joined him. Among theſe was Sir Edward Seymour, by whoſe advice an aſſociation was drawn, and ſigned by all perſons then with the prince, or who afterwards repaired to him. It was likewiſe ſent to ſeveral other parts of the kingdom, and ſigned by great numbers. It was as follows:

" We whoſe names are hereunto ſubſcribed, who have now joined with the prince of Orange, for the defence of the proteſtant religion, and for the maintaining the ancient government, and the laws and liberties of England, Scotland, and Ireland, do engage to Almighty God, to his highneſs the prince, and to one another, to ſtick firm to this cauſe, in the defence of it, and never to depart from it, till our religion, laws, and liberties are ſo far ſecured to us in a free parliament, that they ſhall no more be in danger of falling into popery and ſlavery. And whereas we are engaged in this common cauſe under the protection of the prince of Orange, by which means his perſon is expoſed to danger, and to the curſed attempts of papiſts, and other bloody men; we do therefore ſolemnly engage to God, and to one another, that if any ſuch attempt be made upon him, we will purſue not only thoſe that make it, but all their adherents, and all that we find in arms againſt us, with the uttermoſt ſeverity of a juſt revenge, to their utter ruin and deſtruction; and that the execution of any ſuch attempt (which God of his infinite mercy forbid) ſhall not divert us from proſecuting this cauſe, which we do now undertake, but that it ſhall engage us to carry it on with all the rigour that ſo barbarous an attempt ſhall deſerve."

From this time the face of the prince of Orange's affairs, who left Exeter to march to Saliſbury, was entirely changed. Every day brought him perſons diſtinguiſhed by their birth, eſtates, or employments. The lord Colcheſter, ſon to earl Rivers, a lieutenant in the life-guards, waited upon the prince, accompanied by Mr. Wharton, colonel Godfrey, John How, Eſq. four life-guard men, and about threeſcore men more on horſeback. Theſe were followed by the earl of Abingdon, captain Clarges, Mr. Ruſſel, and others. But what was more material, the lord Cornbury, ſon to the earl of Clarendon, colonel of dragoons, leaving Saliſbury, under pretence of an order from the king, to beat up one of the enemies advanced poſts at Honiton, carried with him his own regiment, and thoſe of horſe of Berwick, St. Albans, and Fenwick, and with the major part of them went over to the prince at Exeter.

About the ſame time the lord Delamere took arms in Cheſhire, and declared openly for the prince, inviting all his tenants to follow his example. The lord Lovelace was alſo marching to Exeter, with ſixty or ſeventy horſemen, but paſſing through Cirenceſter, was made priſoner, by the militia of the country, after a warm ſkirmiſh, in which ten or twelve men were killed on both ſides.

On the other hand, the two archbiſhops, five biſhops, the dukes of Grafton and Ormond, the earls of Dorſet, Clare, Clarendon, Burlington, Angleſey, and Rocheſter, the lords Newport, Paget, Chandois, and Oſſulſton, meeting together in London, drew up a petition, which was ſigned at the biſhop of Rocheſter's houſe at Weſtminſter. The intent of it was, to pray the king to call a free parliament, and find ſome expedient to ſatisfy the prince of Orange. The petition being delivered, and afterwards printed by the lords for their own vindication, this anſwer was returned from the king, which was alſo publiſhed: "My lords, what you aſk of me, I moſt paſſionately deſire; and I promiſe upon the faith of a king, That I will have a parliament, and ſuch a one as you aſk for, as ſoon as ever the prince of Orange has quitted this realm: for how is it poſſible a parliament ſhould be free in all its circumſtances, as you petition for, while an enemy is in the kingdom, and can make a return of near an hundred voices?" This anſwer was not ſatisfactory to the lords, who eaſily ſaw, that the king was far from deſiring a free parliament, nor would have any but of which he could be maſter.

Though the king ſtill put on a face of aſſurance, the deſertions in his army made him very uneaſy. He knew not what to reſolve, in the fear of ſome conſpiracy among the officers to deliver him to the prince of Orange, if he ſhould put himſelf at the head of the army. This was the reaſon of his ſtopping the march of his forces, artillery, and his own equipage. But in a council held on this occaſion, it was judged neceſſary for him to be as ſoon as poſſible with his army, in order to keep thoſe firm to their duty who were yet unreſolved. He therefore departed the 17th of November, after having recommended the care of the city to the lord-mayor, and in a ſpeech to the officers about him, renewed his promiſe of calling a parliament as ſoon as the prince of Orange had quitted the kingdom: he told them, "If they deſired any thing more, he was ready to grant it; but that if, after all, any of them was deſirous to go over to the prince of Orange, he was willing to grant them paſſes, and ſpare them the ſhame of deſerting their lawful ſovereign." But at the very time he ſeemed diſpoſed to give a general ſatisfaction, he left at Whitehall a council compoſed of five lords, all odious to the people, except the lord Godolphin. The other four were, the chancellor Jefferies, the lords Arundel and Bellaſis, both known papiſts; and the lord Preſton, ſuſpected of favouring popery. It is ſaid, the king deſigned to leave there alſo his confeſſor, father Petre, but the jeſuit choſe rather to retire to France.

The king arrived the 19th of November at Saliſbury, where the officers of the army, who were moſt devoted to him, paid him their compliments, and expreſſed an abhorrence of lord Cronbury's defection. At his arrival he was ſeized with a bleeding at the noſe, which encreaſed the next day, as he was going to view part of his army, quartered eight miles from Saliſbury. On the ſame, or the following day, moſt of the chief officers applied themſelves to the earl of Feverſham their general, deſiring him to aſſure the king, "That upon any occaſion they would be ready to ſpill the laſt droop of their blood in his ſervice; but yet they could not in conſcience fight againſt a prince, who was come over with no other deſign, than to procure the calling of a free parliament, for the ſecuring of their religion and liberties." This declaration, at which the king was extremely ſurprized, ſhewed him that his army, which had been always his principal refuge, could not be relied on. The earl of Feverſham, ſtrongly ſuſpecting the lord Churchill (afterwards duke of Marlborough) one of the king's favourites, lieutenant-general, captain of a troop of his life-guards, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, was very earneſt with the king to have him ſecured. But the king, whether he had no ſuch ſuſpicion, or feared it would occaſion a mutiny, would not follow his advice. However, the very next day the lord Churchill went over to the prince of Orange, accompanied by the duke of Grafton, colonel Berkley, four or five captains of his own regiment, and ſome other officers. Father Orleans inſinuates, that he had formed a deſign to deliver the king to the prince of Orange, which was prevented by his majeſty's bleeding at the noſe, at the time he intended to go and view his troops at Warminſter, the moſt advanced poſt of his army. But this accuſation is groundleſs, and entirely deſtroyed by the reſpectful letter written by that lord to the king, and which I therefore think proper to inſert here.

"SIR,

"SINCE men are ſeldom ſuſpected of ſincerity, when they act contrary to their intereſts; and though my dutiful behaviour to your majeſty in the worſt of times, (for which I acknowledge my poor ſervices much over-paid) may not be ſufficient to incline you to a charitable interpretation of my actions; yet I hope the great advantage I enjoy under your majeſty, which I can never expect in any other change of government, may reaſonably convince your majeſty, and the world, that I am actuated by a higher principle, when I offered that violence to my inclination and intereſt, as to deſert your majeſty at a time when your affairs ſeem to challenge the ſtricteſt obedience from all your ſubjects, much more from one who lies under the greateſt perſonal obligations imaginable to your majeſty. This, ſir, could proceed from nothing but the inviolable dictates of my conſcience, and a neceſſary concern for my religion, which no good man can oppoſe, and with which I am inſtructed, nothing ought to come in competition. Heaven knows, with what partiality my dutiful opinion of your majeſty hath hitherto repreſented thoſe unhappy deſigns, which inconſiderate and ſelf-intereſted men have framed againſt your majeſty's true intereſt, and the proteſtant religion. But as I can no longer join with ſuch, to give a pretence by conqueſt, to bring them to effect; ſo I will always, with the hazard of my life and fortune (ſo much your majeſty's due) endeavour to preſerve your royal perſon and lawful rights, with all the tender concern, and dutiful reſpect that become,"

Yours, &c.

This letter is a clear evidence, that nothing was farther from the lord Churchill's thoughts, than to deliver the king to the prince of Orange.

The lord Churchill's defection quite ſunk the king's ſpirits, who from this time ſaw not on whom he could rely. So, no longer daring to venture his perſon with his army, he left Saliſbury, and returned to London with a precipitation like a flight. Before his departure, he publiſhed a proclamation, "promiſing a free and abſolute pardon to all his ſubjects who had taken up arms, and joined with the prince of Orange, provided they quitted and deſerted him within the ſpace of twenty days." But this proclamation had no effect. In his return, he met with a greater mortification, in the defection of the prince of Denmark his ſon-in-law, who leaving him at Andover, went off to the prince of Orange with the duke of Ormond, Sir George Hewet, and others. That prince wrote a very reſpectful letter to the king, in vindication of his conduct, wherein he grounds the defection chiefly on his concern for the proteſtant religion, which the king had openly declared to deſtroy, not only in England, but in all Europe, by his ſtrict union with France.

Mean time, the prince of Orange having left Exeter, was advanced to Sherburn, from whence it was in his power to march to Saliſbury or Briſtol, according to the reſolutions taken by the king. The king had an army ſo ſuperior to that of the prince in number, that had he marched directly to the prince, and attacked him, he would, doubtleſs have very much diſtreſſed him. It is not likely the prince would have ventured a battle, but on the king's advancing, would probably have retired to Briſtol, in expectation of a more general defection in the king's army. Such a defection was juſtly expected, according to all the advices of thoſe who came to join him. Wherefore, it is very unlikely that he would have riſked an advantage, of which he was almoſt aſſured, by a battle, the ſucceſs whereof would have been doubtful. I remember a report then in the prince's army, that the marſhal de Schomberg being told, the king was advancing to give battle, the marſhal coldly anſwered, "If we think proper." But upon hearing that the king was returned to London, and his army retiring to Reading, the prince marched to Saliſbury, and made a public entry into that city, amidſt the acclamations of the people. During his march, there was a ſmall ſkirmiſh between two parties of the armies, in which that of the prince, though very inferior in number, defended themſelves with ſo much bravery, that the enemy had no reaſon to boaſt of the advantage, the loſs being almoſt equal on both ſides[h].

The deſertion of his principal officers was not the only cauſe of the king's mortal fears. Scarce a day paſſed, but what brought him ſome diſagreeable news from different parts of the kingdom. The earl of Bath had made himſelf maſter of Plymouth, where the Dutch fleet lay ſecure. The earl of Shrewſbury, and Sir John Guiſe had, with the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants, forced the duke of Beaufort to ſurrender the important city of Briſtol. The earl of Devonſhire, at the head of a great number of Derbyſhire gentlemen, had declared for a free parliament, agreeable to the prince's declaration. The earl of Danby had ſecured York, and having diſarmed and turned out all the papiſts, (who, under the protection of the duke of Newcaſtle, ſtood up for the king) declared for a free parliament. The town of Berwick ſoon followed the example of York, and the gentlemen of Nottinghamſhire had done the ſame. Colonel Copley, deputy-governor of Hull, ſurpriſed that town, and made the lord Langdale, the popiſh governor, priſoner. The duke of Somerſet and the earl of Oxford, came to offer their ſervice to the prince of Orange. The duke of Ormond entered Oxford without reſiſtance, and cauſed the prince's declaration to be read there. In fine, the king heard, that five commiſſioners from Scotland, among whom were the duke of Queenſbury, and the lord of Belcarris, were coming to London, to demand a free parliament in that kingdom. But the king's greateſt affliction was, to ſee himſelf forſaken by his own daughter, the princeſs of Denmark, who had privately withdrawn from Whitehall, being attended by the biſhop of London, mounted and armed, and retired to Nottingham, from whence ſhe was conducted to the prince her huſband at Oxford. Some days before, it was reported, that the queen had treated her very rudely, and proceeded ſo far as to ſtrike her. This ſo incenſed the people, that as ſoon as they found ſhe appeared not at Whitehall, they offered to tear all the Romiſh party in pieces, upon a ſurmiſe of her being murdered, or confined, but on the news of her being in ſafety, they were appeaſed. At her going off, ſhe writ the following letter to the queen.

"Madam,

"I beg your pardon, if I am ſo deeply afflicted with the ſurpriſing news of the prince's being gone, as not to be able to ſee you, but to leave this paper to expreſs my humble duty to the king and yourſelf; and to let you know that I am gone to abſent myſelf, to avoid the king's diſpleaſure, which I am not able to bear, either againſt the prince or myſelf; and I ſhall ſtay at ſo great a diſtance, as not to return before I hear the happy news of a reconcilement. And as I am confident the prince did not leave the king with any other deſign, than to uſe all poſſible means for his preſervation; ſo I hope, you will do me the juſtice to believe, that I am not capable of following him for any other end. Never was any one in ſuch an unhappy condition, ſo divided between duty and affection to a father and a huſband; therefore I know not what to do, but to follow one to preſerve the other. I ſee the general falling off of the nobility and gentry, who avow to have no other end, than to prevail with the king to ſecure their religion, which they ſaw ſo much in danger, by the violent counſels of the prieſts; who, to promote their own religion, did not care to what danger they expoſed the king. I am fully perſuaded, that the prince of Orange deſigns the king's ſafety and preſervation, and hope all things may be compoſed without more bloodſhed, by calling of a parliament. God grant a happy end to theſe troubles, that the king's reign may be proſperous, and that I may ſhortly meet you in perfect peace and ſafety; till when, let me beg you to continue the ſame favourable opinion that you hitherto had of, Yours, &c.

From what has been ſaid it appears, that the defection was almoſt univerſal, and not confined to the court and the army. It is inconceivable, that the king ſhould not have foreſeen it, or ſhould have ſo ill an opinion of the Engliſh, as to think, they would quietly ſuffer their laws and religion to be deſtroyed: that they ſhould imagine, the giving a man a commiſſion in his army, and obliging him to take the oath of allegiance, ſhould free him from, or at leaſt make him forget his duty to God and his country. But it muſt be remembered, what the princeſs of Denmark inſinuated to the queen, that the king's counſellors cared not to what danger they expoſed him. In making him the inſtrument to execute their deſigns, they no farther regarded his perſon, than as it ſerved to eſtabliſh their religion, in which they could not ſucceed without rendering him abſolute, and James imprudently fell into the ſnare. Herein may be obſerved, the difference between Charles II. and James II. The firſt was always ſenſible, that the zealous promoters of abſolute power intended his grandeur only as a means to accompliſh other projects. Wherefore, when he ſaw himſelf engaged in very dangerous courſes, he forſook them as well as he could, and left his counſellors, his miniſters, and even his own brother in the danger. This was his frequent practice, and he thereby bequeathed to the duke his brother, the difficulty and peril of a contrary method. But James II. in purſuing a directly oppoſite courſe to that of Charles, gave himſelf up entirely to the counſels of thoſe, who to attain their own ends, regarded not to what danger they expoſed him by their violent proceedings.

Be this as it will, the king, at the time I am ſpeaking of, was plunged in a gulph of difficulties, without perceiving any way to eſcape. The queen was diſmayed, and her conſternation inexpreſſible. Father Petre was retired into France, under the protection of the lord Waldgrave, ſent thither in the room of Skelton. The violent counſels of Jefferies were now unſeaſonable. The popiſh counſellors, ſeeing all their meaſures broken, took care to ſhelter themſelves from the impending ſtorm, to which they left the king expoſed. In ſhort Mr. Barillon, the French embaſſador, and Monſieur de Lauſun, then in London, vented themſelves in fruitleſs reproaches on the king, for refuſing the aſſiſtance offered by France, without directing him how to repair that error. In this extreme diſtreſs (more eaſy to be imagined than deſcribed) his ſole refuge was to turn to the proteſtant peers, whoſe counſels he had before rejected, whom he had deprived of their employments, and, in a word, treated as enemies. He therefore aſſembled all the peers, ſpiritual and temporal, that were in London. The number indeed was but ſmall, there being many with the prince of Orange, or in ſeveral parts of the kingdom for his ſervice. When they were met, he prayed their advice concerning the preſent exigencies. On this occaſion he had the mortification to hear a long enumeration of all his unwarrantable proceedings, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, and particularly his violent meaſures to deſtroy the proteſtant religion, and ſubvert the liberties of England. Theſe, it was ſaid, had occaſioned the dangerous ſymptoms that now appeared in the body politic, and for which there was no other remedy than a free parliament. The neceſſity therefore was repreſented to his majeſty, 1. Of granting a general pardon to all thoſe who either came over with the prince of Orange, or had joined him ſince his landing. 2. Of deputing ſome lords to his highneſs to treat with him about a ſuſpenſion of arms, and to endeavour to bring matters to an accommodation. And laſtly, Of turning all papiſts immediately out of their employments, to convince the world, that his majeſty acted with ſincerity.

The king took that night to conſider of the advice, and the next day declared in council, that he was reſolved to call a free parliament, that ſhould meet the 15th of January next enſuing. Accordingly, the chancellor was ordered to iſſue out the writs. Then he publiſhed a proclamation in which he declared, that all his ſubjects ſhould have free liberty to elect, and all the peers, and ſuch as ſhould be elected members of the houſe of commons, ſhould have full liberty and freedom to ſerve and ſit in partiament, notwithſtanding they had taken up arms, or committed any act of hoſtility, or been any way aiding or aſſiſting therein. He likewiſe declared in council his intention of ſending commiſſioners to treat with the prince of Orange: but as to that part of the advice relating to the Roman catholics, his majeſty only ſaid, "He would leave that matter to be debated in parliament." However, ſir Edward Hales, a papiſt, and lieutenant of the Tower, having been obnoxious to the city of London, by threatning to bombard it, was diſplaced, and colonel Skelton put in his room.

The commiſſioners nominated by the king to treat with the prince of Orange, were the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Godolphin. They left London the ſecond of December, and on their way met with paſſes from the prince.

At the ſame time appeared a printed paper at London and other places, called, "The third declaration of the prince of Orange," dated the 28th of November. It was penned by a private, and ſtill unknown, hand, who had the boldneſs to put the prince's name to it, and diſperſe it through the kingdom [i]. Amongſt other things he made the prince ſay, That as he would offer no violence to any but in his own neceſſary defence, ſo he would not ſuffer any injury to be done to the perſon, even of any papiſt, provided he was found in ſuch place, and condition, and circumſtance, as the law required. But he declared, that all papiſts, who ſhould be found in open arms, or in any office civil or military, contrary to the known laws of the land, ſhould be treated by him and his forces, not as gentlemen and ſoldiers, but as robbers, free-booters, and banditties: ſo ſhall all perſons found any ways aiding or aſſiſting to them: That whereas he he was certainly informed, that great numbers of armed papiſts had of late reſorted to London and Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent, not ſo much, he had reaſon to ſuſpect, for their own ſecurity, as out of a wicked deſign to make ſome deſperate attempt upon the ſaid cities and their inhabitants, he therefore required all magiſtrates and officers, civil and military, to diſarm and ſecure them, that all power of doing miſchief might be taken from them: That thoſe magiſtrates or others, who ſhould refuſe to aſſiſt him, to execute vigorouſly what he required of them, ſhould be eſteemed the moſt criminal and infamous of all men: betrayers of their religion, laws, and country, of whom he would require the life of every ſingle proteſtant that ſhould periſh, and every houſe that ſhould be burnt or deſtroyed, by their treachery and cowardice.

This declaration, publiſhed in the prince's name, though it was diſowned by him, finiſhed the confuſion of the papiſts; and the more, as ſeveral juſtices of peace cauſed it to be publiſhed, not imagining that any private man would have had the boldneſs to undertake ſuch a thing. From this time the popiſh party were reduced ſo low, that they durſt not hold up their heads. "An Hue and Cry after father Petre," was publicly cried and ſold in the ſtreets, notwithſtanding he was a privy-councillor. A legal accuſation againſt the earl of Saliſbury, "For infringing the moſt ſacred laws of the kingdom by turning papiſt," was preferred to the grand jury of Middleſex, who found the ſame.

The 6th of December, the three commiſſioners by an expreſs acquainted the king, "That they were to meet the prince of Orange that night at Ameſbury." But the next day they informed his majeſty, "That his highneſs had made a new appointment to meet them at Hungerford, and had ſent to them the earls of Clarendon and Oxford, to deſire them to make their propoſals in writing." This meſſage ſurprized the king, chiefly becauſe the prince had deputed the earl of Oxford, who had never been concerned in any public affair, and the earl of Clarendon was mortal enemy of the marquis of Hallifax. He inferred from thence, the prince's unwillingneſs to come to any accommodation. For this cauſe, Barillon and Lauſun earneſtly preſſed the king, to ſecure himſelf, the queen, and the prince of Wales, by a timely receſs from the nation. But he was willing ſtill to wait for the ſucceſs of the negotiation with the prince of Orange.

The ſubſtance of the propoſals delivered by the king's commiſſioners to the prince was, "That the king obſerving that all the cauſes of complaint, alledged by his highneſs, ſeemed to be referred to a free parliament, he had iſſued out his writs for calling one [k]. That he had ſent commiſſioners to his highneſs for adjuſting all matters relating to the freedom of elections, and ſecurity of the parliament; and, in order to that, propoſed, that the reſpective armies might be kept at ſuch a diſtance from London."

The prince, who was then marching towards London, returned no anſwer to theſe propoſals, but the next day, with the advice of the lords and gentlemen aſſembled with him, he put the following propoſitions into the hands of the king's commiſſioners.

"I. That all the papiſts, and all ſuch perſons as are not qualified by law, be diſarmed, diſbanded, and removed from all employments, civil and military.

"II. That all proclamations that reflect upon us be recalled; and that if any perſons, for having aſſiſted us, have been committed, that they be forthwith ſet at liberty.

"III. That for the ſecurity and ſafety of the city of London, the cuſtody and government of the Tower, be immediately put into the hands of the city.

"IV. That if his majeſty ſhall think fit to be in London, during the ſitting of the parliament, that we may be there alſo, with equal number of guards: and if his majeſty ſhall pleaſe to be in any place from London, whatever diſtance he thinks fit, that we may be at a place of the ſame diſtance; and that the reſpective armies be from London thirty miles: and that no further forces be brought into the kingdom.

"V. That for the ſecurity of the city of London, and their trade, Tilbury-fort be put into the hands of the ſaid city.

"VI. That a ſufficient part of the public revenue be aſſigned to us for the ſupport and maintenance of our troops, until the ſitting of a free parliament.

"VII. That to prevent the landing of the French, or other foreign troops, Portſmouth may be put into ſuch hands, as by his majeſty and us ſhall be agreed on."

Theſe propoſals were ſo reaſonable, that the king himſelf could not help owning, "they were better than he expected." Indeed, the prince of Orange ever adhered to his declaration, in which he only demanded entire freedom for the parliament, and a ſufficient ſecurity for the city of London, without ſtipulating any other advantage for himſelf than the maintenance of his army, till the ſitting of the parliament, for about ſix weeks. As the king could no longer hope to execute his firſt deſigns, it ſeems that nothing could be more advantageous to him in his preſent ſituation, deſerted by all, and not knowing which way to turn, than to be freed from his difficulties, by reſtoring things to their ancient and natural ſtate. Had he diſcovered a willingneſs to embrace theſe propoſals, probably, the parliament would have aſked no more of him than the eſtabliſhment of their religion and laws, ſo as not to be eaſily ſhaken, and he might have kept his crown, though perhaps with ſome diminution of the rights claimed by himſelf, his brother, father, and grandfather. This cannot be ſaid to be a hard condition, conſidering how he had governed, and the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He even ſeemed at firſt diſpoſed to accept theſe propoſals, and refer to the next parliament the deciſion of all differences, ſince that very day he called an extraordinary council of all the lords that were in town. As it was plain, he would be adviſed to accept the propoſals by all the lords, it could hardly be doubted, that he had ſuch an intention, and only called the council for form-ſake. It is not known what paſſed in it, but only that the ſame council was ordered to meet the next morning, to give their farther advice upon the exigency of affairs. Before the council broke up, the king, addreſſing himſelf to the duke of Bedford, ſaid, "My lord, you are a good man, and have a great influence: you can do much for me at this time." To which the duke replied, "I am an old man and can do but little;" then added with a deep ſigh, "I had once a ſon, that could now have been very ſerviceable to your majeſty." This was meant of the lord Ruſſel, beheaded in the late reign, who was ſacrificed to the vengeance of the king, then duke of York.

[i] Hugh Speke has owned himſelf the author of it. Secret. Hiſt. of the Revolut.

[k] He had indeed called a parliament, but the writs were not yet ſent down. Rapin.

Sir

The king was ſtruck dumb with this anſwer, ſo that he could make no reply.

Every thing ſeemed to promiſe an accommodation, and it was not doubted, but the next day ſome reſolution would be taken for the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom. But that ſame night the king, as it is ſuppoſed, conſulted with ſome of his popiſh counſellors, whoſe intereſted advice overthrew all theſe flattering expectations. Theſe counſellors eaſily perceived, what they were to expect from a free parliament. It was manifeſt, nothing could free the king from his preſent difficulties, but the delivering up the popiſh religion to the reſentments of the proteſtants, and the paſſing ſuch acts as would hinder its being ever eſtabliſhed in England. They therefore thought it more advantageous to their religion, that the king ſhould preſerve all his pretenſions, though unable to ſupport them, than ſacrifice them to the parliament. To that end, they adviſed him to withdraw into France. They repreſented, how diſhonourable it would be to retract what he had done, how prejudicial to the Catholic religion, to be forced to give his aſſent to ſuch acts of parliament as would tend only to render its eſtabliſhment impracticable. That the Catholics would be entirely deſtitute of any reſource, whereas by preſerving his rights, he might hope to be reſtored by the arms of France, and finiſh the work ſo glorioufly begun. In a word, by this intereſted counſel, they clearly diſcovered, if the king had been willing or able to perceive it, that not his perſon, but their religion was the ſole object of their concern. In fine, to give more weight to their reaſons, they inſtilled into the queen ſuch apprehenſions, as made her uſe all her influence with the king, to engage him to do as he was adviſed. They told her, the parliament would be far from being favourable to the king and herſelf: and being both ſuſpected, and even openly accuſed in the prince of Orange's declaration, of impoſing an heir upon the crown, it was very apparent, the parliament, to favour the princeſs of Orange, would declare the prince of Wales ſuppoſititious: that perhaps ſhe herſelf would be accuſed for the fact, ſince it was not ſcrupled to impeach the queen, her mother-in-law, for matters much leſs important: that a ſhort exile with a powerful and generous prince, who was able to reſtore them, was preferable to living in their own kingdom, with only the ſhadow of ſovereignty, in diſhonour, indigence, and in dependence upon thoſe whom they ought to command. Theſe conſiderations, ſupported, as it is pretended, by Barillon and Lauſun, made ſuch an impreſſion upon the queen, that ſhe reſolved to retire into France with the prince of Wales, after a poſitive promiſe from the king, that he would follow her with all convenient ſpeed.

Purſuant to this reſolution, in the night between the 9th and 10th of December, the queen in diſguiſe croſſed the Thames to Lambeth, in an open boat, expoſed to wind and rain. At Lambeth, under the walls of a church ſhe waited till a coach could be got ready in the next inn. She went from thence to Graveſend, where ſhe embarked with the prince of Wales on a ſmall veſſel, which conveyed them ſafely to Calais. From thence they went to Verſailles, where ſhe was received by the king of France with great marks of affection, which was ſome alleviation to her melancholy ſituation.

The king being fully determined to follow the queen, waited but one day to execute his deſign. The night between the 10th and 11th of December, in a plain ſuit, and a bob wig, he took water at Whitehall, accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Abbadie a Frenchman, page of the back-ſtairs, without acquainting any other with his intention. If the manner in which this monarch intended to leave his dominions is impartially conſidered, it will hardly be denied, that this was an entire deſertion of them, and a putting of his ſubjects into the ſtate in which nature dictates to men, to provide for their own ſafety. Firſt, he fled without being purſued, and without any cauſe to fear, either for his life or liberty. So that it is manifeſt, his conſcience ſuggeſted evils to him, which were never intended. Secondly, He fled without any proviſion for the government of the kingdom. From this conduct it was afterwards inferred, that he abandoned his ſubjects in a perfect anarchy, and thereby authorized them to chuſe what form of government they pleaſed, or to elect another king. Thirdly, by his flight he violated the promiſe ſo ſolemnly made in his proclamation of calling a parliament. Fourthly, before he went off, he writ to the earl of Feverſham to diſband the army, without any care of their pay, probably, on purpoſe to cauſe diſturbances in the kingdom, by the diſcontents of the officers and ſoldiers. Fifthly, he ordered all the writs to be burnt, that were not ſent out, for electing the parliament, imagining, doubtleſs, that after his departure, it would not be poſſible to aſſemble a parliament, which by the laws could only be called by the king. Sixthly, when he took water, he threw the great-ſeal into the Thames, that nothing might be legally done in his abſence. If this may not be called a real deſertion of his kingdom, it will be difficult to give a name to ſuch proceedings.

As ſoon as the king's flight was known, a general conſternation enſued, moſt people being ignorant how they were to behave on ſo extraordinary an occaſion. However, about thirty ſpiritual and temporal lords met at Guildhall, and ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen. After a ſhort conſultation, it was reſolved to adhere to the prince of Orange, and ſend deputies to him, with this reſolution ſigned by the whole aſſembly. Then they ſent for colonel Skelton, lieutenant of the Tower, of whom they demanded the keys, which he willingly reſigning, they were given to the lord Lucas. Preſently after, the common-council of the city ſent deputies [1] to the prince, with an addreſs, imploring his protection, and praying him to honour the city with his preſence.

Though, upon the king's flight, the militia of London and Weſtminſter were immediately up in arms, they could not prevent the mob from aſſembling and committing ſome diſorders. They confined their rage chiefly to the maſs-houſes erected by the king in the city and ſuburbs, which they demoliſhed entirely, and made bonfires with the materials. And as there were alſo chapels in the houſes of embaſſadors, thoſe of the Spaniſh and Florentine embaſſadors were rifled, before a ſtop could be put to the diſorder. In the firſt of theſe chapels the principal court-papiſts had conveyed all their valuable effects, and this probably was the chief cauſe of the pillage. The houſes of the other embaſſadors were preſerved, by the great care of ſome lords. The two miniſters of Spain and Florence were afterwards largely recompenſed for their loſſes [m].

During theſe diſorders of the mob, chancellor Jefferies, diſguiſed in a ſeaman's habit, in order to eſcape in a veſſel freighted for Hamburgh, was diſcovered [n] as he was looking out of the window of the houſe where he had concealed himſelf. He was immediately ſeized by the mob, and, after many indignities put upon him, carried before the lord-mayor, who declined meddling with him. But the chancellor ſeeing himſelf in the hands of an enraged mob, which threatened to tear him in pieces, deſired that he might be ſent to the Tower, which at laſt was granted him, not as a favour, but in hopes of ſeeing him ſhortly conducted from thence to the gallows. It is pretended, he offered to diſcover many ſecrets, and for that reaſon, was kept ſome time in priſon, till the affairs of the government ſhould be ſettled. But he died in that interval, by the blows he had received, according to ſome; by drinking of ſpirituous liquors, according to others; and as ſome pretend, of the ſtone. Never man had better deſerved a public puniſhment, as an atonement for all the miſchiefs done to his country, and for all the blood ſpilt by his means.

Mean time, the earl of Feverſham, after having communicated the king's letter to the principal officers, diſmiſſed the army, and gave notice of it by a trumpet to the prince of Orange, who returned no anſwer. This made it thought the prince did not approve of his conduct. And indeed it ſeems, that in ſuch a juncture, if he was unwilling to pay ſo much deference to the prince, as to communicate to him the order before it was executed, he ſhould not have done it, at leaſt without the advice of the lords aſſembled at London, who in the preſent ſtate of the kingdom had a right to interpoſe in the government. Accordingly, his conduct was greatly blamed; and this fault was the more taken notice of, as it occaſioned an alarm which threw the city and country into the uttermoſt conſternation. Some Iriſh ſoldiers of the diſbanded troops, finding themſelves moneyleſs, and incapable of ſubſiſting in a country where they were ſo generally hated, reſolved to keep themſelves from ſtarving, by forcibly entering a country-houſe. Whereupon a man of the neighbourhood runs directly to London, crying, as he paſſed, "That the Iriſh were up, and marching to London, firing of houſes, and putting man, woman, and child, to the ſword." The news immediately flew through the city, and cauſed a ſtrange panic fear. This report, as it went along, ſo gathered, that the terror was increaſed. The city was in alarm all night, expecting every moment the arrival of the Iriſh. Some prepared for flight, others ran to arms, not a window in London and Weſtminſter, but what was illuminated. From London the conſternation ſpread through the whole kingdom, ſo that in the remote parts, where people had more time to conſider what was to be done, a reſolution was taken, in caſe the news ſhould be true, of deſtroying all the Iriſh, and papiſts in England. Happily this terror vaniſhed in London as ſoon as the real cauſe of it was known.

Mean time, the prince of Orange being advanced as far as Henley, and fearing the diſorders which might be committed by a diſbanded army, publiſhed a ſhort declaration, requiring all colonels to call together the ſeveral officers and ſoldiers of their reſpective regiments, in ſuch places as they ſhould think convenient, and there to keep them in good order and diſcipline, till farther orders. This declaration was followed by another of the lords aſſembled at London, to the ſame effect, with an additional promiſe of ſubſiſtence, till they ſhould be otherwiſe provided for, to all officers and ſoldiers who ſhould obey, and deliver up their arms to perſons appointed to receive them. Beſides this, all magiſtrates were required to apprehend, and ſeize, all ſuch ſoldiers as ſhould not repair to their reſpective bodies, and to deal with them as vagabonds.

All theſe things were tranſacted, in the belief, that the king had left the nation; and indeed he was gone from Whitehall with that intention. He was got as far as a little place near Feverſham, and had even embarked in a ſmall veſſel that was to carry him to a frigate, ready to tranſport him to France. This veſſel, not being able to ſail immediately, by reaſon of a tempeſtuous wind, Sir Edward Hales, one of the king's attendants, ſent his footman to the Poſt-office at Feverſham. His livery was known by a man, who told ſome others, that Sir Edward was not far off. The footman was followed to the river-ſide, and ſeen to make ſigns to ſome people on board a bark; whereupon the fiſhermen, and other perſons of Feverſham, immediately boarded the veſſel where the king was. Sir Edward was ſoon known, and the king being taken for his chaplain, had many indignities put upon him. Then ſearching him, they found four hundred guineas, and ſeveral valuable ſeals and jewels, which they took from him. Amongſt the people who crouded into the ſhip, there happened to be a conſtable who knew the king, and throwing himſelf at his feet, begged him to forgive the rudeneſs of the mob, and ordered reſtitution to be made of what had been taken from him. The king received the jewels and the ſeals, but gave the four hundred guineas among them. After this, he deſired to be gone, but the people, by a ſort of violence conducted him to a public inn in the town. Here he ſent for the earl of Winchelſea, lord-lieutenant of the county, who prevailed with him not to leave the kingdom, but to return towards London.

This news being brought to London, produced various effects. Some wiſhed the king had never been ſtopt; others were glad of an opportunity to convince him, there was never any ill deſign againſt his perſon. The lords and the magiſtrates of London, who had made ſuch advances towards the prince of Orange, were confounded at their haſte, and were under ſome fear, in caſe the ſtate of affairs ſhould be altered. At laſt, the lords aſſembling, thought proper to appoint four of their body[d] to wait on the king, with an invitation to return to Whitehall, and with aſſurances of being received with all due reſpect; and coaches were immediately ſent to bring him. At the ſame time, an expreſs was diſpatched to the prince of Orange, to acquaint him that the king was ſtill in the nation. The prince, who was come as far as Windſor, was not a little ſurpriſed at the news. He was marching to London to ſettle with the lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, in the ſuppoſition that the king had left it. But his majeſty's return threw the prince into great perplexity, and of courſe would oblige him to take other meaſures. Nevertheleſs, as the king had no army, and by his haſty flight, had entirely forfeited the confidence of all his friends, and the eſteem of his enemies, as he was not in a condition to command, but in ſome meaſure depended upon others, the prince diſpatched Monſieur Zuyleſtein to him, to deſire him to remain at Rocheſter, till it could be agreed what was to be done. But Zuyleſtein miſſing his way, the king came to London the 16th of December, about four in the afternoon, where he was received with acclamations as if he had been returning from victory.

The king being reſtored to his palace, and in ſome manner to his deſerted royalty, diſcovered an inclination to reſume his old meaſures, and ſtill brave the proteſtants. In all appearance, the acclamations as he paſſed through London, had revived his courage, and put him in hopes of a general declaration in his favour. The firſt thing he did was to publiſh an order of council, wherein he ſaid, That being given to underſtand, that divers outrages had been committed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, by burning, pulling down, and defacing of houſes, he commanded all lord-lieutenants, &c. to prevent ſuch outrages for the future, and ſuppreſs all riotous aſſemblies. This was his laſt public act, which crowned ſo many others done in his reign, in favour of the papiſts. Moreover, he diſcharged Leiburn, a popiſh biſhop, who had been ſent to Newgate, and during his ſhort ſtay at Whitehall, was ſurrounded, as formerly, with prieſts, jeſuits, and Iriſhmen.

The king, in his journey to London, diſpatched the earl of Feverſham with a letter to the prince, "Kindly to invite him to the palace at St. James's, with what number of guards and troops he ſhould think convenient to bring along with him, that they might amicably and perſonally confer together about the means of redreſſing the public grievances." The prince returned no anſwer. But the moment the earl of Feverſham was out of his preſence, Monſieur Bentinck demanded his ſword, and told him, he had orders to ſecure him. This doubtleſs was owing to his precipitate diſbanding the army. Some indeed have thought it was only a pretence to remove him from the king's perſon, being ſuſpected of giving him ill advice, or perhaps, becauſe he was too much devoted to him, though he ever profeſſed the proteſtant religion.

In a council held by the prince, and the Engliſh lords who were with him, it was reſolved, "That the royal palace at Whitehall, being ſtill crouded with Iriſh papiſts, prieſts, and jeſuits, his highneſs could not with eaſe and ſafety remain at St. James's, where he muſt neceſſarily go the next day, without his majeſty and his popiſh guards were removed within a reaſonable diſtance from London." Moreover, an accident which happened two days before, provoked thoſe who were concerned for the prince's life. The duke of Grafton marching through the Strand at the head of a regiment, to take Tilbury fort out of the hands of the Iriſh, an Iriſh officer riding up to him, fired a piſtol at him; for which he was ſhot dead upon the place. Much more might ſuch an attempt be apprehended againſt the prince, from ſome of the king's guards. In the debate, it was propoſed to ſend the king priſoner to Breda. But the prince of Orange rejected the propoſal with indignation, proteſting, That he could not conſent to put him under any reſtraint. At laſt, ſince the prince's preſence at London was abſolutely neceſſary, it was agreed, that the king ſhould be deſired to remove to Ham, a houſe belonging to the ducheſs of Lauderdale. It appears from hence, that the king's approbation was no longer conſidered as abſolutely neceſſary to ſettle the affairs of the kingdom. And indeed it ſeems, that ſince he would have abandoned all, he had no right to pretend to any thing. Purſuant to this reſolution, the prince of Orange ſigned an order, directed to the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Shrewſbury, and the lord Delamere, to acquaint the king with it, and to tell him, he ſhould be attended by his guards, to preſerve him from any diſturbances.

Immediately after, the prince ordered the regiment of his guards, conſiſting of three battalions, to march and take poſſeſſion of all the poſts about Whitehall and St. James's, either by perſuaſion or force. The king being informed of it, ſent for count Solms who commanded theſe guards, and deſired him, "If it could be, to let him have his own guard at Whitehall, only for that night," but the count alledging his order, "to relieve all the poſts," the king anſwered, "do your office." At ten o clock at night, the Dutch blue guards entered St. James's houſe, and towards eleven, thoſe who were ordered to Whitehall, moved through the Park, and with lighted match, and in order of battle, marched up to the king's guards. The captain of the guards ſcrupling to diſlodge, at laſt received the king's orders to retire. After this, the Dutch took poſſeſſion of the guard-houſe, and at the ſame time relieved all the poſts about Whitehall and the Park, placing every where double centries. So that, during the reſt of the night, the king was really in the power of the prince of Orange. An hour after midnight, the three lords appointed by the prince came to Whitehall, and ſent to awake the king for an audience. The king ordering them to come to his bedſide, they delivered the prince's meſſage, which was to deſire his majeſty's departure to Ham; to which the king conſented; but after they were withdrawn, he ordered them to be recalled, and bid them tell the prince, that he deſired rather to go to Rocheſter, according to the prince's meſſage by Zuyleſtein, to which the prince conſented that very night. His anſwer coming to the king at eight in the morning, the king about noon took a barge, attended by the earls of Aleſbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarton, ſix of the yeomen of his guard, and about a hundred of the Dutch guard, commanded by the lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. About nine at night he arrived at Graveſend, where he found his own coaches, and ſome troops of the militia, by whom he was the next day conducted to Rocheſter.

The prince arrived at London the ſame day the king left Whitehall, and lodged at St. James's, when he received the compliments of the nobility, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London. From this time it may be ſaid, the king was a mere cypher. He was not a priſoner, but had no power left of doing good or hurt, ſo that moſt of the lords who had any employments at court, laid down the badges of their offices, as the ſtaff, the key, &c. as believing they had no longer any right to exerciſe the ſame.

During the rejoicings at London for the prince's arrival, the mob inſulted the papiſts again, not excepting embaſſadors. As there was properly no government, ſuch diſorders were almoſt unavoidable, no perſon daring to undertake to reſtrain them. At laſt, the privy-council ordered, that all foreigners ſhould be permitted quietly to leave the kingdom. The prince of Orange ſent particular paſſes to the pope's nuntio, the envoys of Poland, Savoy, and Modena. The popiſh lords, Langdale and Montgomery, were releaſed. But the earls of Peterborough and Saliſbury were kept in cuſtody, on account of impeachments againſt them. Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits, apprehended ſince the king's flight, were likewiſe detained.

Mean while, as it was abſolutely neceſſary to put an end to the preſent anarchy, the prince of Orange aſſembled the lords ſpiritual and temporal in London, to the number of above threeſcore, and made this ſhort ſpeech to them, "My lords, I have deſired you to meet here, to adviſe the beſt manner how to purſue the ends of my declaration, in calling a free parliament, for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, the reſtoring the rights and liberties of the kingdom, and ſettling the ſame, that they may not be in danger of being again ſubverted." Upon ſpeaking theſe words he withdrew, and left them to conſult together. His declaration was read, and the lords voted him their particular thanks. Then they reſolved to aſſemble every day in their old houſe at Weſtminſter, and named five of the moſt eminent lawyers[e] to aſſiſt them in the room of the judges, who were moſt of them abſent. It was farther propoſed, that the whole aſſembly ſhould ſign the aſſociation ſubſcribed by the nobility and gentry at Exeter. To this all agreed, except the duke of Somerſet, the earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, the lord Wharton, and all the biſhops but that of London. The objection of the biſhops was chiefly founded upon the unchriſtian word "Revenge," which, to ſatisfy them, was afterwards changed for that of "puniſhment."

In the mean time, the king was at Rocheſter in a melancholy ſituation. He perceived his flight had done him an irreparable injury. The proceedings at London ſhewed, that he was no longer regarded as a king to be intruſted with the government, and it was not in his power to reſtore himſelf by force. Nevertheleſs, ſome of his friends preſſed him to call a parliament, aſſuring him that ſince his misfortune there was a great turn in the minds of the city and army, and that compaſſion for him generally prevailed. But the very name of a free parliament made him tremble. For, beſides that his conſcience might reproach him and inſpire this fear, he plainly ſaw, the leaſt which could befal him, would be, that the parliament would take effectual meaſures for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, and that, as long as he lived, he ſhould be ever diſturbed. Probably it was the fear of paſſing the reſt of his days in ſo uncomfortable a ſtate, which determined him to withdraw into France. Indeed in taking that courſe, he might hope one day to be reſtored by the aſſiſtance of that crown. Whereas by ſtaying in England, he ſaw no other advantage, than the enjoyment of a royalty, ſurrounded with troubles and mortifications, and in which he could not without danger attempt to recover his former authority. Whatever were his motives, which can only be gueſſed, on the 23d of December, about three in the morning, he privately withdrew, taking with him only the duke of Berwick his natural ſon, Mr. Skelton, and Abbadie, and went on horſeback to a place near the river, where he embarked on a ſmall frigate, which landed him ſafely at Ambleteuſe in France, from whence he repaired to St. Germains. It was eaſy to execute this deſign, no perſon about him having orders to ſtop or hinder him from diſpoſing of himſelf as he pleaſed. Very probably, the prince of Orange received no leſs ſatisfaction from this ſecond, than he had from the firſt flight. The king's preſence in the nation could not but greatly embarraſs him. Beſides his natural generoſity, he had promiſed the princeſs that nothing ſhould be attempted againſt the life or liberty of her father. So, the king could not do a greater ſervice to the prince, than voluntarily to retire out of the kingdom. Eſpecially, as this afterwards furniſhed a pretence to ſay, he had abdicated the crown, which abdication paved the prince's way to the throne. When the king quitted Rocheſter, he left the following paper written with his own hand.

"The world cannot wonder at my withdrawing myſelf now the ſecond time. I might have expected ſomewhat better uſage, after what I wrote to the prince of Orange, by my lord Feverſham, and the inſtructions I gave him: but inſtead of an anſwer, ſuch as I might have hoped for, what was I to expect after the uſage I received, by making the ſaid earl a priſoner, againſt the practice and law of nations? The ſending his own guards at eleven at night, to take poſſeſſion of the poſts at Whitehall, without advertiſing me in the leaſt manner of it: the ſending to me at one of the clock at midnight, when I was in bed, a kind of order by three lords, 'To be gone out of my palace before twelve that ſame morning?' After all this, how could I hope to be ſafe, ſo long as I was in the power of one who had not only done this to me, and invaded my kingdoms, without any juſt occaſion given for it; but that did, by his firſt declaration, lay the greateſt aſperſions upon me that malice could invent, in that clauſe of it which concerns my ſon. I appeal to all that know me, nay, even to himſelf, that in their conſciences neither he, nor they can believe me in the leaſt capable of ſo unnatural a villainy, nor of ſo little common ſenſe, to be impoſed on in a thing of ſuch a nature as that. What had I then to expect from one, who, by all arts hath taken ſo much pains to make me appear as black as hell to my own people, as well as to all the world beſides? What effect that hath had at home, all mankind have ſeen by ſo general a defection in my army, as well as in the nation, amongſt all ſorts of people.

"I was born free, and deſire to continue ſo; and though I ventured my life very frankly on ſeveral occaſions, for the good and honour of my country, and am as free to do ſo again (and which I hope I ſhall yet do, as old as I am, to redeem it from the ſlavery it is like to fall under) yet I think it not convenient to expoſe myſelf to be ſo ſecured, as not to be at liberty to effect it; and for that reaſon to withdraw; but ſo as to be within call whenſoever the nation's eyes ſhall be opened, ſo as to ſee how they have been impoſed upon by the ſpecious pretences of religion and popery. I hope it will pleaſe God to touch their hearts, out of his infinite mercy, and to make them ſenſible of the ill condition they are in, and bring them to ſuch a temper, that a legal parliament may be called; and that, amongſt other things which may be neceſſary to be done, they will agree to liberty of conſcience to all proteſtant diſſenters; and that thoſe of my own perſuaſion may be ſo far conſidered, and have ſuch a ſhare of it, as they may live peaceably and quietly, as Engliſhmen and chriſtians ought to do, and not be obliged to tranſplant themſelves; which would be very grievous, eſpecially to ſuch as love their country. And I appeal to all men, who are conſidering men, and have had experience, whether any thing can make this nation ſo great and flouriſhing, as liberty of conſcience? Some of our neighbours dread it. I could add much more, to confirm what I have ſaid, but now is not a proper time."

This paper remained not unanſwered. As I have not been able to procure Dr. Burnet's animadverſions upon it[f], I ſhall endeavour to ſupply the want with ſome obſervations.

The firſt is taken from Mr. Echard, who very juſtly obſerves, "That though the king gave ſome reaſons for his ſecond deſertion, he gave none at all for his firſt. Now it was the firſt, which chiefly demonſtrated, that he choſe rather to abandon his kingdoms, than be forced to reſtore religion and the laws.

2. The king ſuppoſed, that after the diſobliging manner in which he had been treated by the prince of Orange, he had no room to believe himſelf ſafe. And yet he could not deny,

deny, that he had been in the power of the prince, by whom his perſon was untouched. At the very time of his writing this paper, he was at full liberty to concert meaſures for his eſcape into France, and actually executed that deſign, without any oppoſition.

3. What he ſaid concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, was founded upon the impoſſibility, that thoſe who knew him, ſhould believe him capable of ſo unnatural a villainy. But it was the very belief of his being privy to that unnatural villainy, which fixed the imputation upon him.

4. He aſcribes the defection of his army and the whole nation, to the artifices and calumnies of the prince of Orange; whereas the whole hiſtory of his reign is a demonſtration, that it could only be imputed to his own conduct.

5. He ſuppoſed, that he withdrew himſelf, in order to come and redeem the nation from ſlavery. But this ſuppoſition has been deſtroyed by the event, there having been in England but very few, who really wiſhed his reſtoration.

6. He inſiſted, that liberty of conſcience was abſolutely neceſſary to render the Engliſh nation great and flouriſhing. But there was not, perhaps, a ſingle Engliſhman, who believed this was the end propoſed by the king, or that was not convinced, it was only a pretence to introduce his own, and to deſtroy the proteſtant religion.

7. His ſaying, that ſome neighbours dreaded the nation's becoming too great, by the eſtabliſhment of liberty of conſcience, was only an inſinuation to make the people believe, that the Dutch had left their ſhips and forces to the prince of Orange, for that very reaſon.

THE INTERREGNUM.

[1688] UPON the king's departure, there was an Interregnum, but of ſuch a nature, as the like had never been known in England. It was not owing to the death, but to the flight of the ſovereign. So, at the ſame time, the nation was without a king, and without any one to repreſent him, and to take care of the government; and yet there was a king, but a fugitive, and who pretended not to renounce his rights. In ſuch circumſtances, it is in vain to appeal to laws, cuſtoms, or precedents, ſince the difference between this ſtate, and that which laws and cuſtoms ſuppoſe, is manifeſt.

As ſoon as the lords heard of the king's departure, they believed themſelves inveſted with a power to act in their own names, becauſe indeed, in ſuch a juncture, it could properly belong only to them, to take upon them the government. There was no parliament in being, and conſequently no houſe of commons to join with them. By the death or deſertion of the king, all public offices and employments ceaſe, becauſe they come from him. There remains therefore no authority but in the peers, who are neareſt the throne, and conſequently, more authoriſed to take care of the government, till it can be ſettled by the body of the nation, by means of a parliament. The ſtate of the kingdom was ſuch, that there was no example of the like to ſerve for a precedent. The king had abandoned the nation without being forced to it. He was in full liberty, and there did not appear any other motive of his flight, than the fear of being obliged to call a free parliament, which, probably, would not have approved of his late meaſures, but reſtored the conſtitution to its ancient ſtate. The prince of Orange pretended not to have a right to govern; his pretenſions conſiſted only in procuring a free parliament. But this parliament muſt be called by ſome authority. And by what authority could a parliament meet, if the nation continued in anarchy, where no perſon would have a right to meddle with the government? It was therefore the peers, who alone were entitled to take care of the ſtate, or elſe it muſt be ſaid, that becauſe the king was pleaſed to deſert the nation, without ſettling the government, the ſtate was to remain in anarchy, till he ſhould think fit to reſume the care of it. Let the inconveniences ariſing from the power aſſumed by the lords, be never ſo much urged, thoſe which anarchy would have produced, were infinitely greater and more dangerous. Nay, who knows, whether one of the motives of the king's flight, was not to leave the nation in this ſtate of confuſion? Be that as it will, the juncture was ſuch, that extraordinary proceedings could not be avoided.

The firſt thing done by the peers, after conſulting together, was the addreſſing the prince of Orange. "To take upon him the adminiſtration of public affairs, both civil and military; the diſpoſal of the public revenue; and the care of Ireland, till the meeting of the intended convention." The addreſs was dated the 25th of December. By a ſecond addreſs they deſired him, "To iſſue out miſſive letters, ſubſcribed by himſelf, to the lords ſpiritual and temporal being proteſtants, and to the ſeveral counties, cities, and boroughs, containing directions for the chuſing, within ten days, ſuch a number of perſons to repreſent them, as are of right to be ſent to parliament." Theſe addreſſes were ſigned by about ninety lords, that were then preſent in the houſe. They were followed by an order from the ſame peers, to all papiſts to depart the city of London, and ten miles from the ſame, and not to remove from their habitations above five miles; excepting the ſervants of the queen-dowager, the domeſtics of foreign miniſters, and all houſe-keepers in London, and ten miles from the ſame, who had been traders for three years laſt paſt, provided they gave in to the lord-mayor, their names and places of abode, in eight days; and alſo ſuch popiſh officers as ſhould give bail in ſix days, to appear the firſt day of the term, and to be on their good behaviour in the mean time; but ſuch officers as ſhould neglect, were to be taken into cuſtody.

The word convention, to ſignify a parliament aſſembled without the cuſtomary formalities, was new in England, where it had been, as I think, but once uſed in that ſenſe, namely, after the reſtoration of king Charles II. This prince finding, upon his return into England, a parliament ſitting which had hot been ſummoned by him, would not own it for a parliament, on account of the conſequences. But on the other hand, he would not deprive himſelf of the benefit of the reſolutions of this parliament, which had reſtored him to the throne of his anceſtors. So, to reconcile theſe two things together, he was willing to own it as a convention. Probably, the word was borrowed from what is practiſed in Scotland, where a difference is put between a convention of the ſtates, and a parliament. It was therefore this convention of the year 1660, that the lords had in view, when they addreſſed the prince of Orange to call one. But as this was a ſingle precedent, and as the convention of the year 1660, had been firſt called under the name of a parliament, the prince thought, that beſides the ſuffrages of the peers, it was proper to be authoriſed by others, which might paſs for thoſe of the people. He therefore publiſhed an order, "Deſiring all ſuch perſons as had ſerved in any of the parliaments during the reign of the late king Charles II. to meet him at St. James's, upon the 26th of December, by ten of the clock in the morning. He deſired likewiſe, that the lord-mayor and court of aldermen of the city of London, and fifty of the common-council, would be there at the ſame time."

In purſuance of this order, about an hundred and ſixty members, the aldermen of London (the mayor being indiſpoſed) and the deputies of the common-council, met at St. James's on the day appointed, where the prince briefly told them, "That he had deſired them to meet him there, to adviſe the beſt manner how to purſue the ends of his declaration, in calling a free parliament, for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the reſtoring the rights and liberties of the kingdom." They all repaired immediately to the commons houſe in Weſtminſter, when the firſt queſtion they debated, was, "What authority they had to aſſemble?" Upon which it was ſoon agreed, that the requeſt of the prince was a ſufficient warrant. The next queſtion was, "How the prince could take upon him the adminiſtration of affairs, without a diſtinguiſhing name or title?" But as this queſtion tended to prolong the deliberations, and defeat the ends propoſed by the meeting, it was thought proper to wave ſuch queſtions in their future debates. An aſſociation was likewiſe propoſed to be ſigned, but every perſon was left at liberty to ſubſcribe it or not. After theſe previous debates, they reſolved to addreſs the prince to take upon him the adminiſtration of public affairs, until the meeting of the convention, the 22d day of January next. The anſwer returned by the prince to this addreſs, and to that of the lords, was the ſame, that he would endeavour, as far as he was able, to ſecure the peace of the nation, according to their deſire.

During the king's ſtay at Rocheſter, Barillon, the French embaſſador, had been very active to promote diviſions amongſt the peers, with a view to ſerve the king. Of this the prince was not ignorant; but as he was not yet inveſted with any authority, he was obliged to ſuffer it, though he knew he had not a greater enemy in England than the embaſſador. But the moment he was intruſted with the government, he ſent an expreſs order for him to leave the kingdom within four and twenty hours. At the ſame time, he ſent St. Leger, a French refugee, to attend him to the ſhip. That gentleman could not forbear ſaying to the embaſſador, as they were on the road, "Sir, had any one told you a year ago, that a refugee ſhould be commiſſioned to ſee you out of England, would you have believed it?" The embaſſador anſwered, "Sir, croſs over with me to Calais, and I will give you an anſwer."

On Sunday the 30th of December, the prince of Orange went to the royal chapel at St. James's, where he was preſent at divine ſervice[z], and a ſermon preached by Dr. Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph: after which he received the ſacrament from the hands of the biſhop of London. This public profeſſion of the eſtabliſhed religion, greatly contributed to diſpel the fears of thoſe, who dreaded his too zealous adherence to the preſbyterian religion, in which he had been educated. But it muſt be obſerved, that tho' the difference between the epiſcopal and preſbyterian churches has occaſioned much noiſe, diſturbance, and enmity in England, yet, both then and now, very few foreign proteſtants ſcruple to communicate with the church of England.

The next day, the prince publiſhed a proclamation, authoriſing all publiſh officers, not being papiſts, to act in their reſpective offices, till the meeting of the intended convention, or other order to contrary.

The ſame day he paid a viſit to the queen-dowager, who indirectly aſked him to releaſe her chamberlain the earl of Feverſham, which the prince readily granted.

Though in the hiſtory of the two laſt reigns I have ſaid but little of the affairs of Scotland, the reader however may have remarked, that this kingdom was intirely ſubjected to an arbitrary power, and withal, to epiſcopacy, contrary to the general bent of the people. When the prince of Orange's declaration for Scotland (the ſame in ſubſtance with that for England) appeared there, the preſbyterians began to take courage, thoſe at the helm not daring to uſe any violence for fear of a general inſurrection, which would have been extremely prejudicial to the king's affairs at that juncture. Things remained in this ſituation, till the king's party began to retire into England. For though the Scotch biſhops had publiſhed an abhorrence of the prince's expedition, it was by no means the ſentiments of the nation in general. Every one felt the weight of the yoke impoſed on them, and the epiſcopalians themſelves had reaſon to fear, that under the pretence of humbling the preſbyterians, the king intended to deſtroy the proteſtant religion. So far their caſe was the ſame with that of the Engliſh. And therefore the duke of Queenſbury, and ſome other Scotiſh gentlemen were come to London, to deſire a free parliament. Hence may be known, what the Scots thought of their preſent ſlavery. The lord chancellor, upon the news of king James's withdrawing, immediately reſigned the great ſeal, and retired from Edinburgh. Upon which, the populace of that city inſulted and rifled, not only the Roman catholics, but alſo thoſe who had appeared moſt devoted to the epiſcopal party. So, the biſhops were forced to retire, to avoid the inſults of the preſbyterians, who were now much ſuperior to their late perſecutors. On the other hand, ſeveral Scotch lords and gentlemen repaired to London, to obſerve the motions there, and to determine their conduct by that of the Engliſh.

The prince of Orange, who could not viſit Scotland, aſſembled all the Scotch nobility and gentry then in London, who meeting at St. James's, to the number of thirty lords and fourſcore gentlemen, he aſked their advice, what was to be done for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring their laws and liberties, according to his declaration? After this ſhort ſpeech, the lords and gentlemen repaired to the council chamber at Whitehall, and chuſing duke Hamilton their preſident, conſulted together, what advice was moſt proper to be given to the prince. This affair was in effect ſettled the firſt day. But on the morrow they were interrupted by a propoſal from the earl of Arran, that the king ſhould be deſired to return and call a free parliament. The tendency of this propoſal was eaſily ſeen, and therefore it was unanimouſly rejected. At laſt, it was agreed to preſent an addreſs to the prince of Orange, to deſire him to take upon him the adminiſtration of all affairs, both civil and military, and to call a general meeting of the ſtates to be holden the 14th of the following March. This addreſs being preſented to the prince, he deſired time to conſider of it, and two days after returned much the ſame anſwer as he had to the Engliſh.

The proſpect from Ireland was not ſo pleaſing. The earl of Tyrconnel, a zealous papiſt, and entirely devoted to the king, was lord-lieutenant, and ſupported by an army, which he had taken care to compoſe of popiſh officers and ſoldiers. There was room therefore to fear, that the earl would not ſubmit to the reſolutions taken in England, and he was not then to be forced to obedience. Mean while, the prince of Orange having received addreſſes not only from the Engliſh lords and commons concerning Ireland, but likewiſe from the proteſtants of that kingdom, could not but endeavour to procure the happineſs of a nation which depended upon England. It was therefore thought proper to ſummon the earl of Tyrconnel by a letter, to ſubmit to the preſent adminiſtration in England. The delivery of this letter was committed to colonel Hamilton, who promiſed to ſecond it with his perſuaſions. But it was afterwards known, that he acted in concert with Tyrconnel directly to oppoſe it.

The prince, and the lords, as I have ſaid, had ordered the forces diſbanded by the earl of Feverſham to re-aſſemble. When this was done, the prince diſcharged the arrears of the Engliſh army, with two hundred thouſand pounds, advanced in four days by the city of London, ſixty thouſand of which was lent by ſir Samuel Daſhwood. After this, he ordered a reform of eight new raiſed regiments, beſides the troop of life-guards, commanded by the lord Dover, who were all papiſts. Then, ſeveral colonels and other officers having reſigned their commiſſions on account of the new oath exacted of them, he filled their places with proteſtants, and in a word took all poſſible care to put the army under ſuch a regulation, as might render it ſerviceable to the ſtate.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury had hitherto declined waiting on the prince of Orange. But at laſt he ſent a compliment to the prince, and with ſeven or eight biſhops more ſigned the aſſociation, after ſome words were ſoftened in it, that gave them uneaſineſs.

About the ſame time, ninety diſſenting miniſters attended the prince, and aſſured him of their fervent prayers for the preſervation of his perſon, and the ſucceſs of his endeavours for the defence and propagation of the proteſtant intereſt. The prince returned a favourable anſwer, though expreſſed in general terms, inſinuating, that it would not be his fault, if they were not made eaſy.

In the mean time, the elections for the members of the convention proceeded with all imaginable freedom. The electors gave their votes according to their own inclinations, without ſollicitations from the prince, or his friends. Moreover, the prince had ordered the ſoldiers to remove at a certain diſtance from the places of election, to take away all pretence of compulſion.

Mean while, the prince conſidering, that the convention was to ſettle the goverment, thought proper to ſend for his princeſs; ſince if, as it was probable, the convention ſhould declare the throne vacant, no perſon had a juſter pretenſion to it than ſhe. Very likely alſo, he thought he had himſelf room to aſpire to it, by his late great ſervice to the Engliſh. But a ſevere froſt retarded her departure from Holland longer than he expected.

[1688-9] The commons met the 22d of January in two houſes, as a parliament. The peers choſe George Savile, marquis of Hallifax, for their ſpeaker; and the commons, Mr. Henry Powle. In each houſe was read the following letter from the prince of Orange, on the occaſion of the meeting:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have endeavoured to the utmoſt of my power, to perform what was deſired from me, in order to the public peace and ſafety; and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted which might tend to the preſervation of them, ſince the adminiſtration of affairs was put into my hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the foundations of a firm ſecurity for your religion, your laws, and your liberties. I do not doubt, but that by ſuch a full and free repreſentative of the nation, as is now met, the ends of my declaration will be attained: and ſince it hath pleaſed God hitherto to bleſs my good intentions with ſo great ſucceſs, I truſt in him, that he will compleat his own work, by ſending a ſpirit of peace and union to influence your counſels, that no interruption may be given to a happy and laſting ſettlement.

"The dangerous condition of the proteſtants in Ireland, requiring a large and ſpeedy ſuccour, and the preſent ſtate of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unſeaſonable diviſions amongſt ourſelves, nothing can be ſo fatal as too great delay in your conſultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to reſcue this nation, may ſuddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the ſervice of their troops, which are now here, and of your early aſſiſtance againſt a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war againſt them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon ſuch exigencies, ſo I am confident, that their chearful concurrence to preſerve this kingdom with ſo much hazard to themſelves, will meet with all the returns of friendſhip and aſſiſtance, which may be expected from you, as proteſtants and Engliſhmen, whenever their condition will require it.

"Given at St. James's the 22d day of January, "1688-9."

After the reading of this letter, the two houſes preſented an addreſs to the prince, in which they acknowledged him, under God, the deliverer of the nation: they approved likewiſe of all that he had done ſince he had been intruſted with the adminiſtration, which they prayed him to continue till farther application ſhould be made to him by them, which ſhould be done with all convenient ſpeed. They promiſed alſo to diſpatch the matters recommended to them by his letter. The prince in his anſwer accepted the offers made him by the two houſes, and ſtrongly preſſed them to a conſideration of the affairs of Europe.

The firſt thing done by the two houſes after their addreſs of thanks to the prince, was to appoint a day of public thankſgiving to God, for the happy deliverance of the nation. As, on theſe occaſions, prayers ſuited to the day are always compoſed by the biſhops, they had an order to inſert a particular prayer for the prince of Orange.

In the mean time, king James, perceiving the prejudice his flight would do him, endeavoured to prevent it, by a letter directed to the "lords, and others of his privy-council." He repeated the reaſons contained in the writing left on his table at his departure from Rocheſter, and declared his intention to return to England for the holding a free parliament. He reproached the prince of Orange with artifices to hinder his holding ſuch a parliament, and required their advice, "What was fit to be done by him towards his returning." Though this letter was immediately printed and diſperſed, it was little regarded. Even the perſons to whom it was addreſſed, judged it not proper to return an anſwer, at a time the convention was ſitting. James therefore ſent a letter of the ſame tenor to both houſes of the convention, adding a promiſe, on the word of a king, of a pardon even to thoſe that betrayed him, (ſome few excepted) and a reſolution, by an act of oblivion, to cover all faults. But both houſes returning the letters unopened, the king's friends complained of it, as of a great hardſhip.

The houſe of commons deferred their ſitting till the 28th of January, to give time to the reſt of their members to come up to town. That day, Mr. Dolben, ſon to the late archbiſhop of York, made a long ſpeech to prove the vacancy of the throne, by the king's deſerting the kingdom. Upon this aroſe a debate, which held four or five hours, and ended with this memorable vote:

"That king James the Second, having endeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and by the advice of jeſuits and other wicked perſons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, hath 'abdicated' the government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant."

The next day, the commons farther voted, "That it hath been found by experience to be inconſiſtent with this proteſtant kingdom, to be governed by a popiſh prince."

They preſented likewiſe an addreſs to the prince of Orange, for the ſtopping all ſhips that were going to France. Two days after, they voted, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the clergy of the church of England, who had refuſed to read in the churches the king's declaration for toleration; and alſo to the officers and ſoldiers, for having teſtified their ready adherence to the proteſtant religion; and to all ſuch as had appeared in arms for the defence of the ſame. All theſe votes were ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.

But in the houſe of lords things paſſed not with that unanimity. There were ſeveral parties, who cauſed every queſtion to be nicely examined. It was on the 29th of January, that the lords began to conſider the vote of the commons, concerning the vacancy of the throne. The firſt motion was, "Not to agree with the commons that the throne was vacant, but only to ſuppoſe it for the preſent, leaving it to be further examined afterwards, in order to cut ſhort ſeveral other queſtions, by determining this firſt, 'Whether the throne being vacant, it ought to be filled up by a regent or a king?'" Daniel Finch, earl of Nottingham, who was at the head of the party for a regent, made a long ſpeech, alledging ſeveral arguments for a regency, taken from the Engliſh and other hiſtories. He inſiſted particularly upon what had very lately paſſed in Portugal, where, Alphonſo VI. being depoſed, his brother, don Pedro, had only the title of regent of the kingdom conferred on him. But the marquis of Hallifax and the earl of Danby demonſtrated on the other ſide, the inſuperable difficulties attending the adminiſtration of the government under a regent. At laſt, after a very long debate, the queſtion being put to the vote, fifty-one were for a king, and forty-nine for a regency[a]. Thirteen biſhops were among the laſt, and but two among the firſt, namely, Dr. Compton biſhop of London, and Sir Jonathan Trelawney biſhop of Briſtol. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was abſent.

If the principles advanced by the church of England in the reign of Charles II. and the doctrine of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance ſo ſtrenuouſly maintained, and publicly preached, be remembered, it will not be thought very ſtrange, that the biſhops ſhould refuſe to vote for depoſing king James, and ſetting another king on the throne. This was directly contrary to the maxims they had not long ſince approved, and from which they did not think proper to depart entirely. The truth is, by maintaining theſe extravagant maxims, without admitting any limitations, at a time when they thought only of oppoſing the principles of the republicans, they had thrown themſelves into a very dangerous ſtrait, of which they were not ſenſible, till they ſaw the proteſtant religion expoſed to the danger attending theſe maxims. They perceived then, it was abſolutely neceſſary to limit the regal authority, and were themſelves the firſt to do it, by openly refuſing to read the declaration for liberty of conſcience. Herein they acted directly contrary to the principle of paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance, maintained before with ſuch ardour by the church of England. This the king reproached them with, when he told them, He did not expect to meet with reſiſtance from the church. So, after eſtabliſhing as an eſſential doctrine of the church of England, that the royal power is by divine right, and that the king can never be diſobeyed without ſin, they ſhewed by their own practice, that it muſt be received with this reſtriction, "When the king enjoins things according to law. But in caſe his commands are contrary to law, he not only may, but even ought to be reſiſted." A doctrine which would never have been conteſted, had it been thus explained at firſt. When I ſay the biſhops, I mean the church of England in general.

It is therefore certain, that when the queſtion was to be decided, Whether, on ſuppoſition of the vacancy of the throne, it ſhould be filled with a king or a regent, the church of England was ſatisfied that James II. had violated the laws, and no longer deſerved to be truſted with the government of the kingdom. This was the general opinion. The only point was to know, whether the title of king ſhould be left him, and a regent appointed to govern in his room, or whether another king ſhould be ſet on the throne. It is eaſy to ſee the little difference between a king actually depoſed, whoſe throne is filled by another, and a fugitive king, from whom no more orders are to be received, and whoſe authority is exerciſed by a regent not of his own chuſing. But, beſides the particular view ſome lords might have, of rendering the reſtoration of king James leſs difficult, by leaving him the title of king, the biſhops found a conſiderable advantage in a regency. For by that they did not ſwerve ſo far from the principle they had before preached, and cauſed to be preached, that the regal power is jure divino. Indeed, when religion was in extreme danger, they had not thought fit to inſiſt upon this principle. They had not only ſuffered and approved the prince of Orange's coming to the relief of their religion, but moreover, ſome had invited him into England. But the ſtorm being over, the king a fugitive, the catholic party ſuppreſſed, and all fear vaniſhed, they believed they ought not entirely to depart from their principles. If, for their own ſafety, they were willing the kingdom ſhould be governed, not by king James, but by a regent, they could not, on the other hand, reſolve openly to recede from what they had maintained, that the regal power is jure divino, and the king's character indelible.

[a] The chief of thoſe that voted for a regency, were, the dukes of Somerſet and Beaufort; the earls of Kent, Pembroke, Clarendon, Rocheſter, Craven, Weſtmoreland, Scarſdale, Cheſterfield, Litchfield, Yarmouth, and Lindſey; the lords Weymouth, Coventry, Brooke, Leigh, Ferrars, Chandois, Jermin, Arundel of Trerife, Dartmouth, Godolphin, Griffin, &c. Kennet, p. 544.

On the morrow, January 30, this queſtion was put in the houſe of lords, "Whether or no there was an original contract between the king and people?" This queſtion was warmly debated, ſeveral maintaining, that ſuch a contract was only a chimera. Others rejecting the general aſſertions urged by the firſt, and the inſtances brought from the practice of other countries, confined themſelves to the particular conſtitution of the Engliſh government. They endeavoured to ſhew, that it muſt have been by virtue of ſuch a contract, that the parliament was poſſeſſed jointly with the king, of the legiſlative power: otherwiſe, the right of the parliament, in their opinion, could be founded only upon cuſtom, which was not ſufficient to balance the king's pretended divine right: whence it would follow, that the king, in virtue of his divine right, might aboliſh this cuſtom, and render himſelf abſolute. But that the prevention of ſuch a misfortune was the occaſion of their preſent meeting. The queſtion being put to the vote, fifty-three were for the original contract, and forty-ſix only againſt it.

The next day they took into conſideration the word "abdicated," and entered into a grammatical diſpute, to know whether the word could be underſtood only of a voluntary abdication, without any mixture of compulſion, and it was concluded, that the word "deſerted" was more proper. They next examined the word "vacant," and put this queſtion, "Whether king James, having broke that original contract between him and his people, and deſerted the government, the throne was thereby vacant?" The debates upon this queſtion were longer, and more warm than any of the former. In ſhort, the party that maintained, it was a law-maxim, That, "The king never dies," and conſequently, that the throne can never be vacant, carried the negative of the queſtion by eleven voices. But on the morrow, forty lords entered their proteſtations againſt the vote. As the lords vote was founded upon the crown's devolving, on the king's demiſe, immediately to the next heir without any vacancy, ſome of the other party moved, that ſuppoſing king James to be dead in law, the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould be declared king and queen. But this was alſo carried in the negative by five voices.

If theſe ſeveral reſolutions be conſidered, and compared together, the lords will doubtleſs ſeem to have rendered it impoſſible to ſettle the government any way. In the firſt place, the firſt vote by which the regency was rejected, was founded upon the ſuppoſition of the throne's being vacant, and yet by the laſt vote it was carried, that the throne was not vacant. Secondly, it appeared, that they were not for king James. It was agreed, he had broke the original contract, and deſerted the government, and yet it was decided, that the throne was not vacant. Thirdly, in voting that the throne was not vacant, becauſe the king never dies, and the regal authority devolves, after the king's natural or civil death, to the next heir, they refuſed to acknowledge the princeſs of Orange for queen. There remained therefore but one expedient, namely, to recognize for king the prince of Wales, who was conveyed into France; a prince, that by moſt of the Engliſh was believed ſuppoſititious, and beſides would, probably, be educated in the Romiſh religion. But the commons had voted, and the lords concurred afterwards to the vote, that it was inconſiſtent with a proteſtant kingdom, to be governed by a popiſh king. The ſeveral reſolutions of the lords upon the queſtions propoſed, ſeem therefore to tend ſolely to render the ſettling of the government impracticable. This, no doubt, was the aim of ſome among them, that the difficulties might not poſſibly be ſurmounted, but by recalling king James. Many were ſatisfied of this, and therefore a petition was drawn up to be preſented to the lords, deſiring, in plain terms, that the prince and princeſs of Orange might be ſettled on the throne. Care was taken to get this petition ſigned by all ſorts of people, that by the great number of ſubſcribers it might paſs for the ſenſe of the nation. But the prince of Orange not liking this way of proceeding, ſent the lord-mayor orders, to put a ſtop to this tumultuous project, which was accordingly done.

The 2d of February, the lords ſent a meſſage, to acquaint the commons with two amendments they had made to their vote of the 28th of January. The firſt was, inſtead of the word "abdicated," they would have "deſerted" put in. The ſecond, that the words, "and that the throne is thereby become vacant," ſhould be left out. The commons, not pleaſed with theſe two amendments, appointed a committee to draw up reaſons why they muſt inſiſt upon their vote, and deſired a conference with the lords upon that ſubject. This conference produced no effect, each houſe perſiſting in their opinion. Only the earl of Nottingham intimated from the lords, that they inſiſted upon the amendments, not to favour king James, but ſolely to maintain hereditary right, in the fear that the election of a king might deſtroy that right. But the commons perſiſting ſtill in their opinion, by a ſuperiority of two hundred and eighty-two, againſt one hundred and fifty-one, appointed twenty-four of their moſt able members to manage on this extraordinary occaſion at a free conference, for which the lords named on their part, the earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, Rocheſter, Pembroke, with the biſhop of Ely, and ſome others.

As this conference between the two houſes is the moſt remarkable ever known in England, as well for the importance of the thing itſelf, as for the ability of the managers, I ſhall inſert it at large, and take the liberty to add ſome remarks, for the illuſtration of the ſpeeches made on this occaſion.

Mr. Hampden, who opened the conference, ſaid, My lords,——"The word ABDICATED, the commons conceive, is of a larger ſignification than the word your lordſhips are pleaſed to uſe, DESERTED; but not too large to be applied to all the recitals in the beginning of the commons vote, to which they meant it ſhould be applied. Nor ought it to be reſtrained to a voluntary expreſs reſignation, only in word or writing; overt-acts there are, that will be ſignificant enough to amount to it. My lords, That the common law of England is not acquainted with the word, it is from the modeſty of our law, that it is not willing to ſuppoſe there ſhould be any unfortunate occaſion of making uſe of it.

"Your lordſhips next amendment is, that your lordſhips have left out the laſt words in the commons vote, 'And that the throne is thereby vacant.' My lords, the commons conceive it a true propoſition, and that the throne is vacant; and they think they make it appear, that this is no new phraſe; neither is it a phraſe that perhaps ſome of the old records may be ſtrangers to, or not well acquainted with: but they think it not chargeable with conſequences that your lordſhips have been pleaſed to draw from it, 'That it will make the crown of England become elective.' If the throne had been full, we know your lordſhips would have aſſigned that, as a reaſon of your diſagreement, by telling us who filled it; and it would be known by ſome public royal act, which might notify to the people, in whom the kingly government reſided; neither of which hath been done, and yet your lordſhips will not allow the throne to be vacant."—

Mr. Sommers[b] ſaid——"If it be an objection that the word 'abdicated' hath not a known ſenſe in the common law of England, there is the ſame objection againſt the word 'deſerted:' So that your lordſhips firſt reaſon hath the ſame force againſt your own amendment, as it hath againſt the term uſed by the commons. The words are both Latin words, and uſed in the beſt authors, and both of a known ſignification; their meaning is very well underſtood; though it be true, their meaning be not the ſame: the word 'abdicate' doth naturally and properly ſignify, entirely to renounce, throw off, diſown, relinquiſh any thing or perſon, ſo as to have no further to do with it; and that whether it be done by expreſs words, or in writing,' (which is the ſenſe your lordſhips put upon it, and which is properly reſignation or ceſſion) or, 'by doing ſuch acts as are inconſiſtent with the holding, or retaining of the thing;' which the commons take to be the preſent caſe, and therefore made choice of the word word 'abdicate,' as that which they they thought did, above all others, moſt properly expreſs that meaning: and in this latter ſenſe it is taken by others." [Here, to ſhew that it was the true ſignification of the word, he urged the authorities of Grotius, Calvin, Briſonius, Budæus, and Praleius.] "But the word, 'deſerted,' hath not only a very doubtful ſignification, but in common acceptance, both of the civil and common law, doth ſignify only a 'bare withdrawing, a temporary quitting a thing, a neglect only which leaveth the party at liberty of returning to it again." [For this he quoted Spigelius and Bartolus, adding,] "Hence it appears, that that is called 'deſertion,' which is temporary and relievable: that is called 'dereliction,' where there is no power or right to return. So in the civil law, the word 'deſert' is uſed to ſignify, ſoldiers leaving their colours. And in the cannon law to 'deſert' a benefice, ſignifies no more than to be non-reſident. In both caſes, the party hath not only a right of returning, but is bound to return again: which, my lords, as the commons do not take to be the preſent caſe, ſo they cannot think that your lordſhips do; becauſe it is expreſly ſaid in one of your reaſons given in defence of the laſt amendment, 'That your lordſhips have been, and are willing, to ſecure the nation againſt the return of king James:' which your lordſhips would not, in juſtice, do, if you did look upon it as no more than a negligent withdrawing, which leaveth a liberty to the party to return. For which reaſons, my lords, the commons cannot agree to the firſt amendment, to inſert the word 'deſerted' inſtead of 'abdicated;' becauſe it doth not in any ſort come up to their ſenſe of the thing: ſo they do apprehend it doth not reach your lordſhips meaning, as it is expreſſed in your reaſons; whereas they look upon the word 'abdicated,' to expreſs properly what is to be inferred from that part of the vote, to which your lordſhips have agreed, 'That king James the Second, by going about to ſubvert the conſtitution, and by breaking the original contract between king and people, and by violating the fundamental laws, and by withdrawing himſelf out of the kingdom,' hath hereby renounced to be a king, according to the conſtitution, by avowing to govern by a deſpotic power, unknown to the conſtitution, and inconſiſtent with it; he hath renounced to be king according to the law, ſuch a king as he ſwore to be at the coronation, ſuch a king to whom the allegiance of an Engliſh ſubject is due; and hath ſet up another kind of dominion, which is to all intents an 'abdication,' or abandoning of his legal title, as fully as if it had been done by expreſs words (1.)'

[b] A famous lawyer, who was afterwards lord chancellor in the reign of king William III. Rapin.

Remark (1). It is eaſy to perceive, that theſe two ſpeeches of Mr. Hampden and Mr. Sommers refer to what was objected by the lords in a former conference againſt the word "abdicated," and the "vacancy of the throne." I thought proper to omit that firſt conference, becauſe moſt of the things therein alledged, are repeated in this. However, it may be ſeen here by the commons anſwers, what the lords objections were.

Mr. ſerjeant Holt added,——"For that part of your lordſhip's objection. 'That it is not a word known to the common law of England,' that cannot prevail; for your lordſhips very well know, we have very few words in our tongue, that are of equal antiquity with the common law: your lordſhips know the language of England is altered greatly in the ſeveral ſucceſſions of time, and the intermixture of other nations; and if we ſhould be obliged to make uſe only of words then known and in uſe, what we ſhould deliver in ſuch a dialect, would be very difficult to be underſtood.

"Your lordſhip's ſecond reaſon for your firſt amendment, in changing the word 'abdicated' for the word deſerted,' is, 'Becauſe in the common acceptation of the civil law, 'abdication' is a voluntary expreſs act of renunciation.' That is the general acceptation of the word, and I think the commons do uſe the word in this caſe, becauſe it hath that ſignification: but I do not know whether your lordſhips mean a voluntary expreſs act or formal deed of renunciation: if you do ſo, I confeſs I know of none in this caſe: but my lords, both in the common law of England, and in the civil law, and in common underſtanding, there are expreſs acts of renunciation that are not by deed; for if your lordſhips pleaſe to obſerve, the government and magiſtracy is under a truſt, and any acting contrary to that truſt, is a renouncing of the truſt, though it be not a renouncing by formal deed; for it is a plain declaration by act and deed, though not in writing, that he who hath the truſt, acting contrary, is a diſclaimer of the truſt; eſpecially, my lords, if the actings be ſuch as are inconſiſtent with, and ſubverſive of this truſt: for how can a man in reaſon or ſenſe, expreſs a greater renunciation of a truſt, than by the conſtant declarations of his actions to be quite contrary to that truſt?"

Then the earl of Nottingham ſpoke on the ſide of the lords, and ſaid,——"The main reaſon of the change of the word 'deſerted,' is upon the account of the conſequence drawn in the concluſion of your vote, 'That the throne is thereby vacant:' that is, what the commons mean by that expreſſion, whether you mean it is ſo vacant as to null the ſucceſſion in the hereditary line, and ſo all the heirs to be cut off, which we ſay will make the crown elective? And it may be fit for us to ſettle that matter firſt, and when you know what the conſequence of the throne being vacant means in the vote as you underſtand it, I believe we ſhould much better be able to ſettle the difference about the two words (2)."

Rem. (2.) It does not appear that the commons had any thoughts of making the crown elective. This was a conſequence aſcribed to them by the lords, to have an occaſion to contradict the vacancy of the throne.

To this it was replied by ſerjeant Maynard, "My lords, when there is a preſent defect of one to exerciſe the adminiſtration of the government, I do conceive, the declaring a vacancy, and proviſion of a ſupply for it, can never make the crown elective. The commons apprehend there is ſuch a defect now; and by conſequence a preſent neceſſity for the ſupply of the government, and that will be next for your lordſhips conſideration, and theirs afterwards. If the attempting the utter deſtruction of the ſubject, and ſubverſion of the conſtitution, be not as much an 'abdication' as the attempting of a father to cut a ſon's throat, I know not what is. My lords, the conſtitution, notwithſtanding the vacancy, is the ſame; the laws that are the foundations and rules of that conſtitution are the ſame; but if there be in any particular inſtance, a breach of that conſtitution, that will be an 'abdication,' and that 'abdication' will infer a vacancy. It is not that the commons do ſay, 'The crown of England is always and perpetually elective;' but it is more neceſſary that there be a ſupply, when there is a defect, and the doing of that would be no alteration of the monarchy from a ſucceſſive one to an elective."

Then the biſhop of Ely on the ſide of the lords, ſaid, "Gentlemen,——That 'abdicated' may be tacitly by ſome overt-acts, Mr. Sommers very truly did alledge out of Grotius: but I deſire to know whether Grotius, that great author, in treating on this ſubject, doth not interpoſe this caution, 'If there be a yielding to the times: if there be a going away, with a purpoſe of ſeeking to recover what is for the preſent left or forſaken;' in plain Engliſh, 'if there were any thing of force or juſt fear in the caſe, that doth void the notion of 'abdication."

Mr. ſerjeant Maynard replied, "But, my lords, that is not any part of the caſe declared by the commons in this vote; when the whole kingdom and the proteſtant religion, our laws, and liberties have been in danger of being ſubverted, an enquiry muſt be made into the authors and inſtruments of this attempt, and if he who had the adminiſtration intruſted to him, be found the author and actor in it, what can that be but a renunciation of his truſt, and conſequently his place thereby vacant? 'Abdication,' (under favour) is an Engliſh word; and your lordſhips have told us, the true ſignification of it is a renunciation. We have indeed, for your lordſhips ſatisfaction, ſhewn its meaning in foreign authors; it is more than a 'deſerting' the government, or leaving it with a purpoſe of returning."

The biſhop of Ely replied, "The objection of the lords againſt the word 'abdicated,' is, 'That it is of too large a ſignification for the caſe in hand.' It ſeems to be acknowledged, that it reaches a great way; and therefore the lords would have a word made uſe of, which ſignifies only, 'the ceaſure of the exerciſe of a right (3)."

Rem. (3.) Hitherto the lords had not clearly diſcovered why they rejected the word "abdicated." It appears here, by what the biſhop of Ely ſays, that it was becauſe this word expreſſed the commons meaning too well, and therefore the lords would have another word in its ſtead, from which the vacancy of the throne could not be inferred.

The biſhop adds,——"If there be ſuch a defect as hath been ſpoken of, it muſt be ſupplied; there is no queſtion of that. And I think we have by another vote, declared, 'That it is inconſiſtent with our laws, liberties, and religion, to have a papiſt to rule over this kingdom; which I take to be only as to the actual exerciſe and adminiſtration of the government. It is Grotius his diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right: and as there is a natural incapacity for the exerciſe, as ſickneſs, lunacy, infancy, doating old age, or an incurable diſeaſe, rendering the party unfit unfit for human ſociety, as leproſy, or the like; ſo, I take it, there is a moral incapacity; and that I conceive to be a full irremoveable perſuaſion in a falſe religion, contrary to the doctrine of chriſtianity. Then there muſt be a proviſion undoubtedly made for ſupplying this defect in the exerciſe, and an intermediate government taken care for; becauſe become neceſſary for the ſupport of the government, if he to whom the right of ſucceſſion doth belong, makes the exerciſe of his government impracticable, and our obedience to him, conſiſtently with the conſtitution of our religion, impoſſible; but that, I take it, doth not alter that right, nor is an 'abdication' of the right (4.)"

Rem. (4.) It muſt be remembered that the biſhop of Ely's poſition, which was afterwards maintained by others, was, that "there was a real diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right." They readily agreed, that James II, ſhould be deprived of the exerciſe of the right to govern, but not of the right itſelf. Upon this diſtinction all the arguments of the lords are grounded.

"'Abdication' (continued he) no doubt is, by adoption, an Engliſh word, and well known to Engliſhmen converſant in books. Now it is objected, that it is not a word as ancient as the common law of England. We find it in Cicero,—— where it ſometimes ſignifies, 'The renouncing the actual exerciſe of a right,' and ſometimes, 'The renouncing of the very right,' ſo that the ſignification is doubtful; and ſuch words we hope the commons will not think fit to uſe in a caſe of this nature and conſequence as ours now in debate. And beſides, the lords apprehend, that great inconveniencies will follow upon the uſe of this word, if it mean a 'renouncing abſolutely of that right.'———Then there is another diſtinction in thoſe authors that write concerning this point, which are chiefly the 'civilians.' There may be an 'abdication' that may 'forfeit the power of a king only;' and there may be one, that may 'forfeit both that and the crown too.' It is a diſtinction indeed in other words, but to the ſame ſenſe. Thoſe 'abdications' that are of power only, are incapacities; whether thoſe I call natural and involuntary, as defects of ſenſe, age, or body, or the like; or moral or voluntary, as contrariety in religion; an inſtance whereof there was lately in Portugal, which was a 'forfeiture only of the power,' and, not of the 'name,' and 'honour of a king;' for though the adminiſtration was put into the younger brother's hand, the patents, and other public inſtruments ran in the elder brother's name (5.)"

Rem. (5.) If the biſhop of Ely had only a view to James II, the inſtance of the natural incapacities which made Alphonſo VI, king of Portugal, forfeit the exerciſe of the regal power, does not ſeem to be to his purpoſe; ſince theſe incapacities were not the point in queſtion, with regard to James II, which may make it ſuſpected, that he had an eye to the prince of Wales. For, as will hereafter appear, the lords, in maintaining, that the throne was not vacant, pretended that by the civil or natural death of the king, the next heir was immediately to fill the throne, and this heir, according to ſome, was the prince of Wales. But as he was a minor, an intermediate governor muſt be appointed to govern in his name.

"This is not, without all doubt, naturally an 'abdication' in the full extent of the word; nor do I here (as I ſaid) conſider, whether that the king be gone out of the kingdom, or ſtay in it; but only, whether he be fit for the adminiſtration, which muſt be provided for, be he here, or gone away. But the higheſt inſtance of an 'abdication,' is, when a prince is not only unable to execute his power, but acts quite contrary to it; which will not be anſwered by ſo bare a word as 'endeavour.' I take theſe to be all the diſtinctions of 'abdications.' Now, if this laſt inſtance of an 'abdication of both power and right,' take place in a ſucceeding monarchy, the conſequence will be, 'That there is forfeiture of the whole right; and then that hereditary ſucceſſion is cut off; which, I believe, is not intended by the commons. But here is one thing that is mentioned in this vote, which I would have well conſidered, for the preſervation of the ſucceſſion, and that is the original compact: we muſt think, ſure, that meant of the compact, that was made at the firſt time, when the government was firſt inſtituted, and the conditions, that each part of the government ſhould obſerve on their part, of which this is the moſt fundamental, 'That king, lords, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, ſhould have the power of making new laws, and altering of old ones:' and that being one law which ſettles the ſucceſſion, it is as much a part of the original compact as any: then if ſuch a caſe happens, as an 'abdication' in a ſucceſſive kingdom, without doubt, the compact being made to the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, the diſpoſition of the crown cannot fall to us, till all the heirs do 'abdicate' too. There are indeed many examples, and too many interruptions in the lineal ſucceſſion of the crown of England: I think I can inſtance in ſeven ſince the conqueſt, wherein the right heir hath been put by: but that doth not follow, that every breach of the firſt original contract, gives us power to diſpoſe of the lineal ſucceſſion; eſpecially, I think, ſince the ſtatutes of queen Elizabeth, and king James the Firſt, that have eſtabliſhed the oath of allegiance to the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors; the law is ſtronger againſt ſuch a diſpoſition: I grant, that from king William the Firſt, to Henry VIII, there has been ſeven interruptions of the legal line of hereditary ſucceſſion; but, I ſay, thoſe ſtatutes are made ſince that time, and the making of new laws, being as much a part of the original compact, as the obſerving old ones, or any thing elſe, we are obliged to purſue thoſe laws, till altered by the legiſlative power, which, ſingly or jointly, without the royal aſſent, I ſuppoſe, we do not pretend to (6.)"

Rem. (6.) By this reaſoning the lords and commons being agreed, that a catholic king could not exerciſe the right of government, and James II, being a catholic; and as he might poſſibly have an infinite ſeries of ſucceſſors from father to ſon, all catholics, it would follow, that England might be always governed by regents.

"Theſe laws being made ſince the laſt interruption, we are not to go by any precedent that was made before the making thoſe laws. So that, all that I conceive ought to be meant by our vote, is, 'But the ſetting aſide the perſon that broke the contract: and, in a ſucceſſive kingdom, an 'abdication' can only be a forfeiture, as to the perſon himſelf.' I hope, and am perſuaded, that both lords and commons do agree in this, 'Not to break the line of ſucceſſion, ſo as to make the crown elective.' And if that be declared, that this 'abdication' of king James the Second, reacheth no farther than himſelf; and that it is to continue in the right line of ſucceſſion, that, I hope, will make all of one mind in this important affair (7.)"

Rem. (7.) For the better underſtanding the biſhop of Ely's ſpeech, as well as ſome others that follow, it muſt be obſerved, that among the lords who had voted for the vacancy of the throne, by a majority of eleven voices, there were two ſorts of men. The one, without any deſire to favour king James, or the prince of Wales, had no other view than to oppoſe the republican party, who, under colour of gratitude to the prince of Orange, were labouring with all their power to have him elected king, reckoning it would be a large ſtep towards advancing the authority of the people, and rendering the crown elective. Some of the lords voted againſt the vacancy of the throne, chiefly in oppoſition to this party. But there were others who carried their views farther, and by rendering the ſettling of the government impracticable, laboured indirectly, either to cauſe king James to be recalled, or the prince of Wales to be acknowledged for king, knowing it would be impoſſible to prove him ſuppoſitious in a legal manner. But as theſe concealed themſelves among the others, and pretended only to defend hereditary right, it is hard to know by the ſpeeches, who deſigned only to maintain hereditary right, and who had farther views. This the reader is to remember, that he may not imagine, all the lords who voted againſt the vacancy of the throne, were for king James.

Then the earl of Clarendon ſpoke on the lords ſide, and ſaid,——"This breaking the original contract is a language that hath not been long uſed in this place; nor known in any of our law-books or public records, it is ſprung up, but as taken from ſome late authors, and thoſe none of the beſt received. It is not denied, 'That the king is bound by law, and bound to perform the laws made, and to be made.' But I would take notice, that his obligation thereunto, doth not proceed from his coronation-oath; for our law ſaith, 'He is as much king before he is crowned, as he is afterwards; and there is a natural allegiance due to him from the ſubjects immediately upon the deſcent of the crown upon him.' I was in great hopes, that you would have offered ſomething in anſwer to one of my lord of Ely's reaſons againſt that part of the vote, which declares, 'The throne to be vacant,' viz. 'That no act of the king's alone can bar, or deſtroy, the right of his heir to the crown, which is hereditary and not elective (8.)"

Rem. (8.) The earl of Clarendon begins with repreſenting the original contract between king and people, as an imaginary thing. And yet he owns "the king is bound by law, (though he cites none) and bound to perform, &c." But that this this obligation proceeds not from his coronation-oath. What is it then that binds him?

" And then, if this matter goes no farther than king James the Second, in his own perſon; how comes the vacancy and the ſupply to be devolved upon the people? for if he only be ſet aſide, then it is apparent, where the crown is to go, to the perſon that hath the next right of ſucceſſion, and conſequently there is no vacancy." (9.)

Rem. (9.) The lords always ſpoke of the next heir, but without naming the prince of Wales. The reaſon is, that by raiſing, as they thought, invincible obſtacles to the election of a new king, they deſigned by degrees to lead the commons to propoſe the examination of the prince of Wales's birth. But the managers for the commons carefully avoided that ſnare, and therefore the prince of Wales was not ſo much as once mentioned by name in the conference.

The earl of Nottingham added,——" The lords having declared that they are willing, 'to ſecure the nation againſt the return of king James into this kingdom; and will therefore concur with the commons in any act that ſhall be thought neceſſary to prevent ſuch his return, it ſhould ſeem we were agreed in that matter; and if that were the point, we ſhould find words proper ſoon enough to expreſs our meaning by. But I find neither of the words 'abdicated' or 'deſerted,' will, on the one ſide or on the other, be allowed to ſignify this meaning. Therefore we ſhould come preſently to think of ſome other that would. But the reaſons why my lords did chiefly inſiſt upon the alteration of the word 'abdicated,' was, 'Becauſe they did apprehend, that it being a word not known to our laws, there might be other inferences drawn from it than they do apprehend our laws will warrant, from the caſe, as it is ſtated in the fact of this vote; and, as they conceive, is done in the concluding of the throne's being vacant.' Therefore, I think it would ſhorten the preſent debate, if we did ſettle the point of the vacancy firſt. For if we were ſure, that the throne were, or were not vacant, we ſhould eaſily light upon what word were proper to be uſed in this caſe."

Sir George Treby ſpeaking on the ſide of the commons, ſaid,——" I think, my lord, the preſent debate is to begin, where the difference between the two houſes doth begin, and that is at the word 'abdicated.' 'Original contract,' is a phraſe and thing uſed by the learned Mr. Hooker, in his book of 'Eccleſiaſtical Polity.' But I have a greater authority than this, and that is your lordſhips own, who have agreed to all the vote, but this word 'abdicated,' and the 'vacancy of the throne.' But it is very much beyond what the vote before us doth lead us unto, 'To talk of the right of thoſe in the ſucceſſion: for that goes farther than the very laſt part of our vote, and it is ſtill to lead us yet farther, to ſay any thing about making the crown elective.'——Then he endeavoured to prove that king James had actually " abdicated" the kingdom, alledging the authority of Grotius, who ſays, " That if there be any word or action that doth ſufficiently manifeſt the intention of the mind and will, to part with his office; that will amount to an abdication or renouncing." " Now (added he) I beg leave to put this caſe, That had king James the Second come here into the aſſembly of lords and commons, and expreſſed himſelf in writing, or words, to this purpoſe: " I was born an heir to the crown of England, which is a government limited by laws, made in full parliament, by king, nobles, and commonalty; and, upon the death of my laſt predeceſſor, I am in poſſeſſion of the throne; and, now I find, I cannot make laws without the conſent of the lords and repreſentatives of the commons in parliament: I cannot ſuſpend laws that have been ſo made, without the conſent of my people; this indeed is the title of kingſhip I hold by original contract, and the fundamental conſtitutions of the government; and my ſucceſſion to, and poſſeſſion of the crown, on theſe terms, is part of that contract: this part of the contract I am weary of, I do renounce it, I will not be obliged to obſerve it; nay, I am under an obligation not to comply with it; I will not execute the laws that have been made; nor ſuffer others to be made, as my people ſhall deſire, for their ſecurity in religion, liberty and property, which are the two main parts of the kingly office in this nation." I ſay, ſuppoſe he had ſo expreſſed himſelf, doubtleſs, this had been a plain renouncing of the legal regular title which came to him by deſcent: If then he, by particular acts, ſuch as are enumerated in the vote, has declared as much or more than theſe words can amount to, then he hath thereby declared his will to renounce the government,——And this doth amount to a manifeſt declaration of his will, no longer to retain the exerciſe of his kingly office according to law, he has ſufficiently declared his renouncing of the very office, and therefore I cannot depart from inſiſting upon the word 'abdicated,' which doth ſo well correſpond to the fact of the caſe, and ſo well expreſs the true meaning of the commons in their vote."

The earl of Nottingham ſaid,——" I will not undertake to diſpute, whether a king of England may, or may not, renounce his kingdom. For my own part, I think he can, and I may go ſo far in agreement with thoſe that have ſpoken to this point, 'To yield that he may do it by implicit acts, contrary to the kingly office.' For a king to ſay he will not govern according to law; and for a king to act wholly contrary to law, and do that which would ſubvert the conſtitution, is (I think) the ſame thing. But then I muſt ſay alſo, that I think there is a difference between ſaying ſo, and doing ſomething inconſiſtent with what the laws require; for every deviation from the law, is a kind of breach of the fundamental conſtitutions; as the laws are neceſſary, ſo far as to ſupport the foundation. But if every tranſgreſſion, or violation of the law, by the prince's connivance or command, were ſuch a breach of the fundamental laws, as would infer an 'abdication,' then were it in vain to call any of his miniſters or officers to account for any ſuch action. Then the action is the king's, and not theirs; and then adieu to the maxim of, 'A king's not doing wrong.' I take this matter to be ſo plain, as to the diſtinction that I have mentioned, that nothing can be more; and it has been thought ſo eſſentially neceſſary to have it clear and manifeſt, that thoſe two great inſtances of Edward II. and Richard II. were expreſs ſolemn renunciations, and thoſe confirmed in parliament by the lords and commons, by the act of depoſing them. Therefore I cannot infer from the facts enumerated in the vote, that this ſhould be an 'abdication' for himſelf and his heirs."

Sir George Treby replied,—" When a king breaks the law in ſome few particular inſtances, it may be ſufficient to take an account of it from thoſe evil miniſters that were inſtrumental in it, why ſuch a thing was done, which was againſt laws? Why ſuch a law was not executed by them, whoſe duty it was to ſee it put in execution? You may, in ordinary caſes of breaking the law, have remedy in the ordinary courts and courſe of juſtice. But ſure! he does not take this to be ſuch a caſe, or theſe to be ordinary violations of the law: and therefore, in the extraordinary caſes, the extraordinary remedy is to be recurred unto. And where ſhall any man come to have any redreſs in ſuch a caſe as this, when the malefactor comes to be party, unto whom all applications for relief and redreſs from injuries ſhould be made, and ſo be himſelf ſhall be a judge of his own breaches of law? This moſt apparently was the caſe as to the Quo Warranto's, which was a plain deſign to ſubvert the conſtitution in the very foundation of the legiſlature. It is becauſe the king hath violated the conſtitution, by which the law ſtands, as the rule both of the kingly government, and the people's obedience, that we ſay, he hath 'abdicated' and 'renounced' the government; for all other particular breaches of the law, the ſubject may have remedy in the ordinary courts of juſtice, or the extraordinary court of parliamentary proceedings: but where ſuch an attempt as this is made on the eſſence of the conſtitution, it is not we that have brought ourſelves into this ſtate of nature, but thoſe who have reduced our legal well-eſtabliſhed frame of government into ſuch a ſtate of confuſion, as we are now ſeeking a redreſs unto."

The lords objecting nothing farther againſt the uſe of the word " abdicated," the commons proceeded to the ſecond amendment: namely, the leaving out the words, " And that the throne is thereby vacant." Mr. Sacheverell opened the debate, and ſaid,——" My lords, the commons, in uſing the words 'abdication' and 'vacancy,' had no thoughts of making the kingdom elective, neither can any ſuch thing be deduced from their words." (10.)

Rem. (10.) As the principal reaſon which induced the lords to oppoſe the commons vote, was, the conſequence drawn from thence, that the crown would thereby become elective, the commons were very careful to deny this conſequence, by ſaying, that not only they had no ſuch thought, but that it could not be inferred from their vote. This was a material point. For if the lords could have drawn from the commons a confeſſion, that the conſequence was juſt, they would have pretended, that by declaring the throne vacant, the conſtitution was ſubverted, and the crown made elective inſtead of hereditary. It ſeems, that the commons might have denied that the crown was originally hereditary, and maintained, it was ſo only by the ſtatutes made in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. From whence they might have inferred, that the parliament which ſettled the crown upon the deſcendants of James I, in the direct, and afterwards in the collateral line, had likewiſe power to alter the order of the ſettlement. But they avoided all diſcuſſions of this nature, being ſenſible, that the deſign of the lords was to multiply the ſubjects of diſpute, in order to increaſe the obſtacles of the projected eſtabliſhment.

Mr. Sacheverell continued, "The commons reaſon for their diſagreeing to this amendment, was, becauſe they conceive (that as they may well infer) from ſo much of their own vote, as your lordſhips have agreed unto, 'That king James the Second hath abdicated the government: and that the throne is thereby vacant:' So, if they ſhould admit your lordſhips amendments, 'That he hath only deſerted the government;' yet, even thence would follow, 'It is vacant, as to king James the Second:' deſerting the government being, in true conſtruction, deſerting the throne. If king James had only given over the exerciſe of the government, [as their lordſhips pretended] he continues in the office, and is king ſtill; and then all the acts that we have done in this convention, are wholly (as we conceive) not juſtifiable, you are in no place or ſtation to relieve yourſelves, or the nation, in this exigence; unleſs you will think of ſetting up another regency by your own authority, without his conſent; which, I conceive, by the laws of England, you cannot do. What then follows upon all we have done? we have drawn the nation into a ſnare, by the ſteps we have taken; and leave all in ſuch an intricacy, as we have no power by law to deliver them out of; nor can we anſwer for what we have done, unleſs the king ſhould die, and that would leave the ſucceſſion uncertain."

Mr. Pollexfen purſuing the ſame argument, maintained, "That the lords ſaying in their vote, 'That the government was deſerted,' could not mean only the exerciſe of it, but a vacancy: the king's power, and the exerciſe of that power, was, in conſtruction of the law, one and the ſame, and ſo joined, that they could not be ſevered; and therefore, the ſuppoſed diſtinction was only notional, and altogether diſagreeing to the laws of England. That it was utterly unlawful, and as great a crime, to take away from the king the exerciſe of the government, as to take from him the government; it might do well for their lordſhips to conſider, whether they were not guilty of the ſame crime, which they would decline by their amendment. That the commons therefore could not admit, That there ſhould be a taking away the exerciſe of the government from the king, any more than the taking away the government, which, the commons ſaid, he had himſelf given away by 'abdication;' and that if king James was king ſtill, they could not by any means agree to the keeping him out of the kingdom. That to have a regency upon king James without his own conſent, or till his return, while the right was ſtill in him, would be a ſtrange and impracticable thing, and introductive of a common-wealth, inſtead of the ancient government by a limited monarchy; and that the concluſion, That ſuch a vacancy in the throne would make the crown elective, had no premiſſes either from their actions, their ſayings, their votes, or any thing elſe in that caſe." (11.)

Rem. (11.) The lords anſwered but weakly Mr. Pollexfen's reaſons. Several of thoſe who were againſt a vacancy verily believed, it was as unlawful to deprive king James of the exerciſe of the regal power, as of the power itſelf. But they durſt not directly undertake his defence, becauſe "they knew his perſon was odious to the whole nation." Wherefore they had adviſed this diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right, to leave room for his reſtoration. Mr. Pollexfen, as appears, maintains, that this diſtinction is imaginary. Let the reader examine, whether it was well proved, or only ſuppoſed: or whether, in ſuppoſition of its reality, it was applicable to the point in hand.

The earl of Clarendon interpoſed, and ſaid, "He would not declare his opinion about the vacancy as to king James, but deſired to know the meaning of the commons, how far the vacancy was to extend?"

This gave occaſion to Mr. Pollexfen to aſk the lords, "Whether their lordſhips did agree, 'That the throne was vacant as to king James the Second?' That if ſo, or if they ſhould ſay it was full of any body elſe, and would name whom it was full of, it would then be time for the commons to give an anſwer."

To which the ſame earl replied, "That admitting, for diſcourſe ſake, that the throne was vacant as to king James the Second, it muſt then be ſupplied by thoſe that ſhould have come if he were dead; this government being, by all our laws, an hereditary monarchy, which is to go in ſucceſſion by inheritance in the royal line. That if the commons ſaid this government was vacant, that would be to put all thoſe by, that ſhould take it by ſucceſſion, which would make the kingdom elective for that time: that the lords ſaid, there was no vacancy; but ſince the commons ſaid, The throne was vacant, he might very well aſk, Who had the right of filling up that vacancy?"

Mr. ſerjeant Maynard anſwered, "That was not the queſtion before them, though it would come properly in debate, when they were agreed upon the vacancy; that he granted the Engliſh monarchy to be hereditary; but though it ſhould in an ordinary way deſcend to the heir, yet as their caſe was, they had a maxim in law as certain as any other, which ſtopt the courſe; for, ſaid he, no man can pretend to be king James's heir while he is living: Nemo eſt hæres viventis." (12.)

Rem. (12.) Mr. ſerjeant Maynard ſeems to have juſtly remarked, that it was proper to agree upon the vacancy before they proceeded to the queſtion, "Who ſhould fill the throne?" otherwiſe the conſequence would be examined before the premiſſes were ſettled, on which it was founded.

The earl of Pembroke replied, "That to that point the lord Clarendon had given an anſwer, 'That it ſhould go to the next heir in the line, that were to take it if the king were dead.' And that as they ſhould be underſtood, they ſhould make it a caſe of demiſe of the king's, as the law calls it; that is, the king was dead in law, by his abdication or deſertion. That to anſwer the queſtion of the commons, 'Who the throne was full of?' it was ſufficient to know, that there were heirs, who were to take by lineal ſucceſſion, though they did not, or could not, poſitively name the particular perſon." (13.)

Rem. (13.) If the lords had gained this point, that in caſe the throne was vacant with regard to the perſon of king James only, it ſhould be filled by the next heir, they would have thereby engaged the commons in a diſcuſſion of the prince of Wales's birth, wherein they would have had great advantages. But the commons deſired, above all things, to avoid this examination, into which the lords would have artfully drawn them.

The earl of Nottingham argued, "That if the lords ſhould grant a vacancy as to the king himſelf, yet they might juſtly do theſe acts mentioned in the commons reaſons; for if barely the exerciſe of the government were deſerted, there muſt be a ſupply of that exerciſe in ſome perſon's taking the adminiſtration; and as none ſo fit, becauſe of the prince's relation to the crown, and in his preſence here, to addreſs unto about it, ſo none ſo proper to make that addreſs as the lords; ſince in the abſence of the king, they were the king and kingdom's great council, and might have done by themſelves without the commons; but being met in a full repreſentative body, they joined with them." (14.)

Rem. (14.) This concerns only the vindication of the lords conduct, which had been a little cenſured by Mr. Sacheverell and Mr. Pollexfen. This vindication is wholly founded upon the diſtinction between a right, and the exerciſe of that right, which the earl of Nottingham ſuppoſes, without undertaking to prove it.

"They were told, 'That the next heir in ſucceſſion could not take it, becauſe no one could be heir to one alive;' yet ſtill he thought the anſwer given by the lords a very good one, 'That though the king was not dead naturally, yet if (as they inferred) he was ſo civilly, the next of courſe ought to come in by hereditary ſucceſſion; for he knew not any diſtinction between ſucceſſors in the caſe of a natural death, and thoſe in caſe of a civil one: that he would know, if the next heir ſhould be ſet aſide, and another put in, whether that king of England ſhould be king to him and his heirs, and ſo being once upon the throne, the ancient lineal ſucceſſion be altered? which indeed would ſufficiently make the kingdom elective, by taking it from the right heir? That if it was not ſo, then he aſked, Whether ſuch a king as ſhould be put in, ſhould be king only during king James's life? That, he ſuppoſed, was not the meaning of the commons; but, at leaſt, he muſt be made a king during his own life; that then if there was a diſtinction made as to the ſucceſſion, between a natural and a civil death, if king James ſhould die during the life of the new king, what would become of the hereditary monarchy? Where muſt the ſucceſſor come in, when the next heir to king James might not be the preſent heir to the preſent ſucceſſor? That therefore they muſt reduce all to this point, Whether this would not make the kingdom elective? That if they made it once elective, it was enough to make it ever ſo; for he would be bold to ſay, They could not make a ſtronger tie to obſerve that kind of ſucceſſion, than what lay upon them to preſerve it in this caſe."

He added, "That if the throne was vacant, he would know whether they were obliged to fill it? That if they were, they muſt fill it either by the old laws, or by the humour of thoſe who were to chuſe. That if they filled it by the old laws, they declared it was an hereditary kingdom, and they were to take the next ſucceſſor, to whom the ſucceſſion would belong, and there would be no need of ſtanding upon a vacancy: that if they were to fill it according to the humour of the times, that diverted the courſe of inheritance; and that he could not ſee by what authority they could do that, or change the ancient conſtitution, without committing the ſame fault they had laid upon the king. But, ſaid he, if you pleaſe to ſuppoſe the throne vacant as to king James, that is, 'That he has no right,' then let us go on to the next ſtep." (15.)

Rem. (15.) The earl of Nottingham enumerates here all the inconveniences, difficulties, and contrarieties to the law which could ariſe from the commons vote, and all ended in the danger of rendering the crown elective. But he took care not to mention the difficulties which flowed from the lords opinion. The conſequences of their opinion were, either that the kingdom ſhould be left in its preſent confuſion, or king James recalled, or the prince of Wales acknowledged for king. In all three, the danger was as great as in running the hazard of making the crown elective, which was the only danger the earl would have to be conſidered. As if the danger of leaving the kingdom in confuſion, of recalling the king, of owning a prince who was by moſt people thought ſuppoſititious, who was abſent and a minor, who would be bred in France in the catholic religion, and from whom the ſame inconveniences as had cauſed king James to be rejected, were to be feared when he ſhould be of age: as if, I ſay, all theſe dangers were to be reckoned as nothing in compariſon of the hazard of a breach in the lineal ſucceſſion. Beſides, it was only by way of conſequence that the lords pretended that the crown would become elective by this breach, though the commons affirmed they had no ſuch intention.

But Mr. Sacheverell replied, "That all their buſineſs was to maintain that the throne was vacant."

And Mr. Sommers added, "That the lords alledged as a reaſon againſt the word 'abdicate,' That 'it was not a word known to our laws,' but that the word 'vacant' could not have that objection made to it, ſince it was in our records, and even applied in a parallel caſe to this in the firſt of Henry IV."

To which the earl of Rocheſter anſwered, "That as that was the only precedent for the word 'vacant,' yet it was attended with this very conſequence, that it would make the monarchy elective; for it being there declared, That the royal ſeat was vacant, immediately did follow an election of Henry IV. who was not next in the royal line."

The ſame argument was purſued by the earl of Clarendon, who ſaid, "That it was plain in the caſe of Richard II. who had abſolutely reſigned, renounced, or abdicated in writing under his own hand; that after that, the parliament being ſitting, they did not think that ſufficient to go upon, becauſe that writing might be the effect of fear, and not vuluntary: that thereupon they proceeded to a formal depoſition upon articles; and then came in the claim of Henry IV. that this was undoubtedly an election; though he was really the next heir, the earl of March not appearing, Henry claimed it as his undubitable right, being the next heir that appeared: that all the kings that were thus taken in or elected, (for the election was not of God's approbation) any one year ſcarce paſſed in any of the reigns, without being diſturbed in the poſſeſſion: that Henry IV. did not care to owe the crown to the election, but claimed it as his right; that it was a plauſible pretence, and kept him and his ſon upon the throne; bnt in the time of his grandſon Henry VI. there was an utter overthrow of his title and poſſeſſion too: for in the firſt of Edward IV. all the proceedings againſt Richard II. as well as all the reſt of the acts during the uſurpation (as that record rightly calls it) were annulled, repealed, revoked, and reverſed, and all imaginable words uſed to ſet thoſe proceedings aſide, as illegal, unjuſt, and unrighteous: that that act deduced the pedigree of the royal line from Henry III. to Richard II. who died without iſſue; and then Henry IV. ſays the act, uſurped; but that the earl of March, upon the death of Richard II. and conſequently Edward IV. from him, was undoubted king by conſcience, by nature, by cuſtom and by law." (16.)

Rem. (16.) All the arguments from the acts of parliament relating to the differences between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, muſt be very weak. Becauſe theſe parliaments did not all proceed upon the ſame principle, and becauſe the one pulled down what the other had ſet up. This evidently appears, in that both ſides in the preſent caſe, alledged ſome of the acts of theſe parliaments, in ſupport of their cauſe.

Hereupon Sir Robert Howard exerted himſelf, and replied, "He would not ſay that the record of Henry IV. was not a precedent of election; for the parliament did not much mind his claim, knowing that he claimed by deſcent, where there was a perſon that had a title before him: thus the commons did not doubt but that power which brought in another line then, upon the vacancy of the throne by the leaſion of Richard II. was ſtill, according to the conſtitution, reſiding in the lords and commons, and was legally ſufficient to ſupply the preſent vacancy: that he would aſk the queſtion of any lord there, whether, had there been an heir to whom the crown had quietly deſcended in the line of ſucceſſion, and this heir certainly known, their lordſhips would have aſſembled without his calling, or would have either adminiſtered the government themſelves, or adviſed the prince of Orange to have taken it upon himſelf? that he doubted they had been all guilty of high-treaſon by the laws of England, if a a known ſucceſſor of the throne were in poſſeſſion of the throne, as he muſt be if the throne were not vacant: that from hence their lordſhips ſaw, that the difficulty in this matter aroſe from this, That they would all agree the throne to be vacant, when they knew of none that poſſeſſed it; that ſome ſuch thing had been pretended to as an heir-male, of which there were different opinions, and in the mean time they were without a government. Muſt we ſtay, added he, till the truth of the matter be found out? What ſhall be done to preſerve our conſtitution, and in a little time it will, perhaps, through the diſtraction of our conſtitution, be utterly irremediable. He confeſſed it would be a difficult thing to go upon the examination who was heir, or elſe their lordſhips would have explained themſelves before. But, continued he, it not being clear, muſt we always remain thus? Uſe what words you will, fill up, or nominate, or elect, it is the thing that we are to take care of, and it is high time it was done. There is no ſuch conſequence to be drawn from this vote, as an intention or likelihood of altering the courſe of the government, ſo as to make it elective; the throne has all along deſcended in an hereditary ſucceſſion, the main conſtitution has been preſerved. The precedent of Henry IV. is not like that of elections in other countries; and I am ſorry there ſhould be any occaſion for what is neceſſary to be done now; but when ſuch difficulties are upon the nation, that we cannot extricate ourſelves out of, as to the lineal ſucceſſor, your lordſhips, I hope, will give us leave to remember, 'Salus populi eſt ſuprema lex.' And if neither you nor we can do any thing in this caſe, we, who are met under the notion of a convention of the ſtates, have then met to no purpoſe; for after we have voted ourſelves to be without government (which looks as if ſomething were really intended as to a ſettlement) all preſently ſinks, and we are as much in the dark as we were before. Your lordſhips ſay, you will never make a precedent of election, or take upon you to alter the ſucceſſion. With your lordſhips favour, the ſettlement of the conſtitution is the main thing we are to look after. If you provide for the ſupply of the defect there, that point of the ſucceſſion will, without all queſtion, in the ſame method, and at the ſame time, be ſurely provided for. But, my lords, have not you yourſelves limited the very ſucceſſion, and cut off ſome that might have a lineal right? Have you not concurred with us in our vote, 'That it is inconſiſtent with our religion and laws to have a papiſt to reign over us?' Muſt we not come then to an election, if the next heir be a papiſt? Nay, ſuppoſe there was no proteſtant heir at all to be found, would not your lordſhips then break the line? If your lordſhips then in ſuch a caſe muſt break through the ſucceſſion, I think the nation has reaſon to expect you ſhould take care to ſupply the preſent defect, where the ſucceſſion is uncertain; or what can we do further, but even part in confuſion, and ſo leave the nation to extricate itſelf as well as it can out of its diſtraction. But even at whoſe doors that will lie, I muſt leave to your lordſhips own thoughts."

It is ſaid this ſpeech, wherein good ſenſe, and a zeal for the nation equally ſhined, made a deep impreſſion upon ſome of the lords who aſſiſted at the conference, and upon all the reſt of the audience. However, as the earl of Clarendon, to prove the lineal ſucceſſion, had alledged what paſſed with regard to Edward IV. Sir George Treby undertook to explain that matter, and ſaid:

"That

"That it was very well known, that Edward IV came in diſ-affirmance of the title of the houſe of Lancaſter: that as thoſe times went, whenever there was a turn in government, as there were ſeveral, there were new and contrary declarations about the title to the crown, made conſtantly in parliament; and what one parliament ſettled, another undid: but then, that this advantage the commons had on their ſide; that as they had this firſt precedent for them, ſo they had the laſt, viz. the parliament-roll of the firſt of Henry VII, where the record is ſet right again: that the act for depoſing Richard II, was indeed repealed by the firſt of Edward IV, and thereupon it proceeds to attaint Henry VI; but then came in Henry VII, in the firſt year of whoſe reign there was an act made, that ſet aſide all the acts and attainders made againſt his line, and conſequently it repealed the firſt of Edward IV, which had repealed the firſt of Henry IV: that Henry VII, was of the line of Lancaſter, and though he had the heireſs of the houſe of York in his boſom, yet after he came to the throne, he would not endure to have his crown reckoned matrimonial, or ſuffer the ſtile to go in the name of Henry and Elizabeth, as he muſt have done if he had ſtuck to the title by the right line of ſucceſſion. That therefore this act for reſtoring the record of the firſt of Henry IV again, was as good an authority as it was before, and ſomewhat better; for it had the laſt act on its ſide, which was yet unrepealed."

Here the earl of Pembroke replied, "That Henry VII had a good right and title by marriage to the crown, 'in re uxoris;' but that his own title, as deſcended from Henry IV, was an uſurpation; and therefore he would not ſuffer any one to preſcribe which was beſt, as long as it was acknowledged he had one good."

Sir George Treby returned, "That if Henry VII's title by deſcent was an uſurpation, it was hard to determine what title he did govern by; ſince, though his wife was the lineal heir, yet ſhe had no part, or ſo much as a name in the adminiſtration. But, added he, if we ſhould allow none for acts of parliament, but thoſe that were made in the reigns of hereditary kings, and in the right line, I doubt we ſhall want the greateſt part of thoſe laws that compoſe the volume of Statute-books, and the records by which we enjoy a great part of our inheritances and poſſeſſions."

Sir Richard Temple alledged, "That if laws made about the ſucceſſion be ſo obliging, what then ſhould they ſay to the ſucceſſion of queen Elizabeth, who had an act of parliament both againſt her and her ſiſter."

The earl of Pembroke replied, "That to ſhew what opinion ſhe herſelf, and the wiſe men of her time, had in that point, there was an act made in her reign, and yet in being, which declared it to be a præmunire, to affirm, the parliament cannot ſettle the ſucceſſion of the crown, or alter it. That entails of the crown had been in parliament, both ancient and modern; yet the authority of another ſubſequent act had prevailed againſt ſuch an entail, ſo that they ſhould be done in parliament."

Sir Richard returned, "He thought they were in as full a capacity to take care of the government, as any of their predeceſſors; and that if they did as their predeceſſors had done before them, that ought not to be called a changing of the monarchy from an hereditary to an elective."

Here the earl of Nottingham once more interpoſed and ſaid, "He could not imagine how a kingdom could be hereditary, and that the king who had children in being at the time of his forſaking the government, could have the throne vacant, both of him and his children; that the courſe of inheritance, as to the crown of England, was by law a great deal better provided for, than that of any other inheritance, 'That no attainder of the heir of the crown could bar the ſucceſſion to the throne,' as it did the deſcent to any common perſon; and that the very deſcent by order of birth would take away any ſuch defect. That this was the opinion of the great lawyers of England, in the caſe of Henry VII; and therefore he could not apprehend, how any act of the father, could bar the right of the child; ſince even the act of the ſon, which might endanger an attainder in him, could not do it; ſo careful was the law of the royal line of the ſucceſſion, which was declared by ſeveral acts of parliament, and very fully and particularly by the twenty-fifth of Henry VIII. ——That he deſired to know, whether the lords and commons had power by themſelves to make a binding act or law? and whether, according to the legal conſtitution, every king of England, by being ſeated on the throne, and poſſeſſed of the crown, was not thereby king to him and his heirs? and that without an act of parliament he knew not what determination they could make of his eſtate. That it was urged indeed, that the lords had in effect already agreed to the vacancy, by voting, 'That it was inconſiſtent with our religion and laws, to have a popiſh prince to rule over us:' but that a vote of either houſe, or both houſes together, could not alter the law in that or any other point; yet becauſe he was deſirous that that vote ſhould have its effect, he deſired that every thing of that nature might be done in the ancient uſual method of parliament. That ſince they were happily delivered from the fears of popery and arbitary power, God forbid they ſhould aſſume any ſuch power to themſelves; for what advantage ſhould they then give to thoſe who would quarrel with their ſettlement for the illegality of it? Would not this, which they endeavour to cruſh, break forth into a viper? That in all the breaches that were made upon the line of ſucceſſion, ſuch was the force of the laws, that the uſurpers would not take the crown upon them, unleſs they had ſome ſpecious pretence of an hereditary title to it. That what he would have avoided by all means, was the miſchievous conſequences that he feared would enſue upon the vacancy of the throne, namely, the utter overthrow of the whole conſtitution; for if the lords and commons only remained as parts of the government, and if the head be taken away, and the throne vacant, by what laws or conſtitutions was it that they retained lords and commons? That they were knit together in their common head; and that if one part of the government was diſſolved, he ſaw not any reaſon but that all muſt be diſſolved. He confeſſed, that any government was better than none; but he earneſtly deſired they might enjoy their ancient conſtitution." (17.)

Rem. (17.) The earl of Nottingham, in his ſpeech, reaſoned like Charles I, in his diſputes with the parliament. That is, he ſuppoſed the government in its natural ſtate, and on that ſuppoſition, his arguments were ſtrong. But it is hard to conceive a greater diſorder in the government than at the time of this conference. King James had reigned three years in an arbitrary manner. He had violated, not ſome particular laws of little moment, but fundamental laws, whereon the ſecurity of the national religion and liberties depended. After which, he had withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, without taking any order about the government. Moſt men thought his ſon ſuppoſititious, and he had ſent him into France. Could the government therefore be ſuppoſed in a natural ſtate? and if it was not, the reaſoning built upon ſuch a ſuppoſition ought to fall to the ground. However expreſs the laws may be, they always ſuppoſe ſome certain conſtitution of government. But if this conſtitution is broke, as may happen in all countries under the ſun, How, in order to remedy this evil, can the laws be taken for rule, which ſuppoſe the government in its uſual and natural ſtate, and which have not provided for extraordinary unforeſeen caſes?

What the earl of Nottingham would intimate, though he does not ſpeak plainly, is briefly this: The lords and commons are but two of the branches of the government, and can make no law without the third, that is, the king, who is their head. The king has abſented himſelf. He muſt therefore be recalled, or waited for till he returns, or elſe his next heir muſt be owned for king. Now this heir is the prince of Wales. This is evident from the care that was taken not to name him. Or if none of theſe methods be followed, the kingdom muſt be left in a ſtate of anarchy, or a regent appointed to govern in the king's name, during his abſence.

The whole debate was cloſed with two ſhort ſpeeches made by Mr. Paul Foley, and Mr. Eyre: the former ſaid, "He hoped there was no danger of ſhaking our fundamentals in this caſe; that they were purſuing thoſe methods which agreed with our laws and conſtitution; for though the monarchy of this nation be hereditary in the ordinary courſe of ſucceſſion, yet there might fall out a caſe wherein that could not be complied with, and a plain vacancy might enſue. For, ſaid he, put the caſe the whole legal line ſhould fail, ſhould we in that caſe have no government at all? And who then ſhould we have but lords and commons? And I think that comes neareſt to the caſe in queſtion, where the ſucceſſor is not known; for if he had been, we ſhould have heard of him before now. And what is the reaſon that it ſhould then in the former caſe devolve to the lords and commons, but that there is no king? And they being the repreſentative body of the kingdom, are the only remaining apparent parts of the government, and are only to ſupply the defect by providing a ſucceſſor?"

Mr. Eyre ſubjoined, "That they were led out of the way, hunting after the conſequences of a vote not yet agreed unto; That they had made a right and apt concluſion from the premiſſes, premiſſes, otherwiſe all the vote was but hiſtorical: we declare, adds he, 'That the late king James has broke the original contract, has violated the fundamental laws, and has withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, that he has abdicated the government.' What occaſion was there for ſuch a declaration as this, if nothing were concluded from it? That were only to give the kingdom a compendious hiſtory of thoſe miſeries they have too well learned by feeling them. Therefore there was a neceſſity to make ſome concluſion; and none ſo natural as this; that we are left without a king, that the throne is thereby vacant, which it may be as to the poſſeſſion, and yet the right of ſucceſſion no ways prejudiced. But, my lords, we are come here by the commands of the houſe of commons, to debate the reaſons of their vote, and your amendments, not to diſpute what will be the conſequences, which is not at preſent our province." And here ended this famous conference.

During all theſe debates in the convention, the prince of Orange ſtaid at St. James's, without taking the leaſt pains to gain any one perſon to his party. He was never leſs affable, being deſirous to ſhew by his behaviour, that his intention was not to deprive any man of the liberty to vote as he ſhould think fit. The two houſes were ſurpriſed that no body ſpoke to them in the prince's behalf. At laſt, finding that his ſilence might be ill conſtrued, as if he was unwilling to take upon him the burden of royalty, he ſent for the marquis of Hallifax, the earls of Danby, Shrewſbury, and ſome others, and told them:

"He had been till then ſilent, becauſe he would not ſay or do any thing that might ſeem in any ſort to take from any perſon the full freedom of deliberating and voting in matters of ſuch importance: he was reſolved neither to court nor threaten any one. Some were for putting the government into the hands of a regent: he would ſay nothing againſt it, if it was thought the beſt means for ſettling their affairs: only he thought it neceſſary to tell them, that he would not be the regent: ſo, if they continued in that deſign, they muſt look out for ſome other perſon to be put in that poſt: he himſelf ſaw what the conſequences of it were like to prove: ſo he would not accept of it. Others were for putting the princeſs ſingly on the throne, and that he ſhould reign by her courteſy. He ſaid, no man could eſteem a woman more than he did the princeſs; but he was ſo made, that he could not think of holding any thing by apron-ſtrings: nor could he think it reaſonable to have any ſhare in the government, unleſs it was put in his perſon, and that for term of life: if they did think it fit to ſettle it otherwiſe, he would not oppoſe them in it: but he would go back to Holland, and meddle no more in their affairs: he aſſured them, that whatſoever others might think of a crown, it was no ſuch thing in his eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleaſed without it. In the end he ſaid, he could not reſolve to accept of a dignity, ſo as to hold it only the life of another: yet he thought that the iſſue of the princeſs Ann ſhould be preferred in the ſucceſſion, to any iſſue he might have by any other wife than the princeſs."

This declaration being immediately divulged by thoſe it was made to, did not a little contribute to bring the debates in the houſe of lords to a ſpeedy determination. As for the commons, about two thirds were for the prince.

When the report of the conference between the two houſes was made to the lords, there was a very warm debate, whether they ſhould inſiſt upon the amendments. During the debate, it was moved, that the birth of the prince of Wales might be examined into. But this motion was at length rejected for ſeveral reaſons: 1. The prince of Wales was now ſent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the eſtabliſhed religion. What therefore would ſuch an examination ſignify? 2. It was impoſſible for the people of England to know, whether he was the ſame perſon that had been carried over or not. 3. In caſe he ſhould die, another might be put in his room, in ſuch manner, that the nation could not be ſure concerning him. 4. The Engliſh nation ought not to ſend into another country for witneſſes to prove that he was their prince, much leſs receive one upon the teſtimony of ſuch as were not only aliens, but ought to be preſumed enemies. 5. It was known, that all the perſons who had been the confidents in that matter, were conveyed away; ſo it was impoſſible to come at them, by whoſe means only the truth of that birth could be diſcovered. It is pretended, there were ſome who thought it a deep piece of policy, to let the prince of Wales's title remain undecided, in order to deter the ſucceeding kings from imitating king James [a].

At length, after a long debate, the majority of the lords departed from their two amendments, and agreed with the vote of the commons, "That king James had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby become vacant." Very likely, they who deſerted the party of the earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rocheſter, conſidered, that the ſuggeſted danger of the crown's becoming elective, was not to be compared to that which muſt neceſſarily happen, if the kingdom was left in the preſent confuſion, or king James recalled, or the prince of Wales acknowledged for king. It is ſaid however, that the ſcale was turned to this ſide by the arrival of ſome lords, who were not preſent in the houſe when the two amendments were voted: but they are not named. It is hardly probable that the pretended arrival of theſe lords ſhould have occaſioned the change in the houſe of peers. There muſt have been a dozen at leaſt, and all of the ſame ſide, which is not very likely.

This great ſtep being made, the next thing to be debated was, who ſhould fill the vacant throne. The marquis of Hallifax moved, That the crown ſhould be given to the prince of Orange alone, and to the two princeſſes after his death. But he was not ſeconded [b]. If Dr. Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury is to be credited, Bentinck [c], the prince's favourite and confident, ſtrenuouſly ſupported this propoſal. The debate upon this affair was very long. It was readily agreed, that the princeſs of Orange ſhould be placed on the throne; but the queſtion was whether the prince ſhould be king of himſelf, or as huſband of the princeſs? Upon this, parties began to be formed in both houſes. Mean while, as the princeſs was detained in Holland by the froſt, and by contrary winds after the thaw, the earl of Danby ſent one over to the princeſs, with an account of the preſent ſtate of the debate, and to tell her, that if ſhe deſired it, he did not doubt but he ſhould be able to carry it, for ſetting her alone on the throne. The princeſs anſwered, She was the prince's wife, and would never be other than what ſhe ſhould be in conjunction with him, and under him. Adding, ſhe would take it very ill, if any, under a pretence of their care for her, would ſet up a divided intereſt between her and the prince. Not content with this, ſhe ſent the lord Danby's letter [and her anſwer] to the prince, and thereby broke all the meaſures of thoſe, who wiſhed to create a miſunderſtanding or jealouſy between them. The earl of Danby received not the leaſt mark of diſpleaſure from the prince of Orange, who continued ſtill to employ and truſt him.

At laſt, both houſes agreed, and voted ſeverally, that the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould be king and queen of England, but that the ſole and full regal power ſhould be in the prince only, in the name of both. However, this was carried in the houſe of lords but by two or three voices only, and not without a proteſtation entered againſt it by the contrary party [d].

The laſt debate in the convention, was, concerning the oaths that ſhould be taken to the king and queen. To avoid all cavils upon the terms, [rightful and lawful king] in the uſual oath, it was thought proper to reduce the oath to the ancient ſimplicity of ſwearing, "to bear faith and true allegiance to the king and queen." Hence aroſe the famous diſtinction of a king "de facto," and a king "de jure," ſome pretending, that they took the oath to the king and queen, only as king and queen "de facto," whom they were bound to obey no longer than they continued in quiet poſſeſſion; but that it was lawful for them to aſſiſt king James, if he ſhould come to recover his crown, as being ſtill their king "de jure." This diſtinction proceeded chiefly from the clergy, who had ſo far entangled themſelves with thoſe ſtrange

[a] Burnet ſays, that when this matter was debated in private, ſome obſerved, that as king James by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and doing it ſo defectively, had really made it more ſuſpicious than it was before; ſo, if there was no clear and poſitive proof made of an impoſture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out beyond the poſſibility of contradiction, would really give more credit to the thing than it then had, and, inſtead of weakening it, would ſtrengthen the pretenſion of his birth, p. 887.

[b] Burnet ſays, many of the republican party approved of this; for by it they gained another point: The people in this caſe would plainly elect a king without any regard to the order of ſucceſſion, p. 818.

[c] Afterwards earl of Portland.

[d] Burnet, p. 822, ſays, that things were ſo near an equality in the houſe of lords [one hundred and twenty being preſent,] that it was carried by a very ſmall majority of two or three, to agree with the commons in voting the 'abdication' and 'vacancy' of the throne, and that the vote by which the prince and princeſs were declared to be king and queen went very hard. Echard ſays by twenty voices: ſixty-five againſt forty-five.

conceits of the divine right of monarchy, and had ſo engaged themſelves by publicly preaching paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance, as an eſſential doctrine of the church of England, that they did not know how to diſengage themſelves from the ſnare they themſelves had laid, at a time when they little thought of being ever taken in it.

At length, on the 12th of February, the princeſs of Orange arrived at London, and ſeemed very well pleaſed with what had been reſolved, that the adminiſtration of the government ſhould be in the prince only, in the name of both. Thus the ſtrict union between the prince and princeſs broke the meaſures of ſuch as hoped to create a miſunderſtanding between them, in order to ſerve their old maſter.

The next day, the prince and princeſs of Orange being ſeated on two large chairs, under a canopy of ſtate in the Banquetting-houſe, both houſes of the convention waited upon them in a full body, to offer them the crown. But before they proceeded to this ſolemn offer, they cauſed the clerk of the crown to read the following declaration of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter.

" WHEREAS the late king James the Second, by the aſſiſtance of divers evil counſellors, judges, and miniſters employed by him, did endeavour to ſubvert and extirpate the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom; by aſſuming and exerciſing a power of diſpenſing with, and ſuſpending of laws, and the execution of laws, without conſent of parliament: by committing and proſecuting divers worthy prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excuſed from concurring to the ſaid aſſumed power: by iſſuing and cauſing to be executed, a commiſſion under the great ſeal for erecting a court, called, 'The court of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes:' by levying money for and to the uſe of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the ſame was granted by parliament: by raiſing and keeping a ſtanding army within this kingdom in time of peace, without conſent of parliament; and quartering ſoldiers contrary to law: by cauſing ſeveral good ſubjects, being proteſtants, to be diſarmed, at the ſame time, when papiſts were both armed and employed contrary to law: by violating the freedom of election of members to ſerve in parliament: by proſecutions in the court of King's Bench for matters and cauſes cognizable only in parliament; and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courſes. And whereas of late years, partial, corrupt, and unqualified perſons, have been returned and ſerved on juries in trials, and particularly divers jurors in trials for high treaſon, which were not freeholders; and exceſſive bail hath been required of perſons committed in criminal caſes, to elude the benefit of the laws made for liberty of the ſubjects; and exceſſive fines have been impoſed; and illegal and cruel puniſhments inflicted; and ſeveral grants and promiſes made of fines and forfeitures, before any conviction or judgement againſt the perſons upon whom the ſame were to be levied. All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and ſtatutes, and freedom of this realm.

" And whereas the ſaid late king James the Second, having 'abdicated' the government, and the throne being thereby vacant, his highneſs the prince of Orange (whom it hath pleaſed Almighty God to make the glorious inſtrument of delivering this kingdom from popery and arbitrary power) did (by the advice of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and divers principal perſons of the commons) cauſe letters to be written to the lords ſpiritual and temporal, being proteſtants, and other letters to the ſeveral counties, cities, univerſities, boroughs, and cinque-ports, for the chuſing of ſuch perſons to repreſent them, as were of right to be ſent to parliament, to meet and ſit at Weſtminſter, upon the 22d day of January, in this year 1688, in order to ſuch an eſtabliſhment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties, might not again be in danger of being ſubverted. Upon which letters, elections having been accordingly made; and thereupon the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, purſuant to their reſpective letters and elections, being now aſſembled in a full and free repreſentative of this nation, taking into their moſt ſerious conſideration the beſt means for attaining the ends aforeſaid, do, in the firſt place (as their anceſtors in like caſe have uſually done) for the vindicating and aſſerting their ancient rights and liberties; declare,

" 1. That the pretended power of ſuſpending of laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without conſent of parliament, is illegal.

" 2. That the pretended power of diſpenſing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been aſſumed and exerciſed of late, is illegal.

" 3. That the commiſſion for erecting the late court of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and all other commiſſions and courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

" 8. That election of members of parliament ought to be free.

" 9. That the freedom of ſpeech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or queſtioned, in any court or place out of parliament.

" 10. That exceſſive bail ought not to be required, nor exceſſive fines impoſed, nor cruel nor unuſual puniſhments inflicted.

" 11. That jurors ought to be duly impannelled and returned; and jurors, which paſs upon men in trials for high treaſon, ought to be freeholders.

" 12. That all grants and promiſes, of fines and forfeitures of particular perſons, before conviction, are illegal and void.

" 13. And that for redreſs of all grievances, and for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently. And they do claim, demand, and inſiſt upon all and ſingular the premiſſes, as their undoubted rights, and liberties; and that no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the ſaid premiſſes, ought in any wiſe to be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example. To which demand of their rights, they are particularly encouraged by the declaration of his highneſs the prince of Orange, as being the only means for obtaining a full redreſs and remedy therein.

" Having therefore an entire confidence, that his ſaid highneſs the prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance ſo far advanced by him, and will ſtill preſerve them from the violation of their rights, which they have here aſſerted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties; the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve, That William and Mary, prince and princeſs of Orange, be, and be declared King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms and dominions, to them the ſaid prince and princeſs during their lives, and the life of the ſurvivor of them; and that the ſole and full exerciſe of their regal power be only in, and executed by, the ſaid prince of Orange, in the names of the ſaid prince and princeſs, during their joint lives; and after their deceaſe, the ſaid crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the ſaid princeſs; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to the heirs of the body of the ſaid prince of Orange.

" And the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, do pray the ſaid prince and princeſs of Orange, to accept the ſame accordingly. And that the oaths hereafter-mentioned, be taken by all perſons of whom the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy might be required by law inſtead of them; and that the ſaid oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy be abrogated:

" I, A. B. do ſincerely promiſe and ſwear, That I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their majeſties, king William and queen Mary. So help me God. I, A. B. do ſwear, That I do from my heart abhor, deteſt, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and poſition, 'That princes excommunicated or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the ſee of Rome, may be depoſed or murdered by their ſubjects, or any other whatſoever.' And I do declare, That no foreign prince, perſon, prelate, ſtate, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any juriſdiction, power, ſuperiority, pre-eminence or authority, eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual, within this realm. So help me God."

After

After the reading of this declaration, the marquis of Hallifax, ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their higneſſes, in the name of both houſes, whereupon the prince of Orange returned the following anſwer:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THIS is certainly the greateſt proof of the truſt you have in us, that can be given, which is the thing that makes us value it the more; and we thankfully accept what you have offered. And as I had no other intention in coming hither, than to preſerve your religion, laws, and liberties, ſo you may be ſure, that I ſhall endeavour to ſupport them, and ſhall be willing to concur in any thing that ſhall be for the good of the kingdom, and to do all that is in my power to advance the welfare and glory of the nation."

All this was followed with the acclamations of the people, which quickly flew over the whole city. The ſame day the prince and princeſs were proclaimed king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, by the names of William and Mary, to the inexpreſſible joy of the people [e].

A DISSER-

A

ON THE

Riſe, Progreſs, Views, Strength, Intereſts, and Characters of the two Parties of the WHIGS and TORIES. Firſt publiſhed in the Year 1717.

THOUGH the two parties or factions which divide England, have been long talked of, it is but of late years that all Europe, as I may ſay, is engaged in their quarrel. Before the laſt peace, foreigners generally looked upon the differences between the Whigs and the Tories, as a matter of curioſity, which no way concerned them. If any ſeemed to regard them, it was ſolely on account of the diverſity of the opinions of the two parties, concerning the hierarchy or government of the church. To this was confined the idea, which moſt private foreigners formed of the Engliſh diviſions. I ſay, private foreigners; for princes and their miniſters knew what influence they had in the political affairs of Europe, according as the one or the other party prevailed in the court or parliament of England; but, as for the people, it may be ſaid, that in general, they knew not the conſequences of them.

The peace of Utrecht has opened numberleſs eyes, becauſe it is clearly ſeen to flow from the late revolution in the court of England, by the change of the whig, into a tory, miniſtry. As all Europe was engaged in the war, and conſequently concerned in the peace by which it was terminated, thoſe who before only talked of the Engliſh diviſions, as of a foreign affair, are but too ſenſible of what conſequence they are to other ſtates. From that time this matter has been reaſoned and diſputed upon with more warmth. In ſhort, moſt foreigners are become whigs or tories, according as they have believed to ſee in the two parties, principles agreeable or contrary to their intereſts. Though whigs and tories equally profeſs the proteſtant religion, and though their differences ſeem not much to concern either proteſtants or Roman catholics, it has happened, that the papiſts have declared for the tories, and the proteſtants for the whigs. The reaſon of this proceeding is obvious, namely, that the one have conſidered the tories as men labouring to ſet a zealous popiſh prince on the throne of England, whilſt the others have believed, that the preſervation of the proteſtant religion was the ſole aim of the whigs. There is yet another motive which has determined foreigners to ſide with one of the parties, that is, their inclination to France, or their fear of the ambitious deſigns of that crown. In this reſpect the adherents of France are tories, and her enemies whigs. Every one therefore has made a choice, without troubling themſelves, otherwiſe, with the differences of the two parties. This conduct in foreigners is the leſs ſurpriſing, ſince in England itſelf, many are whigs or tories, without having a diſtinct idea of the party they have embraced.

It is very ſtrange, that hitherto the public has not been exactly informed concerning theſe two parties, which, by the ſuperiority either may have in England, are in a capacity to influence the moſt important affairs of Europe. It is true, we have tranſlations of ſeveral Engliſh books, or other pamphlets, upon this ſubject. But it is not from thence, that the true ſtate of the affairs of the two parties may be learnt. Theſe writings are publiſhed by whigs or tories, and conſequently by authors viſibly ſuſpected. Accordingly, there is not one but what carries evident marks of the partiality of its author. It is therefore rather from a foreign pen, that we are to expect a fair account of this matter, though, to ſpeak the truth, there are few foreigners but what either are not ſufficiently informed, or are biaſſed to one of the factions. However, the author of this diſſertation, though a foreigner, thinks himſelf qualified to give the public a more extenſive knowledge of the two parties, than many people have hitherto had. He reſided a long time in England, and has, many years, diligently ſtudied the Engliſh hiſtory. Beſides, he is attached neither by inclination nor intereſt to any one of the parties, and is now in a country where he has nothing to hope or fear from either. His impartiality will evidently appear in the diſſertation itſelf. To give a diſtinct knowledge of the two parties, the author was unavoidably obliged to deſcend to many particulars of the Engliſh hiſtory, without which the riſe and progreſs of theſe parties could not have been clearly explained. If the Engliſh think this Diſſertation defective in ſome points, and too large in others, they are deſired to remember, it was not penned for their uſe; that the author's aim was to confine himſelf to general ideas; in a word, that the things which paſs for common, and well known in England, are myſteries abroad, and require a full explication.

It will perhaps be thought ſtrange, that the author, who was born under a government purely monarchical, ſpeaks in ſome places, ſo as it may be thought he approves not of ſuch a government. To obviate this ſuſpicion, he deſires his readers to conſider, that he could not ſpeak pertinently of his ſubject, without aſſuming an Engliſh ſpirit, and conforming himſelf to the principles which are common in England. It is thus only that he believed he ſhould be able to diſcover the ſtrength and weakneſs of the two parties. All his reaſonings are founded upon this principle, of the ſolidity of which he is perfectly convinced; "That every private perſon is in conſcience obliged quietly to ſubmit to the government eſtabliſhed in the country where he was born, or providence has placed him." Wherefore it is his opinion, that all ſecret practices, all cabals, all means, direct or indirect, tending to the diſſolution of ſuch government, are ſo many crimes, for which the authors are reſponſible to God and their ſuperiors.

THE government of England is of a particular kind, of which there is not the like at preſent in all the world. It is, however, the ſame which was formerly eſtabliſhed in all the kingdoms of Europe, formed out of the ruins of the Roman empire. The preſent difference between England and other ſtates, in this reſpect, is owing to this, that the Engliſh have preſerved the form of their government ever ſince their ſettling in Great Britain; whereas in other nations, it has been loſt by degrees, or extremely altered. This government, which has ſo long ſubſiſted in this iſland, appears in ſome reſpects monarchical, in others, republican; and yet, properly ſpeaking, it is neither. It cannot be called purely monarchical, ſince the nobility and the people have a ſhare in the legiſlative power jointly with the king, nor can the king impoſe any tax, without the people's conſent. Neither is it republican, ſince there is a king, who exerciſes the ſovereign authority, who diſpoſes, as he pleaſes, of all places and dignities eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military; and can make peace or war, without conſulting his ſubjects. It would be therefore in vain to pretend to deſcribe this government, by the uſual names of Monarchy, Ariſtocracy, Democracy, which agree not with it. It is a mixed government, differing from, and yet compoſed of, all three. The prerogatives of the ſovereign, and the privileges of the nobles and people, are ſo tempered together, that they mutually ſupport one another. At the ſame time, each of the three powers, concerned in the legiſlature, may inſuperably obſtruct the attempts of one or both the others, to render themſelves independent. In ſhort, it is very near the ſame form of government, eſtabliſhed by the Saxons in Germany, by the Franes in Gaul, by the Viſigoths in Spain, by the Oſtrogoths, and after them, by the Lombards in Italy. Theſe northern nations introduced this government into the moſt ſouthern parts of Europe, when they ſettled there, and founded new ſtates upon the ruins of the Roman empire.

If, therefore, it be aſked, How long this government has been in England? I ſhall not ſcruple to anſwer. Ever ſince the the Anglo-Saxons finiſhed the conqueſt of that part of Great Britain, which their deſcendents poſſeſs to this day. It is true, a doubt may ariſe, whether the commons, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, were part of the parliament; and I confeſs this point is hard to be determined. But, however, when England was divided into ſeven kingdoms, Engliſh and Saxon, each of theſe had its king and parliament. This laſt was called the "wittena-gemot," or "aſſembly of wiſe-men;" and there was alſo the like for the common affairs of the whole Heptarchy. This ſame form of government ſubſiſted when the ſeven kingdoms were reduced to one and the ſame ſtate. The fields of Mars [March] or of May, called ſince the States-general in France, the Cortes in Spain, and perhaps the Diets of the German empire, are the remains of this ancient form of government, introduced by the northern nations, wherever they ſettled.

William, duke of Normandy, ſirnamed the Baſtard or Conqueror, having ſubdued England in 1066, became abſolute, and eſtabliſhed a deſpotic power, though, in all likelihood, he preſerved the ſhadow of a parliament. To ſecure his conqueſt, he tranſplanted many Norman, French, Breton, and Angevin families, enriching them with the lands, of which he inceſſantly diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh. Theſe tranſplanted families multiplied greatly in a ſhort ſpace, and became in the end ſo powerful, as to make head againſt their ſovereigns, ſucceſſors of the Conqueror. At firſt, they gloried in their entire dependence upon the king, who had put them in poſſeſſion of their lands. Their intereſt required that they ſhould ſupport that power by which they held all their Engliſh poſſeſſions. But when they were once firmly ſettled, they began to dread, that the regal power, which had enriched them, might with the ſame eaſe ſtrip them of their eſtates, if the king ſhould ſo pleaſe. For this reaſon, they wiſhed the government reſtored to the ſame ſtate, as in the times of the Saxon kings. This was the only means to avoid the inconveniences of an arbitrary power, (which might, in time to come, turn as much to their prejudice, as it had to their advantage) and to perpetuate the poſſeſſion of their lands. What at firſt was only a bare wiſh, ſoon roſe into hope, and at laſt into right, by the methods I ſhall preſently ſpeak of. To explain this fully, a large detail of the Engliſh hiſtory would be neceſſary, and a particular enumeration of all the cauſes which have contributed to put the nobility, and afterwards the people, in poſſeſſion of a right, which they did not enjoy, under the firſt Norman kings. But as this detail would lead me too far, I ſhall content myſelf with a ſhort abridgment, concerning the ſubject in hand.

William the Conqueror, in 1087, left the kingdom of England to his ſecond ſon William, ſirnamed Rufus, in prejudice of Robert his eldeſt ſon, who had only Normandy. Robert made ſome attempts to diſpoſſeſs his brother of a crown, of which he believed himſelf unjuſtly deprived. But Rufus defeated them by his addreſs, engaging as well the Normans as the Engliſh in his intereſt, with promiſes of reeſtabliſhing the ancient government, and reviving the Saxon laws. He knew that both were paſſionately deſirous of what he made them hope. By the Normans, I mean here the foreigners newly ſettled in England. This promiſe of Rufus was therefore the firſt foundation of their pretenſions. I ſay the firſt, for the Normans had no right to demand of the king what he was pleaſed to promiſe them, and the conquered Engliſh had as little, to limit the power of their conquerors. It is true, the Engliſh might ground their pretenſions upon ſome general promiſes made them by William the Conqueror, when he received their firſt homages. But this prince never pretended that they ſhould found a right on theſe promiſes. Accordingly, he always treated England as a conquered nation. However, Rufus kept his word with neither Normans nor Engliſh.

Upon his death, Henry I. his younger brother, aſcended the throne in 1100, in prejudice of his eldeſt brother Robert, ſtill alive. To ſecure his uſurpation, he purſued the ſame courſe as his predeceſſor Rufus. He promiſed to reſtore the ancient government, and confirmed his promiſe by a charter in form, but executed it no better than his brother. However, the rights of the ſubject received ſtrength from theſe promiſes though ill performed.

Henry I. dying, Maud, his daughter, widow of the emperor Henry V. and wife to Jeffery Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, ought to have mounted the throne; but in 1135 was defeated of her right by Stephen, earl of Boulogne, ſon of the Conqueror's eldeſt daughter. He bound himſelf more ſtrongly than his two predeceſſors to reſtore the Saxon laws, but in all appearance with as little intention to perform his engagements. At laſt, the great men, finding he ſought pretences to evade his promiſes, harraſſed him with a war which laſted the moſt part of his reign. In the beginning, they called into England the empreſs Maud, and her ſon Henry by the earl of Anjou; and the war ended in a treaty which ſecured the crown to Henry after Stephen's demiſe, though he had ſons.

To Stephen, in 1154, ſucceeded Henry II. During his reign, and that of his eldeſt ſon Richard I. there were no conteſts between the king and the barons, for ſo the great men of the kingdom were then called. But very conſiderable diſputes aroſe in the reign of king John, ſirnamed Lackland, brother and ſucceſſor of Richard I. An unhappy quarrel between the prince and the court of Rome, having forced him to do homage to pope Innocent III. for his kingdom, and bind himſelf to pay him tribute, this diſhonourable proceeding, added to many other cauſes, loſt him the eſteem and affection of his ſubjects. The barons improving ſo favourable a juncture, preſented to him the charter of Henry I. which had never been executed, and reſolved to oblige him to confirm it. John at firſt rejected it with great haughtineſs, but at laſt compelled by his own weakneſs, and the united oppoſition of almoſt all the barons, he was obliged to grant them a charter, much more ample and advantageous to the ſubject, than Henry the Firſt's, and which was called Magna Charta, or the Charter of Liberties. By this charter, drawn as the barons pleaſed, the king's power was ſo curbed, that it was in a manner reduced to the ſame ſtate as under the Saxon kings before the conqueſt. This charter has been ever ſince the principal foundation of the rights of the ſubjects. I ſhall not here pretend to decide a queſtion ſo much above my reach, whether this foundation is very ſolid. It will ſuffice briefly to remark, by what means a conceſſion ſeemingly ſo defective in its origin, ſince it was evidently extorted, changed, as I may ſay, its nature by the firmneſs of the Engliſh, and acquired an indiſputable authority, though it might have been conteſted at firſt. To this end, we muſt ſee what paſſed afterwards with reſpect to this charter.

King John, who had ſigned it, deſiring to revoke it, drew upon himſelf freſh misfortunes, which laſted as long as he lived. The barons, reſolving to adhere to their charter, took at laſt the deſperate courſe to call in to their aſſiſtance Lewis, ſon of Philip Auguſtus, king of France, and to put him in poſſeſſion of all, or the greateſt part of, the kingdom. John died during the war, deprived by a foreign prince, or rather his own ſubjects, and left a ſon of ten years of age, little capable to maintain the quarrel. Some lords, who had remained faithful to the late king, appointed the earl of Pembroke regent, during the minority of the young prince, who was recognized by his few adherents by the name of Henry III. in 1216.

Shortly after the face of affairs was changed by the prudent conduct of the regent, who, ſeeing the barons bent to ſupport their charter, promiſed poſitively, it ſhould be confirmed and executed. Upon this aſſurance, they deſerted prince Lewis, who was obliged to return to France.

Henry III. was no ſooner out of his minority than he repealed Magna Charta, and thought of reigning uncontrouled. But, as he had not a capacity equal to ſuch an undertaking, his long reign of fifty-ſix years was one continued ſcene of troubles on account of the Magna Charta. He was frequently forced to confirm it, and as often broke all his oaths and engagements. At laſt, the barons took arms under the conduct of the earl of Leiceſter, ſon of the famous Simon Montfort, general of the cruſade againſt the Albigenſes. The king had the misfortune to loſe a battle, and to ſee himſelf, his brother the king of the Romans, and his ſon prince Edward, in the hands of the earl of Leiceſter, who obliged them to ſwear, they would never oppoſe the execution of Magna Charta. The earl of Leiceſter governed ſome time in the name of the king his priſoner. It is pretended, the commons were firſt received into parliament during his adminiſtration. But, without ſtaying to examine ſo difficult a queſtion, I ſhall only obſerve, that at leaſt it cannot be denied, that ſince the end of Henry III's reign the commons have ever enjoyed this privilege.

Prince Edward, ſon of Henry III, having happily made his eſcape from the earl of Leiceſter, gained a battle in which the earl was ſlain. This victory reſtored the king to his liberty, who uſed it not agreeably to the oath he had been obliged to take. But his reign and life ended a few years after his deliverance. Though the barons party was very much humbled, yet Edward I. who in 1272 ſucceeded his father Henry III. confirmed Magna Charta. However, ſome ſteps taken by him afterwards, diſcovered a deſign to revoke it; but the barons beginning to ſtir, he retracted, and confirmed it once more.

Edward II, his ſon and ſucceſſor, in 1307, was depoſed by the parliament, for intending to eſtabliſh an abſolute power contrary to Magna Charta.

Edward III, ſon and ſucceſſor of this unfortunate prince, in 1327, confirmed it ten times during the courſe of his reign, which the victories obtained by himſelf and his ſon the prince of Wales, over France, rendered extremely glorious.

Richard II, grandſon and ſucceſſor to Edward III, in 1377, was ſolemnly depoſed, for having violated in many inſtances the privilege of the people, founded on Magna Charta.

Henry IV, who had uſed that pretence to dethrone Richard II, in 1399, and put himſelf in his place, made ſome attempts to diminiſh the privileges of the parliament; but did not carry very far the execution of this project.

Henry V, his ſon, who ſucceeded him in 1413, maintained the parliament in all its rights, and left the privileges of his ſubjects untouched. His reign was one continued ſeries of victories and ſucceſſes againſt France. He died in 1422.

From that time the government of England remained ſo well ſettled, and ſo firm upon its foundations, I mean, the prerogatives of the king, and the privileges of the parliament, that for near two hundred years, not one king appears to have had any intention to ſhake it. The policy of the kings turned wholly upon governing their parliaments by ſecret intrigues, without diſcovering any deſire of altering the conſtitution. True it is, that ſome kings, as Henry VIII, did what they pleaſed, but without any prejudice to the privileges of parliament. On the contrary, by ſupporting the parliament in its rights, they had the addreſs to make it ſubſervient to their ends. This, by the way, is the beſt, and perhaps the only method, for a king to render himſelf powerful and eaſy.

After ſo long a continuance of the ſame form of government, and ſo uninterrupted a poſſeſſion of the privileges of Magna Charta, the Engliſh nation was ſo accuſtomed to it, that it ſeemed impoſſible to make any alteration without throwing the kingdom into confuſion. Nay, it ſeemed there was no fear that any king ſhould ever think of attempting ſo difficult a thing, at the hazard of his crown, as had been the caſe of ſome former kings. Notwithſtanding all this, James I, ſucceſſor to queen Elizabeth, in 1603, failed not to take ſome ſteps in this dangerous courſe, and endeavour to diminiſh the privileges of parliament. It was by the pernicious counſels of the duke of Buckingham, his favorite, that he engaged in this deſign, which probably would have ended unfortunately for him, had not death ſurprized him before he had plainly diſcovered his intention. The duke of Buckingham ought to be conſidered as the firſt author of the troubles, which have ſo long infeſted England, and ſtill do infeſt it to this day.

It was under Charles I, ſon and ſucceſſor to James, in 1623, that the project to render the king abſolute, and independent of the laws, was vigorouſly puſhed and advanced by all methods. The duke of Buckingham, favourite to Charles I, as he had been to his father, inſpired him with maxims directly contrary to the eſtabliſhed government, and thereby occaſioned his ruin. The duke being aſſaſſinated, the deſign was purſued by Charles, which had been begun by the deceaſed favourite. He imagined the nation might be governed without a parliament, or at leaſt that parliaments were only to ſupply him with money. He had diſſolved three in the four firſt years of his reign, and even ſignified his intention of calling no more. Twelve years paſſed without a parliament, during which the king levied taxes by the bare act of his will, upon his ſubjects, and by his conduct diſcovered a deſign to reign arbitrarily. Unhappily for him, he admitted to his perſon and council two men imbued with the ſame maxims, by whom he was puſhed on to his ruin; namely, William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Thomas Wentworth, earl of Strafford.

While this prince had no difficulties to ſtruggle with from abroad, he enjoyed his uſurped power with ſome tranquility, but not without the open murmurings of the people. Mean time, no perſon dared to oppoſe ſo violent a torrent. At laſt, the archbiſhop of Canterbury adviſing him to finiſh the reſtoration of the Scotch hierarchy, and introduction of the Engliſh liturgy, he followed the pernicious advice, but could not execute his project, without engaging in an open war in 1639, with his ancient kingdom of Scotland. He levied forces, and maintained them by taxes, which he himſelf had impoſed. Money failing him after the firſt campaign, he at laſt, in April 1640, called a parliament, which was diſſolved in a few days, for the ſame reaſon as the three firſt, and the arbitrary impoſitions continued as before. But the king quickly perceived, that the continuation of his power depended upon the happy ſucceſs of his arms. The people ſerved him with regret. The lords, on divers pretences, withdrew from court. The validity of his orders, by virtue whereof his impoſitions were levied, were conteſted in town and country. In ſhort, the king ſaw his ſubjects every where ready to deſert him, on the firſt occaſion.

This occaſion preſented itſelf ſooner than he expected. His army having received a check, and the Scots ſurprized Newcaſtle, the king was forced to ſeek means to drive them out of England, whereas he had hoped to become abſolute in Scotland. But inſtead of finding his Engliſh ſubjects ready to aſſiſt him, he ſaw them on the contrary, rejoicing at his diſgrace, and conſidered it as a proper opportunity to recover their privileges. In this extremity, he aſſembled the peers at York, in order to adviſe with them upon what was to be done. Their unanimous opinion was, that the only way to free himſelf from the preſent difficulties, was to call a parliament. He then perceived, that an interval of fifteen years was not capable to efface out of the minds of the Engliſh, the memory of their parliaments, which they looked upon as the ſtrongeſt ſupport of their liberties. Mean while, he was under a ſort of neceſſity to follow the advice of the peers, in calling a parliament [a].

In the preſent diſpoſition of the people to the king, ſuch repreſentatives were choſen, as were eminent for their ability, courage, and firm attachment to the privileges of the ſubject. The parliament being met, inſtead of thinking to drive the Scots out of the kingdom, as the king had hoped, believed they ought, before all things, to ſecure the liberties of the nation, by ſetting bounds to the illegal authority, which the king had for fifteen years aſſumed. This reſolution was no ſooner diſcovered, than all the people adhered to the parliament. From that time the king was ſo deſtitute of friends, that he ſaw himſelf unable to reſiſt the torrent. His only refuge was, to comply with his parliament, and paſs almoſt every bill preſented to him to curb his authority. He hoped, by this condeſcenſion, to convince his ſubjects of his intention to return to the ancient courſe from which he had been diverted by evil counſels, and perhaps he really deſigned it, but could gain no belief. On the contrary, it was thought, that mere neceſſity obliged him to meaſures ſo oppoſite to the former. So, mutual confidence, ſo neceſſary between the king and his people, being entirely loſt, the parliament would no longer depend upon the ſincerity of a prince, whom they believed they had juſt cauſe to diſtruſt. They therefore inceſſantly laboured to ſecure the liberties of the ſubject from any future invaſion. To this end, they were not ſatisfied with obtaining the king's conſent to acts which reduced the royal power within its ancient limits, but alſo extorted his aſſent to laws, which conſiderably leſſened the juſt prerogatives of the crown. The friends of the parliament ſcrupled not to affirm, that the ſubject could never be ſecure in his property, while the king had power to return to his former courſes. Thus king Charles, who had hoped to carry the royal authority higher than any of his predeceſſors, ſaw himſelf, on the contrary, deprived of great part of his legal power. He even had the mortification to ſee himſelf forced, in May 1641, to ſign the earl of Strafford's ſentence, who had acted nothing without his orders, or at leaſt his approbation. The archbiſhop of Canterbury alſo, loſt his head on the ſcaffold in 1644.

Had the parliament contented themſelves with ſettling the government upon its ancient foundations, very probably, it would not afterwards have been eaſily ſhaken. But on ſuch occaſions it is difficult to keep a juſt medium. The leading members, willing to ſcreen themſelves from the attempts of the royal power, almoſt entirely changed the ancient conſtitution, by ſtripping the crown of the beſt part of its prerogatives. It was no longer the king and parliament which governed the nation, but the parliament alone, or rather the houſe of commons, managed all affairs. The houſe of peers had ſcarce any other power, than that of an implicit aſſent to the bills offered to them, and the king was but the ſhadow of a ſovereign. However, it was this very thing that procured him adherents, whom, doubtleſs he would never have had, if the balance had been kept even. Many thought it as ſtrange that the parliament ſhould, as I may ſay, govern without a king, as that the king ſhould attempt to rule without a parliament. The conſtitution of the government ſuffered equally by both uſurpations. But that which brought the ſtrongeſt acceſſion to the king's party, was, that the parliament, to gain the Scots to their intereſt, were poſſeſſed with the project, of changing the epiſcopal government of the church, into preſbyterian, which they accompliſhed with open force. Moſt of the Engliſh, accuſtomed to ſee the church under the direction of biſhops, could not bear this change without murmuring. But as theſe were not the ſtrongeſt, becauſe the parliament had the treaſure, army, and places at their diſpoſal, their only refuge was to unite with the king. Then it was that two parties appeared in the kingdom, one for the king, and one for the parliament, with a ſort of equality, which quickly made it thought, they would not long remain quiet, and without coming to arms. The king's adherents at firſt had the name of Cavaliers, which was afterwards changed into that of Tories: and thoſe of the parliament, then called Roundheads, have received the name of Whigs. The origin of theſe two famous diſtinctions is this: at that time a ſort of Iriſh Banditti, or robbers, who kept in the mountains and iſles formed by the vaſt bogs of that country, were called Tories, and at preſent are known by the name of Rapparees. As the king's enemies accuſed him of favouring the Iriſh rebellion, which broke out about that time, they gave his adherents the name of tories. Theſe, on the other hand, to be even with their enemies, who were cloſely united with the Scots, called them Whigs, a name of reproach uſed in Scotland [b]. Hence it appears, that theſe two names are as ancient as the troubles, though they were not in vogue till many years after. I cannot preciſely fix the time, but am of opinion, that cavalier and roundhead continued till the reſtoration of Charles II, and then, by degrees, were changed into tory and whig. Theſe are the two parties which began to divide England in the time of Charles I, and which ſtill divide it to this day. The Roman catholics, called papiſts in England, joined, from the firſt, the king's party, which was more favourable to them than that of the parliament, and have always remained united with the tories.

What has been ſaid, ſufficiently ſhews, that the king's party was compoſed of two ſorts of men, of which the one had principally in view the political intereſt of the king and the crown, and the others, that of the church of England. But they were all re-united in this point, that they found their mutual advantage in the king's proſperity, without which they could not hope to ſucceed in their reſpective deſigns. For this reaſon, they were conſidered but as one party, under the ſame name of cavaliers or royaliſts. This mixture of two different views in the ſame party, ſubſiſts to this day, and is not one of the leaſt cauſes of that confuſion of ideas, which the word tory occaſions. To remove this ambiguity as much as poſſible, I ſhall call the firſt, the political, or ſtate cavaliers; and the others, the eccleſiaſtical or church cavaliers. Each of theſe two branches were again ſubdivided. For among the political cavaliers there were ſome, who following the maxims of the duke of Buckingham, archbiſhop Laud, and the earl of Strafford, wiſhed to ſee the king inveſted with abſolute power, and able to deſtroy the privileges of the parliament. Theſe may be called the rank cavaliers. Their number was ſmall, and little capable to ſupport the king in his adverſity, though, during his proſperity, they made a great noiſe. The other branch of the political cavaliers, was compoſed of men whom I ſhall call moderate. Theſe deſired indeed the reſtoration of the royal authority, but according to the ancient conſtitution. The other cavaliers, whom I call eccleſiaſtical, were alſo ſubdivided into two branches, one of which was compoſed of rigid churchmen, who were againſt the leaſt change in the diſcipline of the church of England. Thoſe who compoſed the other branch, were leſs ſcrupulous and obſtinate, and may be called the low or moderate churchmen.

In oppoſition to the cavaliers or royaliſts, the roundheads, or parliamentarians, were divided into two principal branches, namely, the political and eccleſiaſtical. The firſt had principally in view, the maintenance of the rights of the people; and the ſecond, the advancement of preſbytery. Each of theſe branches was likewiſe ſubdivided into two; one whereof was compoſed of republicans, who aimed at undermining the regal power, and erecting a commonwealth; the other, of the moderate roundheads, or parliamentarians, deſired only to reduce the king to an incapacity of abuſing his power, by leaving him the poſſeſſion of his juſt rights. This relates only to the political roundheads, or parliamentarians. As for the eccleſiaſtical, they alſo formed two branches, of which the firſt was compoſed of the rigid preſbyterians, who would be contented with nothing leſs than the deſtruction of the hierarchy; and the other, of the moderate preſbyterians, who would have been ſatisfied with much leſs, and perhaps, with bare toleration. It was abſolutely neceſſary to premiſe thus much, in order to enable the reader to underſtand the ſequel of this diſſertation. I ſhall more largely ſpeak of the views and intereſts of the different branches of the two parties, after I have finiſhed the abridgement which their riſe obliged me to interrupt.

Whilſt the king was in a deplorable ſtate, without money or friends, and reduced to bear every thing from the parliament, who had him, as I may ſay, at their mercy, he beheld a ray of hope ſhine in the riſe of the two parties I have been ſpeaking of. He thought immediately, that to foment the diviſion could not but be advantageous to him, wherein he ſucceeded. He thereby ſaw himſelf at laſt in a condition to hope to do himſelf juſtice by his arms, for the injuries of which he thought he had reaſon to complain. In this expectation he raiſed an army, and engaged in an open war againſt the parliament, who on their ſide had now taken all the neceſſary meaſures to reſiſt him.

The particulars of this war are needleſs here, ſince the ſad concluſion of it is ſtill recent. It will ſuffice to ſay, that Charles I. was vanquiſhed, and beheaded the 20th of January 1648. Thus the king himſelf, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Strafford, and archbiſhop Laud, authors of the project to render the king abſolute, came all to a tragical end. If to theſe we add, the examples of king John, Henry III, Edward II, Richard II, and laſtly of James II, who had all the ſame deſign, and all miſcarried in the execution, it will be eaſy to ſee how difficult and dangerous it is for a king of England to attempt to ſubvert ſo well cemented a government.

Oliver Cromwell, author of Charles I's death, remained maſter of the government. He durſt not, however, aſſume the title of king; and if he had the addreſs to render himſelf abſolute, it was under the ſpecious pretence of maintaining the nation's liberty. He is the ſingle inſtance in England, of an uſurper dying a natural death in his uſurpation.

While the ſovereign authority was in Cromwell's hands, the cavaliers were extremely humbled. But they revived on the death of this formidable enemy. To give their adverſaries no advantage againſt them, they put themſelves under the conduct of thoſe of their party, who were the moſt moderate, ſo that there ſeemed to be no more rank or rigid tories. This policy was abſolutely neceſſary, at a time, when the royal prerogative and the rights of the church were not to be inſiſted on, as there were neither king nor biſhops. At laſt, by a moſt ſurprizing revolution, aſſiſted by the prudent conduct of general Monk, the Engliſh united to ſet Charles II. on the throne, ſon of the deceaſed king, and to reſtore the monarchy and the church to their former ſtate.

Charles II. reigned peaceably at firſt. He was a prince who wanted neither wit nor penetration, but was indolent, and addicted to his pleaſures. His intention was to live quietly, and avoid all diſputes with his ſubjects. He was too weary of a long exile, during which he had often wanted common neceſſaries, to be willing to hazard the being again reduced to the ſame ſtate. On the other hand, the Engliſh had had time, and frequent occaſion, to open their eyes, and diſcover, that by a pretended maintenance of their liberties, they had been drawn into ſervitude. For it may be affirmed, that England had never enjoyed leſs freedom, than under the government of the long parliament, and afterwards of Oliver Cromwell. However, Charles II. engaged himſelf by degrees, farther than he ever intended. This, doubtleſs, was owing either to his indolence, or too great condeſcenſion to his miniſters, who were all cavaliers, whom, for the future, I ſhall call tories, as I ſhall give the roundheads the name of whigs, though I do not know exactly when theſe two names were firſt uſed. The tories therefore, who alone were in the king's confidence, were inceſſantly urging him to reſtore the monarchy and church to their ancient luſtre. The court of France, for intereſts of their own, laboured to inſpire him with the ſame deſign. In a word, his miniſters took great care to hinder the whigs from inſinuating themſelves into the king's favour.

The tory party had at their head the duke of York, the king's brother, a prince naturally impetuous and violent;

[b] Rapin by miſtake ſays, they were ſo called from certain robbers in Scotland. But Burnet tells us the name is derived from the word Whiggam, uſed by the weſtern Scots in driving their horſes, from whence thoſe drivers were called whiggamors, and, by contraction, whiggs, p. 43.

who having embraced the Roman catholic religion in his exile, formed the project of eſtabliſhing it in England. This project could not be executed, without firſt extending the royal power beyond the bounds preſcribed by the law, that is to ſay, without reſuming and purſuing the ſame deſign, wherein his father had unhappily miſcarried. But the duke, by reaſon of his impetuous temper, was very improper to conduct ſuch an undertaking. He purſued it eagerly during his brother's reign, who had no legitimate iſſue, hoping that the work then begun, would be more eaſy to finiſh on his own acceſſion to the throne.

To ſucceed in this deſign, he had no other way than to begin it with the utter ruin of the whigs, whoſe principles were directly contrary to the duke's deſigns, both with regard to the church and the ſtate. It muſt be obſerved, that moſt of the whigs were then preſbyterians. So, in pretending only to attack preſbyterianiſm, the duke of York projected the deſtruction of thoſe who oppoſed the increaſe of the regal power, without alarming the nation. Indeed, after humbling the whigs, he might fear to meet with great obſtacles from the moderate tories, whoſe principles did not entirely agree with the arbitrary power he intended to eſtabliſh. But he deſpaired not to ſurmount, if the whigs, his more dangerous enemies, were once removed out of the way. To this end he induced his brother to perſecute the preſbyterians, wherein he was aſſiſted by all the tories, who with pleaſure beheld this firſt occaſion of being revenged on their enemies, the whigs. So preſbyterianiſm was furiouſly attacked, under pretence of reſtoring the church to the ſtate it was in before the troubles. An act was paſſed, forbidding the preſbyterian aſſemblies, which were called conventicles; and another, known by the name of the Teſt-Act, which indeed more directly concerned the Roman catholics. This act ordained, that no perſon ſhould be admitted to any public office, without producing a certificate of his having communicated in an epiſcopal church. Moreover, it was called the Conformity-Act, becauſe all who were to be admitted to any office, were obliged by this ſtatute to conform to the church of England.

The whigs ſoon perceived, that under colour of maintaining the rights of the church of England, the duke of York's deſign was to change the government of the ſtate, and ruin the proteſtant religion in England. It required ſome time to take juſt meaſures; and at laſt, with the aſſiſtance of the moderate tories, who feared the duke of York's going too far, they obliged the king to ſend him out of the kingdom. Nay, the commons prepared a bill, called the Excluſion Bill, to deprive him of the right of ſucceſſion. But the paſſing of this bill was prevented by the diſſolution of the parliament. Another was called at Oxford, in expectation of finding the members leſs violent. But the king was miſtaken, and, after a ſhort ſeſſion, was again obliged to diſſolve them, upon their endeavouring to paſs the like bill.

It will perhaps ſeem ſtrange, that the ſcene ſhould be thus changed, and the whigs, who were extremely low, ſhould ſuddenly become ſuperior. To let the reader into the reaſon of this change, it is neceſſary to remark, that the moderate tories promoted the deſigns of the court, while they believed them levelled only againſt the preſbyterians. But perceiving, by all the proceedings of the king, the duke of York, and the miniſters, that a project was formed to ruin the conſtitution of church and ſtate, and undermine the foundation of Magna Charta, they readily joined with the whigs to oppoſe the execution of this project. It was therefore this union which gave the whigs a ſuperiority, to which, otherwiſe, they could never have pretended. On the other hand, the ſtate tories and rigid churchmen, deſiring to recover the ground they had loſt, endeavoured to gain the people to their intereſt, by accuſing the whigs of a ſettled deſign to ruin the church; and theſe in their turn accuſed the others, of intending the ſubverſion of the government, and of favouring the duke of York's pernicious deſigns. Thus the enmity of the parties, which ſeemed to have been much weakened by the reſtoration, was revived. It may be truly ſaid, that the tories were in fault, who, to revenge the wrongs received from the long parliament and Cromwell's uſurpation, raſhly threw themſelves into the duke of York's party. They afterwards repented, when they ſaw to what the duke intended to make them ſubſervient.

Some time after, the minds of the people being a little calmed, the duke of York returned into England, and continued, without interruption, to foment diviſion, without which he could not hope to effect his deſigns. So this prince (by an exceſs of zeal for his religion, by a deſire of revenge, and perhaps excited by the ambition of accompliſhing a project, which had been in vain attempted by ſeveral kings of England) and Charles II, through a too great condeſcenſion to his brother, kindled a flame in England, which is not yet extinguiſhed.

Charles II. died during theſe tranſactions, and the duke of York aſcended the throne, by the name of James II, without any oppoſition. He at firſt made great promiſes to his ſubjects, that neither religion, nor the conſtitution, ſhould ſuffer any change in his reign. But he was far from performing his promiſes. Shortly after, the duke of Monmouth, natural ſon of Charles II, relying on the diſcontent of the people, left the Low-Countries, where he had lived ſome time in exile, made a deſcent in England with a handful of men, and aſſumed the title of king. But his royalty laſted but few days. His party being much weaker than he had expected, he was defeated, taken, and beheaded. The king was ſo elated by a victory, obtained with ſuch eaſe, that he ſcrupled not to diſcover his deſigns, ſo ſecure did he think himſelf of the ſucceſs. The judges, who were devoted to him, gave their opinion, that the king might diſpenſe with the laws. Their deciſion was founded upon ſome ſtatutes lodging this power in the ſovereign, with regard to certain laws, and upon examples of ſome of his predeceſſors, who had, in this reſpect, exceeded the bounds of their power. Thus theſe corrupted judges drew from particular caſes a general concluſion, and founded a permanent right upon ſome tranſient uſurpations.

This door being opened, the king, by his ſole authority, repealed the penal laws, enacted by ſeveral parliaments to prevent the deſigns of the papiſts. He next filled his army with officers of that religion, and beſtowed preferments and titles upon men, who by the laws were unqualified. He took away the charters from London, and other corporations, and reduced them to a dependence upon his pleaſure. In ſhort, by a bare proclamation, he granted a full liberty of conſcience, and permitted to each ſect the public profeſſion of their religion. This proclamation had a double view, to favour the papiſts, and to amuſe the preſbyterians. The king was perſuaded, that as the latter were ſtill liable to the penal laws enacted againſt them in the late reign, they would be glad to be freed from them, and that the fear of forfeiting the liberty granted by the proclamation would keep them in ſubmiſſion. But they were not deceived by an artifice directly tending to their ruin. I omit many other ſteps taken by the king, which were but too capable to fill all his ſubjects with terror.

Hitherto the tories in general had favoured the king's deſigns. But when they perceived, all his proceedings tended to a ſubverſion of the eſtabliſhed government, and ruin of the proteſtant religion, they began to repent of their paſt conduct. They clearly ſaw, that by the courſe they were made to take, it was intended to lead them where they deſigned not to go, and that they could not attain their end, the ruin of the whigs, without the loſs of their religion and liberty. In this danger, which could not be more imminent, they joined the whigs, and with them, reſolved to call in the prince of Orange to free them from their dangerous ſtate. From that time the king's party became extremely weak, being compoſed of only papiſts, rank tories, and ſome lords, ſlaves of the court, and their fortune. Mean while, the king appeared outwardly as powerful as ever, and near the end of his undertaking; becauſe thoſe who yet ſeemed attached to the court, did not think proper to declare before the time. The prince of Orange was landed before the king's weakneſs was viſible. His army, his fleet, the lords whom he thought moſt devoted to his perſon, forſook him at once, and he was reduced to the ſad neceſſity of trying, in a diſguiſe, to eſcape out of his kingdom. But failing even in this attempt, he had the mortification to ſee himſelf at the mercy of the prince of Orange, and, in all appearance, indebted to his generoſity, or perhaps his policy, for the indirect means which were furniſhed him, of flying into France. This example ſhews, that though the Engliſh are divided into two parties, and there is great enmity between them, their paſſion does not however cauſe them, in general at leaſt, to abandon the intereſts of religion and liberty.

William and Mary being crowned, on the flight, or, as it was called, the abdication of king James, their chief care was to ſtifle the ſeeds of diviſion ſtill ſubſiſting between the whigs and tories, though the danger had united them. In order to this, it was neceſſary to remove from the miniſtry and their confidence, the favourers of king James's deſigns, and the bigots to the minuteſt rites and ceremonies of the church of England. Without this, the whigs could never have have enjoyed any quiet, ſince they ever conſidered the rank and rigid tories, as their irreconcileable enemies. On the other hand, it was not leſs neceſſary to remove from the council the moſt rigid whig preſbyterians, for fear of giving occaſion to think, there was a deſign to change the church-government. This fear would have been the moſt juſt, as the new king having ever profeſſed in Holland the preſbyterian religion, the leaſt ſtep in its favour, might have raiſed a ſuſpicion, of his deſigning to eſtabliſh it upon the ruins of the national church. Great addreſs was therefore to be uſed to remove all cauſe of fear and jealouſy in the tories. It was for theſe purpoſes, that during the reign of William and Mary, the offices were generally conferred on the moderate men of both parties. This maxim was purſued by king William when he reigned alone, after the queen's death. But as it was impoſſible to pleaſe both parties at once, unleſs there had been more places to give, he affected frequently to change his miniſtry, and employ the two parties alternately. This was all he could do, till time ſhould have extinguiſhed entirely the flames of diviſion.

Under ſuch circumſtances, and a king of ſuch wiſdom and foreſight, it may be almoſt affirmed, that no diſturbance would have happened to the government from the difference of the principles of the two parties, if the church-tories could have been contented with ſeeing their church remain eſtabliſhed. But they could not be ſatisfied, ſo long as they ſaw the preſbyterians enjoy an entire liberty of conſcience, publicly exerciſe their religion, and fill offices, contrary to the conformity-act of king Charles II. They were jealous that the whigs intended by degrees to undermine the church, and that the king concurred with them in that deſign. What they had ſeen during the long parliament gave them occaſion to fear the ſame attacks. The rank tories, having loſt king James their patron and defender, inſpired the epiſcopal party with theſe fears and jealouſies, to animate them againſt king William. They perceived, they were no longer able to ſupport themſelves, unleſs means were found to engage the church in their quarrel. Hence the rumours induſtriouſly ſpread among the people, of the church's being in danger. The whigs ſaw by this, that the rank tories had not relinquiſhed their projects, but would, whenever they were armed with power, make uſe of the pretence of religion to ruin them, in imitation of king James. It was thus, that animoſity was continued between the two parties, notwithſtanding king William's care and endeavours.

It ſeemed therefore, that religion was then the ſole point in queſtion between the two parties; the junctures not allowing either the rank Tories, or the republican whigs, to puſh their principles. This has given occaſion to a falſe idea of the differences between the two parties, and to an imagination, that they ſolely conſiſt in a diverſity of ſentiments concerning church-government. But this is certainly a miſtake.. When an opportunity offers, the rank Tories ſhew, that the ſafety of the church is not the ſole motive of their conduct, and probably the republican whigs would alſo remember their maxims, at a favourable juncture.

As to the papiſts, who may be conſidered as a branch of the tories, they would have had reaſon to be ſatisfied with king William's moderation, if their extreme deſire to ſee king James again on the throne, had not cauſed them to look upon the reigning king as their enemy. Some of them were even engaged in conſpiracies againſt his perſon, which only turned to their own confuſion and ruin. This immoderate deſire expreſſed by the papiſts, and even by ſome tories, for the reſtoration of king James, obliged king William to ſeek means, not only for the prevention of their ill deſigns during his life, but alſo to render their endeavours fruitleſs after his death. Accordingly, by an act of parliament, the ſucceſſion of the crown was ſettled in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, without any regard to the pretenſions which birth or nearneſs of blood could give to any papiſt whatſoever. William died ſhortly after, and Anne, daughter of James II, and princeſs of Denmark, mounted the throne.

This queen had been educated in the principles of the rigid tories with reſpect to religion, and, probably, in thoſe of the rank tories with regard to government. At leaſt, all who had any power over her, or were concerned in her education, were of this character. Charles II, her uncle, James II, her father, the earl of Rocheſter, her mother's brother, were all rank tories, deeming any oppoſition to the ſovereign's will, a manifeſt rebellion. Queen Anne was beſides of no great capacity, and naturally obſtinate. An accidental quarrel with her ſiſter Mary, having made her reſolve to withdraw from court, ſhe was ſo punctual to her reſolution, that ſhe would not even viſit the queen her ſiſter, when on her death-bed. The meanneſs of her genius foretold the power which her miniſtry would have in the government. On the other hand, her education made it feared, ſhe would be guided by the rank and rigid tories, of whom her uncle, the earl of Rocheſter, was conſidered as the head. This lord was equally dreaded by the whigs and moderate tories, as a dangerous man, and capable of carrying things to extremities. He was otherwiſe a perſon of great parts, but very fond of his principles. Probably, he was going to be at the helm of the government, by the acceſſion of the queen, his niece, to the throne. But it is pretended, that the fear of the moderate tories, to ſee him in ſo high a poſt, made them reſolve to join with the whigs, to prevent it. At leaſt it is certain, that ſuch an union was made, which forced the queen to throw herſelf into their arms, and truſt them with the management of affairs. I am a ſtranger to the intrigues uſed to bring the queen to theſe meaſures. The lords Godolphin, Marlborough, and ſome other leaders of the moderate tories, were among thoſe who joined the whigs, and ſtrengthened them more by their ability than their credit and numbers. From this time, the moderate tories and the whigs made but one party.

It is needleſs to relate here, with what glory to England, and to the queen in particular, theſe new miniſters directed the public affairs. This is a thing univerſally known, and the memory of it ſtill recent. But it is pretended, that by reaſon of the meanneſs of the queen's genius, they held her in a kind of ſervitude, though they outwardly affected to give her the honour of all her glorious ſucceſſes. During their adminiſtration, the rank and rigid church-tories were excluded from all civil employments, and eccleſiaſtical dignities. Had this continued to the death of the queen, theſe two branches of the tory party would doubtleſs have been conſiderably leſſened in number and credit.

Mean time, the queen ſaw herſelf, not without ſome impatience, forced, as it were, to follow the counſels of thoſe whom ſhe had a right to command, and who, if public report is to be credited, left her not free to purſue her own inclinations or judgment. The rank tories perceiving, or perhaps ſuggeſting theſe ſentiments to the queen, induſtriouſly cheriſhed her diſcontent, by the aſſiſtance of a certain lady, who was in her confidence. Such was their ſucceſs, that after they had ſatisfied her, that she was a ſlave, they brought her to a reſolution of freeing herſelf. This intrigue was conducted with ſuch art and ſecrecy, that her miniſters found themſelves ſupplanted, before any meaſures could be taken to prevent their ruin. Immediately, their places were filled with rank and furious tories. The parliament, in which the whigs had a great ſuperiority of votes, was diſſolved, and another called, to which the new miniſters took care to have members returned devoted to their party. Any perſon, ever ſo little acquainted with the affairs of England, knows what influence the court has in the elections. It may, however, be affirmed, that in reſpect of number, the party of the miniſtry was ſtill inconſiderable. But they had the queen and the parliament on their ſide. Beſides, they were very careful to ſtrengthen their party, by infuſing jealouſies on the account of religion, and perſuading the epiſcopalians, that the church had been in great danger, during the late adminiſtration, and would always be ſo, as long as the whigs had any ſhare in the government. Theſe inſinuations revived the paſſion of the church-tories, and carried them to ſuch exceſſes againſt the preſbyterians, as ſhould not be allowed in a well ordered ſtate, but which theſe miniſters affected to connive at. Indeed, their deſign was not to leſſen, but rather to increaſe the animoſity between the two parties, becauſe their own was thereby ſtrengthened.

Hitherto every thing ſucceeded to the wiſh of the new miniſtry. But they were very ſenſible, that the preſent advantages procured by theſe imaginary terrors would be of no long continuance. Beſides, though they could have kept the people always in this diſpoſition, the queen might die very ſoon, eſpecially as ſhe was very infirm. In that caſe, they had reaſon to fear, the fabric they had raiſed, would be demoliſhed, by the elector of Hanover, who was to ſucceed the queen, by virtue of the act of ſucceſſion, for which he was chiefly indebted to the whigs. They were therefore to think of preventing this danger without loſs of time. Their party was too weak to ſtruggle with the ſovereign, ſhould he happen to be againſt them, as had been often ſeen during the reign of king William, and in the firſt years of queen Anne. They therefore concluded, at leaſt, if we may judge by their proceedings, that their ſureſt way would be to ſecure the crown to the pretender, in order to have a protector when the queen ſhould fail them. It is however ſtill uncertain, whether the earl of Oxford, that able miniſter, now in the Tower, was of this opinion. But it cannot be denied, that they believed the aſſiſtance of France to be abſolutely neceſſary for their ſupport. Accordingly, to ſecure it, they made a diſhonourable and haſty peace, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, and forced the allies of England to follow her example. Probably, had not the queen died ſo ſoon after the peace, the oppreſſed whigs would have been obliged to call in to their aſſiſtance, the elector of Hanover, as they had before the prince of Orange, but with far leſs hope of having the general concurrence of the people. The reaſon is, becauſe king James's deſign to ſubvert the church and ſtate, was ſo open, that it could not be doubted, whereas againſt the pretender, there was only bare preſumption.

What has lately happened ſince king George's acceſſion to the throne, ſhews, there was a formed deſign to ſecure the ſucceſſion to the pretender, had not the death of the queen happened, before the authors of it had time to take all their meaſures. It is however uncertain, whether they could have executed their deſign, or whether, if they could, the pretender's reign would have been of any long continuance. The Engliſh in general are extremely jealous of their laws and liberties, nor are they leſs ſo of their religion. This is what I think I may venture to affirm, though ſome of them ſeem indifferent as to the latter. But, thanks be to God, theſe are far from being the majority. Now it would have been very difficult for the pretender, advanced to the throne by foreign aid, and profeſſing a religion contrary to the national, and guided by rank tories, to keep himſelf within the bounds of moderation, neceſſary to gain the hearts of his ſubjects, without which a king of England can never ſit firm on his throne. However without ſtaying to gueſs what might have happened, let us only obſerve, that the rank and rigid tories have been diſappointed. Not only, the pretender is not king, but his hopes of becoming ſo were never leſs. King George is in peaceable poſſeſſion of his crown; the tories are humbled, and the whigs, lately oppreſſed, are now at the top of the wheel.

After this brief account of the riſe and progreſs of the tories and whigs, it will not perhaps be unacceptable to the reader to know more particularly the views, intereſts, ſtrength, and characters of the two parties. For this purpoſe the different branches before-mentioned, muſt be carefully diſtinguiſhed. It is therefore neceſſary to repeat here, that the two parties may be conſidered under two different relations; namely, with reſpect to the ſtate, and with regard to the church. I ſhall firſt ſpeak of the ſtate-tories and whigs, after which, I ſhall conſider them with reſpect to religion.

The ſtate-tories are, as I ſaid, divided into two branches, one of which may in French be called, rank. In England they are known by the name of high-flyers. This idea, taken from birds that by ſoaring above the common flight, loſe themſelves in the clouds, is very ſuitable to men, who cannot contain themſelves within the limits of the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe are for having the ſovereign abſolute in England, as he is in France and ſome other countries, and for erecting his will into law. They regard not what I have ſaid in the beginning of this diſſertation, that all the governments at this day in Europe were originally like that eſtabliſhed in England; and conſequently there is no reaſon why the Engliſh ſhould imitate nations who have ſuffered it to be loſt, or at leaſt very much altered. It may be imagined that in ſuch a country as England, this party cannot be very numerous, and yet they are very conſiderable for three reaſons. Firſt, becauſe the heads of this party are perſons of the higheſt rank, and commonly favourites and miniſters of ſtate, or ſuch as hold the greateſt offices at court, and the moſt eminent dignities in the Church. Theſe men, who would not willingly put themſelves under the conduct of others, being thus advantageouſly ſituated, become, generally, the leaders of all the tory party. They manage them as they pleaſe, not only for the advantage of the whole party, but chiefly for their own particular ends. Thus very often, under pretence of acting for the intereſt of their party, their proceedings tend only to their own advantage, and the tories are led by them much farther than moſt of them deſire. It is this which gives occaſion to many perſons to accuſe all the tories of being for arbitrary power, though it is certain that only the high-flyers are chargeable with this principle. But it is no great fault, it ſeems, to aſcribe to a whole party what is done by their leaders.

Secondly, This particular branch of tories is conſiderable, in that, when they are in the miniſtry, they engage the church tories ſtrenuouſly to maintain the doctrine of paſſive-obedience, which goes a great way towards gaining the people to their party. They inſinuate to the epiſcopal miniſters, that they have only in view the ruin of the preſbyterians, and under that pretence, cauſe them to preach a doctrine, the conſequence of which extends to all the ſubjects. This was experienced in the reigns of Charles II, of James II, and of queen Anne, towards the concluſion.

Laſtly, The party of the high-flyers becomes very powerful, when, as it frequently happens, they are ſupported by the king, and then it is that the liberty of the nation is in danger. Proofs of this, have been ſeen in the reigns of James II, and Charles I, Richard II, Edward II, and Henry III; for the high-flyers are more ancient than is imagined.

The ſecond branch of the ſtate-tories is compoſed of thoſe I called moderate. Theſe are for having the king enjoy all his prerogatives, but they pretend not, with the high-flyers, to ſacrifice to him the privileges of the ſubject. They are true Engliſhmen, who have the welfare of their country at heart, and are for preſerving the conſtitution tranſmitted to them by their anceſtors. They have often ſaved the ſtate, and will again ſave it, when in danger from the rank tories or republican-whigs, by oppoſing with all their power thoſe who ſhall attempt to alter the government. It would be injuſtice, to confound them with the high-flyers under the general denomination of tories.

As there are two branches of ſtate-tories, ſo there are two of ſtate-whigs, namely, republican, and moderate whigs. The republican whigs are the remains of the party of the long parliament which endeavoured to turn the government into a common-wealth. Theſe at preſent are ſo inconſiderable, that they ſerve only to ſtrengthen the other whigs, with whom they uſually join. The tories would perſuade the public, that all whigs are of this kind. And in like manner the whigs would have it believed that all tories are high-flyers. But this is only an artifice to render one another mutually odious.

The ſecond branch of the ſtate-whigs contains the moderate whigs, who are nearly allied to the moderate tories in principle, and conſequently are to be conſidered as true Engliſhmen, who deſire, the government may be maintained upon its ancient foundations. Herein they would be exactly like the moderate tories, were it not that theſe incline more to the king, and the moderate whigs to the parliament. The moderate whig is perpetually hindering the people's rights from being invaded, and ſometimes even takes precautions at the expence of the crown. By him the triennial act was procured, with ſome others, which 'tis needleſs to mention, to prevent the abuſe of the royal power. Hence it is evident that the high-flyers have no greater enemies than the moderate whig, and that theſe two branches of whigs and tories properly form the oppoſition between the ſtate-tories and ſtate-whigs. Theſe laſt laugh at paſſive-obedience when its conſequences are carried too far. Their principle is, that the royal power has its bounds, which cannot be tranſgreſſed, without injuſtice. Conſequently they believe, that whenever the ſovereign exceeds his prerogatives, he may be reſiſted by his ſubjects. Hence it is eaſy to infer, they do not think the king can diſpenſe with the laws.

What has been ſaid is ſufficient to ſhew that the moderate ſtate-whigs and tories are almoſt of the ſame ſentiments. Their being of different parties proceeds from their mutual fear that either may make their balance incline too much to the king's or the parliament's ſide. It is not therefore ſtrange, that theſe two branches of the oppoſite parties, unite in the preſſing exigencies of the ſtate. For, their views equally point to the preſervation of the government; though often they purſue their ends by different paths. Accordingly ſince the union of theſe two branches upon the death of king William, they have remained inſeparable, and the moderate whig and tory form almoſt the ſame party, under the common appellation of whig. I dare not however affirm, that there are not yet moderate tories who keep by themſelves, and are unwilling to be confounded with the whigs.

It muſt be remembered, that hitherto I have only ſpoke of the tories and whigs in relation to the government, without any regard to religion. I take care not to confound things which ought to be carefully diſtinguiſhed. It is not true that all churchmen are tories, or all preſbyterians whigs, in point of government, as is commonly imagined. Many preſbyterians are, in this reſpect, of the ſame principles with the moderate tories, and would not be leſs concerned to ſee the king ſtripped of his prerogatives, than the ſubject of his privileges. In like manner, many churchmen, even biſhops themſelves, are whigs, very good whigs as to the government, and as conſidered in oppoſition to the high-flyers, which ſhews the neceſſity of diſtinguiſhing ſtate-tories and whigs, from church-whigs and tories, of whom we are how going to ſpeak.

I preſume the reader knows that the Church of England, when ſhe received the reformation, admitted only ſome alterations in her doctrine, but preſerved the hierarchy, with all the ceremonies in which ſhe ſaw nothing ſuperſtitious. The reformation was not properly compleated till the reign of Elizabeth. Then it was that ſeveral conſtitutions of the convocation, confirmed by acts of parliament, ſettled the public worſhip as it ſtands to this day. Mean while, many Engliſhmen, who had fled from the rage of queen Mary, returned home with favourable ſentiments of the reformation, as eſtabliſhed in France, Switzerland, Geneva, and other parts of Germany. Theſe men could not comply with the reformation in England, which, in their opinion, had not been carried far enough from the church of Rome. For this reaſon they not only abſented themſelves from the aſſemblies of the eſtabliſhed church, but alſo compoſed ſeparate aſſemblies, which were called conventicles. Theſe ſeparatiſts were likewiſe ſtiled preſbyterians, becauſe, refuſing their ſubmiſſion to the biſhops, they maintained that all prieſts or miniſters had an equal authority in the church, which ought to be governed by preſbyteries, or conſiſtories, compoſed of miniſters and lay-elders. Upon this occaſion were two parties formed, who wanting the mutual forbearance of perſons profeſſing in the main the ſame religion began to moleſt one another with diſputes in conference and writing. The church of England men were very angry, that private perſons ſhould pretend to reform what, after mature deliberation, had been eſtabliſhed by national ſynods and parliaments. On the other hand, the preſbyterians thought it no leſs ſtrange, that they ſhould be compelled to practiſe what they believed contrary to the purity of religion[a], and with what their conſciences could not comply. The preſbyterians were long oppreſſed, becauſe their adverſaries ſupported their arguments with reaſons from the authority of the queen and parliament.

The preſbyterians conceived great hopes of the acceſſion of James I. becauſe that prince had always profeſſed their religion whilſt he reigned in Scotland. But as he readily conformed to the church of England, they were not much eaſed. Mean while, this party, though oppreſſed, ſo increaſed, that in the beginning of the troubles they were become very numerous. King Charles I. was ſo attached to the church of England, that it may be affirmed, he died a martyr to it, as is evident from his hiſtory. His opinion of the purity of this church, made him hearken to William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſuggeſting to him the reduction of the church of Scotland under the ſame government with that of England, by introducing the hierarchy. This undertaking engaged him in a war with Scotland, and the war produced the long parliament, againſt which he thought himſelf obliged to take arms. This parliament wanting the aſſiſtance of the Scots, could not obtain it but by an engagement to make the church of England preſbyterian. A quarrel was therefore ſought with the biſhops, deans, and chapters; in a word, with the whole church of England, which ſaw its hierarchy, eſtabliſhed by queen Elizabeth, entirely ſubverted, and the Scotch preſbyterian government introduced. In this diſtreſs, the epiſcopalians had no other reſource than to unite the epiſcopal party with the king's party, and as they had one common intereſt with the cavaliers, namely, the maintenance of the king's cauſe, they were confounded with them under the ſame party denomination. The preſbyterians were in like manner reckoned among the roundheads, becauſe they adhered to the parliament.

During the long parliament, and even to the death of Cromwell, the diviſion of the branches juſt mentioned, was hardly perceived. All who were known by the name of roundheads, or parliamentarians, were rigid preſbyterians and republicans. This was the party then in vogue, and the only one that could prefer ſuch as aſpired to the poſts in the gift of the parliament. In like manner the followers of the king's party appeared to be rank cavaliers, or rigid epiſcopalians, becauſe theſe were then moſt regarded at court. But on the reſtoration of Charles II, the ſeveral branches of the two parties began to be diſtinguiſhed. All being tired with the troubles which had ſo long harraſſed the kingdom, the moderate no longer feared to diſcover their ſentiments. Some of the preſbyterians teſtified a readineſs to relax, and many epiſcopalians were of opinion, that, for the ſake of peace, ſome condeſcenſion might be uſed to the preſbyterians. Theſe therefore were the men of both parties, who preſerving this moderation, formed the two branches of the moderate whigs and tories, with reſpect to religion. But ſtill the majority in both parties, firmly adhered to their principles with inconceivable obſtinacy. Amongſt the epiſcopalians there were, who, upon no account whatſoever, could be perſuaded to recede in the leaſt from the practice of their church. On the other hand, there were preſbyterians who were no leſs offended at ſeeing a miniſter officiate in a ſurplice, than at hearing him preach hereſy, and who branded with the name of idolatrous and ſuperſtitious, every ceremony retained by the church of England. This gave birth to the two branches of the rigid epiſcopalians and preſbyterians, which ſubſiſt to this day. The hierarchy is the principal point, on which they are divided. They are both compriſed under the name of whigs and tories, becauſe the rigid epiſcopalians join with the tories, and the preſbyterians with the whigs.

From what has been ſaid concerning the ſeveral branches of whig and tory, it is eaſy to gather that theſe two names are very obſcure and equivocal terms, becauſe they convey, or ought to convey, to the mind different ideas, according to the ſubject diſcourſed of. For inſtance, if I hear it ſaid, that the tories and whigs are at great enmity, this raiſes in my mind an idea comprehending all the ſeveral branches of whigs and tories in general. But if I am told, the tories are for having the king abſolute and independent, or that the whigs would be glad the regal power were aboliſhed, my idea can only extend to the high-flyers and the republican-whigs. The reſt of the whigs and tories would doubtleſs be offended at any ſuch imputations. In like manner, if I hear that the tories had rather ſee a papiſt on the throne than a proteſtant, favourable to the whigs, I ſhould injure the tories in general, by imputing ſuch a thought to them which can only be entertained by the popiſh and ſome rigid church-tories, and perhaps ſome high-flyers. Laſtly, if I hear that the whigs aim at the ruin of the church of England, I can underſtand this only of the preſbyterian-whigs, ſince the epiſcopal-whigs, amongſt whom are ſeveral biſhops, cannot with juſtice be accuſed of labouring the ruin of their own church. Thus the names of tories and whigs convey to the mind certain confuſed ideas, which few are capable of rightly diſtinguiſhing. But this difficulty ſtill increaſes, when it is conſidered that the ſame perſon may be either whig or tory, according to the ſubject in hand. A preſbyterian, for inſtance, who wiſhes the ruin of the church of England, is certainly for that reaſon in the whig-party. But if this preſbyterian oppoſes with all his power the attempts of ſome of his party, againſt the regal authority, it cannot be denied that he is in that reſpect a true tory. In like manner, when the church only is concerned, the epiſcopal party are to be conſidered as tories. But how many even of theſe are whigs with reſpect to the government? Nor have foreigners only ſuch confuſed ideas in this matter; the Engliſh themſelves are liable to them. Nothing is more frequent than to hear a whig charging all the tories in general with an intention to deſtroy the rights and liberties of the ſubject; and a tory arraigning the whigs without diſtinction, as utter enemies to the church and ſtate. Every man uſes this confuſion of ideas, occaſioned by the names of whig and tory, to accuſe his adverſaries of what is moſt odious in both parties.

Having ſhewn as diſtinctly as I could, what is to be underſtood by the tories and whigs, I am next to examine the ſeveral motives and intereſts of the two parties. Were we to rely on what is ſaid by both, nothing is more juſt, more equitable, than the motives by which they are actuated, namely, the glory of God, the honour of the king, the public good, and the welfare of the nation. For my part, if I may ſpeak my mind, it is my belief, that as they are all men, intereſt is the main ſpring of all their actions. Since the two parties were formed, each has earneſtly laboured to gain a ſuperiority over the other, becauſe this ſuperiority is attended with poſts, honours and dignities, which are conferred on their own members by the prevailing, in excluſion of thoſe of the contrary party. This made king William ſay, that, "If he had places enough to beſtow, he ſhould ſoon reconcile the two parties." There would be yet another expedient to ſupply what that prince imagined, namely, to confer all the great places upon neutral lords. But where ſhall we find a ſufficient number of ſuch, who are qualified to exerciſe the higheſt offices? Certainly there are but very few.

[a] This procured them the name of puritans.

I own

I own however there are ſome, who, by their capacity, their impartiality, their diſintereſtedneſs, would deſerve a particular diſtinction. I wiſh I knew them all, that I might inſert their names, and give them in part their due praiſe. But theſe lords, ſo worthy of being known, are little heard of in foreign parts, becauſe as they make their court to neither party, the public poſts generally fall not to their ſhare. Nevertheleſs, it ſometimes happens that miniſters are in a manner obliged to find out theſe neutral lords, and advance them to the firſt dignities in the kingdom. We know one eſpecially, who without ever courting the whig or Tory miniſters, was ſent embaſſador and plenipotentiary at the peace of Ryſwick, honoured with the order of the garter, ſucceſſively raiſed to the offices of lord privy-ſeal, lord preſident of the council, lord high-admiral of England, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, though he never ſolicited theſe great offices. I ſpeak of the earl of Pembroke, whoſe reputation is better known to me than that of ſome other lords of the ſame character, who ought to receive no injury from my ſilence. Among all his other virtues, his integrity in the great poſts which he has filled, calls for much nobler encomiums than he can receive from a foreigner, who has neither the honour to know him perſonally, nor to be known by him. If there were in England twelve ſuch lords, advanced to the great offices, it would be an infallible means to humble both parties at once. Then the aſpirers to employments would make it a merit to eſpouſe neither party, and this impartiality would ſoon deſcend from the great men to the people. But this is a happineſs rather to be deſired than hoped. Neutrality, far from promoting perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit, is rather a ſure impediment to their riſing, becauſe the miniſters and party-leaders think only of gratifying their creatures.

Intereſt, as I ſaid, is the principal motive which actuates the two parties, and this is but too apparent. If, for inſtance, the high-flyers wiſh to ſee the ſovereign in poſſeſſion of abſolute power, I very much doubt whether this flows from a deſire of procuring the welfare of the kingdom, tho' they ſhould be perſuaded that deſpotiſm is the moſt complete form of government. If the public good was the ſole ſpring of their actions, they would not be ſo warm. The ſame may be ſaid of the other branches of the two parties. Each would have it believed, they have only the good of the kingdom in view, while in fact they are only labouring for themſelves, their family and poſterity. But when I ſay that intereſt is their principal motive, I pretend not to exclude entirely many others, which may actuate as well the heads as the members of each party. Some believe that their principles really tend to the good of the ſtate; others act from a religious motive; ſome are ſwayed by revenge, party-ſpirit, and the deſire of ſuperiority. Numberleſs other motives there are on which I think it needleſs to enlarge, that I may not be led to examine the conduct of particulars. It is certain, many may purſue the ſame ends from different motives. It will be better to ſhew the ſtrength and ſeveral intereſts of both parties. In order to this, it is neceſſary to proceed in this examination according to the different branches into which they are divided. I ſhall begin with the Tories.

It is difficult at firſt to conceive, that in a country like England, bleſſed with ſo many noble privileges, which other nations do not at preſent enjoy, there ſhall be men who wiſh to ſee the king inveſted with unlimited power. There are indeed but very few who openly profeſs themſelves to be of the party which I call high-flyers. Nevertheleſs it is but too true, that ſuch a party has always been in England, and ſtill ſubſiſts to this day, though diſowned by moſt of thoſe who are engaged in it. Can it be denied that ſuch a party exiſted under Charles I? The very judges of the kingdom, who are conſidered as the interpreters of the law, gave it as their opinion, that in caſes of neceſſity the king might impoſe taxes upon his ſubjects, and that the king himſelf is the ſole judge of ſuch caſes. This was rooting up the nobleſt prerogative of the parliament, and the principal cauſe of their frequent meetings. If the ſovereign could levy taxes upon his ſubject, without authority of parliament, it may be affirmed, that their ſeſſions would be very rare, and perhaps, in time, entirely ceaſe. But, if the parliament were once laid aſide, what would become of the privileges and immunities of the ſubject? In all likelihood, the caſe would be the ſame as in France, ſince the general aſſembly of the ſtates has been diſcontinued. Has it not alſo been ſeen under James II, that the judges aſcribed to the king a power of diſpenſing with the penal laws? And was not this making him abſolute? In ſhort, we have ſeen Charles I, Charles II, James II, taking large ſteps towards arbitrary power, which they would never have attempted, had they not expected to be ſupported by a numerous party. Let queen Anne's proceedings in the laſt years of her reign be conſidered; for inſtance, the negotiation and concluſion of the peace at Utrecht, the creation of twelve peers at once, the violences uſed in parliamentary-elections, and it cannot be denied that they were ſo many advances towards deſpotiſm, to which ſhe was excited by the party I am ſpeaking of. It is therefore certain, there is ſuch a party in the kingdom. But as they dare not openly avow their principles, they cover them with the pretence of maintaining the rights of the crown, to which they ſeem to confine themſelves, willing to have it believed that they are of the party of the moderate tories. But the principal high-flyers, being commonly favourites or miniſters of ſtate, it generally happens that they become heads of the whole party of the tories, and engage them to do more than they would. They begin with attacking the preſbyterians, and ſo engage the church-tories to follow their meaſures, without knowing whither it is intended to lead them. On pretence of having the diſſenters only in view, they cauſe the clergy to preach paſſive-obedience, which tends directly to arbitrary power. It is this which renders the high-flyers more powerful than appears at firſt ſight. The main concern of this party lies in drawing the church into their quarrel, by pretending an extreme zeal for her rights. They are thereby confounded with the church-tories, whoſe number is very conſiderable, avoid giving the alarm to the moderate tories, and keep themſelves undiſcovered till they have made the whole party ſubſervient to their particular deſigns. But for all this, notwithſtanding their care to obſerve what I have been ſaying, they have the misfortune never to arrive at the end of their career. After they have made themſelves leaders of the whole tory-party, and by ſecret paths, conducted the moderate and church-tories to a certain point, they are at laſt forced upon ſome proceedings which diſcover their deſigns. Then they loſe many of their followers, who not only deſert them, but go over to the whigs. This was the caſe of James II, who ſaw himſelf ſuddenly abandoned by all the world, juſt as he thought himſelf ſecure of his ends. If, in the laſt year of queen Anne, the high-flyers who governed in her name, had attempted to procure a repeal of the act of ſucceſſion, very probably, they would have met with the ſame mortification, and I doubt not but the ſame thing will happen upon every the like occaſion. The reaſon of what I advance ſeems to me evident, namely, that it can be advantageous but to very few Engliſhmen, to have a popiſh or abſolute king.

The party, or branch of the moderate tories much exceeds in number that of the high-flyers; whatever advantage this laſt may have from the quality of their leaders, the other is more powerful from the goodneſs of their cauſe, I mean the preſervation of the king's juſt prerogatives. This is properly the intereſt of all Engliſhmen, who cannot hope for greater happineſs under any other form of government, than under that which has been ſo long eſtabliſhed. This branch of the moderate tories becomes ſtill more conſiderable as often as any attempt is made to extend or abridge the royal prerogative. If to abridge it, they are joined by all the whigs; if to extend it, they are aſſiſted by all the reſt of the tories. Nevertheleſs, it ſometimes happens, that the junctures produce ſome change in the principles, as well as in the intereſts, of this party. When the ſovereign favours the tories in general, by conferring places and poſts upon them, nothing is capable to detach the moderate tories from his intereſt: but their affection cools whenever he inclines to the other ſide. Then, if they ſee the whigs, by a precaution common to them, make any attempt upon the prerogative royal, they are ready to join them. But herein their ſole aim is to let the king know that they deſerve his regard. This courſe was frequently taken by them in the reign of king William, who often changed ſides. In general, it is the intereſt of the moderate tories to oppoſe the attempts of the whigs againſt the authority of the ſovereign, becauſe this ſupports their credit at court and in the country. But withal, they are to take care that the high-flyers do not, under the ſpecious pretence of being of the ſame name and party, carry them farther than is neceſſary.

As to the church-tories, it may eaſily be conceived that they include almoſt the whole kingdom in their party, ſince this branch conſiſts of all the members of the church of England. Therefore when religion is in queſtion, between the whigs and tories, the former are not able to reſiſt their adverſaries. To this ſuperiority is owing the readineſs with which the church-tories ſhew their reſentment againſt the preſbyterian whigs. It is not ſo with the whigs, who even in their greateſt proſperity dare not ſo much much as discover the least thought of attacking the church. They did it once under the long parliament, and it will never be forgot by the tories. They look upon the whig-party as an enemy always ready to undermine the foundations of their church, and, from what was once done, infer the desire of doing the like again, when a favourable opportunity presents. This makes them so readily conceive every impression which from time to time is given them of the church's being in danger, and suffer themselves to be so easily deluded on that account. Their leaders know so well how to improve this disposition, that they project nothing in relation to the state, without including the Church. This is an infallible expedient to unite the whole party, which would be very much divided, were the government only concerned. This procured Charles I. many adherents, whom assuredly he would have wanted, had the parliament not attacked the church of England. Moreover, it was this, which in the reign of Charles II, put the duke of York, though a papist, at the head of the episcopal tories, who willingly concurred with him in the destruction of their enemies. Whenever king William turned to the side of the whigs, the tories were full of imaginary fears of his labouring the ruin of their church. The same method was practised in the first years of queen Anne, because the ministry was then composed of whigs or moderate tories. The same imaginary fear threw the episcopalians, towards the conclusion of that reign, into the schemes of men who had visibly no religion at all. In short, on this very pretence, we lately saw in the reign of king George, a popish pretender called in, to screen the church of England from the pretended attempts she had to fear from the whigs. It is therefore religion which gives power to the tory party. It is certain, if the secret of interesting the church in the quarrel was not practised, the high-flyers would make a very contemptible figure, and the differences between the whigs and the moderate tories would cause none of those disturbances in the kingdom, which have so long prevailed.

It is true, that among the church-tories, there are many who are very sensible of the artifices by which the whole party is engaged in a quarrel, advantageous but to few. Of this number are those I call low-churchmen, among whom some possess the first dignities of the church. But they are not the strongest. The party of the rigid churchmen is much more numerous. This last branch consists of almost all the inferior clergy, of some bishops, of both universities, particularly that of Oxford, and these bodies draw after them great numbers of the laity. It is these that compose what is called in England, high-church, that is, a church which has no mixture of presbyterianism. These men are so attached to the least ceremony of the church of England, that they would not relax upon any thing whatsoever, and by this stiffness, they discover more of the spirit of party than of zeal for religion. I will even venture to say, that many of them would rather chuse to see England under popery than presbyterianism. Now, as the low-churchmen, though more moderate in their sentiments, look upon the hierarchy as an essential point, it is not surprizing, that the tories unite when the growth of whiggism is to be opposed, which has all the presbyterians in its party. It is, perhaps, an artifice of the state-tories, to have given, or at least to continue with so much care, the name of tories to the episcopalians, in order to confound in the same party, interests of a different nature, because this conclusion is very serviceable to them.

The papists are likewise considered as a branch of the tories, because they always remain attached to that party. As they can never hope to see popery established but by means of an absolute king, it is not strange that they rank themselves with the high-flyers. Indeed, this assistance would not be very considerable to the tories, if confined to the English papists, since enjoying neither places nor votes in elections, they cannot have much credit. But this admission of papists, engages likewise foreign powers in the tory interest, who can on certain occasions be very serviceable. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied, that by this the tories give their enemies great advantage against them, who use this pretence to render them odious.

If the leaders of the tory party aimed only at maintaining the prerogatives of the king, and the rights of the church, it may be affirmed, that party would be invincible, because that is the true interest of the kingdom. But as it sometimes happens, that these are only pretences to cover other projects, less agreeable to the good of the state, when once their designs are discovered, their friends generally draw off, a division of the tory members being a necessary consequence of such discovery. This makes me think, that it is almost impossible they should ever succeed in settling the pretender on the throne, or investing any king whatsoever with absolute power. This opinion is founded upon its not being the interest or desire of the nation in general. And hence it is, that they so firmly espouse the interests of France, because they are very sensible they want her assistance. It was seen in the last war that the ill successes of that crown were terrible mortifications to them, and therefore they endeavoured, as much as possible, to lessen them. Accordingly, when they were at the helm, their first care was to cure the wounds France had received. However, it is very difficult for France to put them in possession of their wishes. Great Britain is an island which can hardly be attacked unawares; and which, while there is a good understanding between the king and the parliament, can send out fleets which France is not in condition to oppose.

The high-flyers are therefore to be considered as a party, to which the junctures of the time are not at all favourable, and consequently it should be their interest to remain in a state of inaction, till time should produce some opportunity to exert themselves. But to be quiet is no part of their character. They cannot possibly be easy, while they see themselves excluded from all places of honour and profit, which probably are the springs of their motions. It is however certain, that the disturbances raised by them from time to time, to very little purpose, are attended with great injury to themselves, as well as to all the tories in general, who are always charged with the faults and passions of those who are looked upon as their leaders. This very consideration induces some to desert their party.

As to the three other branches of the tories, namely, the moderate, the rigid, and the low, it would be folly in the whigs to think of their ruin by violent methods. This could not be effected without over-turning the kingdom. They may indeed exclude them from public posts and employments. But should they be so imprudent as to meddle with the church of England, they would run the hazard of raising a storm, which might cost them the superiority they at present enjoy. Therefore it is the interest of the whigs to leave the church unmolested, and their conduct shews they are perfectly convinced of this truth. Though they have lately had frequent provocations, it is not seen, that now they are in power, they seek to be revenged upon the episcopal party. On the contrary, their grand aim is to divide that party, if possible, from the rest of the tories, by convincing them, that they bear no ill-will to the church. If they could succeed, their victory over the high-flyers would be certain. But these last, sensible of the prejudice which this conduct does them, endeavour to prevent its effects by always engaging the church in their quarrel, and inspiring the people with continual fears of the designs of the whigs against the church.

Having shewn the views, strength, and interest of the tory-party, I am next to speak of the four branches of the whigs. As to the republican-whigs, they are at present very inconsiderable, and their party daily diminishes. There is not the least probability of their ever finding again an opportunity like that during the troubles of Charles I's reign.

I have already observed, that the principal difference between the moderate whigs and moderate tories is, that the latter are more inclined to the king's prerogatives, and the former to the privileges of the subject. But this prevents not their union when the state is in danger. Were the moderate tories not episcopalians, and had the moderate whigs fewer presbyterians among them, it might be hoped that these two branches of whigs and tories would remain for ever united, as they seem to be since the death of king William. But when I say that the one incline more to the king, and the others to the subject, I speak the truth, and not what they say themselves. The two parties affirm, on the contrary, they have no other aim, than the preservation of the government as established many ages. So to hear them, you would think they form, and always have formed, one and the same party. It is, however, but too true, that their different inclination frequently obliges them to divide, though it is to be presumed, their intentions are equally good, and that they differ only in the means they employ. The one perhaps are too jealous of the increase of the royal prerogative, and the others fear it not enough. But it is religion which chiefly makes them to be considered as different parties, because the one is composed wholly of episcopalians, and the other has a great mixture of presbyterians. Now to separate the interests of the church from those of the state, requires abstractions of which all are not capable.

Nevertheleſs it may be affirmed, that the branch of the moderate whigs conſidered ſeparately, and in itſelf, is not leſs powerful than that of the moderate tories. But when both join together, they form a party which would be reſiſtleſs, if religion were out of the queſtion. The great buſineſs therefore of the moderate whigs is to aſſiſt the people as much as poſſible, to diſcern the intereſts of the church from thoſe of the ſtate; for which purpoſe they are to treat the epiſcopalians with great moderation. Nor ought they to be leſs careful how they liſten to the republican-whigs, for fear of alarming the moderate tories, of whom they have frequent occaſion. But on the other hand, nothing ought to be neglected by them for breaking the meaſures of the high-flyers, who are their real enemies. Such is the courſe they muſt take to preſerve their credit.

I proceed now to the church whigs, who are divided into two branches, of which the firſt is of the rigid preſbyterians, who abſolutely reject not only the hierarchy, but moreover every ceremony practiſed in the church of England. Their number is very great in England, but they are ſtill more conſiderable by having all Scotland for them. They are continually labouring the propagation of preſbyterianiſm, and, on ſome occaſions, the leading whigs, to content them, are obliged to take ſome ſteps prejudicial to the whole party. It is eaſy to conceive that the intereſt of the rigid preſbyterians requires an innovation in the eſtabliſhed religion, becauſe it can only be by ſome great revolution that their own can come to be uppermoſt. Wherefore they are conſidered as dangerous men, and very unfit to head the whig party, who in all appearance, would be ill conducted by ſuch leaders.

Laſtly, There is another branch of the church whigs, which includes the moderate preſbyterians, and to which may be added all the reſt of the non-conformiſts, as quakers, anabaptiſts, &c. who find more ſupport from the whigs than from the tories, though their junction adds no great ſtrength to the party. The moderate preſbyterians, leſs ſcrupulous, leſs paſſionate, and leſs obſtinate than the rigid, make no difficulty to join the aſſemblies of the eſtabliſhed church, and even to communicate therein, when their intereſt requires it. If it were left to their choice, preſbyterianiſm would be the reigning religion. But they do not think it prudent to labour to make it ſo by violent methods. They know, it would be an infallible means to unite all the tories againſt them; whereas it is the intereſt of all the whigs to keep them divided, by continually inſiſting upon the diſtinction between ſtate and church tories, and ſhewing that they have no ill deſigns againſt the latter. Theſe are doubtleſs, the moſt dangerous enemies of the high-flyers and rigid tories, becauſe by their moderate conduct they deprive them of the pretence to complain that the church is in danger. Theſe were aimed at by the tories in their act towards the concluſion of queen Anne's reign againſt occaſional conformity. As few are acquainted with the nature of this act, I ſhall briefly explain it.

In the reign of Charles II, an act was made called the Conformity Act, whereby any perſon admitted to any public office was to bring a certificate of his having received the ſacrament in the church of England. The intent of this act was to exclude all non-conformiſts from places of any kind. Indeed, it produced this effect with regard to the rigid preſbyterians, who could not reſolve to receive the communion from the hands of a biſhop, or a miniſter of the epiſcopal church. But the moderate preſbyterians were not ſo ſcrupulous. On their admiſſion to any poſt, they ſcrupled not to receive the communion in an epiſcopal church, and to take the proper certificates. It was not poſſible for the tories to add any explication to this act, during the reign of king James, who, on the contrary, granted an univerſal liberty of conſcience; nor in the life time of king William, or the firſt years of queen Anne. But having the power in their hands, at the concluſion of her reign, they were not contented with reviving this act, but added to it a clauſe to prevent occaſional conformity, or the communicating in the church of England on account of ſome employment. This excluded not only the rigid, but alſo the moderate preſbyterians, from all public offices: For by this act, which is ſtill in force, to communicate once in an epiſcopal church, is not a ſufficient qualification for a place, as before, but a man muſt ſhew that he is really a member of the church of England. If the whigs, who at preſent prevail, dared to meddle with this act, it would ſoon be repealed. But for reaſons before intimated, very probably it will be ſuffered to ſubſiſt, and its violation only connived at.

The ſtrength of the two parties being ſuch as we have ſeen, and the intereſt of the ſeveral branches ſo oppoſite, it ſeems to me a natural conſequence, that the placing a popiſh prince upon the throne, while the king and parliament are in union, and the rights of the church are untouched, is a thing almoſt impoſſible. The people may from time to time be deluded by imaginary fears of the church's danger. But this deluſion muſt quickly vaniſh, when it is ſeen that the church is not really attacked. Now if religion is not concerned, that is, if the epiſcopalians do not think themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of trying all ways to ſave their church from ruin, the endeavours in favour of the pretender, will prove ineffectual. As often as it ſhall be attempted to place him on the throne, the moderate ſtate and church tories will join the whigs, and then that party will be too ſtrong for the high-flyers, though in matter of religion they ſhould be joined by all the rigid tories, which however is not very likely. For it muſt not be imagined, becauſe a few rigid tories make a great noiſe, that the whole branch wiſh to ſee a popiſh prince on the throne. They are zealous for their church, but their church is proteſtant, and this very zeal ſuffers them not to endanger their religion. It will be ſaid perhaps, that France will aſſiſt the high-flyers with all her forces. This is what I can hardly believe for reaſons I ſhall mention hereafter. But though France ſhould heartily engage in this undertaking, the execution would be difficult on account of the ſituation and naval power of England. Nothing but a ſurpriſe can produce the effect deſired by the high-flyers, papiſts, and ſome rigid tories. However, the attempt lately made, will probably induce the king and parliament to take good precautions againſt ſuch ſurpriſes for the future.

There is ſtill another everlaſting obſtacle to the eſtabliſhment of a popiſh prince, and that is, the poſſeſſion of ſome part of the lands of the monaſteries ſuppreſſed by Henry VIII. by almoſt every noted family in England. The anceſtors of the preſent poſſeſſors either received them in preſents from the king, or purchaſed them at an eaſy rate. If therefore a popiſh prince ſhould now mount the throne, there is no doubt but he would try to eſtabliſh his religion. But ſhould his attempt prove ſucceſsful, in what danger would theſe eſtates be? In all probability the preſent owners would be diſpoſſeſſed. Nay, who knows whether they would not be called to account for the profits? It is therefore manifeſt, that the tories and whigs have an equal intereſt in the prevention of this danger. If the advocates for a popiſh prince were to be ſtrictly examined, it would be found, without doubt, either they have no poſſeſſion of this kind, or believe they have particular reaſons to flatter themſelves with an exemption from the general law, or with being made amends ſome other way.

I am now to give a more diſtinct idea of the two parties of whigs and tories, by ſhewing their reſpective characters.

The tories in general are fierce and haughty. The whigs are treated by them with the utmoſt contempt, and even with rigour when they have the ſuperiority. As the tory party is compoſed of epiſcopalians, who properly make the body of the nation, they look upon themſelves as the prevailing party, and cannot bear an equality, much leſs a ſuperiority in their adverſaries. I cannot better compare the behaviour of the tories to the whigs, than to that of the Roman catholics to proteſtants in countries where the papiſts have the advantage of number, and the ſupport of the government. It is with regret that the tories allow the preſbyterians liberty of conſcience. When the power is in their hands, they ſeldom failed to prohibit their aſſemblies, and to exclude them from public employments by acts of parliament. The laſt years of queen Anne afforded flagrant inſtances of the haughtineſs of this party.

There is ſtill another character which belongs to them. They are exceeding paſſionate and precipitate in their motions. This often diſconcerts all their projects. When they have the reins in their hands, they drive with amazing rapidity. Very remarkable proofs of this were ſeen under Charles II, James II, and the late queen. Nevertheleſs it muſt be confeſſed, that this rapidity is not always the effect of an impetuous paſſion, but is ſometimes founded on policy. As the high-flyers, who are commonly at the head of the party, ſometimes project the alteration of the government, they are obliged to embrace, with great haſte, the opportunities which offer, becauſe theſe opportunities are naturally tranſient. For inſtance, under Charles II, it was neceſſary to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the progreſs of the whigs for fear the king, who was, with ſome difficulty and for other intereſts than his own, engaged in the plot, ſhould alter his mind.

Beſides,

Beſides, there was no time to loſe, becauſe it was well known that the whigs were labouring with all their power to inform the people of the true deſigns of the court. So again, when James II. aſcended the throne, the preſumptive heir to the crown was his eldeſt daughter the princeſs of Orange, who was firmly attached to the proteſtant religion. Wherefore as the king might die without ſons, all his projects would vaniſh by his death, if his work was not finiſhed during his life. It was neceſſary therefore to make haſte, becauſe the like opportunity would probably never offer again after his death. For the ſame reaſon, queen Anne being childleſs when ſhe put the miniſtry into the hands of the high-flyers, a peace was quickly to be concluded with France, and ſpeedy meaſures taken for ſecuring the crown to the pretender, leſt her death ſhould prevent the execution of their projects, as it really happened. It was undoubtedly on this account that a peace was ſo haſtily concluded with Lewis XIV. becauſe his aſſiſtance was thought neceſſary to accompliſh the work. Probably if the queen had lived a little longer, the act of ſucceſſion had been repealed. But this precipitation, which ſeems ſo neceſſary to the tories, is, on the other hand, prejudicial to them, inaſmuch as it too ſoon diſcovers the deſigns of their leaders, which require a gradual execution. In order to ſucceed, they muſt have a long and peaceable reign, a king favourable to their deſigns, and of great ability, or at leaſt ready to be guided by their counſels.

Another character of the tories is, their change of principles as their party prevails or is humbled. When they have the prince on their ſide, the doctrine of paſſive obedience is ſupported with all their power, and every ordinance of the king is to be obeyed without examination, becauſe then, they would have the whigs ſuffer themſelves to be oppreſſed without any reſiſtance. But, when the government is in the hands of the contrary party, this doctrine lies dormant or is forgotten. Thus, in all the tory-writers, who have tranſmitted the troubles of the reign of Charles I, paſſive-obedience is eſtabliſhed as a principle certain and inconteſtable. This is owing to their intention of repreſenting the meaſures of the parliament for their own defence, and in oppoſition to the deſigns of the king, as a horrible rebellion. When the preſbyterians were perſecuted in Charles II's reign, paſſive obedience was every where talked of. But it was ſtill much worſe under James II. I remember to have heard from the pulpit, the conſequences of this doctrine carried as far, and perhaps farther, than ever they were in France, under Lewis XIV. Great ſtreſs was laid upon a canon of a convocation of the church of England, which imported, that arms taken up againſt the king by the ſubject, on any pretence whatſoever, is direct rebellion: That whether the ſubject be upon the offenſive or defenſive, he is clearly condemned by St. Paul, who ſays, 'he ſhall receive to himſelf "damnation." But the convocation, in which this canon was made, was held under archbiſhop Laud, when Charles I. governed in an abſolute manner, a little before the beginning of the troubles. But when king William was on the throne, the doctrine of paſſive obedience was no longer inforced, becauſe that king was conſidered as no friend to the tories. The caſe was the ſame under queen Anne, while the miniſtry was compoſed of whigs, and moderate tories. But the doctrine revived when that princeſs delivered herſelf up to the conduct of the high-flyers. But ſince king George has filled the throne, the high-flyers and rigid tories plainly ſhew, this doctrine is only admitted by them when they have a prince of their party, but is rejected without any ſcruple when the government is not for them. For this purpoſe they have a diſtinction ready between a king, "de jure," and a king "de facto," and maintain, that only the king, "de jure" has a title to this obedience, but ſuch is every king who favours them, whether he is upon the throne, or has only pretenſions to it.

Let us now ſpeak of the character of the whigs. Thoſe of this party who are rigid preſbyterians, are a ſtubborn and obſtinate generation, who perhaps would be as hot and as paſſionate as the tories, were they in poſſeſſion of power. But as, ſince the long parliament, the party has never been under this direction, it is not upon them that we are to form the general character of the whigs, whereas that of the tories is to be taken principally from the high-flyers and rigid tories, who are their leaders and directors.

The heads of the whig party are much more moderate than the leaders of the tories. Beſides, they proceed generally upon fixed principles, from which they never ſwerve, except when they are obliged to give ſome ſatisfaction to the preſbyterians to keep them from deſponding. Far from deſiring, like the tories, to carry things with a high hand they advance gradually, without heat or violence. Their greateſt trouble is to curb the paſſion of ſome among them, who, were they unreſtrained, would quickly ruin the party. By this moderation, they try to inſinuate mildly into the people, that they have no ill deſigns againſt the church of England, in order to ſeparate the church tories, from the high-flyers. As it is the intereſt of the tories to confound all the branches of their party, and unite them into one body, to be directed by the leaders; ſo it is the buſineſs of the whigs to have theſe ſeveral branches diſtinguiſhed, that the epiſcopalians may be prevented from promoting the deſigns of the high-flyers. But they would never be able to gain this point, were they to uſe violence. Thus the gentleneſs and moderation of the whigs is no leſs founded in policy, than the haſtineſs and precipitation of the tories.

The whigs are charged with being greedy of riches and honours, and ungrateful to their adherents, which makes their friends often forſake them. I can ſay nothing to this, not being ſufficiently informed of the particular concerns of the party. Beſides, the examination of this charge would lead me to conſider the conduct of thoſe who think themſelves ill uſed, which I would avoid, as contrary to my intent of confining myſelf to general ideas. However it may be ſaid for the moderate whigs, that generally they ſupport a good cauſe, namely, the conſtitution of the government as eſtabliſhed by law. They err indeed ſometimes through too much care and diſtruſt, which throws them now and then upon proceedings contrary to their true intereſt, and their own principles, ſince on certain occaſions they maintain the privileges of the nation and parliament, at the expence of the royal authority.

As to the eccleſiaſtical whigs, who are no other than the preſbyterians, all that can be ſaid of them is, that they are extremely prejudiced againſt biſhops, and the whole hierarchy. Now the queſtion is, whether this prejudice be well grounded, or being ſo, whether it affords juſt cauſe for ſeparation. For my part, I look upon this diſpute between the epiſcopalians and preſbyterians as of little conſequence. And therefore I cannot approve of the ſtiffneſs of the preſbyterians, in a country where the reformation is eſtabliſhed according to the church of England, ſince the two churches differ in no eſſential point. I ſay the ſame thing of the epiſcopalians of Scotland, and perhaps in England itſelf, greater regard ſhould be had to the ſcruples of the preſbyterians. But this is only my private opinion, which I do not pretend to give for a rule to the one or to the other.

Before I proceed, it will be proper to obviate an objection which may naturally occur to the reader, namely, That every thing in England being done by way of parliaments, theſe unions above-mentioned, whether of the branches of the ſame party, or of the branches of the two different parties, ſeem to no purpoſe, unleſs made in the parliament itſelf between the members. But ſo far are ſuch unions from taking place in the parliament, that one of the parties generally ſo prevails there, as to render the union of the reſt of the members entirely fruitleſs.

To this I anſwer, firſt, that the parliament, conſiſting of two houſes, whereof that of the lords remains always the ſame without any conſiderable change, theſe unions may take place in that houſe, whoſe principles are not ſo variable as thoſe of the commons. Now, as the upper-houſe has power to throw out the bills ſent up by the lower, it follows that the lords, by means of ſuch unions, may break the commons meaſures. Conſequently theſe unions may produce great effects.

Secondly, Theſe unions may influence the elections of members. For inſtance, on ſuſpicion that a popiſh prince is intended to be ſet on the throne, the moderate tories and low-churchmen may join with the whigs, and cauſe ſuch repreſentatives to be choſen as are againſt what is feared, and thereby break the meaſures of the high-flyers and rigid tories.

Thirdly, Even in a houſe of commons, conſiſting moſtly of tory members, the moderate among them ſeeing ſome deſign in hand prejudicial to the nation, may join with the whigs, and hinder the execution of it. The moderate whigs might alſo unite with the tories, if they ſaw the republican party growing too ſtrong.

It muſt however be owned that party-ſpirit, the cabals of the leading men, the intrigues of the court, the intereſt of particular perſons, have but too much influence upon the debates of parliament. To ſay all in a word, the parliament is compoſed of men who are not free from paſſions. If the parliament were to anſwer the idea which thoſe conceive of it who are not thoroughly acquainted with its nature, it ſhould be compoſed of perfect men. But as this is impoſſible, it would would be proper, at leaſt, to reform certain abuſes, for which hitherto no remedy has been found, or perhaps ſought. Though this leads me a little from my ſubject, I ſhall ſtay a moment and take the liberty to point out ſome of theſe abuſes. This may at leaſt ſerve to give a more extenſive knowledge of the Engliſh conſtitution, which, though excellent in its nature, is however liable to ſome imperfections.

The firſt abuſe lies in the two great influence of the court, in the election of members, and conſequently in the reſolutions of the parliament. This influence is viſibly owing to the diviſion between the whigs and tories, which gives the king an advantage, he would doubtleſs not have, were all the people well united. When one of the parties gets into the miniſtry, the lieutenancies of the counties and all the court places are conferred on perſons devoted to them. After which, a new parliament is called. Then, beſides the money privately diſtributed by the miniſtry, if report is to be credited, thoſe that are in authority in the towns and counties, uſe all their intereſt and ſkill to get members choſen favourable to the court, that the miniſtry may have the ſuperiority of votes in the houſe of commons. We may judge of the effect of theſe intrigues by this ſingle conſideration, that commonly there is a whig-parliament when the miniſtry is ſo, and a tory-parliament when the miniſters are tories. Nevertheleſs the thing is not ſo very certain, but that we find ſometimes moſt of the elections carried againſt the court. But this rarely happens, unleſs the nation in general is ſatisfied that the court has deſigns pernicious to the ſtate, or the liberties of the ſubject. I ſay nothing of our ſeeing, in the late reign, twelve peers created at once, with the ſole view of procuring the court a majority of votes in the houſe of lords. This is a palpable as well as very dangerous abuſe.

Another abuſe lies, in many ſmall boroughs having a right to ſend repreſentatives to parliament, whoſe votes have the ſame weight with thoſe of the members of London and Weſtminſter, notwithſtanding the great diſproportion between the electors of the one and the other. In theſe inconſiderable boroughs, by the influence of the court, members are choſen that have not a foot of land near the place. It is pretended by ſome, that theſe boroughs have a right as ancient as the parliament itſelf, having enjoyed it ever ſince the time of the Anglo-Saxons. Others think it of much later date. But however, it is at preſent a monſtrous abuſe, that villages of four or five thatched houſes ſhould be upon the level in parliament with the largeſt cities in the kingdom.

A third abuſe there is of great importance, and which ought to be reformed, ſince it is in ſome meaſure contrary to Magna Charta, on which the Engliſh found their liberties and privileges. In this charter king John promiſes in expreſs terms, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, to declare beforehand the cauſes of calling a parliament. As long as this cuſtom was obſerved, the points debated in parliament were not many, for which the members came prepared, and the ſeſſions laſted but a few days. If this was obſerved now, the boroughs and counties might give their repreſentatives inſtructions upon the affairs for which the parliament ſhould be called, or, at leaſt, might chuſe ſuch members as are of the ſame ſentiments with the electors. But at preſent ſeveral abuſes ſpring from the non-obſervance of this method.

In the firſt place, the ſeſſions hold as long as the king pleaſes, and are ended when he thinks proper. Henry IV. improved this advantage, by keeping the parliament aſſembled, till the deſired ſubſidy was granted. In the next place the electors, not knowing the buſineſs on which the parliament is to proceed, are forced to give their repreſentatives an unlimited power. Hence ariſes another abuſe, that the repreſentatives of a borough or county are often of a contrary opinion to thoſe that ſend them. It may therefore happen, nay, it has frequently happened, that the reſolves of the lower-houſe are directly oppoſite to the ſentiments of the people whom they repreſent. So it is not the people or commons of England that ſhare the legiſlative power with the king and peers, but their repreſentatives, who enjoy a privilege which belongs only to the people in general, to whom however they are not accountable for their conduct. All they can ſuffer, in caſe they have acted contrary to the ſenſe of their borough or county, is not to be choſen another time. This ſeems therefore to be lodging too great a power in bare repreſentatives. It was not ſo in France, when the ſtates of that kingdom were convened. Every province drew up, before-hand, their particular inſtructions [a], from which their deputies were not allowed to ſwerve. In like manner, in important affairs to be debated by the States-general of the United provinces, the deputies receive inſtructions from their provinces; and in the particular ſtates of each province, the magiſtrates of the towns give their orders and inſtructions to their deputies.

A fourth abuſe lies in the public canvaſſings at the time of elections, with great expence. It coſts ſome men ſeveral thouſands of pounds to be elected, and this openly in the face of all the world.

Laſtly, There is another ſort of abuſe in the houſe of commons, namely, that the members are allowed to go and come, or abſent themſelves as they pleaſe, except on certain great occaſions, ſo that of five hundred and thirteen members, (if I miſtake not) there are not preſent ſometimes above one hundred and fifty. This makes it much more eaſy for the parties to cabal, than if the houſe were full. Moreover many members, though in London, do not conſtantly attend the houſe, but keep away upon any the ſlighteſt affair of their own. This puts me in mind of a pleaſant ſtory, with which I ſhall cloſe this digreſſion. A whig member telling one of the ſame party in great anger, "That if he had been at the houſe that morning, they ſhould have carried an important point." The other calmly aſked him, "By how many they loſt it? By one ſingle vote," ſays he. The other replies, "Had I been there, we ſhould have loſt it by four, for there would have been four tories more, whom I have kept all this morning on purpoſe at a tavern."

It remains only that I briefly ſpeak of the intereſts of the neighbouring ſtates, whith regard to the whigs and tories.

Though the differences between the two parties ſeem only to reſpect England, they have a great influence on the affairs of the other ſtates. The peace of Utrecht clearly ſhews of what conſequence they are to all Europe.

Every one knows, that the States-general of the United Provinces are friends of the whigs, and very juſtly, ſince the whigs have all along ſupported their intereſt in England. The whigs obliged Charles II. to make a peace with Holland, when he was in league with Lewis XIV. againſt her. From that time, they have ever conſidered the intereſt of the Dutch as their own. Accordingly, in their turn, they have received ſignal ſervices from them, particularly in the aſſiſtance given by the States-general to the prince of Orange, to go and break king James's meaſures. This good underſtanding is ſtill cultivated, ſo that the Dutch may be ſaid to be whigs, and the whigs to be Dutch. The reaſon of this union is evident. For France, perpetual enemy of Holland, ever ſupported the tories; whence it follows, that Holland is obliged to ſtand by the whigs, ſince ſhe cannot expect aſſiſtance from England, but by their means. This is ſo clear, that it needs no farther illuſtration.

For the ſame reaſon, the emperor, as ſovereign of the Netherlands, ought to be a friend to the whigs. As he muſt look upon the king of France as a very formidable and dangerous neighbour, he can expect the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, in caſe his dominions are invaded, and when the whigs are in power. In all appearance, the tories would not exert themſelves in the defence of the Netherlands againſt the invaſions of France. But, ſhould the emperor, through exceſſive zeal for his religion, lend his forces to the pretender to aſcend the throne of England, he would only render France ſtill more powerful, and add to the balance of Europe a weight, which would make it entirely incline to one ſide.

The intereſts of France, with regard to the whigs and tories, afford matter for many more obſervations. In general, it is doubtleſs the intereſt of that crown to cultivate a good underſtanding with England. Since the growth of the houſe of Auſtria, that is, ſince about two hundred years, England has ever had it in her power to incline the balance either on the ſide of Auſtria, or on the ſide of France, as ſhe pleaſed. But it has been her ſtanding intereſt to keep the balance even between theſe two powers. This has been the hinge, on which all the policy of the kings of England has turned, for two centuries. Henry the Eighth's varying ſometimes from this courſe, is to be aſcribed wholly to the private intereſt of cardinal Wolſey his prime miniſter, or to his own caprice. So it was ever the intereſt of France to keep fair with England. Accordingly Lewis XIV. has politicly endeavoured theſe fifty years, either to get England on his ſide, or, at leaſt, to prevent her from eſpouſing that of his enemies. But as it was not eaſy for that monarch to perſuade the Engliſh, that to incline the balance to his ſide was for their advantage, he confined his endeavours to hinder them from concerning themſelves in the affairs of Europe, to the end he might proceed without any oppoſition from them. But it muſt be obſerved, that this policy reſpected only his vaſt deſigns of enſlaving all Europe. Otherwiſe, he would have had no need to trouble himſelf about the Engliſh. To ſet this matter in a clearer light, it will not be amiſs to ſhew briefly how this monarch managed with regard to England.

[a] Called in French, Les Cahiers.

The

Lewis XIV, as every one knows, formed the project of an univerſal monarchy in Europe. As he was not ignorant that England was concerned to keep the balance of Europe even, and that the Engliſh conſidered this maxim as the chief foundation of their ſecurity, he was juſtly apprehenſive of their oppoſing the execution of his deſigns. For prevention of which, he uſed all his addreſs to gain Charles II. to his intereſt, when he had reſolved upon a war with Holland in 1672. The miniſtry being tory, he drew Charles, by their means, into a league with him. But this league was of no long continuance. It was ſo evidently againſt the intereſt of England, that the parliament obliged the king to make peace with Holland. Nay, they would have conſtrained him to declare againſt France, if the proſpect of an approaching peace between that crown and the States-general, had not hindered them from going ſo far.

The peace of Nimeguen, concluded in 1678, cauſed not the king of France to diſcontinue the proſecution of his grand deſigns. But as he was very ſenſible, king Charles would not have it in his power to follow his own inclination, he reſolved to take another method, in order to diſable England at leaſt from interpoſing in the affairs of Europe. And that was to raiſe troubles in the kingdom, and then to foment them, that the Engliſh might be employed at home. The duke of York's plots, the king his brother's eaſineſs to be guided by his counſels, the choice of paſſionate and perhaps corrupt miniſters, proceeded in all appearance, from Lewis's ſecret practices in England. This method ſucceeded to his wiſh. The conſpiracy diſcovered by Titus Oates, the pretended proteſtant plot, the perſecution of the preſbyterians, the people's murmurs, the diſcord between the king and the parliament found the Engliſh ſo much employment at home, that it was not poſſible for them to look abroad. In the mean time, Lewis XIV. was rendering himſelf formidable to all Europe, having nothing to fear from the Engliſh, who remained idle, when they ſhould have uſed their utmoſt endeavours to put a ſtop to his progreſs.

Upon the acceſſion of James II. to the throne, Lewis gave not over a method that had proved ſo ſucceſsful. On the contrary, he preſſed the new king of England to execute the projects he had formed when duke of York, in favour of popery and arbitrary power. He knew theſe two points were ſufficient to keep England long employed; however, as his aim was only to imbroil the nation, he never aſſiſted king James to any purpoſe. The too ſudden execution of that prince's deſigns was not for his intereſt. When he ſaw him on the point of being attacked by the prince of Orange he never ſtirred in his defence, but rather made uſe of the juncture to carry war into Germany. He imagined that the troubles he had raiſed in England, would long diſable that kingdom from oppoſing his ambitious deſigns. This was the ſole end of all his proceedings. Afterwards, when king William proclaimed war againſt him, he ſent king James into Ireland with ſeven thouſand men, an aid too weak to reſtore him to his throne, but ſufficient to make a diverſion, and feed the hopes of the male-contents. Thus is demonſtrated from Lewis's whole conduct, that his ſole intention was to embroil England, and that king James was the dupe of his policy. It ſeems however at firſt ſight, that king James's reſtoration would have been for Lewis's advantage. But moſt aſſuredly it was againſt his intereſt for a king of England to be at peace in his dominions. The reaſon is plain; as it is the intereſt of England to keep the balance even in Europe, Lewis, who had formed vaſt projects, would have been in danger of being oppoſed by a king of England, who having no diſtractions at home, might in the end purſue his true intereſts, or be forced to it by his parliament. And therefore Lewis XIV. has been ſatisfied to keep England embroiled, and for that purpoſe, to hold ſecret correſpondence with the leading tories, who at length have diſcovered themſelves in the laſt years of queen Anne.

It ſeems therefore to be the French king's intereſt to preſerve a good underſtanding with the tories, in order, by their means to foment the troubles in England. This is ſtrictly true, when he forms deſigns againſt the reſt of Europe. But if he aims to live in peace, and ſtand upon his defence, in caſe of invaſion, nothing can be more for his advantage than to cultivate the king of England's friendſhip according to the conſtant maxim of Lewis's predeceſſors, whether the miniſtry be whig or tory. France may now be ſaid to be invincible, as long as England declares not againſt her. But if the king of England is provoked, and enters into a new alliance with Holland and Germany, the laſt war's experience ſhews that France is very far from being invincible. It may therefore be affirmed, that if the illuſtrious prince [b] now at the helm of the French affairs, intends not to purſue the vaſt deſigns of Lewis XIV, it is not his intereſt to cheriſh the troubles of England, which, inſtead of being for his advantage, may greatly turn to his prejudice [c]. I confeſs, in the indirect aſſiſtance given to the pretender in France, the regent's proceedings ſeem to deſtroy the maxim I mean to advance. Time will unfold, perhaps, the myſtery of this policy. But in the mean while I cannot forbear thinking that he is miſinformed of the true ſtate of the two parties in England, and has given too much credit to intereſted and prejudiced perſons. Perhaps, the pretender himſelf has been deceived in the ſame manner.

I have but one obſervation more to make, with which I ſhall conclude what I have to ſay concerning the whigs and tories. In ſpeaking of their ſeveral views, intereſts and characters, I pretend not to include every particular perſon of either party, but only their leaders and managers, with ſome of the moſt active of both ſides. Though the people in general, by inclination, or intereſt, are either whigs or tories, it does not follow that every ſingle perſon acts in the views I have aſcribed to them. It is certain, moſt ſuffer themſelves to be led without knowing where it is intended to conduct them, or examining the courſe preſcribed them. Conſequently they are far from being concerned in the intrigues and cabals of their leaders. Such a one has liſted himſelf a tory, as being attached to the church of England, and afterwards, without knowing how, finds himſelf obliged to maintain the principles of the high-flyers and rigid tories, though contrary to his inclination. There are thouſands of good Engliſhmen, without doubt, who grieve to ſee their country thus rent with diviſions, and would gladly embrace all expedients to put a ſtop to them. But it is not eaſy to obſerve a juſt neutrality, becauſe it is difficult to be without ambition and avarice. Thoſe who ſtand neuter, as I ſaid, are neither preferred nor truſted, by reaſon that one of the parties are always in power, and have nothing more at heart, than the advancing their friends, or gaining ſome of their adverſaries. Conſequently there can be no poſts or offices for men, from whom the prevailing party can expect no manner of ſervice. Moreover, how can a man be neuter between two parties, each of whom repreſent their adverſaries as deſigning thoſe evils which are moſt apt to fill men with fears, I mean the deſtruction of the religion they profeſs, and the diſſolution of the government; which alone, in their opinion, can render ſubjects happy? A man muſt be very inſenſible, not to be moved with ſuch dangers, when convinced of their reality.

All Engliſhmen therefore are not to bear the blame of theſe unnatural diviſions, but only thoſe who cheriſh them for their own private intereſt. Who are they that would inveſt the king with abſolute power? Who are they that would debar free-born ſubjects of liberty of conſcience? Who are they, in a word, that labour to introduce popery? Can it be ſaid that theſe are the views of every particular tory? No, by no means. But they are the aims of the leaders, who, for their own ends, ſeduce the poor people, and make no ſcruple to involve them in the danger of a civil war.

It may be affirmed, that it is not the kingdom's intereſt for one of the parties to become ſo ſuperior as to meet with no oppoſition. Should it be the high-flyers, they would introduce arbitrary power. And if it were the moderate tories, their biaſs to the prerogative of the crown, would at length enable the ſovereign to ſhake off the galling yoke of parliaments. Were it poſſible for the papiſts to be ſuperior, England would ſoon loſe her religion and liberty. On the other hand, if the republican-whigs ſhould recover the advantage they have loſt, you would hear no more of the kingdom but the commonwealth of England as in Cromwell's days. Laſtly, were the moderate whigs to have the management, they would ſo guard againſt the encroachments of the regal power, that the ſovereign would be reduced to the condition of a doge of Venice.

[b] The duke of Orleans.

[c] It muſt be obſerved, that what Rapin ſays here of the intereſt of France with regard to the whigs and tories, was written before the concluſion of the alliance between that crown, England, and Holland, ſigned January 4, 1717, this Diſſertation being finiſhed in February 1716.

As for the two parties with regard to religion, it is certain, if the preſbyterians can ever act without controul, they will not be ſatisfied till the hierarchy of the church of England be entirely demoliſhed. But then, if the rigid epiſcopalians have nothing to balance their power, the preſbyterians muſt expect to be openly perſecuted. And who knows whether they will ſuffer them to enjoy a bare liberty of conſcience?

Aſſuredly the welfare of the kingdom conſiſts not in any of the ends propoſed by the leaders of both parties. The only way to reſtore peace and tranquility, would be to leave the government upon its ancient foot, and the church as eſtabliſhed at the reformation. It would alſo be neceſſary to grant a toleration to the preſbyterians, who are very numerous in the kingdom. If this way be not uſed, it will always be better for the ſtate that the people remain in diviſion, than if one of the parties ſhould acquire a ſuperiority, which would be more fatal to the public than the equality which cheriſhes diſcord. I do not ſee what can put an end to this ſort of civil war, but the prudence of a juſt and equitable ſovereign, moderate in his deſires and paſſions, a lover of the proteſtant religion, and that makes the good and happineſs of his ſubjects his whole care and ſtudy. This is what may with reaſon be expected from the king who now fills the throne, ſince he poſſeſſes all thoſe virtues in an eminent degree. May heaven proſper his deſigns, and may he live to ſee the happy effect of his pains and endeavours!

I. The Bill for ſettling the Succeſſion of the Crown on Richard III, and his Deſcendants.

MR. Rapin (with moſt of our hiſtorians) has committed ſome miſtakes (particularly vol. ii. p. 10.) concerning the affair of baſtardiſing the iſſue of king Edward IV. for the correction of which, ſir Robert Cotton's tranſlation of the bill for excluding Edward's children, and ſettling the crown on Richard III, and his deſcendants, is here inſerted at large, with Prynne's Annotations. This extraordinary bill, though publiſhed near one hundred years ago, has not only not been copied, but hardly noticed by any Engliſh hiſtorian except Speed.

Anno primo RICHARDI Tertii.

In rotulo parliamenti tenti apud Weſtm. die Veneris, viceſſumo tertio die Januarii, anno regni regis Richardi Tertii primo, inter alia continentur, ut ſequitur.

Memorandum quod quædam billa exhibita fuit coram domino rege in parliamento prædicto in hæc verba.

WHEREAS late heretofore, that is to ſay, before the conſecration, coronation, and enthronization of our ſovereign lord king Richard III, a roll of parchment, containing in writing certain articles of the tenor underwritten, on the behalf, and in the name of the three eſtates of this realm of England, that is to ſay, of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and of the commons by name, and other nobles and notable perſons of the commons in great multitude, was preſented and actually delivered unto our ſaid ſovereign lord, the intent and effect expreſſed at large in the ſame roll, to the which roll, and to the conſiderations, and inſtant petition compriſed in the ſame, our ſaid ſovereign lord, for the public weal, and tranquility of this land, benignly aſſented.

Now, foraſmuch as neither the ſaid three eſtates, neither the ſaid perſons, which in their name preſented and delivered, as it is aforeſaid, the ſaid roll unto our ſaid ſovereign lord the king, were aſſembled in "form of parliament;" by reaſon whereof divers doubts, queſtions, and ambiguities, being moved and engendered in the minds of divers perſons as it is ſaid [a].

Therefore, to the perpetual memory of the truth, and declaration of the ſame, be it ordained, provided, and eſtabliſhed in this preſent parliament, That the tenor of the ſaid roll, with all the contents of the ſame, preſented as is aboveſaid, and delivered to our aboveſaid ſovereign lord the king, in the name, and in the behalf, of the ſaid three eſtates out of parliament [b], be now by the ſaid three eſtates aſſembled in this preſent parliament, and by authority of the ſame, ratified, enrolled, recorded, approved, and authorized, to the removing of the occaſions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawful effects that ſhall now thereof enſue; ſo that all things ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired, and remembered in the ſaid roll, and in the tenor of the ſame, underwritten in the name of the ſaid three eſtates, to the effect expreſſed in the ſaid roll, be of the like effect, virtue, and force, as if all the ſame things had been ſo ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, and remembered in full parliament, and by authority of the ſame accepted and approved: the tenor of the ſaid roll of parchment, whereof above is made mention, followeth, and is ſuch.

To the high and mighty prince Richard, duke of Glouceſter.

"Pleaſeth it your noble grace to underſtand the conſiderations, election, and petition under written, of us the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons of this realm of England, and thereunto agreeable, to give your aſſent to the common and public weal of this land, and to the comfort and gladneſs of all the people of the ſame [c].

Firſt, we conſider, how that heretofore in time paſt, this land for many years ſtood in great proſperity, honour, and tranquility; which was cauſed for ſo much as the kings reigning uſed and followed the advice and counſel of certain lords ſpiritual and temporal, and other perſons of approved ſageneſs, prudence, policy, and experience, dreading God, and having tender zeal and affection to indifferent adminiſtration of juſtice, and to the common and public weal of the land: Then our Lord God was dreaded, loved, and honoured; then within the land was peace and tranquility, and among the neighbours concord and charity; then the malice of outward enemies was mightily reſiſted and repreſſed; and the land honourably defended with many great and glorious victories; then the intercourſe of merchants was largely uſed and exerciſed; by which things above remembered, the land was greatly enriched, ſo that as well the merchants as the artificers, and other poor people, labouring for their living in divers occupations, had competent gain, to the ſatisfaction of them and their houſholds, living without miſerable and intolerable poverty. But afterwards, when as ſuch had the rule and governance of this land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by ſenſuality and concupiſcence, followed the counſel of perſons inſolent, vicious, and of inordinate avarice, deſpiſing the counſel of perſons good, virtuous, and

Mr. Prynne's Notes.

[a] Things done and concluded without the three eſtates in parliament, give little or no ſatisfaction to the people, though in the name of the parliament and the three eſtates.

[b] The three eſtates muſt concur to make a parliament, elſe his title would neither be valid nor ſatisfactory, but ambiguous as before, no one or two of them being a full or real parliament, but all conjoined.

[c] The new device of this bloody uſurper, to entitle himſelf to the crown of England, and take upon him the regal government.

prudent, ſuch as above be remembered; the proſperity of this land decreaſed daily, ſo that our felicity was turned into miſery, and our proſperity into adverſity, and the order of policy, and the laws of God and man confounded; whereby it is likely for this realm to fall into great miſery and deſolation, (which God defend) without due proviſion of convenable remedy be had in this behalf in all godly haſte.

Over this, among other things more ſpecial, we conſider how in the time of the reign of Edward IV. late deceaſed, after the ungracious pretended marriage (as all England hath cauſe to ſay) made betwixt the ſaid king Edward and Elizabeth, ſometimes wife to Sir John Gray, knight, late naming herſelf, and many years heretofore queen of England, the order of politic rule was ſubverted, the laws of God, and of God's church, &c. alſo the laws of nature, and of England, and alſo the laudable cuſtoms and liberties of the ſame, wherein every Engliſhman is inheritor, were broke, ſubverted, and contemned, againſt all reaſon and juſtice[d]; ſo that the land was ruled by ſelf-will and pleaſure, fear and dread, all manner of equity and law laid apart and deſpiſed; whereof enſued many inconveniences and miſchiefs, as murders, extortions and oppreſſions, namely of poor and impotent people; ſo that no man was ſure of his life, land, or livelihood, nor of his wife, daughter, or ſervant, every good maiden and woman ſtanding in fear to be raviſhed and deflowered. And beſides this, what diſcords, inward battles, effuſion of chriſtian men's blood, and namely, by the deſtruction of the nobles blood of this land, was had and committed within the ſame, is evident, and notorious through all this realm, unto the great ſorrow and heavineſs of all true Engliſhmen. And here alſo we conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage betwixt the above-named king Edward and Elizabeth Gray, was made of great preſumption, without the knowledge and aſſent of the lords of this land, and alſo by ſorcery and witchcraft committed by the ſaid Elizabeth, and her mother Jacquet, ducheſs of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the public voice and fame is throughout all this land, and hereafter, if the cauſe ſhall require, ſhall be proved ſufficiently in time and place convenient. And here alſo we conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage was made privily and ſecretly, without edition of banns, in a private chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the church, after the laws of God's church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable cuſtom of the church of England; and how alſo at the time of the contract of the ſame pretended marriage, and before and long time after, the ſaid king Edward was and ſtood married, and troth-plight, to one dame Eleanor Butler, daughter to the earl of Shrewſbury, with whom the ſaid king Edward had made a pre-contract of matrimony, long time before he made the ſaid pretended marriage with the ſaid Elizabeth Gray, in manner and form aforeſaid *. Which premiſſes being true, as in very truth they be true, it appeareth and followeth evidently that the ſaid king Edward during his life, and the ſaid Elizabeth, lived together ſinfully and damnably in adultery, againſt the law of God and of his church; and therefore, no marvel that the ſovereign lord and head of the land being of ſuch ungodly diſpoſition, and provoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God, ſuch heinous miſchiefs and inconveniences as are above remembered were uſed, and committed in the realm amongſt the ſubjects. Alſo it appeareth evidently, and followeth, that all the iſſue and children of the ſaid king Edward be baſtards, and unable to inherit, or claim any thing by inheritance, by the law and cuſtom of England.

Moreover, we conſider how that afterwards by the three eſtates of this realm aſſembled in parliament, holden at Weſtminſter, anno 17, of the reign of the ſaid king Edward IV, he then being in poſſeſſion of the crown and royal eſtate, by act made in the ſame parliament, George duke of Clarence, brother to the king Edward now deceaſed, was convicted, and attainted of high treaſon, as in the ſaid act is contained more at large; becauſe, and by reaſon whereof, all the iſſue of the ſaid George was, and is diſabled, and barred of all right and claim, that in any caſe they might have, or challenge by inheritance, to the crown and dignity royal of this realm, by the ancient laws and cuſtoms of this ſame realm.

Over this, we conſider, that you be the undoubted heir of Richard duke of York, very inheritor of the ſaid crown and dignity royal, and as in right king of England by way of inheritance; and that at this time the premiſſes duly conſidered, there is none other perſon living but you only that may claim the ſaid crown and dignity royal, by way of inheritance, and how that you be born within this land; by reaſon whereof, as we deem in our minds, you be more naturally inclined to the proſperity and commonweal of the ſame; and all the three eſtates of the land have, and may have more certain knowledge of your birth and filiation aforeſaid. We conſider alſo the great wit, prudence, juſtice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in divers battles, which as we by experience know you heretofore have done, for the defence and ſalvation of this realm, and alſo the great nobleneſs and excellency of your birth and blood, as of him that is deſcended of the three moſt royal houſes of Chriſtendom; that is to ſay, England, France, and Spain[e]. Wherefore theſe premiſſes duly by us conſidered, we deſiring effectually the peace, tranquillity, and weal public of this land, and the reduction of the ſame to the ancient honourable eſtate, and proſperity: and having in your great prudent juſtice, princely courage, and excellent virtue, ſingular confidence, have choſen by all that in us is, and by that our writing chuſe you high and mighty prince, our ſovereign lord[f], to whom we know of certain it appertaineth of inheritance ſo to be choſen[g]. And hereupon we humby deſire, pray, and require your moſt noble grace, that according to this election of us the three eſtates of your land, as by inheritance, you will accept and take upon you the ſaid crown and royal dignity, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging, as well by inheritance as by lawful election[h]; and in caſe you ſo do, we promiſe to aſſiſt and ſerve your highneſs, as true and faithful ſubjects and liegemen, and to live and die with you in this matter, and every other juſt quarrel; for certainly we be determined rather to adventure and commit us to the peril of our lives and jeopardy of death, than to live in ſuch thraldom and bondage as we have done long time heretofore; oppreſſed and injured by extortions, and new impoſitions, againſt the law of God and man, and the liberties and old policy, and laws of this land, wherein every Engliſhman is inherited[i]. Our Lord God, king of all kings, by whoſe infinite goodneſs and eternal providence all things are principally governed in this world, lighten your ſoul, and grant you grace to do as well in this matter as in all others, that which may be according to his will and pleaſure, and to the common and public weal of this land. So that after great clouds, troubles, ſtorms and tempeſts, the ſun of juſtice and of grace may ſhine upon us, to the joy and comfort of all true-hearted Engliſhmen[k].

Albeit that the right, title, and eſtate, which our ſovereign lord, king Richard III, hath to, and in the crown and royal dignity of this realm of England, with all things thereunto within the ſame realm, and without it annexed and appertaining, being juſt and lawful, as grounded upon the laws of God and nature, and alſo upon the ancient laws and laudable cuſtoms of this ſaid realm; and alſo taken and reputed as ſuch by all perſons, being learned in the aboveſaid laws and cuſtoms[l].

Yet nevertheleſs, foraſmuch as it is conſidered, that the moſt part of the people is not ſufficiently learned in the aboveſaid laws and cuſtoms, whereby the truth and right in this behalf of likelihood may be hid, and not clearly known to all the people, and thereupon put in doubt and queſtion. And over this, how that the court of parliament is of ſuch authority, and the people of this land is of ſuch a nature and diſpoſition as experience teacheth, that manifeſtation or declaration of any truth or right, made by the three eſtates of this realm aſſembled in parliament, and by the authority of the ſame, maketh before all other things, moſt faith, and certain quieting of men's minds, and removeth the occaſion of doubts, and ſeditious language[m].

[d] Liberties and laws every Engliſhman's inheritance.

* The marriage contract is by Rapin and other modern hiſtorians ſaid to be with Eleanor Lucy inſtead of Eleanor Butler. Tindal.

[e] His pretended virtues and fitneſs to reign as king; his valour in battle; his honourable and royal birth; without one word of his deſperate treaſons, regicides, murders, hypocriſy, and other vices.

[f] His election by the three eſtates and this inſtrument, to be king of England.

[g] They make his hereditary title the ground of their choice.

[h] Their petition and importunity to him to accept of the crown, though himſelf moſt eagerly thirſted after it. And his hereditary right thereto ſeconded by their election.

[i] Their promiſe to aſſiſt, ſerve, and obey him, upon his acceptance thereof, as his ſubjects, and to live and die with him. And their pretended great thraldom, bondage, oppreſſions, &c. under his predeceſſors. Ibid.

[k] Their prayer for him, and their great trouble, occaſioned partly by himſelf. Ibid.

[l] The lawyers flatter and approve his title. The common people ignorant in the laws. Prynne.

[m] The parliament's authority with the people, when true, free and real, conſiſting of the three eſtates. Its declaration quieteth all men's minds, removeth all doubts and ſeditions. Yet he that conſiders 39 Henry VI. or 1 Edward IV. will ſcarce believe this for a truth, neither proved it to in his own caſe. The three eſtates muſt all concur to make a parliament, and valid election.

They

Therefore, at the requeſt, and by the aſſent of the three eſtates of this realm, that is to ſay, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons of this land, aſſembled in this preſent parliament, and by authority of the ſame, be it pronounced, decreed and declared, that our ſaid ſovereign lord the king was, and is the very undoubted king of this realm of England, with all things thereunto within the ſame realm, and without it, united, annexed, and appertaining, as well by right of conſanguinity and inheritance, as by lawful election, conſecration, and coronation [n].

And over this, that at the requeſt, and by the aſſent and authority aboveſaid, be it ordained, enacted and eſtabliſhed, that the ſaid crown, and royal dignity of this realm, and the inheritance of the ſame, and all other things thereunto within this realm, or without it, united and annexed, and now appertaining, reſt and abide in the perſon of our ſaid ſovereign lord the king, during his life, and after his deceaſe in his heirs of his body begotten, in eſpecial at the requeſt, and by aſſent, and the authority aforeſaid, be it ordained, enacted, eſtabliſhed, pronounced, decreed and declared, that the high and excellent prince Edward, ſon of our ſaid lord the king, be heir apparent of the ſame our ſovereign lord the king, to ſucceed to him in the aboveſaid crown and royal dignity, with all things (as is aforeſaid) thereunto united, annexed, and appertaining, to have them after the deceaſe of our ſaid ſovereign lord the king, to him, and to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten.

"Quæ quidem billa communibus regni Angliæ in dicto parliamento exiſtentibus tranſportata fuit, cui quidem billæ iidem communes aſſenſum ſuum præbuerunt ſub his verbis:" A ceſte bille les communs ſont aſſentes: "quibus quidem billa & aſſenſu coram domino rege in parliamento prædicto, lectis, auditis, & plene intellectis, & de aſſenſu dominorum ſpiritualium & temporalium in dicto parliamento ſimiliter exiſtentium, & communitatis prædictæ; nec non authoritate ejuſdem parliamenti pronunciatum, decretum, & declaratum exiſti, Omnia, & ſingula in billa prædicta contenta fore vera & indubita; ac idem dominus rex, de aſſenſu dictorum trium ſtatuum regni, & authoritate prædicta, omnia & ſingula præmiſſa in billa prædicta contenta concedit, & ea pro vero & indubio pronunciat, decernit, & declarat [o]."

It is obſerved by the authors of the Parliamentary Hiſtory, Vol. II. that this parliament is not introduced in the abridgment of the records, or in the parliament roll, with that formality as moſt of or all the reſt are. There are no writs of ſummons, nor names of peers; no ſpeech from the throne or from the lord chancellor, declaring the cauſe of the meeting, nor any ſpeaker to the commons mentioned in it: Neither is there any notice taken of a tax or ſubſidy; though the tax is ſaid by hiſtorians to have been very grievous to the people [p]. There is no wonder that the act of attainder againſt the earl of Richmond and his followers, is not to be found on record. Conqueſt, and ſucceſſion to the crown ſoon after, gave him power enough not only to abrogate that act, but even to eraſe it from the records. And the reaſon the roll is yet extant may be aſſigned to the policy of the conqueror, ſince it conveyed a blot on the houſe of York, by baſtardizing Edward's children.

II. Concerning the Convention of 1653.

CROMWELL, on the 20th of April 1653, diſſolved the long parliament, which had rendered themſelves ſo famous at home and abroad; and, in conjunction with his council of officers, reſolved to ſummon a ſelect number of perſons in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to whom the ſupreme authority ſhould be delegated by an inſtrument ſigned and ſealed by himſelf and the officers, obliging themſelves to be obedient to their orders. Purſuant to this reſolution, about 140 perſons (five of whom were for Scotland, and ſix for Ireland) were ſummoned in the general's name only *, to meet at Whitehall the 4th of July 1653. Being aſſembled on the day appointed, Cromwell made a long ſpeech to them, ſhewing the cauſe of their ſummons, and that "they had a clear call to take upon them the ſupreme authority of the common-wealth." Then he produced an inſtrument under his own hand and ſeal, whereby he did, with the advice of his officers, devolve and intruſt the ſupreme authority and government of the common-wealth into their hands, any forty of whom were to be deemed the ſupreme authority; but not to ſit longer than the 3d of November 1654; and, three months before their diſſolution, they were to chuſe their ſucceſſors, who were to ſit but one year, and ſo on.

This extraordinary convention having choſen Francis Rouſe for their ſpeaker, by calling him to the chair, and Mr. Scobel for their clerk, they voted themſelves to be the parliament of the common-wealth of England, and publiſhed a declaration, "That as they were ſummoned and required to take upon them the ſupreme government of England, Scotland, and Ireland, they had judged it meet, for the peace and ſafety of theſe nations, to undergo that great burden—That they ſhould endeavour to demean themſelves in all things as becomes thoſe who are ſet by God for the good of all, and to be as tender of the lives, eſtates, liberties, juſt rights, and properties of all others, as they were of themſelves and their poſterities, whom they expected ſtill to be governed by ſucceſſive parliaments."

This done, they appointed ſeveral committees, and amongſt theſe were, 1. For correcting the grievances of the law. 2. For the buſineſs of tythes. 3. For trade and corporations. 4. For regulating the commiſſions of the peace. 5. For priſons and priſoners. 6. For advancement of learning, and receiving all propoſitions tending thereto [q].

Having voted that all petitions ſhould be preſented by ſome member, they ordered Mr. Scobel, their clerk, to publiſh a liſt of their names, that it might be known who were the repreſentatives of the nation, which, by the private manner of their ſummons, did not appear.

The LIST was as follows.

[p] So far was this parliament from laying any burthenſome tax, that among many wholeſome laws which ſtand unrepealed to this day, one was, "That whereas the ſubjects of this realm had of late been burthened with a new impoſition, called, A Benevolence, the ſame ſhould not thenceforth be exacted." It was likewiſe enacted, "That every juſtice of peace ſhall have power to admit a priſoner, arreſted for felony, to bail; and that no officer ſhall ſeize the goods of a priſoner, arreſted for felony, till he be attainted." Another act was, "That no perſon ſhall be impanneled upon juries, but who hath 20 ſhillings freehold, or 26 ſhillings and 8 pence copyhold at the leaſt."

The characters of theſe perſons are variouſly repreſented by the hiſtorians of thoſe times. By the lord Clarendon, and other cotemporaries, and by our modern hiſtorians, who implicitly copy their invectives and miſtakes, they are ſtyled (except a few gentlemen) illiterate, fooliſh, low mechanics, fanatics, the dregs of the human ſpecies, enthuſiaſts, and are ſaid to be enemies to the clergy, and to look upon the function itſelf as Anti-chriſtian, and the payment of tythes as abſolute Judaiſm; to deem learning unneceſſary and heatheniſh; and to intend to abrogate the law and eſtabliſh the Moſaical inſtitution. And as to their proceedings, they are paſſed over with the utmoſt neglect. It is ſaid, that they never entered upon any grave and ſerious debate that might tend to any ſettlement; and Rapin himſelf, with the other moderns, falls into the ſame error, affirming, 'that this ridiculous aſſembly, in above a five-months ſeſſion, did nothing remarkable." Nor have hiſtorians mentioned ſcarce any thing more than their meeting and diſſolution.

On the contrary, Whitelock ſays, that many of this aſſembly were perſons of fortune and knowledge. And Ludlow remarks, "that this aſſembly being compoſed, for the moſt part, of honeſt and well-meaning perſons, who thought themſelves in full poſſeſſion of the power and authority of the nation, and therefore proceeded to the making of laws relating to the public."

Theſe are the different characters and repreſentations of this convention: and as by the laws they made, and the bills they were employed about at the time of their diſſolution, it will beſt appear whether they do or do not deſerve all that ignominy which hath been thrown upon them, an account of ſome of their proceedings ſhall be laid before the reader, as taken from their journals (which are printed with the ſame exactneſs as any of the preceding legal parliaments) and from other authorities of the times [s].

Upon a petition from inſolvent debtors within the ſeveral tyrannical dens of cruelty (the priſons and goals) an act was paſſed for the relief of creditors, and poor debtors, worthy of the beſt of times [t].

[s] The journals were publiſhed to prevent falſe or imperfect accounts being obtruded upon the public. Beſides theſe, was publiſhed 'An exact relation of the proceedings and tranſactions of the parliament which began July 4, 1653, by a member thereof." See the Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. xx.

[t] An abſtract of the moſt important clauſes of this act:

Seventeen commiſſioners were appointed to act as judges in the caſe of priſoners in the Upper Bench Priſon, the Fleet, the Gatehouſe in Weſtminſter, the Counter in Surry, or priſon in White-chapel; with power to examine, and determine in a ſummary way, concerning the cauſes of ſuch perſons impriſonment, their eſcapes and their eſtates; and to act as commiſſioners of bankrupts, who were to be allowed two pence in the pound out of the money ariſing by the ſale of ſuch priſoners eſtates, for the charges of them and their clerks. A certain number of perſons were alſo appointed to act in the ſame capacity for each county in England and Wales, with an allowance of ſixpence in the pound.

Priſoners not paying their debts in ſix months to be deemed bankrupts; and in caſe of ſettlement of any part of a priſoner's eſtate in truſt for himſelf or any other perſon, after the debt contracted or judgment obtained, theſe commiſſioners were empowered to ſell the eſtate, and to fine any other perſon aiding or aſſiſting in ſuch fraud; and perſons not able to pay ſuch fine were to be adjudged to the pillory or workhouſe.

Priſoners able to pay their debts, and refuſing ſo to do, were, if theſe commiſſioners thought fit, to be ordered to cloſe impriſonment: the eſtates of any perſon for whoſe debts another ſhould be impriſoned, were to be ſold as fully as the eſtate of the priſoner himſelf; and where a priſoner made an eſcape, his eſtate not being ſufficient to diſcharge his debts, the goaler and his ſecurity were to make good the deficiency: but in caſe of priſoners againſt whom there had not been any declaration filed, theſe commiſſioners were to diſcharge them, and to give them damages for ſuch vexatious impriſonment.

In order to prevent priſoners, unable to pay their debts or fines, from periſhing in priſon, through the cruelty or obſtinacy of any obdurate creditor, theſe commiſſioners were impowered to diſcharge, abate, or give reſpite of time to any ſuch priſoner, according as the circumſtances of the caſe might require; and to remove to the workhouſe or houſe of correction, any obſtinate priſoner, who ſhould be found to lie in priſon through his own wilful default; or to have run in debt by a vicious courſe of life. They were Having taken into conſideration the ſtate of the high court of chancery, it was reſolved, after a two days debate, " That the court of chancery ſhould be taken away, and that the committee of law ſhould conſider how the cauſes now depending in chancery might be determined, and likewiſe a proviſion made for the deciding matters of equity for the future within the juriſdiction of that court [a].

Not content with this, they took into conſideration the ſtate of the law in general, and reſolved that the committee ſhould conſider of a new body of the law; and every Friday was ſet apart for this affair, which occaſioned great debates [b].

Upon receiving petitions for and againſt the abolition of tythes, the committee was ordered to ſit twice a week, and conſider of the property of incumbents in tythes, as alſo the caſe of proprietors of impropriated tythes, and report the ſame to the houſe. Soon after, a bill was ordered to be brought in for taking away the power of patrons to preſent to benefices. This was followed by the report of the committee of tythes, conſiſting of three articles. The ſubſtance of the two firſt was, " That commiſſioners ſhould be ſent into all the counties, divided into ſix circuits, three in each county to join with four or ſix of every county, and ſhould have power to eject all miniſters who were not of good behaviour or unable to teach.———And to ſettle able perſons in their room, and unite two or three pariſhes together that were not above three miles from the place of public meeting. ———Then followed the names of 21 commiſſioners, conſiſting of ten clergymen and eleven laymen."

By the third article, " All perſons approved on as public preachers of the goſpel in the public meeting places, were to enjoy the maintenance already ſettled by law, and ſuch other encouragement as the parliament has already appointed, or hereafter ſhould appoint: and that where any ſcrupled payment of tythes, the three next juſtices of peace, or two of them, ſhould, upon complaint, call the parties concerned before them; and, by the oaths of lawful witneſſes, ſhould duly apportion the value of the ſaid tythes to be paid either in money or land, by them to be ſet out according to the ſaid value, to be held and enjoyed by him that was to have the ſaid tythes; and in caſe ſuch apportioned value was not duly paid or enjoyed, according to the order of the ſaid juſtices, the tythes ſhould be paid in kind, and ſhould be recovered in any court of record.

" Laſtly, that upon hearing and conſidering what had been offered to the committee touching property in tythes, of incumbents, rectors, poſſeſſors of donatives or impropriate tythes, it was the opinion of the committee, that the ſaid perſons have a legal property in tythes [c]."

One of their moſt remarkable tranſactions, was, the act were alſo authorized to examine into the caſe of perſons who had fraudulently got out of goal by means of former acts for the relief of inſolvent debtors, and to recommit them. They were to inquire inte the abuſe of charities given to priſoners, and to puniſh the ſame; to make orders for ſelling wholeſome proviſions to the priſoners at a reaſonable price; and to cauſe a table of moderate fees to be hung up in every priſon, and any perſon taking more, was to forfeit fourfold to the party injured, and to be ſet on the pillory: and in caſe of the death of a priſoner before his debts were paid, they were impowered to ſell his eſtate for payment thereof: and tho' priſoners enlarged by this act were not liable to be arreſted for debts due before, yet their eſtates were to remain ſubject to their creditors ſatisfaction.

Laſtly, Theſe commiſſioners were not to be reſponſible for their conduct but to parliament; and in caſe of any difficulty, wherein they might apprehend they had not ſufficient power for the relief of juſt creditors or poor priſoners, they were to certify the ſame to the houſe, with their opinion what further proviſion was neceſſary to be made,"

[a] The arguments on this ſubject, omitted by Whitelock and others, are thus given by the anonymous author of the Exact Relation abovementioned. He ſays, " That in the courſe of the debate, the court of chancery was called, by ſome members, the greateſt grievance in the nation: others ſaid, That for dilatorineſs, chargeableneſs, and a faculty of bleeding the people in the purſe-vein, even to their utter periſhing aad undoing, that court might compare with, if not ſurpaſs, any court in the world: that it was confidently affirmed by knowing gentlemen of worth, that there were depending in that court twenty-three thouſand cauſes, ſome of which had been there depending five, ſome ten, ſome twenty, ſome thirty years, and more: That there had been ſpent therein many thouſands of pounds, to the ruin, nay utter undoing of many thouſands of families: that no ſhip almoſt that ſailed in the ſea of the law, but firſt or laſt put into that port; and, if they made any conſiderable ſtay there, they ſuffered ſo much loſs, that the remedy was as bad as the diſeaſe: that what was ordered one day was contradicted the next, ſo as in ſome cauſes there had been five hundred orders and more. That when the purſes of the clients began to be empty, and their ſpirits were a little cooled, then by a reference to ſome gentlemen in the country, the cauſe ſo long depending, at ſo great a charge, came to be ended; ſo that ſome members did not ſtick to term the chancery a myſtery of wickedneſs, and a ſtanding cheat. And that, in ſhort ſo many horrible things were affirmed of it, that thoſe who were, or had a mind to be, advocates for it, had little to ſay on the behalf of it; and ſo at the end of one day's debate, the queſtion being put, it was voted down."

[b] The anonymous author (who was preſent) gives the following account of the debates:

" The clerk of the houſe, in drawing up the queſtion, put the word 'Body' inſtead of 'Model,' which ſome members, friends to this vote, deſired to have altered; but others lovers of the law as it now ſtood, oppoſed the alteration of the word, being very angry at the vote; and ſo it went as it was, with ſome ſeeming diſadvantage, by means of the word 'Body,' which ſome of theſe aforeſaid angry gentlemen would needs fancy, and accordingly reported, as if it were intended to deſtroy and take away the laws we had been fighting for all this while as our birth-right and inheritance; and ſuch a noiſe was made about it, that made many believe that the houſe was made up of monſters, rather than men of reaſon and judgment; but there were ſome very ſober and moderate gentlemen, in the account of all men, that concurred heartily in this vote.

" Some of the reaſons that were alledged in the debate producing this vote, was the intricacy, uncertainty, and incongruity in many things, with the word of God and right reaſon, in the laws as they now are.

" Firſt, That whereas the laws ought to be eaſy, plain, and ſhort, ſo that they who were to be ſubject to them, and have benefit by them, might be able to know and underſtand them in ſome good meaſure; they are now ſo voluminous, and thereby intricate and uncertain, dark and concealed, as few are able to come to the knowledge of them. Thoſe of the profeſſion of the law differ, in very many caſes, what the law is, and are of ſeveral opinions about this thing and the other; and then how ſhould others, though highly concerned, be able to underſtand them, and their intereſt therein continued; there being ſo many law-books of great bulk, ſo many old muſty records, reports and book-cases, as that, after the time ſpent in ſchool-learning, the reſt of the time of the flower of a man's years would be little enough to read them over and peruſe them.

" That, beſides, thoſe records and book-caſes are very ill guides or lights to go by, for who knoweth the circumſtances that did attend them, which often alter the whole caſe? Who knoweth whether, in thoſe caſes, bribery did not make the judgment, or the powerfulneſs of ſome great men, or the love or hatred of the judge, or the negligence or corruption of the advocate? And, beſides, in thoſe law caſes, ſome precedents are directly contrary to others; and an advocate or council alledgeth one caſe or report, and another another; and then the judge followeth which he pleaſeth: how arbitrary is the law in this caſe: and at what uncertainty are the great intereſts and properties of men?

" Beſides, how various are the cuſtoms, which, notwithſtanding, paſs for laws? uſually unknown but to ſome old men of the place; which, though it be ever ſo unrighteous and unreaſonable, 'Time out of mind' carries it. How bulky and voluminous are the ſtatute books? and of ſo great a price that few are able to buy them; and ſo large that few can ſpare time to read them, to know their right, and how they are concerned in them; and yet they muſt be judged, and ſtand or fall by them. And many times ſome muſty ſtatute, of an hundred years old and more imprinted, is found and made uſe of by ſome crafty lawyer, to the undoing of an honeſt man that meant no hurt, nor knew any thing at all of the danger.

" Upon ſomething held forth to this effect, the vote was firſt carried for a new body or model of the law; and a committee choſen to that end, who met often, and had the help of ſome gentlemen of worth, that had deſerved well of their country, being true patriots; who liked well the thing, as very uſeful and deſirable, it being not a deſtroying of the law, or putting it down, as ſome ſcandalouſly reported, but a reducing the wholeſome, juſt, and good laws into a body, from them that are uſeleſs and out of date; ſuch as concerned the biſhops and holy church, ſo called, and were made in favour of kings, and the luſts of great men, of which there are very many. If the law of God be eyed, and right reaſon looked into in all, there be ſome laws that are contrary to both, as the putting men to death for theft, the ſparing the lives of men for murder, under the notion and name of man-ſlaughter; a term and diſtinction not found in the righteous law of God: and that unreaſonable law, that if a waggon or cart, &c. driven by the owner, or ſome other, with never ſo much care, fall and kill any perſon, the owner, though it were his own ſon or ſervant that could no way help it, ſhall loſe his horſe and waggon, by the profane and ſuperſtitious name of Deodand; and the owners of the goods ſhall loſe them alſo upon the ſame account, though they were as innocent as Abel. Other inſtances might alſo be given.

" The way the committee took in order to their work, which muſt needs be elaborate, was by reducing the ſeveral laws to their proper heads to which they did belong, and ſo modelizing or embodying of them; taking knowledge of the nature of them, and what the law of God ſaid in the caſe, and how agreeable to right reaſon they were; likewiſe how proportionable the puniſhment was to the offence or crime; and wherein there ſeemed any thing either deficient or exceſſive, to offer a ſupply and remedy, in order to rectifying the whole. The committee began with criminals; treaſon being the higheſt, they conſidered the kinds thereof; what was meet to be adjudged treaſon in a free common-wealth, and what was meet to be the puniſhment of grand and petty treaſon. Then they proceeded to murder, the kinds of it, and what was to be ſo adjudged, and the puniſhment thereof. The like they intended concerning theft, and after to have aſcertained and ſecured property; as alſo the executive part of the law; ſo as a perſon ſhould not need to part with one property to ſecure and keep another, as now it is; perſons being forced to loſe the property of their cow, to keep the property of their horſe; or one parcel of land to preſerve and keep another. This body of law, when modelized, was to be reported to the houſe to be conſidered of, and paſſed by them as they ſhould ſee cauſe: A work in itſelf great, and of high eſteem with many, for the good fruit and benefit that would ariſe from it: By which means the huge volumes of the law would come to be reduced into the bigneſs of a pocket-book, as it is, proportionably, in New-England and elſewhere. A thing of ſo great worth and benefit as England is not yet worthy of, nor likely in a ſhort time to be ſo bleſſed as to enjoy. And that was the true end and endeavour of thoſe members that laboured in that committee, although it was moſt falſly and wickedly reported that their endeavours tended to deſtroying the whole laws, and pulling them up by the roots."

[c] The authors of the parliamentary hiſtory take notice of a very high charge brought againſt this convention by the lord Clarendon (which has been copied by others.) His lordſhip ſays it was propoſed, " That all lands belonging to the univerſities, and colleges in thoſe univerſities might be ſold; and that the money ariſing thereby ſhould be diſpoſed of for the public ſervice, and to eaſe the people from payment of taxes and contributions.—But, upon a ſtrict review of the journals it does not appear that any ſuch motion or propoſal, relating to the univerſities, was ever made in the houſe. What might be intended by ſome zealots, we pretend not to determine:

concerning marriages, births and burials: by this extraordinary act, marriages were entirely taken out of the hands of the clergy, and put into thoſe of the juſtices of the peace [d].

Beſides theſe tranſactions, there were ſeveral bills in agitation when the convention was diſſolved: "A bill for incorporating Scotland into one common-wealth with England.—For making thoſe perſons incapable of places who ſhould ſollicit for them.——For regulating the great exorbitance of fees in law or elſewhere, and for the better election of jurors.—— For making proviſion for the diſpatch of the cauſes depending in chancery, and determining ſuits of equity for the future in a ſummary way, ſo as the expence ſhould not, in general, exceed 30 or 40 ſhillings." It was alſo reſolved to reduce the number of officers in the exciſe and other duties, and lower the ſalaries, in order to a ſaving of the public charge.

But all theſe great matters were left unfiniſhed, by reaſon of their ſudden diſſolution.

It is obſerved by ſome of our lateſt hiſtorians, that it was uſual in thoſe days for the ſaints to change their names from Peter, John, Henry, &c. into the Old-Teſtament names of Hezekiah, Habbakuk, Obadiah, &c. and ſometimes into godly ſentences [e].

It is very remarkable, that even this mark of folly and enthuſiaſm (though ſaid to be ſo very common) cannot be fixed upon the members of this convention, among whom, as appears by the liſt, there is but one ſingle inſtance of the laſt ſort of names; which ſerved, however, to give them all the contemptuous name of Praiſe-God Barebone's parliament.

The diſſolution of this aſſembly was as remarkable as the ſummons: The journals, as well as Whitelock, only take notice of the ſuddenneſs of it; but Ludlow, in the Memoirs, is more full in this matter, as appears from the following extract.

"The perfidious Cromwell having forgot his moſt ſolemn profeſſions and former vows, as well as the blood and treaſure that had been ſpent in this conteſt, thought it high time to take off the maſk; and reſolved to ſacrifice all our victories and deliverances to his pride and ambition, under colour of taking upon him the office, as it were, of a high conſtable, in order to keep the peace of the nation, and to reſtrain men from cutting one another's throats. One difficulty yet remained to obſtruct his deſign, and that was the convention which he had aſſembled, and inveſted with power, as well as earneſtly ſolicited to reform the law, and reduce the clergy to a more evangelical conſtitution. And having ſufficiently alarmed thoſe intereſts, and ſhewn them their danger from this convention, he informed them farther, that they could not be ignorant of the confuſion that all things were brought into by the immoderate zeal of thoſe in authority, and to what extremities matters might be reduced, if permitted to go on; poſſibly, ſaid he, to the utter extirpation of law and goſpel; and therefore adviſed that they would join their intereſts to his, in order to prevent this inundation. His propoſition was readily embraced by the corrupt part of the lawyers and clergy, and ſo he became their protector, and they the humble ſupporters of his tyranny. But that this uſurpation might ſeem leſs horrid, he ſo contrived it by his inſtruments, that ſome of the conventioners muſt openly manifeſt their diſapprobation of their own proceedings; and, under divers ſpecious pretences, put a period to their ſitting.

"To this end it was agreed by Mr. Rouſe, chairman to that aſſembly, and the reſt of Cromwell's junto, to meet earlier in the houſe than uſual, which was done accordingly on the 12th of December 1653, hoping, by ſurprize, to obtain a vote for their diſſolution: being met, Col. Sydenham, ſir Charles Wolſeley, and others, according to their inſtructions, bitterly inveyed againſt the tranſactions of the convention; and particularly charged them with a deſign to deſtroy the army, by not making a ſufficient and timely pro-

mine: But the only attempt that carried any tendency that way, was the ſcheme for aboliſhing of tythes: And this project, as we are aſſured by a member of this convention, was ſo far from being intended to the prejudice of the parochial clergy, that the deſign was only to take away the manner of maintenance by tythes, as unequal, burthenſome, and being the occaſion of litigious law-ſuits; and that a bill was offered, on the day of the parliament's reſignation, for rendering the revenues of the clergy more certain and equal, by reducing benefices of 200l. a year, and upwards, and advancing thoſe of a ſmaller income; and alſo for making a proviſion for the widows and children of miniſters; but that this equitable propoſal was refuſed a reading, and that therefore the charge againſt one part of the houſe, of an intent to deſtroy the miniſtry, was a groundleſs reproach, caſt upon thoſe who endeavoured only to take off oppreſſions and grievances.——— The truth of this gentleman's aſſertion ſeems the leſs liable to be controverted, becauſe it is an inconteſtable fact, though generally paſſed over by the hiſtorians of thoſe times, "That the long parliament, when they aboliſhed epiſcopacy, and ſold the temporal revenues of the biſhops, deans and chapters, &c. made an expreſs reſerve of all their impropriations, which were to be applied to the increaſe of the revenues of the parochial clergy, and heads of colleges; and the ſame reſerve of impropriations was made in the act paſſed by this convention, for enabling delinquents to compound for their eſtates, The journals alſo abound with inſtances, wherein theſe gentlemen, who had the misfortune to be under ſequeſtration for their loyalty to the king, were obliged to endow the reſpective vicarages of which they were impropriators, with a portion of the tythe, and the value of ſuch portion, upon the calculation of years, was allowed in part of payment of their compoſitions?"

[d] This act well deſerves notice, of which the moſt material clauſes were theſe:

"That all perſons in England or Ireland, intending to be married, ſhould, twenty-one days at leaſt before, deliver in writing to the regiſter appointed by this act for the pariſh where each party to be married live, with their names, ſirnames, additions, and places of abode; and of their parents, guardians, or overſeers: all which the ſaid regiſter ſhall publiſh three ſeveral lord's days then next following, at the cloſe of the morning exerciſe, in the church or chapel; or, if the parties to be married deſired it, in the market place next adjoining thereto, on three market days, in three ſeveral weeks next following, between the hours of eleven and two; which being done, the regiſter ſhall, upon requeſt of the parties concerned, make a certificate of the due performance thereof, without which ſuch marriage ſhall not proceed: And if any exception be made thereto, the regiſter ſhall inſert the ſame, with the name of the perſon making ſuch exception, and their place of abode, in the certificate of publication.

All perſons intending to be married, ſhall come before ſome juſtice of the peace of the ſame county, city, or town corporate, where publication hath been made, and bring a certificate thereof, with proof of the conſent of their parents or guardians, if either of the parties be under the age of twenty-one years: And the juſtice ſhall examine, upon oath concerning the truth of the certificate, and due performance of all the premiſſes, and of any exception ariſing; and, if there be no reaſonable cauſe to the contrary, the marriage ſhall proceed, in this manner:

The man taking the woman by the hand ſhall diſtinctly pronounce theſe words, "I A. B. do here in the preſence of God, the ſearcher of all hearts, take thee C. D, for my wedded wife; and do alſo in the preſence of God, and before theſe witneſſes, promiſe to be unto thee a loving and faithful huſband."

And then the woman, taking the man by the hand, ſhall alſo diſtinctly pronounce theſe words, "I C. D. do here in the preſence of God, the ſearcher of all hearts, take thee A. B. for my wedded huſband; and do alſo in the preſence of God, and before theſe witneſſes, promiſe to be unto thee a loving, faithful, and obedient wife."

The man and woman having made ſufficient proof of the conſent of their parents or guardians, and expreſſed their conſent to marriage, in the manner and words aforeſaid, before ſuch juſtice of peace, in the preſence of two or more credible witneſſes, he ſhall declare them to be from henceforward huſband and wife; and, after ſuch conſent ſo expreſſed, and ſuch declaration made, the ſame ſhall be good and effectual in law; and no other form or marriage ſhall be accounted valid according to the laws of England: But the juſtice of peace, in caſe of dumb perſons, may diſpenſe with pronouncing the words aforeſaid; and with joining hands, in caſe of perſons that have no hands.

A book of vellum or parchment ſhall be provided for the regiſtering of all ſuch marriages and of all births of children, and burials of all ſorts of people, within every pariſh; for the ſame keeping of which, the inhabitants and houſholders chargeable to the poor, ſhall make choice of ſome able and honeſt perſon, to be approved by one juſtice of the peace of the county, and ſo ſignified under his hand in the ſaid regiſter-book, to have the keeping thereof, who ſhall therein enter all ſuch publications, marriages, births of children, and burials of all ſorts of perſons, and the names of every of them, and the days of the month and year thereof, and the parents, guardians, or overſeers names: And for ſuch publication and certificate, the regiſter ſhall be paid 1s. alſo 1s. for the entry of every marriage; for every birth of a child 4d. and for every death 4d. But for publications, marriages, births, or burials, of poor people who live upon alms, nothing ſhall be taken. And the juſtice of peace, if deſired, ſhall give a certificate on parchment under his hand and ſeal, of ſuch marriage, and of the day of the ſolemnization thereof, and of two or more of the witneſſes then preſent, for which his clerk to receive 1s. And if ſuch certificate ſhall be produced to the clerk of the peace for that county, and requeſt made to him to make an entry thereof, he ſhall enter the ſame in a book of parchment to be provided for that purpoſe, and kept amongſt the records of the ſaid ſeſſions, for which he may receive 4d.

If any perſon ſhall, by violence or fraud, ſteal or take away any one, under the age of 21 years, or cauſe ſo to be done, with intent of marriage, he ſhall forfeit his whole eſtate, real and perſonal; one half to the common-wealth, and the other to the party ſo taken away; and further ſuffer cloſe impriſonment, and be kept to hard labour in ſome houſe of correction during life; and every perſon convicted of aiding or abetting any ſuch violence or fraud, ſhall be impriſoned and kept to hard labour for the ſpace of ſeven years: and any pretended marriage obtained by ſuch violence and fraud, ſhall be null and void.

Where any guardian ſhall betray his truſt touching any child, or ſeducing, ſelling, or otherwiſe wilfully putting ſuch child into the hands or power of any perſon to marry ſuch child, without his or her free conſent, ſuch guardian ſhall forfeit double the value of ſuch child's portion, one moiety thereof to the common-wealth, and the other to the child ſo married.

The age of a man to conſent unto marriage ſhall be 16 years, and the age of a woman 14.

Controverſies touching contracts and marriages to be determined at the general quarter ſeſſions of the peace."

The following remarkable clauſe was propoſed but rejected, "That if any perſon then married, or to be married according to this act, ſhould make proof by one or more credible witneſs upon oath, that either the huſband or wife had committed the deteſtable ſin of adultery during ſuch marriage, then the ſaid parties might be divorced by the ſentence of three juſtices of the peace."

viſion for their pay. They alledged, that though they had voted them a ſum of money, yet having reſolved to raiſe it by way of a pound rate, it would take up ſo much time to bring it in, that the army muſt either ſtarve by want, or oppreſs the country by free-quarter. A ſecond ground of their invectives was taken from a motion made, that the great officers of the army ſhould ſerve without pay for one year. They accuſed them alſo of endeavouring to deſtroy the clergy, the law, and the property of the ſubject; inſtancing in their denying a right of preſentation to the patrons of eccleſiaſtical benefices: and, in general, that they had not a frame of ſpirit to do juſtice, which they would have made out by their not relieving ſir John Stawell, when he made his application to them. Thus they endeavoured to cajole the clergy, lawyers, cavaliers, and all intereſts, except that which they ſhould have had moſt regard to.

They thought to have prevented any debate about their deſign, by meeting ſo early in the morning; but they were deceived, and enough found in the houſe to anſwer their objections. To that concerning the army it was ſaid, That the pound-rate was found to be the more equal way of raiſing money, and therefore reſolved upon by them; not at all doubting, that it would come in ſoon enough for the ſoldiers ſupply: that they thought it reaſonable and juſt, that the great officers of the army, who were poſſeſſed of plentiful eſtates, and had received all their arrears, ſhould abate ſomewhat of their ſuperfluities, and ſerve for a little time freely, as well as thoſe who were employed in civil affairs, whoſe labour and hazard was as great, and both equally concerned in the public good; eſpecially conſidering how much this conduct would contribute to the eaſe and ſatisfaction of the people, who could not be ignorant that there were now no preſſing occaſions of charge or danger, the enemy being every where entirely ſubdued. To what had been done in order to a reformation of the law and clergy, it was anſwered, That as they conceived there was great need of it, ſo they had been told that they were called together principally for that end; and that if they had done any thing too much therein, the gentlemen who blamed them for it were very unfit ſo to do, having themſelves been the men that preſſed them continually to go much farther than they had done. To the objection concerning preſentations, they ſaid, that the method uſed therein ſeemed to them too unreaſonable to be continued; it being, in effect, to give a power to the greateſt of the pariſh, who were not always the beſt, to preſcribe what religion they pleaſed to the pariſhioners, by preſenting a perſon, howſoever unfit for that office, to be their miniſter. Laſtly, in anſwer to the charge of denying relief to ſir John Stawell, it was anſwered, that the conſideration of that matter was before them, and that they would not have failed to act as his caſe deſerved."

To this account, the authors of the Parliamentary Hiſtory add the following particulars, collected from three different members, who are ſaid to be preſent at the diſſolution.

As ſoon as the ſpeaker had taken the chair, a member ſtood up, and ſpoke to this effect: "That he muſt diſburden himſelf of ſome things that had a long time laid upon his heart: that he was now to ſpeak to the Eſſe, or Being, rather than the Bene Eſſe, or well-being, of the common-wealth; which was ready to ſink, through the ill-management of the authority intruſted to that aſſembly; and that, for his own part, he muſt reſign his power from whence he had it; foreſeeing clearly, that their waitings and expectations of ever coming on to things of public good, were more and more diſappointed: [He then inſtanced the particulars touching the army, the clergy, the law, &c. as before recited.] And that for theſe conſiderations, he could not ſatisfy himſelf to ſit any longer in the houſe, and ſo be guilty of bringing confuſion and deſolation upon the nation: but if any would yet be ſo hardy as to continue there, he would ſay unto them in the words of the prophet, 'Ephraim hath joined himſelf to idols; let him alone.'

"This motion being ſeconded by two more, with ſome bitter invectives, another member ſtood up; (and declaring himſelf to ſpeak with much diſadvantage, in that he had not as the other gentlemen, any premeditated thing to ſay) told the ſpeaker, 'He had in his hand an expedient in reference to the things comprehended in the vote of the 10th of December, concerning tythes, which he hoped would ſatisfy all; and that the committee for regulating the law had ready to be offered to the houſe, ſeveral bills of very great concernment to the good and eaſe of the people; proteſting before God, angels, and men, his diſſatisfaction to the propoſed reſignation, as being deſtructive to the common-wealth.' Some gentlemen ſtanding up to ſecond him, were not ſuffered to ſpeak. Others continued to preſs the former motion, inſiſting, 'That it was not now a time to debate; whereupon the ſpeaker, though earneſtly called on to keep the chair, left it; and the ſerjeant, as if he had been of his council, took up the mace, and carried it before him, though much urged to the contrary. Theſe were inſtantly joined by the chief clerk, and followed by about 80 members, who went directly to Whitehall, and there ſubſcribed a reſignation of their power to the lord-general. Thirty odd ſtaid in the houſe till colonel Goffe and major White came in, and entreated them earneſtly to go out. To which it was as earneſtly replied, That at their perſonal requeſt they could not, nor would not, withdraw unleſs compelled by force. Whereupon the officers calling in a file of muſqueteers, the members withdrew; and ſome of theſe went three or four days after, and ſubſcribed the the inſtrument of reſignation.

When this inſtrument, ſo ſigned, was brought to Cromwell, he lifted up his eyes with aſtoniſhment; and, with no leſs ſeeming modeſty, refuſed to receive it; but, at length, through the importunity of major general Lambert and others, repreſenting to him that the welfare of the nation abſolutely required the acceptance of the parliament's reſignation, he thought fit to comply with their requeſt—Though it is the concurrent opinion of all contemporary writers, that Cromwell's refuſal to accept of this offer of the legiſlative power was meer hypocriſy, and that this formal ſurrender of it was a contrivance of his own, in order to pave the way to the protectorate; yet in a ſpeech made to the enſuing parliament, Sept. 12, 1654, he poſitively affirms, in the moſt ſolemn manner, "That he was ſo far from having any hand in this project, that he was an abſolute ſtranger to the deſign, till the ſpeaker, with the major part of the houſe, came to him with the inſtrument of their reſignation."

That Cromwell might not know of the reſignation, may poſſibly be true, but that he had reſolved the diſſolution of this aſſembly is very certain, from his producing, four days after, a plan of government, the forming of which muſt have taken up a much longer time.

After this account of the convention of 1653, the reader will be enabled to judge of the prejudice and partiality of the hiſtorians in their characters of the members, and their omiſſions of the more material proceedings.

Cromwell having accepted the reſignation of the ſupreme authority, it was reſolved in a council of the officers that he ſhould be choſen lord protector of the three nations. Accordingly, on the 16th of December, four days after the diſſolution, his inauguration was performed with great ſolemnity, during which, the following plan of government was read and ſworn to by him.

The GOVERNMENT of the COMMON-WEALTH of England Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging.

I. THAT the ſupreme legiſlative authority of the common-wealth of England, Scotland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, ſhall be and reſide in one perſon, and the people aſſembled in parliament; the ſtyle of which perſon ſhall be, "The Lord Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland."

II. That the exerciſe of the chief magiſtracy, and the adminiſtration of the government over the ſaid countries and dominions, and the people thereof, ſhall be in the lord protector, aſſiſted with a council, the number whereof ſhall not exceed 21, nor be leſs than 13.

III. That all writs, proceſs, commiſſions, patents, grants, and other things, which now run in the name and ſtyle of "The Keepers of the liberty of England by Authority of Parliament," ſhall run in the name and ſtyle of "The Lord Protector;" from whom for the future, ſhall be derived all honours and magiſtracy in theſe three nations; and have the power of pardons (except in caſe of murders and treaſon) and benefit of all forfeitures for the public uſe; and ſhall govern the ſaid countries and dominions in all things by the advice of the council, and according to theſe preſents and the laws.

IV. That the lord protector, the parliament ſitting, ſhall diſpoſe and order the militia and forces, both by ſea and land, for the peace and good of the three nations, by conſent of parliament, and that the lord protector, with the advice and conſent of the major part of the council, ſhall diſpoſe and order the militia for the ends aforeſaid in the intervals of parliament.

V. That the lord protector, by the advice aforeſaid, ſhall direct in all things concerning the keeping and holding of a good correſpondency with foreign kings, princes, and ſtates; and alſo, with the conſent of the major part of the council, have the power of peace and war.

VI. That the laws ſhall not be altered, ſuſpended, abrogated, or repealed, nor any new law made, nor any tax, charge, or impoſition laid upon the people, but by common conſent in parliament, ſave only as is expreſſed in the 30th article.

VII. That there ſhall be a parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter upon the third day of September, 1654, and that ſucceſſively a parliament ſhall be ſummoned once in every third year, to be accounted from the diſſolution of the preſent parliament.

VIII. That neither the parliament to be next ſummoned, nor any ſucceſſive parliaments, ſhall, during the time of five months, to be accounted from the day of their firſt meeting, be adjourned, prorogued, or diſſolved, without their own conſent.

IX. That as well the next as all other ſucceſſive parliaments, ſhall be ſummoned and elected in manner hereafter expreſſed; that is to ſay, the perſons to be choſen within England, Wales, the iſles of Jerſey, Guernſey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, to ſit and ſerve in parliament, ſhall be, and not exceed, the number of 400. The perſons to be choſen within Scotland, to ſit and ſerve in parliament, ſhall be and not exceed, the number of 30: And the perſons to be choſen to ſit in parliament for Ireland, ſhall be, and not exceed the number of 30.

X. That the perſons to be elected, to ſit in parliament from time to time, for the ſeveral counties of England, Wales, the iſles of Jerſey and Guernſey, and the towns of Berwick upon Tweed, and all places within the ſame reſpectively, ſhall be according to the proportions and numbers hereafter expreſſed: That is to ſay,

The diſtribution of the perſons to be choſen for Scotland and Ireland, and the ſeveral counties, cities, and places therein, ſhall be according to ſuch proportions and number as ſhall be agreed upon and declared by the lord protector and the major part of the council, before the ſending forth writs of ſummons for the next parliament.

XI. That the ſummons to parliament ſhall be by writ under the great ſeal of England, directed to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral and reſpective counties, with ſuch alteration as may ſuit with the preſent government, to be made by the lord protector and his council, which the chancellor, keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal, ſhall ſeal, iſſue, and ſend abroad by warrant from the lord protector. If the lord protector ſhall not give warrant for iſſuing of writs of ſummons for the next parliament, before the firſt of June, 1654, or for the triennial parliaments, before the firſt day of Auguſt in every third year, to be accounted as aforeſaid; that then the chancellor, keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal for the time being, ſhall, without any warrant or direction, within ſeven days after the firſt day of June, 1654, ſeal, iſſue, and ſend abroad, writs of ſummons (changing therein what is to be changed as aforeſaid) to the ſeveral and reſpective ſheriffs of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for ſummoning the parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, the third day of September next; and ſhall likewiſe, within ſeven days after the ſaid firſt day of Auguſt, in every third year, to be accounted from the diſſolution of the precedent parliament, ſeal, iſſue, and ſend abroad, ſeveral writs of ſummons (changing therein what is to be changed) as aforeſaid, for ſummoning the parliament to meet at Weſtminſter the ſixth of November, in that third year. That the ſaid ſeveral and reſpective ſheriffs ſhall, within ten days after the receipt of ſuch writ as aforeſaid, cauſe the ſame to be proclaimed and publiſhed in every market town within his county, upon the market days thereof, between twelve and three of the clock; and ſhall then alſo publiſh and declare the certain day of the week and month, for chuſing members to ſerve in parliament for the body of the ſaid county, according to the tenor of the ſaid writ, which ſhall be upon Wedneſday five weeks after the date of the writ; and ſhall likewiſe declare the place where the election ſhall be made: for which purpoſe, he ſhall appoint the moſt convenient place for the whole county to meet in, and ſhall ſend precepts for elections to be made in all and every city, town, borough, or place within his county, where elections are to be made by virtue of theſe preſents, to the mayor, ſheriff, or other head officer of ſuch city, town, borough, or place, within three days after the receipt of ſuch writ and writs; which the ſaid mayors, ſheriffs, and officers reſpectively reſpectively are to make publication of, and of the certain day for ſuch elections to be made in the ſaid city, town or place aforeſaid, and to cauſe elections to be made accordingly.

XII. That at the day and place of elections, the ſheriff of each county, and the ſaid mayors, ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other head officers within their cities, towns, boroughs, and places reſpectively, ſhall take view of the ſaid elections, and ſhall make return into the chancery within twenty days after the ſaid elections, of the perſons elected by the greateſt number of electors, under their hands and ſeals, between him on the one part, and the electors on the other part; wherein ſhall be contained, That the perſons elected ſhall not have power to alter the government as it is hereby ſettled in one ſingle perſon and a parliament.

XIII. That the ſheriff, who ſhall wittingly and willingly make any falſe return, or neglect his duty, ſhall incur the penalty of 2000 marks, of lawful Engliſh money; the one moiety to the lord protector, and the other moiety to ſuch perſon as will ſue for the ſame.

XIV. That all and every perſon and perſons, who have aided, adviſed, aſſiſted, or abetted in any war againſt the parliament, ſince the firſt day of January, 1641, (unleſs they have been ſince in the ſervice of the parliament, and given ſignal teſtimony of their good affection thereunto) ſhall be diſabled and incapable to be elected, or to give any vote in the election of any members to ſerve in the next parliament, or in the three ſucceeding triennial parliaments.

XV. That all ſuch, who have adviſed, aſſiſted, or abetted the rebellion of Ireland, ſhall be diſabled and incapable for ever to be elected, or give any vote in the election of any member to ſerve in parliament; as alſo all ſuch who do or ſhall profeſs the Roman catholic religion.

XVI. That all votes and elections given or made contrary, or not according to, theſe qualifications, ſhall be null and void: and if any perſon, who is hereby made incapable, ſhall give his vote for election of members to ſerve in parliament, ſuch perſon ſhall loſe and forfeit one full year's value of his real eſtate, and one full third part of his perſonal eſtate; one moiety thereof to the lord protector, and the other moiety to him or them who ſhall ſue for the ſame.

XVII. That the perſons who ſhall be elected to ſerve in parliament, ſhall be ſuch (and no other than ſuch) as are perſons of known integrity, fearing God, and of good converſation, and being of the age of twenty-one years.

XVIII. That all and every perſon and perſons ſeized or poſſeſſed to his own uſe, of any real eſtate or perſonal, to the value of 200l. and not within the aforeſaid exceptions, ſhall be capable to elect members to ſerve in parliament for counties.

XIX. That the chancellor, keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal, ſhall be ſworn before they enter into their offices, truly and faithfully to iſſue forth and ſend abroad, writs of ſummons to parliament, at the times and in the manner before expreſſed: and in caſe of neglect or failure to iſſue and ſend abroad writs accordingly, he or they ſhall for every ſuch offence, be guilty of high treaſon, and ſhall ſuffer the pains and penalties thereof.

XX. That in caſe writs be not iſſued out, as is before expreſſed, but that there be a neglect therein, fifteen days after the time wherein the ſame ought to be iſſued out by the chancellor, keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal, that then the parliament ſhall, as often as ſuch failure ſhall happen, aſſemble and be held at Weſtminſter, in the uſual place, at the times prefixed, in manner and by the means hereafter expreſſed; that is to ſay, That the ſheriffs of the ſeveral and reſpective counties, ſheriffdoms, cities, boroughs, and places aforeſaid, within England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, the chancellor, maſters, and ſcholars of the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the mayor and bailiffs of the borough of Berwick upon Tweed, and other the places aforeſaid reſpectively, ſhall, at the ſeveral courts and places to be appointed as aforeſaid, within thirty days after the ſaid fifteen days, cauſe ſuch members to be choſen for their ſaid ſeveral and reſpective counties, ſheriffdoms, univerſities, cities, boroughs, and places aforeſaid, by ſuch perſons, and in ſuch manner, as if ſeveral and reſpective writs of ſummons to parliament under the great ſeal had iſſued and been awarded according to the tenor aforeſaid: that if the ſheriff, or other perſons authoriſed, ſhall neglect his or their duty herein, that all and every ſuch ſheriff and perſon authoriſed as aforeſaid, ſo neglecting his or their duty, ſhall, for every ſuch offence, be guilty of high-treaſon, and ſhall ſuffer the pains and penalties thereof.

XXI. That the clerk, called the clerk of the commonwealth in chancery for the time being, and all others, who ſhall afterwards execute that office, to whom the returns ſhall be made, ſhall for the next parliament, and the two ſucceeding triennial parliaments, the next day after ſuch return, certify the names of the ſeveral perſons ſo returned, and of the places for which he and they were choſen reſpectively, unto the council; who ſhall peruſe the ſaid returns, and examine whether the perſons ſo elected and returned be ſuch as is agreeable to the qualifications, and not diſabled to be elected: and that every perſon and perſons being ſo duly elected, and being approved of by the major part of the council, to be perſons not diſabled, but qualified as aforeſaid, ſhall be eſteemed a member of parliament, and be admitted to ſit in parliament, and not otherwiſe.

XXII. That the perſons ſo choſen and aſſembled in manner aforeſaid, or any ſixty of them, ſhall be, and be deemed the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and the ſupreme legiſlative power to be and reſide in the lord protector and ſuch parliament, in manner herein expreſſed.

XXIII. That the lord protector, with the advice of the major part of the council, ſhall at any other time than is before expreſſed, when the neceſſities of the ſtate ſhall require it, ſummon parliaments in manner before expreſſed, which ſhall not be adjourned, prorogued, or diſſolved without their own conſent, during the firſt three months of their ſitting. And in caſe of future war with any foreign ſtate, a parliament ſhall be forthwith ſummoned for their advice concerning the ſame.

XXIV. That all bills agreed unto by the parliament, ſhall be preſented to the lord protector for his conſent; and in caſe he ſhall not give his conſent thereto, within twenty days after they ſhall be preſented to him, or give ſatisfaction to the parliament within the time limited; that then, upon declaration of the parliament that the lord protector hath not conſented, nor given ſatisfaction, ſuch bills ſhall paſs into, and become laws, although he ſhall not give his conſent thereunto; provided ſuch bills contain nothing in them contrary to the matters contained in theſe preſents.

XXV. That Henry Lawrence, eſq. &c. [whoſe names are before-mentioned p. 1052.] or any ſeven of them, ſhall be a council for the purpoſes expreſſed in this writing; and upon the death or other removal of any of them, the parliament ſhall nominate ſix perſons of ability, integrity, and fearing God, for every one that is dead or removed; out of which the major part of the council ſhall elect two, and preſent them to the lord protector, of which he ſhall elect one: and, in caſe the parliament ſhall not nominate within twenty days after notice given unto them thereof, the major part of the council ſhall nominate three as aforeſaid to the lord protector, who out of them ſhall ſupply the vacancy; and until this choice be made, the remaining part of the council ſhall execute as fully in all things, as if their number were full. And in caſe of corruption, or other miſcarriage in any of the council in their truſt, the parliament ſhall appoint ſeven of their number, and the council ſix, who, together with the lord chancellor, lord keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal for the time being, ſhall have power to hear and determine ſuch corruption and miſcarriage, and to award and inflict puniſhment, as the nature of the offence ſhall deſerve; which puniſhment ſhall not be pardoned or remitted by the lord protector: and, in the interval of parliaments, the major part of the council, with the conſent of the lord protector, may, for corruption, or other miſcarriage as aforeſaid, ſuſpend any of their number from the exerciſe of their truſt, if they ſhall find it juſt, until the matter ſhall be heard and examined as aforeſaid.

XXVI. That the lord protector, and the major part of the council aforeſaid, may, at any time before the meeting of the next parliament, add to the council ſuch perſons as they ſhall think fit; provided the number of the council be not made thereby to exceed twenty-one, and the quorum to be proportioned accordingly by the lord protector and the major part of the council.

XXVII. That a conſtant yearly revenue ſhall be raiſed, ſettled, and eſtabliſhed for maintaining of 10,000 horſe and dragoons, and 20,000 foot, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the defence and ſecurity thereof, and alſo for a convenient number of ſhips for guarding the ſeas, beſides 200,000l. per ann. for defraying the other neceſſary charges of adminiſtration of juſtice, and other expences of the government; which revenue ſhall be raiſed by the cuſtoms, and ſuch other ways and means as ſhall be agreed upon by the lord protector and his council, and ſhall not be taken away or diminiſhed, nor the way agreed upon for raiſing the ſame altered, but by the conſent of the lord protector, and the parliament.

XXVIII. That

XXVIII. That the ſaid yearly revenue ſhall be paid into the public treaſury, and ſhall be iſſued out for the uſes aforeſaid.

XXIX That in caſe there ſhall not be cauſe hereafter to keep up ſo great a defence both at land or ſea, but that there be an abatement made thereof, the money which will be ſaved thereby, ſhall remain in bank for the public ſervice, and not be employed to any other uſe but by conſent of parliament, by the lord protector, and major part of the council.

XXX. That the raiſing of money for defraying the charge of the preſent extraordinary forces, both at ſea and land, in reſpect to the preſent wars, ſhall be by conſent of parliament, and not otherwiſe: ſave only that the lord protector, with the conſent of the major part of the council, for preventing the diſorders and dangers which might otherwiſe fall out both by ſea or land, ſhall have power, until the meeting of the firſt parliament, to raiſe money for the purpoſes aforeſaid; and alſo to make laws and ordinances for the peace and welfare of theſe nations, where it ſhall be neceſſary; which ſhall be binding and in force, until order ſhall be taken in parliament concerning the ſame.

XXXI. That the lands, tenements, rents, royalties, juriſdictions and hereditaments, which remain yet unſold, or undiſpoſed of, by act or ordinance of parliament, belonging to the common-wealth, (except the foreſts and chaſes, and the honours and manors belonging to the ſame; the lands of the rebels in Ireland, lying in the four counties of Dublin, Cork, Kildare, and Catherlaugh, in the late wars; and alſo the lands of papiſts and delinquents in England, who have not yet compounded) ſhall be veſted in the lord protector, to hold, to him and his ſucceſſor, lords protectors of theſe nations, and ſhall not be alienated but by conſent in parliament. And all debts, fines, iſſues, amerciaments, penalties and profits, certain and caſual, due to the keepers of the liberties of England by authority of parliament, ſhall be due to the lord protector, and be payable into his public receipt, and ſhall be recovered and proſecuted in his name.

XXXII. That the office of lord protector over theſe nations ſhall be elective and not hereditary; and upon the death of the lord protector, another fit perſon ſhall be forthwith elected to ſucceed him in the government; which election ſhall be by the council, who, immediately upon the death of the lord protector, ſhall aſſemble in the chamber where they uſually ſit in council; and having given notice to all their members of the cauſe of their aſſembling, ſhall, being thirteen at leaſt preſent, proceed to the election; and, before they depart the ſaid chamber, ſhall elect a fit perſon to ſucceed in the government, and forthwith cauſe proclamation thereof to be made in all the three nations as ſhall be requiſite: and the perſon that they, or the major part of them, ſhall elect as aforeſaid, ſhall be, and ſhall be taken to be, lord protector over theſe nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging. Provided that none of the children of the late king, nor any of his line or family, be elected to be lord protector or chief magiſtrate over theſe nations, or any the dominions thereto belonging. And until the aforeſaid election be paſt, the council ſhall take care of the government, and adminiſter in all things as fully as the lord protector, or the lord protector and council are enabled to do.

XXXIII. That Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of the forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland, ſhall be, and is hereby declared to be, lord protector of the common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, for his life.

XXXIV. That the chancellor, keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the treaſurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief-juſtices of both the benches, ſhall be choſen by the approbation of parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the approbation of the major part of the council, to be afterwards approved by the parliament.

XXXV. That the chriſtian religion, as contained in the Scriptures, be held forth and recommended as the public profeſſion of theſe nations; and that, as ſoon as may be, a proviſion, leſs ſubject to ſcruple and contention, and more certain than the preſent, be made for the encouragement and maintenance of able and painful teachers, for inſtructing the people, and for diſcovery and confutation of error, hereſy, and whatever is contrary to ſound doctrine: and that until ſuch proviſion be made, the preſent maintenance ſhall not be taken away nor impeached.

XXXVI. That to the public profeſſion held forth none ſhall be compelled by penalties or otherwiſe; but that endeavours be uſed to win them by ſound doctrine, and the example of a good converſation.

XXXVII. That ſuch as profeſs faith in God by Jeſus Chriſt, (though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worſhip, or diſcipline publicly held forth) ſhall not be reſtrained from, but ſhall be protected in, the profeſſion of the faith, and exerciſe of their religion; ſo as they abuſe not this liberty to the civil injury of others, and to the actual diſturbance of the public peace on their parts: provided this liberty be not extended to popery nor prelacy, nor to ſuch as, under the profeſſion of Chriſt, hold forth and practiſe licentiouſneſs.

XXXVIII. That all laws, ſtatutes, and ordinances, and clauſes in any law, ſtatute, or ordinance to the contrary of the aforeſaid liberty, ſhall be eſteemed as null and void.

XXXIX. That the acts and ordinances of parliament, made for the ſale or other diſpoſition of the lands, rents, and hereditaments of the late king, queen, and prince, of archbiſhops and biſhops, &c. deans and chapters, the lands of delinquents, and foreſt lands, or any of them, or of any other lands, tenements, rents, and hereditaments belonging to the common-wealth, ſhall nowiſe be impeached or made invalid, but ſhall remain good and firm; and that the ſecurities given by act and ordinance of parliament for any ſum or ſums of money, by any of the ſaid lands, the exciſe, or by any other public revenue; and alſo the ſecurities given by the public faith of the nation, and the engagement of the public faith for ſatisfaction of debts and damages, ſhall remain firm and good, and not be made void and invalid upon any pretence whatſoever.

XL. That the articles given to, or made with, the enemy, and afterwards confirmed by parliament, ſhall be performed and made good to the perſons concerned therein: and that ſuch appeals as were depending in the laſt parliament, for relief concerning bills of ſale of delinquents eſtates, may be heard and determined the next parliament, any thing in this writing, or otherwiſe, to the contrary notwithſtanding.

XLI. That every ſucceſſive lord protector over theſe nations, ſhall take and ſubſcribe a ſolemn oath, in the preſence of the council, and ſuch others as they ſhall call to them, that he will ſeek the peace, quiet, and welfare of theſe nations, cauſe law and juſtice to be equally adminiſtered; and that he will not violate or infringe the matters and things contained in this writing; and, in all other things, will, to his power, and to the beſt of his underſtanding, govern theſe nations, according to the laws, ſtatutes, and cuſtoms thereof.

XLII. That each perſon of the council ſhall, before they enter upon their truſt, take and ſubſcribe an oath, that they will be true and faithful in their truſt, according to the beſt of their knowledge; and that in the election of every ſucceſſive lord protector, they ſhall proceed therein impartially, and do nothing therein for any promiſe, fear, favour, or reward.

The oath was in theſe words:

"WHEREAS the major part of the laſt parliament (judging that their ſitting any longer, as then conſtituted, would not be for the good of the common-wealth) did diſſolve the ſame; and, by a writing under their hands, dated the 12th day of this inſtant December, reſigned unto me their powers and authorities; and whereas it was neceſſary thereupon, that ſome ſpeedy courſe ſhould be taken for the ſettlement of theſe nations upon ſuch a baſis and foundation as, by the bleſſing of God, might be laſting, ſecure property, and anſwer thoſe great ends of religion and liberty, ſo long contended for; And, upon full and mature conſideration had of the form of government hereunto annexed, being ſatisfied that the ſame, through the divine aſſiſtance, may anſwer the ends aforementioned; and having alſo been deſired, and adviſed, as well by ſeveral perſons of intereſt and fidelity in this common-wealth, as the officers of the army, to take upon me the protection and government of theſe nations in the manner expreſſed in the ſaid form of government, I have accepted thereof, and do hereby declare my acceptance accordingly; and I do promiſe, in the preſence of God, that I will not violate or infringe the matters and things contained therein; but, to my power, obſerve the ſame, and cauſe them to be obſerved; and ſhall, in all other things, to the beſt of my underſtanding, govern theſe nations according to the laws, ſtatutes, and cuſtoms thereof: ſeeking their peace, and cauſing juſtice and law to be equally adminiſtered."

to

O. CROMWELL.

To this oath was ſubjoined the following memorandum:

"Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this common-wealth, and now declared lord protector thereof, did, this 16th day of December, 1653, ſign this writing, and ſolemnly promiſe, as is therein contained, in preſence of the lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal of England, who adminiſtered the ſame oath, and of the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London, divers of the judges of the land, the officers of ſtate and army, and many other perſons of quality."

It is obſervable that when Cromwell's firſt parliament was ſummoned upon this new model, inſtead of 30, there were (as appears by the liſt) but 21 members choſen for Scotland. Of the other nine, only five are accounted for by Whitelock, who ſays, that five ſheriffdoms returned, "that not one fit to be a parliament-man was to be found within their liberties."

All the thirty were returned for Ireland.

Great alterations were made in this plan by Cromwell's ſecond parliament, in an inſtrument which was paſſed under the title of The HUMBLE PETITION AND ADVICE, which the reader may ſee in Whitelock's Memorials.

THE

PUBLIC LAW OF EUROPE:

OR,

An Hiſtorical Abridgment of the Treaties on which are founded the Rights and Pretenſions of the ſeveral Princes and States in EUROPE.

PART I.

From the Treaty of MUNSTER in 1648, to the Peace of RYSWICK, 1697.

CHAP. I.

The TREATIES of WESTPHALIA [a] and the PYRENNES [b].

WHEN the doctrines of Luther had prevailed in Germany, it was eaſy to foreſee that the intolerant zeal of the catholics, and their cruel uſage of the proteſtants, would diſturb the peace of the empire. The proteſtants, tired with making fruitleſs complaints, as ſoon as they could form an army, entered into a confederacy called, from the place of congreſs, the League of Smalcald; but their arms were not crowned with ſucceſs [c]. The battle of Mulberg, (in 1547) and the captivity of John Frederic, elector of Saxony, and of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, would have entirely demoliſhed the proteſtants, if the bravery of prince Maurice of Saxony (couſin to the elector) had not revived their hopes, and France raiſed up enemies to the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe ruin ſhe ſought. The calamities that were felt, and the dread of thoſe that were approaching, made both parties relax. The PUBLIC PEACE, or treaty of Paſſau was ſigned the 2d of Auguſt 1552, and, three years after, the PEACE of RELIGION was concluded at Auſburg. By theſe treaties the Lutheran religion, and liberty of conſcience, were eſtabliſhed in Germany. The catholics believed they had loſt too much, and the proteſtants imagined they had not gained enough, or at leaſt did not think their rights ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. Suſpicions bred animoſities, and in this ſtate of things, it was hardly poſſible that the conventions of Paſſau and Auſburg ſhould be regarded, eſpecially as the houſe of Auſtria, catholic both by policy and principle, blew up the coals of the civil diſſentions. Charles V. formed the ambitious project of enſlaving the empire, and to that end endeavoured to weaken the princes of the Germanic body (whoſe forces were formidable to him) by arming them one againſt another. His ſucceſſors, after his example, always conſidered the troubles of Germany as favourable to their views, but, leſs able to practice the ſame policy, they did not draw from thence the ſame advantages.

Ferdinand II. ſaw Bohemia in arms againſt him, and the proteſtants of the empire, by ſupporting the revolt of that kingdom, put the catholics upon taking up arms in defence of the emperor. Ferdinand, aided by the moſt conſiderable forces of the Germanic body, utterly demoliſhed the party of Frederic V, elector Palatine, whom the Bohemians had placed on their throne. The triumph of religion was not the principal, or at leaſt the ſole, object of Ferdinand, and in his proſperity he did not forget the intereſts of his crown. He artfully availed himſelf of the indiſcreet zeal of the catholics, who thought all things lawful either to deſtroy the proteſtants or to retain their ſpoils, and by means of the animoſities which divided the empire, he began to exerciſe an arbitrary power.

Germany was ready to ſink, and the loſs of her liberty would have made it eaſy for the houſe of Auſtria to accompliſh their projects; when Guſtavus Adolphus, who had lately concluded a ſix years truce with Poland, perceived at once how much it behoved him to gain an eſtabliſhment in the empire, in order to be more reſpected in Europe, and how favourable to him the preſent circumſtances were. This prince, born with the qualities, ſeldom united, of a great king and a hero, had an army worthy of him. Cardinal Richlieu, who looked upon him as a fit inſtrument to humble the houſe of Auſtria, promiſed him ſubſidies, and enflamed his hopes by flattering his ambition [d]. The proteſtant princes of Germany at the ſame time addreſſed to him their complaints: The yoke they were under, began to be too heavy to be thrown off without a foreign aid, and in their invitation they promiſed to join their forces with his. Guſtavus therefore entered the territories of the empire, declaring himſelf the protector of Germany, and the avenger of its laws. He landed the 24th of June, 1630, in the iſle of Rugen, where he began the firſt hoſtilities, and five days after he paſſed into the iſland of Uſedom.

This war is one of the moſt famous in Europe, more particularly for the number of illuſtrious generals, Guſtavus, Weimart, Horn, Bannier, Tortenſon, Maximillian of Bavaria, Tilly, Walſtein; Piccolomini, Merci, Guebriant, Condé, Turenne, &c. But what made it ſtill more memorable, was, that almoſt all Europe took part in it; that it ſet bounds, at leaſt for a time, to the power of the Auſtrian princes; and that the peace which ended it, altered the intereſts of all Chriſtendom, and has ſerved for foundation to all the ſubſequent treaties [e].

Cardinal Richlieu perhaps would have prevented a general war, if, inſtead of only paying ſubſidies to Sweden, he had declared war againſt Ferdinand, when Guſtavus was ſpread-

[a] In the treaty of Weſtphalia, the proteſtant plenipotentaries aſſembled at Oſnabrug, and the catholic at Munſter, (both which places are in Weſtphalia) and therefore it is commonly called, The treaty of Munſter and Oſnabrug.

[b] The Pyrenean treaty is joined with thoſe of Munſter and Oſnabrug, as it may deemed part thereof. The kings of France and Spain were as yet too much incenſed againſt each other to ſubmit the deciſion of their quarrel to the Weſtphalian negotiations, and therefore continued the war twelve years longer. The king of France excluded the duke of Lorrain from the treaty of Munſter, as the king of Spain did Portugal, which laſt was deſerted by France at the treaty of the Pyrenees, contrary to the moſt ſolemn promiſes, and the duke of Lorrain was admitted upon hard terms, as will be ſeen in the articles relating to his dominions. This treaty likewiſe diſcovers the future deſigns of France, and the end that court has invariably purſued to this day.

[c] Smalcald is a city of Franconia, in the county of Hennenberg, under the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel. The emperor Charles V, reſolving to extinguiſh the Lutherans, aſſembled a diet at Spire, and, by a decree, dated the 13th of October, 1529, directed that they ſhould be proceeded againſt. Whereupon the Lutheran princes proteſted in favour of their religion, and ſo gained the name of proteſtants, and their religion was ſtiled the proteſtant faith. The next year they aſſembled at Smalcald, and entered into a defenſive league, which was concluded in 1530, and renewed in 1535 for ten years.

[d] Cardinal Richlieu, by his penſioners in the court of Sweden, gave Guſtavus Adolphus the firſt hint of taking advantage of the troubles of Germany, to enter there on pretence of religion. But Guſtavus would not come into the views of France, and attack the houſe of Auſtria alone, which France wanted to humble.

[e] It may be added, that by the ceſſion to France of three biſhopries and Alſatia, it began to deſtroy the balance of power in Europe.

Norlingen

ing terror in in the heart of Germany; or at leaſt if he had not deferred it, till the battle of Norlingen had ruined the affairs of the Swedes[f]. By this conduct, he would have preſcribed terms to the Spaniſh court, and the emperor been obliged to receive law from the conqueror: whereas Ferdinand, from the brink of ruin, having recovered a ſort of ſuperiority, it was become more difficult to force him to ſue for peace, and renounce the vaſt projects of his houſe.

The war continued with vigour, and for ſeveral years the contending powers were too much incenſed againſt each other to perceive how dearly they purchaſed the glory of conquering, or of ſhewing their fortitude in adverſity. It was in ſome meaſure againſt their wills that they ſigned at Hamburgh, the 25th of December, 1641, the preliminary articles of the peace. The conferences were to begin the 25th of March of the next year, but were put off to the 10th of July, 1644, and the peace, after five years negotiation, was not concluded till 1648.

The catholics held their aſſemblies at Munſter, and the proteſtants at Oſnabrug. Matters at firſt were treated with great ſlowneſs. The plenipotentiaries ſounded one another; and each feared that his adverſary would take advantage of his advances, and even of his readineſs to liſten to the firſt propoſitions. Hence aroſe numberleſs difficulties objected to the plaineſt overtures. However, the length of the Weſtphalian treaty muſt not be aſcribed to that cauſe alone. There was an immenſe chaos of oppoſite intereſts to be adjuſted; whole provinces were to be torn from the houſe of Auſtria; the laws and liberties of the oppreſſed empire were to be reſtored; and the proteſtants to be enriched with the ſpoils of the catholic eccleſiaſtics, in order to eſtabliſh a ſort of an equilibrium between them.

As long as the war left the court of Vienna the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs, the neceſſary conditions for confirming the public tranquility, ſeemed impracticable. Nay, the peace itſelf was no longer the prime object of the negotiators. The imperial miniſters thought only to diſunite France, Sweden, and the Germanic body. Spain, after their example, uſed all her endeavours to draw off the United Provinces from the alliance of France. Nothing was forgot of what the moſt refined politics could ſuggeſt, to breed ſuſpicions and fears. In ſhort, a general peace could not be expected. It is true, France and Sweden adhered faithfully to their engagments. Each of theſe powers perceived that the advantage of a ſeparate peace would be but tranſitory. What further contributed to their union, was, that the princes of the catholic league, ſenſible of the emperor's weakneſs, were withdrawing themſelves from him by degrees, in order to put themſelves under the ſecure protection of his enemies. But the United provinces, purſuant to their intereſt, took a contrary courſe; they detached themſelves from France, and ſigned a ſeparate peace with Spain the 30th of January, 1648. From thenceforward Spain thought herſelf ſo ſure of humbling France, that ſhe would not conſent to the ceſſions required of her.

The conduct of the United Provinces was complained of on all ſides: but their gratitude to France, on which the French miniſters too far relied, was not able to counterbalance their intereſts: the Spaniards granted all their demands; they had nothing to hope from the continuation of the war, and, after all, an unlucky turn might deprive them of the advantage they had gained. Beſides, France was now become formidable to the States-general. They dreaded her ſucceſſes and neighbourhood, and began to perceive that Spain was no longer that power which had made all around her tremble under the reigns of Charles V, and his ſon.

The peace of the empire with France and Sweden was ſigned the 28th of October, 1648, and in conſequence of the convention of Nuremberg, the 30th of July, 1650, Octavius Piccolomini, and Charles Guſtavus, prince Palatine, generals of the imperial armies, were charged with ſeeing all the articles punctually executed.

It was to be feared that the war, which was going to continue with greater warmth than ever, between France and Spain, would deſtroy the fruits of a five years negotiation, and kindle a ſecond flame over all Europe. To prevent this misfortune, the French plenipotentiaries required that the emperor and empire ſhould not interfere in the war with the king of Spain, though that prince, by virtue of the circle of Burgundy, was a member of the Germanic body, nor take up arms to adjuſt the diſputes concerning Lorrain. France omitted nothing to ſecure the execution of theſe important articles: ſhe procured by treaties of league and alliance (which were often renewed after the peace of the Pyrenees) the guaranty of the moſt powerful princes of the empire.

The inteſtine diviſions which began in 1648 to diſturb the minority of Lewis XIV, did not hinder the French from keeping the aſcendant they had gained over the Spaniards after the battle of Rocroy. If the court of Madrid ſaw their hopes vaniſh, which had made them ſo haughty at Munſter, France was no leſs weary of her triumphs[g]. A ſuſpenſion of arms was agreed upon, and ſigned at Paris the 7th of May, 1659. Cardinal Mazarin's haſte to put an end to hoſtilities on bare preliminaries, did not eſcape cenſure. Since the beginning of the war, the ſucceſſes of France had not yet been ſo great, and it was thought the concluſion of the peace would render them fruitleſs. Some, ignorant doubtleſs of the danger in driving an enemy to deſpair, were for cruſhing the Spaniards; others, more wiſe, wiſhed only that the peace had been treated ſword in hand, to render the negotiations more eaſy and ſhort. But the ſituation of affairs, and diſpoſition of the parties, did not require the ſame conduct as was uſed during the congreſs of Weſtphalia. Cardinal Mazarin and Don Lewis de Haro came to the frontiers of the two kingdoms, and, after twenty-four conferences, the peace was concluded the 7th of November, 1659, in the iſle of pheaſants in the river Bidaſſoa.

Mazarin has left in his letters a curious and circumſtantial account of this negotiation. Don Lewis de Haro had but little knowledge of the affairs of Europe, naturally weak, timorous, and irreſolute; he had no fixed and certain principle to guide him in his proceedings. Mazarin, on the contrary, had all the qualifications that can be deſired in a negotiation. With a thorough inſight into the affairs of Europe, he was perfectly acquainted with every thing relating to the reſpective intereſts of his maſter and the king of Spain. Theſe talents were needleſs in the Pyrenean conferences: he had ſcarce other difficulties to ſurmount but Don Lewis's irreſolution and vanity, both which he eaſily managed. Indeed, he could not prevail to have Portugal included in the treaty, nor Condé to be left out; but for theſe compliances, ample amends were made by other conceſſions.

FRANCE.

"The emperor and empire reſign to the king of France to be incorporated in his crown for ever, all their rights upon the cities and biſhopries of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and their dependencies, particularly Moyenvic, ſaving the right of metropolitan, which belongs to the archbiſhop of Treves."

"The emperor for himſelf and the houſe of Auſtria and the empire, reſign to France the city of Briſac, and the villages of Hoolſtat, Niederrimſing, Harten, and Acharren, which depend thereon, to be held in full ſovereignty, in the ſame manner as the Upper and Lower Alſatia, Suntgau, and the provincial prefecture of the ten imperial cities, namely, Haguenau, Calmer, Scletſtadt, Weiſemberg, Landau, Oberenheim, Roſheim, Munſter in the vale of St. Gregory, Keyſerberg, and Turingham, with their dependencies. All and every of theſe ſhall be incorporated for ever in the crown of France. But the moſt Chriſtian king ſhall be obliged in all thoſe places to maintain the catholic religion, and to baniſh thence all innovation brought in during the war. The emperor, empire, and archduke of Inſpruck, Ferdinand Charles, to diſcharge the ſubjects of thoſe places from all engagements and oaths of fidelity; and derogate and make void all decrees, conſtitutions, and particularly the article of the imperial capitulation, by which the alienation of the rights and poſſeſſions of the empire is prohibited[h]. In the next diet theſe alienations ſhall be raiſed anew, and if any pro[f] Norlingen is an imperial city in Swabia, famous for nothing but the defeat of the Swedes in 1644, and the victory of the Swedes and French over the Bavarians in 1645.

[g] One inducement to Spain to make peace with France, was, that Cromwell, after having been courted by both crowns, thought fit to make a treaty with the French againſt the Spaniards, having had an eye for ſome time on ſome conqueſt in America.

[h] As the emperors had endeavoured to encroach upon the rights and privileges of the electors, it was reſolved, upon the death of Maximilian, that before his grandſon Charles V. was admitted to the imperial dignity, certain articles of government, ſtiled "The imperial capitulation," ſhould be drawn up and ſworn to. This method has ever ſince been conſtantly followed. When the emperor is choſen, the electors lead him to the church, and place him upon the great altar, where the archbiſhop of Mentz gives him the capitulation to ſign, with a promiſe to confirm immediately after his coronation, all the liberties and privileges which the electors, and other princes and ſtates of the empire, before enjoy. Some of the principal articles of theſe capitulations are, the obſervance of the golden-bull: of the agreement at Auſburg in 1655; of the treaties of Munſter and Oſnabrug; and of ſeveral other articles, making in all 47, which run upon changing nothing

poſal be made hereafter in a diet, for the recovery of lands or rights of the empire, the preſent alienations ſhall not be included therein.

" All the fortifications of Benfield, Rhinau, Saverne, Hohenbar, and Neuburg on the Rhine, ſhall be demoliſhed, and no garriſon kept there. Saverne ſhall keep an exact neutrality, and give the king's troops a free paſſage as often as required."

It may be obſerved that, by the expreſſions uſed in this article, the empire meant only to ſooth the magiſtrates and inhabitants of Saverne, in the ceſſion of their city to France.

" The king of France ſhall have a perpetual right to garriſon Philipſburg, and ſhall have free paſſage for his troops thither through the empire. But the ſaid king ſhall only have the protection of the place; the property, profits, &c. remaining to the biſhop and chapter of Spire.

" The emperor and empire reſign to France all the rights of ſovereignty that do or may belong to them over Pignerol.

" France ſhall remain poſſeſſed of all Artois, except only the towns, bailiwics, and chaſtellanies of Ayre and St. Omer, with their dependencies: in Flanders, of Graveling, the forts Philip Sluice, Hannain-Bourburg, and St. Vinant in the county of Hainault, of Landrecy, Queſnoy: In the duchy of Lunenburg, of Thionville, Montmedy, Danvilliers, Ivoy, Chavancy, Chaſteau, and Marville, with all their appurtenances.

" La Baſſee and Berg St. Vinox, and the royal fort of Berg, which his moſt chriſtian majeſty has declared he will never conſent to part with, ſhall be exchanged for Marienberg and Philipville, and their dependencies: Avennes, with its appurtenances, ſhall be given to France, and the prince of Chimay ſhall be indemnified for his pretenſions by his catholic majeſty, who alſo engages to build no new fortreſs that may cut off or diſturb the communication of theſe places with France.

" The king of France ſhall remain poſſeſſed of all the countries on this ſide the Pyrences, and the king of Spain of thoſe on the other ſide of the mountains, which ſhall divide the two kingdoms.

" Spain renounces all right and pretenſions to whatever was yielded to France by the treaty of Munſter, and to the county of Terreſe."

This county was not reſigned to France till the 16th of December 1660, by a treaty concluded at Paris between Lewis XIV. and Ferdinand Charles, archduke of Inſpruck, and confirmed the 4th of June, 1663, by Sigiſmund Francis, archduke of Inſpruck.

" The king of France proteſts againſt all preſcription and lapſe of time, with regard to the kingdom of Navarre, and reſerves to himſelf a power to proſecute his right to the ſaid kingdom by an amicable way, and not by arms, as alſo all his other rights, which he conceives to belong to him or his predeceſſors.

All authors, who have writ of the law of nations, agree, that preſcription authoriſes rights the moſt doubtful in their origin; and what proves the wiſdom of this maxim, is, that it concerns every nation to adopt it. The difficulty is, to know how preſcription is acquired: It ſeems to be ſolely eſtabliſhed by the ſilence of the party aggrieved, when he has treated with the prince who poſſeſſes his property, or when his adverſary ſells, reſigns, or alienates it in any other manner. Silence in theſe caſes is equivalent to conſent. Had authors, who have treated of the rights and pretenſions of the powers of Europe, ſet out upon this maxim, they would not have endeavoured to realize the chimeras which the ſtates themſelves, in favour of whom they write, durſt not avow. To what purpoſe to talk now of the pretenſions of the empire on the eccleſiaſtical ſtate? of the rights of England on the crown of France? or thoſe of France on the provinces enjoyed by Charles the Great? Without inflaming the ambition and jealouſy of princes, there will be ſubjects of quarrels enough, and the public tranquility too often diſturbed. From this maxim of preſcription, it muſt be concluded that each prince rightfully poſſeſſes what has not by any act of proteſtation being claimed ſince the treaties of Weſtphalia.

" If any ſtate or prince whatſoever attacks the king of France, or the king of Spain, in what either now poſſeſſes or ſhall poſſeſs by virtue of this treaty, the other ſhall not any way aſſiſt the ſaid ſtate or prince, though otherwiſe his ally."

This is a wiſe and regular article, if the courts of Paris and Madrid meant only to tie up their hands for the future, that is to ſay, debar themſelves of the liberty of making any engagements reſpectively hurtful to them. But if, as ſome pretend, cardinal Mazarin and Don Lewis de Haro intended that this clauſe ſhould have a retroſpect to the treaties preceding the Pyrenean, nothing would be more irregular or contrary to the principles of ſincerity. For France and Spain would put themſelves under a neceſſity of breaking their preſent convention, or their former engagements with other powers. There are politicians who applaud this manner of treating, as leaving a ſtate free to take, on occaſion, the part moſt favourable to its intereſts. But, is it true that ſo pernicious an advantage may be drawn from thence? A prince who has entered into contrary engagements, is bound to fulfil the prior, becauſe the others are null and ought not to have been made. If the later conventions annul the more ancient, in vain do nations negotiate together. The faith of treaties vaniſhes, all is uncertain, and the law of nations are words without any meaning. The ſame inconveniences are alſo incurred, and all the bands of ſociety are broke, if a prince may renounce his engagements without the conſent of the party with whom he has made them.

" If any breach ſhould happen between the allies of the two kings of France and Spain, neither ſhall engage in the quarrel till endeavours have been uſed for an accommodation, which not ſucceeding, each king ſhall be free to ſupport his ally, without any breach of this treaty."

It is lawful without doubt to act in a hoſtile manner againſt ſtates who aſſiſt our enemies. This principle has in all times been carried into practice, and yet there has prevailed in Europe, ſince the beginning of this century, a new way of thinking on this ſubject. It is pretended, in ſome writings, that it is unlawful to attack a power, who, to perform his engagements, ſends aid to our enemies. It has been obſerved with aſtoniſhment, that ſtates, waging war againſt one another with warmth, have believed, or feigned to believe, that they were ſtill friends, becauſe they were only auxiliaries, and no formal declaration had preceded their hoſtility.

It would be eaſy to diſcover the cauſe of ſuch a change in the principles of the law of nations; but it ſhall only at preſent be examined, whether it is advantageous to ſocieties to agree that the aſſiſtance, they give their allies, ſhall not alter the friendſhip and good correſpondence which ought to reign among them.

The plenipotentiaries who firſt deviſed this clauſe, had doubtleſs no other end than to ſtrengthen the peace, and prevent the war between two ſtates from ſpreading its ravages and becoming general; but it may be affirmed, that they were miſtaken in their views. In the firſt place, peace is not thereby more firmly eſtabliſhed; for it is not declarations but hoſtilities that create a ſtate of war between two nations. In the next place, ſo far are the calamities of war from being the leſs extended by it, that, on the contrary, they are rather increaſed. A prince who would not venture to concern himſelf in the quarrels of his neighbours, will take part in the war, when he can do it without making an enemy. The aid he ſhall give will increaſe the flame, which otherwiſe might poſſibly be more eaſily extinguiſhed.

'Twill be to no purpoſe to agree by treaties, that the allies of the two contending powers ſhall not be deemed enemies; a prince will always behold with an evil eye, a nation that contributes to his damage, and will ſeize the firſt opportunity to be revenged. It is next to impoſſible for the paſſions, when put in a fermentation, not to proceed at laſt to an open rupture.

SWEDEN.

" The emperor and empire reſign to Sweden, as perpetual and immediate fiefs of the empire, the higher Pomerania, (commonly called Vor-Pomeren) with the iſland of Rugen, and in the farther Pomerania the towns of Stetin, Garts, Dam, Golnau, and the iſle of Vollin, with the ſovereignty of the river Oder, and the arm of the ſea called Friſchaft; alſo the three mouths of the Peine, the Swine, and the Diewenou, with the lands on both ſides, from the bounds of the royal territory to the Baltic ſea.

" The elector of Brandenburg ſhall poſſeſs the farther Pomerania and biſhopric of Camin."

There were ſome diſputes afterwards between the courts of Sweden and Berlin concerning the limits. But all difficulties in matters of religion; and hinder him from aboliſhing laws, declaring war, impoſing taxes, making peace or alliances, building fortreſſes, or doing any thing that relates to the good of the empire, without the conſent of the ſtates of the empire, and advice of the electors and other princes thereof. Theſe capitulations are like our " Petition of Right, and Coronation-Oaths."

Great

were removed by the treaty of Stetin, in May 1663. By virtue of that treaty the king of Sweden ſhared with the elector the revenue of the tolls payable in all the ports and harbours in Farther Pomerania. It would be needleſs to ſay any thing more of the treaty of Stetin, the diſpoſitions of it were altered by that of St. Germain-en-Laye and Stockholm, as will be ſeen hereafter in the peace of Nimeguen.

" The titles and arms of Pomerania ſhall be common to the kings of Sweden and electors of Brandenburg. In caſe of failure of heirs male in the houſe of Brandenburg, the Farther Pomerania and biſhopric of Camin ſhall devolve to the king of Sweden.

" With the conſent of the empire, the emperor gives to Sweden the town and port of Wiſmar, with the fort of Walfich, the bailiwics of Poel, (except ſome villages belonging to the hoſpital of the Holy Ghoſt in Lubec) of Newencloſter, and of Wilſhuſen; the archbiſhopric of Bremen, and biſhopric of Verden, ſaving to the city of Bremen its immunities, which ſhall be left in its preſent ſtate in eccleſiaſtical and political matters[b]."

" Queen Chriſtina and her ſucceſſors, kings of Sweden, in conſideration of theſe fiefs, ſhall be deemed princes of the empire, and have their place and vote in the diets as dukes of Bremen, Verden, and Pomerania, princes of Rugen, and lords of Wiſmar. They ſhall hold theſe fiefs of the empire, and receive the inveſtitures, taking the uſual oath.

" The crown of Sweden ſhall enjoy the privilege of not appealing, provided there be eſtabliſhed in theſe fiefs, in ſome commodious place in Germany, a tribunal where juſtice may be adminiſtered according to the laws and conſtitutions of the empire."

The electors only have in their dominions tribunals of juſtice to judge without appeal. The ſubjects of the other princes appeal from the ſentence of their judges to the imperial chamber at Wetzler, or the Aulic Council of the empire[c]. The electors of Treves in their territories permit appeals to the imperial chamber; it is not clear, however, whether by the golden bull, a ſubject of that archbiſhop can be compelled to appear before a foreign judge, the privilege of not appearing being granted not ſolely to the electors but alſo to their ſubjects.

" All the ſtates of the empire ſhall contribute towards paying to Sweden, in three payments, the ſum of five millions of rix-dollars.

The CATHOLICS, the PROTESTANTS, the REFORMED.

" For the redreſs of the religious grievances which have partly occaſioned the war, it is agreed, that the tranſaction of Paſſau in 1552, and the peace of religion which enſued in 1555, ſhall be inviolably obſerved as it was confirmed to Auſburg in 1556, and ſhall ſerve for foundation to the 5th article of the treaty of Oſnabrug. There ſhall be an exact equality between the electors, princes, and ſtates of both religions according to the conſtitutions of the empire, all violence and force between the two parties being for ever prohibited[d].

" The cities of Auſburg, Dunckelſpiel, Biberach, and Ravenſburg, ſhall retain the exerciſe of religion as on the 1ſt of January 1624. The magiſtracies and public offices ſhall be held by an equal number of catholics and proteſtants. If the number be unequal, each religion ſhall have alternately an additional magiſtrate of the ſame confeſſion. As to offices held by a ſingle perſon, they ſhall be filled by turns by catholics and proteſtants. The city of Auſburg having a council of ſeven ſenators, two of which having the title of preſident, and the other five of counſellors, the catholics ſhall always have one preſident and three counſellors of their religion; but if the catholics abuſe the plurality of the ſuffrages to the prejudice of the proteſtants, it ſhall be lawful for thoſe laſt to have recourſe to the alternative of a fifth counſellor.

" The inhabitants of Oppenheim who profeſs the Auſburg confeſſion, ſhall be put in poſſeſſion of their churches and eccleſiaſtical eſtates as they were in the year 1624; and all other proteſtants ſhall have the free exerciſe of their religion.

" The nobility who hold immediately of the empire ſhall enjoy the ſame rights in matters of religion with the electors, princes, and ſtates of the Germanic body.

" The counts, barons, nobles, towns, monaſteries, commendams, communities, who are ſubjects of the ſtates holding immediately of the empire, eccleſiaſtical or ſecular, catholic or proteſtant, ſhall retain the free exerciſe of the religion they profeſſed the 1ſt of January 1624. Thoſe who are not of the religion of their ſovereign, and who at that time did not enjoy the public or private exerciſe of their religion, ſhall be free to attend their devotions in their own houſes, and even to be preſent at the public ſervice, performed in their neighbourhood. They ſhall enjoy, moreover, all the civil privileges granted to thoſe of the eſtabliſhed religion.

" In caſe that thoſe who had not on the 1ſt of January 1624, the public or private exerciſe of their religion, or who ſhall change their religion, have a mind, or are ordered to remove, they ſhall be at liberty to ſell or keep their effects, to have them adminiſtered, and to viſit them freely without a paſſport. The firſt ſhall have five years allowed to remove, the other, three, reckoning from the day of notice from their territorial lord.

" The eccleſiaſtical benefices enjoyed by catholics in 1624, ſhall remain in their hands for ever, and thoſe poſſeſſed in the ſame year by proteſtants, ſhall remain with them in like manner. If any eccleſiaſtic ſhall for the future change his religion, he ſhall forfeit his benefice, but without reſtoring the revenues he ſhall have conſumed.

" In the places of the Auſburg profeſſion, where the emperor enjoys the right of firſt prayers, he ſhall always name a proteſtant[e]. In the ſame places, the pope ſhall have no right of annates, pall, confirmation, &c. and whoever ſhall demand ſuch rights in his name, ſhall not be ſupported by the ſecular arm. Such as are choſen or ſtand for archbiſhopric, biſhopric, or prelacies of the confeſſion of Auſburg, ſhall receive inveſtiture of the emperor, after having within the year paid homage and taken the uſual oaths of fidelity. In the places where both religions are admitted, the pope ſhall preſerve his right with regard to catholic benefices. The emperor ſhall not exerciſe his right of firſt prayers in favour of a catholic but on the benefices of thoſe who are of the Romiſh religion.

[b] Great alterations have happened ſince this treaty in the ceſſions made to the Swedes. For by the treaty of Stockholm in 1720, the queen of Sweden reſigned in perpetuity to the houſe of Brandenburgh, the city of Stetin, the diſtrict between the Oder and the Pohne, with the iſles of Wollin and Uſedon, which had been given to Sweden by the 10th article of the treaty of Oſnabrug. By the 3d and 19th articles of the ſaid treaty of Stockholm, Sweden alſo yields up the towns of Dam and Holnau. By an explanation of another treaty concluded at Stockholm the 20th of November, 1719. Sweden reſigns to the electorate of Hanover the duchies of Bremen and Verden.

[c] For the better and more impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, which had been greatly interrupted, the emperor Maximilian, at the ſolicitation of the ſtates, erected a court under the title of " The Imperial Chamber," at Worms in 1495. This court was removed to Spire, 1633, and, after the French had barbarouſly ruined the Palatinate, to Wetzler in 1696, where it ſtill remains. The members of this great court of juſtice were a judge of the chamber, 4 preſidents, and 50 aſſeſſors; but in 1719 this number was leſſened by one half, and theſe to be part proteſtants and part papiſts.

The emperors had been averſe to ſuch a tribunal, becauſe they ſtill hoped to bring, as in old time, all cauſes in the laſt reſort before a tribunal of their own appointing, whereas the emperor names only the judge and preſidents of the imperial chamber. What former emperors had in vain endeavoured by authority, Maximilian obtained by policy. He foreſaw, the large expence of the imperial chamber, which fell entirely on the ſtates, would make them unattentive to their new tribunal, which accordingly happened. They knew the importance of it, and ſtruggled to obtain it, but neglected its ſupport, by which means it was often ſhut up.

The politic emperor took advantage of this, and revived his Aulic Council; and, to ſhew his moderation, deſired the ſtates to add to the number of aſſeſſors eight, though the ſalaries of all are paid by the emperor. By this means he drew all the cauſes to his own tribunal, by keeping it ever open. The princes and ſtates ſaw their error, but could not correct it. For, after all their diſputes, theſe two ſupreme courts ſubſiſt, and almoſt with equal authority, for which firſt poſſeſſes a cauſe, thereby retains it; and both receive appeals from inferior juriſdictions, and decide dubious titles. The ſentences of both, in caſe of injuſtice, may be complained of to the general diet. The Aulic Council conſiſts of a preſident, and ſeventeen aſſeſſors, of whom ſix are proteſtants. The vice chancellor of the empire has alſo a right to a ſeat, and all the decrees paſs through his hands, and are directed by him to thoſe who are to execute them. There is one circumſtance wherein theſe tribunals differ, the imperial chamber ſubſiſts during a vacancy of the throne, when juſtice is adminiſtered in the name of the vicars of the empire; but the Aulic Council is diſſolved by the death of the emperor; and a new one cannot be choſen till an emperor is elected.

The papiſts, and eſpecially the proteſtants, both complain of the too great authority of this tribunal; but hitherto they have not been able to reſtrain its power and reſtore to the imperial chamber its original and legal juriſdiction.

There are aulic-councils or tribunals of juſtice in the ſtates of the ſovereign princes, either with or without appeals to the imperial chamber or aulic-council of the empire.

[d] This article has been ſo often violated, that it may be ſaid to exiſt only in idea. The intolerant ſpirit of the Romiſh clergy breaks through all obſtacles, and the 4th ſeparate article of the treaty of Ryſwic has given a mortal blow to liberty of conſcience.

[e] The right of Primæ Preces or firſt prayers, is the right of filling, for once only, a vacant ſeat in every chapter of the empire; and it anſwers to the privilege of our archbiſhop of Canterbury called an Option.

" The electors, princes, &c. of the confeſſion of Auſburg, ſhall poſſeſs all the eccleſiaſtical benefices they enjoyed, in 1624, and the catholics, of what condition ſoever, ſhall be reſtored to what they held in the ſame year in the ſtates of the Lutheran princes.

" If any elector, prince, lord of territory, &c. change his religion, or acquires, by inheritance or otherwiſe, any ſtate profeſſing a different religion from his, he ſhall be allowed to have in his court and about his perſon, miniſters of his religion; but ſo, as to be no expence to his ſubjects or prejudice to their religion. If any community embrace the doctrine of their prince or lord, and deſire leave to have at their coſt the ſame exerciſe of religion, the prince or lord ſhall grant them that favour, which it ſhall not be in the power of his ſucceſſors to reverſe.

" In the ordinary aſſemblies, as well as in the general diets, the number of the deputies of both religions ſhall be equal. When an affair requires extraordinary commiſſaries, they ſhall be taken among the proteſtants, if the point in queſtion concerns the Lutherans. If the diſpute relates to the catholics, the commiſſaries ſhall be ſo: if it ariſes between catholics and proteſtants, there ſhall be an equal number of commiſſaries of both religions.

" The tribunal of the imperial chamber ſhall be compoſed of a catholic judge, four preſidents named by the emperor, of whom two ſhall be of the Auſburg profeſſion; of twenty-ſix catholic aſſeſſors and twenty-four proteſtants. The judges of the Aulic council ſhall conſiſt of an equal number of both religions. If all the catholics ſhall be of one opinion and all the proteſtants of another, the affair to be decided ſhall be referred to the general diet of the empire.

" The dukes of Brieg, Lignitz, Munſter, Berg, and d'Oels, and the city of Breſlau, ſhall be maintained in the privileges they enjoyed before the troubles of Bohemia, and in the free exerciſe of their religion. The Lutheran counts, barons, nobles, &c. in the dutchy of Sileſia, who depend on the royal chamber, ſhall be allowed to aſſiſt at the public ſervice of their religion in their neighbourhood, and to build three churches at their own coſt near the cities of Sweidnitz, Jant, and Glogau.

" The ſame liberty that is granted to catholics and Lutherans, ſhall alſo be allowed to thoſe who call themſelves the reformed. Except theſe three religions, no other ſhall be received or tolerated in the empire."

This article ſeems to regard any ſubjects, ſince, on account of the fiefs he enjoys in the empire, it was not objected againſt the duke of Holſtein preſumptive heir of the crown of Ruſſia, when he embraced the Greek religion.

ELECTORS, PRINCES, and STATES of the EMPIRE[f].

" For preventing any diſputes that may ariſe for the future in the political ſtate, the electors, princes, and ſtates of the Roman empire ought to be confirmed by virtue of this treaty in their ancient rights, prerogatives, privileges in the free encreaſe of territorial right, in matters eccleſiaſtical and political in their dominions, in their rights of the regale, that no perſon may have it in his power or choice to give them moleſtation on any pretence whatſoever. They ſhall enjoy the right of ſuffrage in all deliberations concerning the affairs of the empire; particularly when laws are to be made or interpoſed; war to be declared; contributions to be impoſed; levies of troops to be made, and their quarters regulated; new fortreſſes to be raiſed in the name of the public in the territories of the ſtates, or garriſons to be placed in the old, and alſo when any treaties or alliances are to be concluded; none of theſe and other things of the like kind ſhall be undertaken or permitted without the ſuffrages of all the ſtates of the empire aſſembled in the diet. They ſhall have perpetual right of making alliances among themſelves and with foreigners, provided ſuch alliances are not directed againſt the emperor and empire, againſt the public peace, or the preſent treaty in particular.

" The free cities, both in the general and particular diets, ſhall have deciſive votes, and enjoy all their ancient rights, cuſtoms and privileges."

The Ban of the empire is one of the moſt important points of the Germanic law. The Golden Bull ſays nothing of its form; it is ſurprizing that the plenipotentiaries of Weſtphalia ſhould be ſatisfied with referring the manner and order to be obſerved in putting it in execution to the next diet, which was to meet within ſix months after the concluſion of the treaty. In this diet it was ſettled, that the emperor ſhould not put any prince or ſtate under the ban without the conſent of the electors. The colleges of the princes and imperial cities juſtly complained, and notwithſtanding the numberleſs papers publiſhed on that occaſion, they could not obtain the ſatisfaction they required, till the acceſſion of Charles VI. to the imperial throne. The electors inſerted in his capitulation, that he ſhould not pronounce the ban without the knowledge and conſent of the electors, princes, and ſtates of the empire[g]. This emperor expreſſes himſelf thus, concerning the forms to which he ſubmitted himſelf on theſe occaſions: " When the proceſs is about to end, the acts of it ſhall be laid before the general diet, to be taken into conſideration, and examined by deputies of the three colleges of the empire, half catholics and half proteſtants, who ſhall be expreſly ſworn for that purpoſe. Their opinion ſhall be reported to the electors, princes, and ſtates aſſembled, who ſhall pronounce thereon the final concluſion. The ſentence, after confirmation by us or our commiſſaries, ſhall be publiſhed in our name, and the execution ſhall no otherwiſe be accompliſhed than by the tenor of the regulations of execution, and by the ſame circle to which the proſcribed perſon belonged, or where he inhabited. We will detain nothing of what ſhall be forfeited, either for ourſelves or our houſe, but the whole ſhall be incorporated in the empire; and, before all things, the injured party ſhall receive ſatisfaction."

This clauſe was inſerted in the capitulation of the emperor Charles VII. and ought to be conſidered as part of the treaties of Munſter and Oſnabrug; the plenipotentiaries having beforehand guarantied what ſhould be decided in the affair by the princes of the empire.

HOUSE of AUSTRIA.

" France ſhall pay, in three equal payments, the ſum of three millions of livres Tournois to Ferdinand-Charles, archduke of Inſpruck, after Spain ſhall have conſented to the alienation of Alſatia and the other ſeſſions by the treaty of Munſter."

This prince being dead, the three millions were paid to his brother Sigiſmund-Francis in 1663, 1664, and 1665.

HOUSES of BAVARIA, PALATINE, and BRANDENBURG.

" The houſe of Bavaria ſhall remain poſſeſſed of the elec-

[f] After the extinction of the family of Charles the Great, who conquered Germany and Lombardy, the empire became elective, and great diviſions and diſſentions aroſe, which at laſt were ſettled in the reign of Charles IV. by the Golden-Bull, or Magna Charta of Germany.

This edict or law was made in the year 1356, in a diet of the ſtates at Nuremburgh. It is called Golden, becauſe it has a gold ſeal in the form of a pope's bull. It contains thirty chapters, concerning the form and ceremonies of the election of the emperors: the number, rights, and functions of the electors, and all that belongs to the government of the empire in general. The electors were thus ſettled: The archbiſhop of Mentz, as great chancellor of Germany; the archbiſhop of Cologn, as great chancellor in Italy; the archbiſhop of Treves, as great chancellor in Gaul and Arles; the king of Bohemia, as cup-bearer; the count Palatine, as high-ſteward; the duke of Saxony, as grand marſhal; and the margrave of Brandenburg, as grand chamberlain, were the ſeven electors. To theſe have ſince been added, the duke of Bavaria, and duke of Brunſwick, as arch-treaſurer.

The general diet of the empire conſiſts of the electors, princes, ſtates, prelates, counts, barons, and free cities. The elector of Mentz, as high chancellor, is the director or ſpeaker. The members of the diet are divided into three colleges: I. The electoral college. II. The college of princes, in which ſit not only the ſpiritual and temporal princes of Germany, but the prelates who are not conſidered as princes, and the counts of the empire. The temporal and ſpiritual princes have each ſingly a vote; but the prelates and counts vote by benches, each bench having one vote. III. The college of the free or imperial cities. Theſe cities, in the times of confuſion, confederated for the benefit of trade, and for mutual defence againſt the princes, and at length became ſo powerful as to make the third eſtate or college of the empire. Bremen is ſaid to begin the aſſociation in the year 1164. There are now about ſixty imperial cities, or hanſe-towns in Germany.

The empire was divided by Maximilian, about the year 1500, firſt into ſix, and, twelve years after, into ten circles; namely, Franconia, Bavaria, Suabia, the Upper Rhine, Weſtphalia, Lower Saxony, Auſtria, Burgundy, the Lower Rhine, and Upper Saxony. In each of theſe circles there is a director for the management of civil, and a chief for regulating military affairs. The directors are fixed, but the chiefs or generals are choſen by the circles; each circle appointing the general to command the forces it is obliged to find in defence of the empire. To the directors the imperial chamber commit the execution of their decrees. The circles having many things to manage, hold frequent diets, in which they take meaſures for their ſafety, and upon occaſion, they negotiate with the diets of other circles; and when this is done with a view to ſome certain point, they are called Confederate Circles.

[g] Though this was inſerted in the capitulation of the emperor Joſeph, yet he, by his own authority, put under the ban of the empire the electors of Cologn and Bavaria.

When

toral dignity, the Upper Palatinate, and the county of Cham, formerly belonging to the electors Palatine. In virtue of this ceſſion, the elector of Bavaria ſhall renounce all the debt of thirteen millions, and all his pretenſions to the Upper Auſtria."

The duke of Bavaria, though he was omitted at the time when the number of electors was ſettled by the golden bull, had formerly enjoyed the electoral dignity alternately with the counts Palatine. The elector Maximilian-Emmanuel, in his manifeſto againſt the emperor Leopold, in the beginning of the year 1701, expreſſes himſelf thus:

"The electoral dignity is very ancient in my houſe, by the concordat of Pavia, between the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, (from whom I am deſcended) and Adolphus, ſon of Rodolphus of Bavaria, brother to the emperor Lewis, and author of the Rodolphin branch. The dignity which belonged to the houſe of Bavaria, was to be enjoyed alternately by the chiefs of the two branches of which that houſe was then compoſed. Some time after the Pavian concordat, the emperor Charles IV, declared enemy of the princes of my branch, publiſhed the golden bull, wherein he appointed that the eldeſt ſons of the electors ſhould always ſucceed their fathers. A prince of the Rodolphin branch enjoyed the electorate of my houſe when that bull was publiſhed. His ſon, by virtue of this golden bull, kept poſſeſſion of the electorate, which by the Pavian concordat was to come to the eldeſt of my branch. His uſurpation was continued by his deſcendants, notwithſtanding the proteſtations of my anceſtors ſo often repeated and renewed in full diet by duke William of Bavaria, my great grand-father.

"An eighth electorate ſhall be created in favour of the count Palatine, his heirs and ſucceſſors of the Rodolphin branch, together with all the Lower Palatinate, and in caſe the Willelmine branch ſhould happen to be extinct, and the Rodolphin ſurvive, then the Upper Palatinate and county of Cham ſhall return to the Palatine, and the eighth electorate ſhall be ſuppreſſed."

The treaties of Weſtphalia have ſettled nothing about the vicariate of the empire [h]. At the death of Ferdinand III. the elector of Bavaria claimed that dignity as annexed to his electorate, or rather to the Upper Palatinate, of which he was poſſeſſed. The elector Palatine maintained, on the contrary, that the vicariate belonged to him as count of the Lower Palatinate; and the golden bull ſeems to favour his pretenſions, where it is ſaid, "whenever the empire ſhall become vacant, the illuſtrious count Palatine of the Rhine, high-ſteward of the holy Roman empire, ſhall be vicar of the empire." 1. It is not natural that it ſhould be forgot to give the title of elector to the count Palatine, if the vicariate had been annexed to his electorate. 2. The golden bull calls him count Palatine of the Rhine, from whence it might be inferred that he was vicar of the empire by virtue of the Lower and not of the Upper Palatinate. This queſtion divided the whole empire, and in vain did arbitrators offer to decide it. Theſe two princes, in May 1724, came to an agreement, that for the future they ſhould exerciſe the office of vicar in common in ſome neutral place appointed for that purpoſe. Accordingly the vicariate was ſo adminiſtered in the vacancy of the empire, after the death of Charles VI. Several princes proteſted againſt this agreement, which, to have the force of a law, ought to have had the conſent of the emperor and the diet. At the death of the emperor Charles VII, the elector of Bavaria, his ſon, came a new agreement, whereby the vicariate was to be exerciſed alternately.

Purſuant to the 48th article of the treaty of Munſter, and the 4th of Oſnabrug, wherein it was agreed that the ſucceſſion of Juliers (undecided ſince the year 1609) ſhould be ſettled without delay, Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg, and prince William, Palatine of the Rhine, duke of Neuburg, ſigned at Cleves the 9th of September, 1666, a treaty which was afterwards confirmed by the emperor Leopold.

"The duke of Neuburg and his heirs ſhall keep the duchies of Juliers and Bergs, and the lordſhips of Winnendaal and Breſques. The elector of Brandenburg, and his heirs ſhall poſſeſs the duchy of Cleves and the counties of La Marc and Ravenſburg."

The county of Ravenſtein, about which the parties did not agree in 1666, has ſince been ceded to the Palatine houſe.

"The countries of the ſucceſſion of Juliers ſhall remain inviolably allied. The contracting parties ſhall uſe the titles in common, and mutually guaranty the poſſeſſion."

"The treaty of Cleves ſhall in no way be detrimental to the pretenſions, any princes may form, to the ſucceſſion of Juliers."

This clauſe of reſerving the rights of Saxony and Deux-Ponts, ſeems to make this treaty of Cleves only a proviſional agreement. But how can ſuch a clauſe be reconciled with the mutual guaranty between Brandenburg and Newburg? Theſe kinds of contrarieties are too often to be found in treaties. This of Cleves, where the Palatine branch of Newburg is only mentioned, might have met with objections at the death of the laſt elector Palatine: they were removed by the treaty, the prince of Saltzbach concluded with the king of Pruſſia, by which the partition, and other diſpoſitions of 1666, are confirmed.

"As an equivalent for reſigning the Hither Pomerania to the Swedes, the elector of Brandenburg and his ſucceſſors, princes of his houſe, ſhall hold as immediate fiefs of the empire, the archbiſhopric of Magdeburg, excepting the four bailliwicks of Querfurt, Guterbok, Dam, and Borck, given to the elector of Saxony; the biſhoprics of Halberſtadt, Minden, and Camin. The city of Magdeburg ſhall enjoy all its ancient and other privileges; the bailliwic of Eglen, which belonged to the chapter, ſhall be given to Brandenburg, with a fourth part of the canonicates. The chapter of Halberſtadt ſhall have no right in the government of the biſhopric, and a fourth part of the canonicates ſhall be extinguiſhed: Minden ſhall preſerve all its prebends, and thoſe of Camin ſhall be ſuppreſſed and united to the Farther Pomerania *."

HOUSES of MECKLENBURG, BRUNSWIC-LUNENBURG, HESSE, and BADEN.

"In conſideration of the duke of Mecklenburg's reſigning the town and port of Wiſmar to the Swedes, he ſhall have, as a perpetual and immediate fief, the biſhoprics of Swerin and Ratzburg, with the power of ſuppreſſing the canonicates of the two chapters, and alſo a ſeat in the aſſemblies of the empire, and of the circle of Lower Saxony, with the double title and voice of a prince. For farther ſatisfaction to the ſaid duke, there ſhall be given to him the two commendams of Mirow and Nimerau belonging to the order of Malta."

In 1667, Chriſtian Lewis, duke of Mecklenburg, put himſelf and dominions under the ſpecial protection of France, upon a promiſe of defence againſt all his enemies. The duke engaged, on his part, to aid the French with all his forces, to receive them into his ſtates, to ſuffer them to raiſe recruits, whenever the diſpoſitions of the peace of Weſtphalia were to be maintained.

"The houſe of Brunſwick-Lunenburg ſhall have the alternate ſucceſſion of the biſhopric of Olnabrug, with the catholics, for reſigning the coadjutorſhips of Magdeburg, Bremen, Halberſtadt, and Ratzburg; and alſo the provoſtſhip of Walkenreid and monaſtery of Groeningen. The debt contracted by duke Ulric with the king of Denmark, and granted by the ſaid king to the emperor, who gave it to count Tilly, ſhall be annulled.

"The houſe of Heſſe-Caſſel ſhall retain the abbey of Hirsfield with all its dependencies, as the provoſtſhip of Gelingen, ſaving however the rights of the houſe of Saxony to what it poſſeſſes time immemorial.

"The landgrave of Heſſe and his ſucceſſors ſhall enjoy the bailiwics of Schaemburg, Ruckenburg, Saxenhagen, and [h] When there is no king of the Romans, (that is no perſon choſen in the emperor's life time as his preſumptive heir, who upon the emperor's deceaſe immediately fills the throne upon his coronation, without a ſecond election) the golden bull has provided for the adminiſtration of the government, by the electors Palatine and of Saxony, who have the title of Vicars of the empire. Each of theſe has his diſtrict, and they have likewiſe an Aulic Council, called the Tribunal of the Vicariate. Their acts are valid and binding; and, for the greater ſecurity, care is taken to inſert an article in the new emperor's capitulation, by which he promiſes to ratify in the fulleſt manner whatever the vicars of the empire have done during the vacancy.

There are vicars of the emperor, as well as of the empire, but theſe offices widely differ. For, by virtue of his imperial power, the emperor may delegate his power to any prince in the empire, when he is not in a condition to execute it himſelf. But then this vicar is accountable to the emperor, who may annul all his acts, or even reſume his office whenever he pleaſes.

There is alſo a vicariate of the empire in Italy, which has generally been executed by the dukes of Savoy.

Hence it appears, that unleſs the emperor is deſirous of having a ſucceſſor appointed in his life-time, there can be no ſolid reaſon aſſigned for the electors giving him an aſſociate, under the title of king of the Romans, ſince the emperor may devolve any part of his authority upon any prince he thinks proper, with the character of Vicar.

From

Stettenhagen, which belonged to the biſhopric of Minden. The right of primogeniture, introduced into the houſes of Heſſe-Caſſel and Heſſe-Darmſtadt, ſhall be inviolably obſerved."

By the right of primogeniture is meant in the empire the indiviſibility of the dominions. "We will (ſays Charles IV, in the golden bull) that for the future and for ever, the great and magnificent principalities, ſuch as the kingdom of Bohemia, the county Palatine of the Rhine, the dukedom of Saxony, and the marquiſate of Brandenburg, their lands, juriſdictions, homages, and vaſſalages, with their appurtenances and dependencies, ſhall not be ſhared, divided, or diſmembered in any manner whatſoever; but ſhall remain united for ever whole and entire. The eldeſt ſon ſhall ſucceed, and the whole domain and right ſhall belong to him alone." For a long time none but the electoral territories enjoyed this privilege.

"The precedency in the aſſemblies of Swabia, and in other general or particular diets of the empire, ſhall be alternative in the two branches of the houſe of Baden."

SPAIN.

"All the articles of the treaty of Vervins, concluded in the year 1568, which are not derogated by the treaty of the Pyrenees, are again approved and confirmed.

"Spain proteſts againſt all preſcription, and reſerves to itſelf the proſecution of all rights in an amicable way, and not otherwiſe, which have not been expreſly renounced, and which are claimed upon France."

Theſe reſerves, the work of ambition, were only proper to inflame it. Obſolete rights are almoſt null, in ſpite of proteſtations: that is, they are commonly looked upon as neglected pretenſions, and a prince who ſhould think of purſuing them by force of arms, would be accuſed of injuſtice and breaking the peace. In the treaty of Ryſwick in 1697, the French and Dutch renounced all their reſpective pretenſions. Well would it be if this example was followed. The circumſtances of the courts of Paris and Madrid, at the time of the treaty of Vervins, required the before-mentioned reſerves. The French and Spaniards had againſt each other the ſtrongeſt motives of enmity. They had not yet weakened one another ſufficiently to be ſincerely reconciled. The peace of Vervins was therefore really conſidered by Heny IV. and Philip II. only as a truce convenient for their affairs, and of which they meant only to avail themſelves, to attack one another with more vigour. In theſe diſpoſitions it was natural that neither party ſhould recede from what could be refuſed, or what might be made the ground of ſome pretenſion, and even of a rupture. Affairs had taken a new turn, when the Pyrenean treaty was concluded. The two crowns, tired with a revenge, of which they were the victims, could make a ſolid peace, becauſe they had felt all the inconveniencies of a war. Perhaps cardinal Mazarin would have renounced the reſerves made at Vervins, if he had not feared that his vigilant enemies would have charged him with relinquiſhing ſomething real, and betraying the intereſts of his country.

When the king of Spain ſaid, he reſerved all the rights which he had not expreſly renounced, his ſincerity ought not to be ſuſpected. It is the ſame thing as if he had ſaid ſimply, that he reſerved the rights he had not renounced. This is never ſet down in ſo many words in a treaty, nor is inſerted at all. There may indeed be in treaties, as in all other contracts, articles underſtood and preſumed; but the politicians ſeem to have juſtly made it a rule to have no regard to them. The more ſacred the faith of treaties is, the more care ſhould be taken not to give it the leaſt blemiſh. Should treaties be ſo framed as to become the object of the ſubtleties and ſophiſms of ambition and intereſt? There would be nothing ſacred among nations, if tacit conditions are admitted in their conventions; for it is but too well proved by woful experience, that men's paſſions blind them in their cleareſt and moſt evident engagements [a].

Every one remembers that in the year 1733 the court of France ſent ſome battalions to the aſſiſtance of Dantzick, where Staniſlaus, king of Poland, was beſieged by the Ruſſians. This weak body of troops was obliged to capitulate, and the commanding officer was contented with the ſtipulation of tranſporting them to a port in the Baltic Sea. The preſumed intention of the French was to be free, and they certainly underſtood that they ſhould be tranſported to a neutral port; and yet count Munick ſent them to Peterſburg, where they were treated as priſoners of war. If the condition preſumed and underſtood, of a treaty or capitulation, had any force, France and her allies would not have failed to complain to the Ruſſian court of the treachery of their general. Nothing was ſaid, only the French officer was blamed for his ignorance, and count Munick was ſaid to know how to avail himſelf of all his advantages.

This remark ſerves to juſtify negotiators in the eyes of the world, who ſeeking in their treaties a certain conciſeneſs which would be a great fault, complain of finding there circumſtances which to them ſeem ſuperfluous. All the particular caſes and parts of an engagement cannot be too carefully expreſſed and ſeparated. Plenipotentiaries make this a law, unleſs it be in the reduction of an article, by which they have not obtained what was deſired. Then they uſe vague and equivocal turns and expreſſions which may give occaſion for ſome explication. In the letters of cardinal Mazarin it appears, how much pleaſed he is to give ſuch a turn to ſome paſſages of the Pyrenean treaty, as France might take advantage of them in certain conjunctures [b].

"The infanta Maria-Tereſa, eldeſt daughter of Philip the IVth, ſhall eſpouſe Lewis XIV; and as the public welfare and ſafety of the crowns of France and Spain require that, being ſo great and powerful, they may not be united in one, and that from henceforth the occaſions of ſuch a junction be prevented, their moſt chriſtian and catholic majeſties agree that the infanta Maria-Tereſa, and her children, male or female, and their deſcendants, ſhall not ſucceed to any of of the dominions which now do or ſhall hereafter belong to the Spaniſh monarchy. The moſt ſerene infanta ſhall make, before her marriage, a formal renunciation to all her rights, and ſhall make another jointly with the moſt chriſtian king, as ſoon as ſhe ſhall be married." Theſe words are prefixed to the contract of marriage of the infanta with Lewis XIV, which is part of the Pyrenean treaty.

HOUSES of SAVOY, MANTUA and MODENA.

"To prevent diſputes reviving between the dukes of Savoy and Mantua concerning Montſerrat, it is agreed that the treaty of Queraſque, concluded the 6th of April, 1631, between Lewis XIII, and the emperor Ferdinand II, ſhall remain in full force. The duke of Savoy ſhall be maintained in the poſſeſſion of that part of Montſerrat which has been reſigned to him. And the ſaid duke renounces all his pretenſions to the dukedoms of Mantua and Montſerrat, and as a compenſation ſhall poſſeſs the city of Trin, with a territory ſufficient to produce fifteen thouſand and fifty crowns of gold."

"Pignerol ſhall be excepted out of the treaty of Queraſque, which the duke of Savoy has reſigned to France, by particular treaties; namely, the treaty of St. Germain-en-laye, May 5, 1632, and of Turin, July 5, 1632."

It is needleſs to obſerve that France, on the 31ſt of May, 1631, concluded a private treaty with the duke of Savoy, by which the poſſeſſion of Pignerol was ſecured.

"In execution of the firſt article of the treaty of St. Germain-en-laye, the king of France ſhall pay to the duke of Mantua the ſum of four hundred ninety-four thouſand crowns, and his debtor the duke of Savoy ſhall be diſcharged from the ſame.

"The caſtles of Reggiolo and Luzzara, with their territories, ſhall be compriſed in the inveſtiture of the duchy of Mantua. The duke of Guaſtalla ſhall be obliged to reſtore the ſaid caſtles, reſerving the annual penſion of ſix thouſand crowns, which he claims as his due.

"Spain conſents to keep garriſon no more in Correggio, and promiſes to engage the emperor to the inveſtiture of it to the duke of Modena in the ſame manner as he gave it to the princes of Correggio."

[a] From this very juſt reflection, it may be inferred, that nothing is more unreaſonable than the alliance of France with Bavaria in 1741, and the war that enſued in contempt of the guaranty ſtipulated in the 10th article of the definitive treaty of 1738, to which the ambition and intereſt of France gave the ſubtle interpretation of ſaving the rights of a third, which is the motive of her enterpriſes againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

[b] Of this there is a remarkable inſtance in the cardinal's treaty with Oliver Cromwell by which Cromwell was to have the harbours of Flanders. In the tenth article, inſtead of promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of the ſaid harbours, the cardinal only promiſes to leave the lord Protector in the quiet poſſeſſion, ſovereignty, &c. of the ſaid places.—Accordingly the cardinal, after the taking of Dunkirk, ordered marſhal Turenne to take poſſeſſion of it and keep it. Had this been done, both the reaſon and reſult of the treaty had been very different. But Cromwell, by a timely diſcovery of the cardinal's deſign, prevented it, and got poſſeſſion of Dunkirk.

HOUSE

HOUSE of LORRAIN.

" The moſt Chriſtian king conſents to reſtore the duke of Lorrain to his dominions, except the imperial city of Moyenvie, united to France by the treaty of Munſter: the duchy of Bar, the county of Clermont, the towns of Stenai, Dun, Jametz, and their territory, which ſhall remain for ever incorporated in the crown of France. The fortification of Nantz ſhall be demoliſhed. The dukes of Lorrain ſhall diſband their forces, and be obliged to give free paſſage to the troops France ſhall have occaſion to ſend into Alſatia, Briſac, or Philipſburg. In caſe the duke of Lorrain refuſes to ratify theſe conditions, the king of France ſhall remain in poſſeſſion of Lorrain."

Theſe conditions left hardly any thing to the duke of Lorrain but an empty title. It was reſolved to pnniſh him for his infidelities, and prevent the dangers to be feared from his inconſtancy. Preſſed however by the moſt earneſt ſollicitations, cardinal Mazarin agreed by the treaties of Vincennes, of the 28th of February, 1661, to reſtore to the duke of Lorrain, Dun, and the dutchy of Bar, on condition that France ſhould remain poſſeſſed of Sirk, with its thirty dependent villages; hold in full ſovereignty Cauſinan, Saarburg, Phalſburg, with the dependencies of Malville belonging to Bar, and alſo enjoy the rights over the caſtle of Montclair, which the dukes of Lorrain held jointly with the elector of Treves. It would be tedious to name all the places which were reſigned to France by the duke, and which formed a paſſage for the French troops from Metz into Alſatia, without touching the duke's dominions. This road was half a league wide, and thirty in length.

In conſequence of his rights in Montclair, the king of France at Fontainbleau, the 12th of October, 1661, concluded a treaty with the elector of Treves. It was agreed that the caſtle of Montclair ſhould be demoliſhed for ever.

The duke of Lorrain had no ſooner agreed to the articles of the treaty of Vincennes, than he repented of it, and was extremely uneaſy at his ſituation. He entered upon a negotiation which ended in a moſt extraordinary treaty, and which is univerſally known, the treaty of Montmartre, the 6th of February 1662. The duchies of Lorrain and Bar were to be united to the kingdom of France, after the death of Charles IV, on condition that all the princes of his houſe ſhould be ingrafted into the royal family, and ſucceed to the crown according to their rank of primogeniture, after the princes of the houſe of Bourbon. Till this union was compleated, the king of France was to begin with garriſoning Marſal.

This treaty did not take place, and to end all differences concerning Lorrain, a new agreement was ſigned at Metz the 31ſt of Auguſt 1663. The king was to be put in poſſeſſion of Marſal, with a clauſe to reſtore it within a year to the duke of Lorrain, with the fortifications blown up, or to keep it, giving an equivalent. The treaty of Vincennes was confirmed in all its articles, except only that the duke might incloſe Nantz with a bare wall.

The UNITED PROVINCES.

" Philip IV. king of Spain, acknowledges the freedom, independence, and ſovereignty of the United Provinces, renounces all his rights thereto, and conſents to treat with the States-general."

It may be aſked, whether the States-general, by virtue of this treaty, acquired the rights and pretenſions the kings of Spain had formed upon ſome of their neighbours, as dukes of Guelders, counts of Holland, &c. The ſolution of this queſtion has been given in what was ſaid of the tacit and preſumed conditions of a treaty. The States-general of the United provinces, and the particular ſtates of each province, having neglected to ſtipulate that they ſtood in the place and ſtead of the kings of Spain, acquired only the right of governing themſelves: all beyond that remained to the kings of Spain and their ſucceſſors in the ſovereignty of the Netherlands.

" Beſides the United Provinces, the States-general ſhall hold and enjoy the town and mayoralty of Bois-le-duc, the towns of Bergen-op-zoom, Breda, Maeſtricht, with their juriſdiction; the county of Vroonhoff, Grave, the country of Kuik, Hulſt and its Bailliwick; Hulſter Ambacht, Axele Ambacht. As to the three quarters of Outremeuſe, namely, Delem, Fauquermont, and Roleduc, they ſhall remain in their preſent ſtate, and in caſe of diſpute, it ſhall be amicably decided."

A diſpute did ariſe between Spain and the United Provinces concerning theſe three quarters. An agreement was made the 25th of February and the 27th of May 1658, by which they were to be equally divided between Spain and the States-general. The next year, December the 13th, another treaty, by way of interim, was alſo ſigned by theſe two powers. The affair was not finally ſettled till the 26th of December 1661, when it was agreed by a treaty, that the king of Spain ſhould poſſeſs the country of Fauquemont and Dalem, and the town and caſtle of Roleduc. The towns and caſtles of Fauquemont and Dalem, and the country of Roleduc, were to remain to the United Provinces.

" Neither the Spaniards nor States-general ſhall build any new forts in the Low-countries, or cut canals that may be prejudicial to either of the parties. The catholic king ſhall demoliſh the forts of St. Job, St. Donas, the Star, St. Tereſa, St. Frederic, St. Iſabella, St. Paul, and the redoubt called Pape-mutz. The States-general ſhall demoliſh the two forts in the iſle of Caſant, called Orange and Frederic, the two forts of Pas, and all thoſe on the eaſt ſide of the Scheld, except Lillo and Kildrecht, called Spinola.

" The king of Spain renounces all his rights to Graves, the country of Kierk and their dependencies, which the prince of Orange held formerly by mortgage, and of which the States-general gave him the property in the year 1611. He alſo renounces all his pretenſions to the cities and lordſhips of Lingen, Bevergern, and Kloppenburg, which ſhall remain to the prince of Orange and his heirs.

" The ſubjects on both ſides are declared capable of inheriting one another, either by will or without, according to the cuſtom of the places.

" Both parties ſhall remain in poſſeſſion of the countries and commerce which they hold in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies. The Spaniards ſhall enjoy the privileges they now poſſeſs in the Eaſt Indies, without extending them farther, and the ſubjects of the States-general ſhall not frequent the places where the Caſtilians are ſettled.

" The Spaniards, and ſubjects of the United Provinces, ſhall not ſail to or trade in the harbours, ports, forts, lodgments, or caſtles, or any other places belonging to the other party in the Eaſt Indies."

BASIL, SWISS CANTONS, and ſome HANSE-TOWNS.

" The city of Baſil and the Swiſs Cantons are in no way ſubject to the tribunals and courts of the empire.

" The free cities which are included in the dominions poſſeſſed by the Swedes in Germany ſhall preſerve the ſame liberty of navigation which they have hitherto enjoyed, as well with regard to the empire as to foreign kingdoms, republics and ſtates."

NAMES of the PRINCES, &c. Parties and Guarantees of the TREATIES of WESTPHALIA.

The emperor and houſe of Auſtria, France, Sweden; the electors of Mentz, Bavaria, Saxony, Brandenburg; the biſhops of Bamberg and Wirzburg, the princes of Saxe Altenburg, Brandenburg-Culmbach, Brunſwick-Lunenburg, Zell, Grubenhagen, Wolffenbuttle, Calemberg, Mecklenburg, Wirtemberg, Heſſe-Caſſel, Heſſe-Darmſtadt, Baden, Saxe-Lavenburg; the counts and barons of the Bench of Weterania and of Franconia; the cities of Straſburg, Ratiſbon, Lubeck, Nuremberg, Ulm, &c.

" All theſe parties ſhall be obliged to defend and maintain all and every of the conditions of the peace of Weſtphalia without diſtinction of perſons or religion. In caſe any difference ariſes, endeavours ſhall be uſed to decide it in an amicable manner; if that method fails, the injured party ſhall be aided with all the forces of the others."

PROTESTATIONS.

The pope's nuntio at Munſter proteſted againſt the peace of Weſtphalia on the 14th and 28th of October, 1648. A month after, pope Innocent himſelf made his proteſtation. The 20th of January 1649, Charles II. duke of Mantua proteſted againſt the ſtipulations concerning his diſputes with the duke of Savoy.

After this account of the Weſtphalian and Pyrenean treaties, and of thoſe relating thereto, it will not be improper to add a few remarks before we come to the peace of Oliva.

Perſons deſigned for negotiation cannot ſufficiently ſtudy the treaties of Munſter and Oſnabrug. They are perfect patterns in their kind, for order, preciſion, and clearneſs. The ſuperior genius of the miniſters who framed them is conſpicuous throughout. Beholding at once an affair in all its different views and lights; perfectly informed of the intereſts on which they were treating, their near or diſtant relations; they diſcarded whatever was foreign to the point, and rejected all vague and ſuperfluous expreſſions, which throw no light upon the ſubject.

It is not ſo eaſy as may be imagined, to give a good form to a treaty. How many plenipotentiaries who deſerve the reputation they have gained, have ſplit upon this rock? Some can hardly be followed; no order in the ideas, no connexion in the matters; and the reader who wants inſtruction is to begin with unravelling a chaos. Others there are who ſeek to inſert in their treaties the fineſſes they uſed in the courſe of their negotiation; they are dark, confuſed, indiſtinct; their meaning muſt be gueſſed. Theſe cannot finiſh an article without ſlipping in ſomething ſuperfluous; they ſwell minute things, and love to conſider them as important objects, thinking their negotiation will thereby acquire the more dignity.

If ſuch conſiderable defects are often found in treaties penned by men of rare talents in buſineſs, what a ſubject for criticiſm muſt the acts of thoſe be, who are little verſed in affairs, of a narrow genius, and owe ſolely to favour the honour of being charged with the intereſt of their country and of wording its treaties?

Another remark may be added for the ſake of thoſe readers who have no knowledge of this ſubject; that, beſides the conventions which form the public law, there are, in all the treaties, articles of another kind. Theſe concern only the moment wherein the treaty is concluded, and, as conſequently they cannot have any influence for the future, need not to be enlarged upon; ſuch are the ſtipulations for the reſtitution of a province, a place, a caſtle to a ſtate from which it had been taken: or for reſtoring things to their former ſituation without creating any new title. In ſpeaking of the houſe of Heſſe-Caſſel, was there any occaſion to ſay, that the plenipotentiaries of Munſter and Oſnabrug agreed that there ſhould be paid to the ſaid houſe one hundred thouſand rixdollars within the ſpace of nine months, and at the expence of the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologn, the biſhops of Paderborn and Munſter, and the abbot of Fuld? It ſhould, however, have been mentioned, if Heſſe had made ſo great a figure in the war as Sweden.

There are alſo another ſort of articles, which are omitted becauſe they are mere matters of form, and common to all treaties of peace. They never fail to begin with ſaying "There ſhall be a true and perpetual peace between the parties: hoſtilities ſhall ceaſe: there ſhall be a general amneſty on both ſides: all the priſoners ſhall be releaſed without ranſom: the ſubjects of the two powers may reſort to and ſettle in each other's territories, &c." The whole concludes with a promiſe of faithfully performing engagements, and ratifying them within ſuch a time.

It may not be amiſs to examine an important queſtion concerning the ratification of treaties, which ſome conſider as an act neceſſary to their validity, whilſt others think it only a form authorized by cuſtom which gives authenticity to the engagements but adds nothing to their force.

Grotius is of this laſt opinion. "We may (ſays he) be bound by another man's act, if it appears that we have deputed and empowered him to act for us, either as our agent in that particular buſineſs, or under a general qualification. And it may likewiſe happen that where the commiſſion is general, he that is ſo commiſſioned may bind us by acting contrary to his private inſtructions: for here are two diſtinct acts of the will, the one whereby we bind ourſelves to confirm and ratify whatever our agent ſhall do in ſuch an affair; the other, whereby we bind our agent, that he ſhall not act beyond our ſecret inſtructions. This we obſerve on account of thoſe things which embaſſadors promiſe for their maſters, by virtue of their inſtructions, but exceeding their private orders."

"A ſovereign (adds the ſame author) is bound by the act of his miniſter, in caſe he tranſgreſs not the bounds of his public office, though he act contrary to his private inſtructions. If a miniſter tranſgreſs his commiſſion, and promiſe more than he can perform, he himſelf ſhall be bound to the full value, unleſs ſome law ſufficiently known ſhall prevent it. If there ſhall be found any fraud in the caſe, that is, if he ſhall pretend to have more power than was really given him, he ſhall then be obliged to ſatisfy for the damage thereby ſuſtained; and if through his crime great injury be done to the adverſe party, he ſhall be bound to ſuffer puniſhments anſwerable to his crime. In the firſt caſe his goods ſhall make ſatisfaction, and if theſe fail, his corporal liberty: in the latter caſe, his perſon or his goods, or both, according to the greatneſs of his crime."

The author who publiſhed, ſome years ſince, an eſſay upon the principles of law and morality, ſeems to have juſter notions of this matter than Grotius. After having eſtabliſhed his principles concerning the engagements contracted by an agent, he adds, "the inconveniency from the unfaithfulneſs of embaſſadors, is remedied by the reciprocal ſtipulation of the exchange of the ratifications, which is as much as to ſay, that the time agreed for ſending the ratifications is allowed to the ſovereigns to ſee whether their private inſtructions have been executed; and in caſe they have not been followed, to retract the promiſes made by their embaſſadors."

Indeed a treaty is not in full force till ratified by the powers that made it. To adopt this principle is certainly the intereſt of every prince, in order to avoid the danger of being a victim to the preſumption, infidelity, or corruption of a miniſter, whom he charges with the care of diſcuſſing and ſettling his right and pretenſions. If the force of the expreſſions uſed in drawing up an embaſſador's full powers be only attended to, there is no doubt that the ratification of the treaties is to be conſidered as a ſuperfluous formality. But here we muſt be on our guard; we muſt not reaſon upon the particular ideas raiſed by the expreſſions, ſo much as upon a general idea of a full power. Now how extenſive ſoever the full powers of a plenipotentiary may be, we know how to give the ſtyle its due value; and an embaſſador himſelf ſcruples not to own a hundred times in the courſe of a negotiation, that his hands are tied up, that he waits for farther inſtructions, &c. Since the authority of a miniſter is actually limited, though by his full power it ſeems to be without bounds, it may from thence be inferred, that a treaty has not all its force till ratified by the prince, nor till then becomes obligatory. It would therefore be imprudent to ſtipulate that the conventions ſhould be executed at the time of ſigning: this is what has not been duly attended to by ſome embaſſadors.

CHAP. II.

PACIFICATION OF THE NORTH, PEACE OF OLIVA, OF COPENHAGEN, &c.

MARGARET of Waldemar, called by the hiſtorians the Semiramis of the north, about the year 1387, united the three kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, and having formed the grand deſign of making, in ſome meaſure, all her ſubjects but one nation, ſhe aſſembled at Calmar, in 1392, the States-general of the three kingdoms, who very readily conſented to the union. It was ſettled by a ſolemn treaty, that the Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians, ſhould preſerve their reſpective laws, cuſtoms, and privileges, though united under one head, and that the king elected by turns by each nation, ſhould reſide among thoſe by whom he was choſen.

Eric

Eric, her nephew, ſucceeded Margaret; but being depoſed by his ſubjects for his ill conduct, Chriſtopher of Bavaria was placed on the throne in his room. Though this election was managed ſolely by the Danes, it was confirmed by the Swedes, whoſe turn it was to chuſe. They had not afterwards the ſame complaiſance, for the ſtates of Denmark having choſen Chriſtiern of Oldenburgh to ſucceed Chriſtopher of Bavaria, the Swedes conferred their crown on Charles Canutſon, of the race of their ancient kings *.

The treaty of Calmar from hence began to be productive of calamities in the north, inſtead of the advantages intended by Margaret. The union being diſſolved, could not but create animoſities between the three kingdoms, as it had confounded their intereſts, and given them rights and pretenſions upon one another. The kings of Denmark looked upon the election of Canutſon, as an encroachment upon their authority. They imagined Sweden was to be one of their provinces; and indeed that kingdom muſt have ſubmitted to the Daniſh yoke, if Guſtavus Vaſa had not found in the foreſts of Dalecarlia, avengers of their country.

The cruel war between Sweden and Denmark was not yet at an end, when a new ſource of diſcord was formed in the north during the war which the Muſcovites carried into Livonia about the middle of the ſixteenth century. Gothart Kettler, grand maſter of the Teutonic order, and as ſuch, ſovereign of Livonia, was not in condition to oppoſe the irruption of his enemies. Revel, deſpairing of relief, ſought the protection of Sweden, and ſubmitted to that crown in 1560, whoſe example was quickly followed by all Eſtonia, of which that city is the capital.

The Swedes believing they could not preſerve their new acquiſition but by the deſtruction of the Teutonic order, refuſed all aſſiſtance to Kettler. He, out of revenge, and to ſave at leaſt ſome part of his dominions, reſigned to the Poles all his right to Livonia, reſerving only Courland, for which he conſented to do homage. When the Muſcovites were repulſed, the Poles aſſerted their claim to the ceſſion of Kettler, and demanded of Sweden, Revel and Eſtonia, which had not been able to throw off the yoke of their lawful ſovereign for the ſake of a new one. The Swedes knew perhaps, that a nation abandoned by their prince, is no longer ſubject to him, and therefore only anſwered the Poles by taking up arms.

It was hoped, that the bloody wars kindled by this diſpute were going to end, when the Poles were ſeen to give their crown to Sigiſmund, eldeſt ſon of John king of Sweden and Catherine Jagellon, a princeſs whoſe name was dear to them, and whoſe anceſtors had governed the republic with glory. The calm, however, was ſhort and tranſient, John died in 1592; his ſon went immediately into Sweden to be crowned, but he made too much haſte to return to his Poliſh dominions before he had eſtabliſhed his authority over the Swedes; and, committing a ſecond error worſe than the firſt, he reſigned to the republic of Poland his rights, as king of Sweden, to Livonia.

This imprudent conduct the more eaſily raiſed diſcontents, as Charles of Sudermania, brother of the late king, had been endeavouring to gain a party. This able and ambitious prince rouſed the pride of the Swedes, by repreſenting to them, that their ſtruggles to avoid the tyranny of the Danes were become fruitleſs, if they did not take courage and prevent their country from being a province of Poland. He deſcribed the Poles as greedy and ſevere republicans, who were going to be inveſted with all the high offices of Sweden in order to cruſh her, and whoſe violences were much more to be dreaded than thoſe of the Danes; ſince the religion of the kingdom could not be ſafe under a prince whoſe court ſwarmed with prieſts of the Romiſh religion.

Sigiſmund, informed of what was contriving againſt him, thought his preſence might reclaim or awe the Swedes; but it was too late. Charles of Sudermania, who had ſecured to his intereſts all the orders of the ſtate, prevented his entrance into the kingdom, and defeating the troops which attended him, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king [a]. This war ſometimes interrupted or waged with leſs vigour, by reaſon of the old quarrels between Sweden and Denmark, took up the whole reign of Charles IX, and employed his ſon, the great Guſtavus Adolphus, till upon his expedition into Germany to aſſiſt the proteſtants, he concluded with Poland the truce of ſix years, mentioned in the foregoing chapter.

Peace at length prevailed in the north. In 1613 the Danes had ſolemnly renounced all their rights to Sweden: they had the triſling conſolation left them, of bearing the arms of that kingdom, and Norway was not conteſted. It is true, the truce between the Swedes and the Poles was only for a ſhort ſpace, but it was very eaſy to dry up the fountain of all their diſputes. It was the intereſt of Poland to ſeek peace, as being almoſt exhauſted, whilſt Sweden had viſibly gained an aſcendant in the north. The making a ſecond truce in 1635, inſtead of a treaty, was done on purpoſe to manage the Poles, and by leaving them in ſome hopes of recovering their loſt provinces, to render more eaſy an accommodation, oppoſed by the emperor's emiſſaries, and neceſſary to promote the progreſs of the Swedes in Germany.

Caſimir, attacked by the Muſcovites, and diſturbed by the revolt of the Coſſacks, began in 1654 a negotiation, of which the truce of 1635 was to be the baſis, peace was juſt going to be ſettled, when his miniſter at Stockholm, proteſted againſt the coronation of Charles Guſtavus, two days after the abdication of queen Chriſtina.

This ſpark rekindled a flame which ſpread over the north. The Swedes thinking themſelves abuſed, demanded war, and the new king, had his troops and finances been proportioned to his grand deſigns, would have inſtantly gratified his ſubjects. He ſpent the reſt of the year 1654 in making preparations, exerciſing and augmenting his forces, amaſſing money, and forming a ſtrict alliance with the the elector of Brandenburg, duke of Pruſſia, and in the beginning of the next year he entered Poland at the head of his army.

Never was progreſs more rapid; all gave way to Charles's furious attacks, terror flew before him and diſarmed his enemies; was it as eaſy to keep as to make great conqueſts, Caſimir would never have recovered his crown. Charles reſolved to demoliſh him, and his obſtinacy proved the ſafety of his enemy. The Poles, who had trembled for fear, were fired with reſentment; their ſhame for behaving ſo cowardly, rendered their courage the more impetuous, and they formed an army, which was a more honourable aſylum for Caſimir than Sileſia, where he had been forced to conceal himſelf.

The Muſcovites, who were at war with the Poles, began to look with a jealous eye upon the power of the Swedes, and made a diverſion in Livonia. On the other hand, the princes of the ſouth, and weſt of Europe, would no longer be indifferent ſpectators of the quarrels in the north. The emperor Ferdinand III. ſeized the opportunity of revenging the injury done him by the peace of Weſtphalia, and ſeeing Caſimir's affairs begin to be reſtored, ſent him ſuccours, and engaged Lenmark to make a diverſion in favour of the Poles. The cham of Tartary marched at the ſame time to their aid a hundred thouſand men, which rendered ineffectual the alliance Sweden had juſt made with Ragotzki, prince of Tranſilvania.

In turning his principal forces againſt the Danes, Charles Guſtavus ſaw himſelf obliged to ſtand upon the defenſive in Poland; and from that time the elector of Brandenburg, thinking it his intereſt to renounce his alliance, concluded with Caſimir, the 17th of September 1657, the famous treaty of Velau. Denmark had the ſame fate as Poland had endured, that kingdom was almoſt entirely conquered, and Frederic III. quickly concluded a ſeparate peace.

The peace of Roſtchild, ſigned the 8th of March 1658, and managed by France and England, would have paved the way to the pacification of the north, had it taken effect. But Frederic, encouraged by his allies, was aſhamed of his fearfulneſs. The arms of Sweden were repreſented to him as an irreſiſtible torrent, but which flows away and diſappears ſo much the more ſuddenly, as its waters are carried with the greater violence. The aſſiſtance of the United Provinces, and their declaration of war againſt Charles, determined the court of Denmark to fall off from the terms they had accepted [b].

All Europe would at length have taken part in the quarrel of the north, if France and England, by a treaty of the 21ſt of May 1659, had not agreed with the United Provinces to take the ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual meaſures for reſtoring tranquility. The States-general withdrew their ſuccours from the Danes; the Engliſh promiſed to give none to Sweden, and the firſt fruits of this negotiation was a peace ſigned at Elſenor the 9th of December 1659, between Charles Guſtavus and the United Provinces.

* The ſame with Charles VIII.

[a] In 1604 about 147 years after the death of Charles VIII.

[b] It muſt be obſerved, that it was not from the treaty of Roſtchild that Frederic fell off, but from the preliminary treaty of Toſtrup, concluded the 18th of February by the mediation of England. This he refuſed to ratify, as thinking it too diſadvantageous. The king of Sweden, who had paſſed into Zealand over the ice, continued his march to Roſtchild, and beſieged Copenhagen; but at the repeated inſtances of the French and Engliſh miniſters, the peace was concluded the 8th of March following. The treaty of Toſtrup was the baſis of that of Roſtchild, which was executed after having been duly ratified by his Swediſh majeſty at Gottenburgh the 24th of March, and by the Dane at Copenhagen the 29th.

At

Fortune who had laviſhed her favours upon the Swedes, began to forſake them and incline to their enemy, but nothing haſtened more the ſucceſs which the mediators, aſſembled at Oliva and Copenhagen, flattered themſelves with, than the death of Charles Guſtavus. This prince, worthy of the great Adolphus's throne, and one of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of his age, died the 23d of February 1660. His courage could not brook making a peace in circumſtances, wherein his enemies had leſs occaſion for it than he. His ſon ſigned the treaty of Oliva the 3d of May 1660, with Poland, the emperor Leopold, and the elector of Brandenburg. The treaty of Copenhagen was concluded the 6th of June the ſame year, between Sweden and Denmark.

The peace however was not general in the north. Muſcovy continued the war with Sweden and Poland. The treaty of Pleyſſemond diſarmed the Swedes the 1ſt of July 1661; but the Poles and the Ruſſians were not finally agreed till the 25th of April 1686, when theſe powers leagued together in a war againſt the Turks. Hoſtilities had however ceaſed from the 30th of January 1667, by a truce of 13 years, which was renewed or prolonged by treaties ſigned the 17th of March 1670, the 9th of April 1672, and the 7th of Auguſt 1678.

TREATY of OLIVA.

SWEDEN.

"John Caſimir king of Poland, renounces all right to the kingdom of Sweden and principality of Finland. He reſerves the power of bearing the arms and titles of that kingdom, except when he writes to the king of Sweden. His ſucceſſors ſhall not uſe the ſame titles, nor form any pretenſion to Sweden."

This laſt clauſe could only regard thoſe of his ſucceſſors who ſhould be of his family, the republic of Poland having no claim to the throne of Sweden. The eldeſt branch of the houſe of Vaſa ended in the perſon of king Caſimir, who after his abdication, retired into France, and died a mitred abbot, which ſuited him better than a crown. Guſtavus Adolphus was the laſt male heir of the younger branch.

"The king and republic of Poland ſurrender to Sweden all Livonia beyond the Dwina, except the towns of Dunenburgh, Roſſiden, Ludſen, Marienhuſen, and other places poſſeſſed by the Poles during the truces of 1629 and 1635."

All Livonia was then in the hands of the Muſcovites, which they did not evacuate till the next year, when the Swedes, by virtue of the 2d and 3d articles of the treaty of Pleyſſemond, took poſſeſſion, except the ſouthern part, which was reſtored to Poland in 1667, purſuant to the 6th article of the truce concluded that year between the Poles and the Muſcovites.

"Sweden ſhall alſo poſſeſs the iſle of Ruynen, and all the territory on the left of the Dwina, which the Swedes held during the truces of 1629 and 1635.

"The kings of Poland and Sweden and their ſucceſſors ſhall equally uſe the ſtile and arms of Livonia, with the title of dukes."

The 18th article of the treaty of Oliva deſerves notice for its ſingularity. It ſays, "that the dead bodies of the general and ſubaltern officers, if demanded, ſhall be reſtored to the Swedes. And as for thoſe that are buried at Elbing, Marienburg, or in any other place of Pruſſia or Poland, they ſhall lie inviolated."

"Denmark renounces all pretenſions to Sweden.

"Sweden ſhall poſſeſs in full ſovereignty Jemptia, and all that part of Heredalia which is ſeparated from Norway by the mountains of Oſtrafiel. The king of Denmark gives alſo to Sweden the iſles of Oeſel and Gotland.

"The provinces of Halland, Schonen, and Blecking, are reſigned to Sweden, to be enjoyed in full ſovereignty."

The king of Sweden had been in poſſeſſion of Halland ſince 1645, by virtue of the 25th article of the treaty of Brom-Sebro. Chriſtiern IV. had yielded it to Chriſtina for 30 years, as a pledge for the freedom of the Swedes in the Straits of the Sound and the Belt. The thirty years expired. Denmark could not retake poſſeſſion of that province without giving Sweden an equivalent ſecurity, ſuch as ſhould be approved of. So frivolous a convention teaches negotiators at once how extremely nice princes ſometimes are, and yet eaſy to be ſatisfied [c].

"Sweden ſhall poſſeſs in full ſovereignty the iſland of Bornholm."

This iſland was alſo given to Sweden by a particular act, which is generally annexed to the treaty of Copenhagen.

"The king of Denmark reſigns to Sweden the fiefs of Bahns, with all their dependencies, and likewiſe all his juriſdictions, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, on the iſle of Rugen.

"The ſhips of the king of Sweden and of his ſubjects, of what province ſoever, ſhall not be liable to any toll, ſearch, viſit, detention or charge, in paſſing the Sound and the Belt. All the effects belonging to the Swedes, or to other ſubjects of Sweden, ſhall enjoy the ſame privilege, though freighted on board foreign ſhips."

DENMARK.

"The kings of Denmark ſhall bear the arms of Sweden, provided no right or pretenſion to that crown is inferred from thence.

"The king of Sweden renounces, in favour of the king of Denmark and the duke of Holſtein Gottorp, all his rights, as duke of Bremen, to the counties of Delmenhorſt and Ditmaſen, and to the effects of certain nobles of Holſtein."

By the 15th article of the treaty of Copenhagen, the king of Sweden renounces all his rights acquired by conqueſt to the provinces which he reſtores to Denmark. In reading this article, one would think it concerned two barbarous nations, who acknowledge no other right but that of the longeſt ſword, and believe the ſeizing of a country a ſufficient title to the ſovereignty of it. There is no wonder ſuch a notion ſhould ſubſiſt in 1660, ſince, at this very time, it has not fallen into that contempt it deſerves and creates. A prince no doubt may very juſtly conquer a province that belongs to him, and refuſe to reſtore it. He may even extend his conqueſts beyond the country he claims for a puniſhment of his enemy's injuſtice, and for a ſatisfaction of the expences of a war, he was forced into. But arms of themſelves give no title to poſſeſſion, they ſuppoſe a prior, and it is only to fix this conteſted and equivocal right that a war is made. If it was otherwiſe, a prince diſpoſſeſſed by his enemy would have no longer any right to the dominions taken from him, and conſequently it would be ridiculous for the conqueror to require of him a ceſſion by a treaty of peace. To this may be added one plain argument, if conqueſts by their nature form a right of poſſeſſion for the conqueror, it matters not whether the war be founded upon juſt or unjuſt motives. But who is ſo bold as to advance ſuch a propoſition? For no reaſonable man can deny that a prince who takes up arms without a juſt cauſe, ought to indemnify his enemy for all his loſſes occaſioned by the war.

SWEDEN. DENMARK.

"The kings of Sweden and Denmark renounce all alliances which have been made to the prejudice of one another. They ſhall form no ſuch hereafter, and each party ſhall refuſe an aid, directly or indirectly, to the enemy of the other.

"Theſe two princes ſhall keep up in their territory, each at his own expence, the ſea-marks for navigation between Schagen and Salſterbo. The Swede conſents never to exact any toll in the Sound: but Denmark ſhall pay him every year, by two equal payments, the ſum of 3500 rix-dollars.

"Every Swediſh ſhip paſſing the Sound ſhall ſalute the caſtle of Cronenburg; which ſhall be returned. Every Daniſh ſhip in the Sound ſhall ſalute the caſtle of Elſenburg, which ſhall be returned. The Swediſh and Daniſh ſhips, when they happen to meet, ſhall not lower their top-ſails.

"When one of the two kings ſhall ſend into or out of the Baltic above five men of war, or more than 1200 ſoldiers, he ſhall give notice of it to the other three weeks before."

POLAND. BRANDENBURG.

"The inhabitans of Weiſmar and Pomerania ſhall be reſtored to all the rights, privileges, and cuſtoms, granted them by the treaty of Odenſee."

[c] At preſent, when ſome crowns have made it a rule to obſerve treaties no farther than it ſuits their conveniency, it would not be amiſs to introduce the cuſtom of giving pledges for the performance of articles. If when the emperor Charles VI. concluded the treaty of 1738, with the king of France, in which he paid him before-hand for the guaranty of his Pragmatic Sanction, he had required that Alſatia or Burgundy ſhould be ſurrendered him for 36 years, on condition that it ſhould remain to the houſe of Auſtria if the guaranty was not obſerved; if this had been done, ſhould we have ſeen the fatal war of 1741, and would France ever have been allied with the elector of Bavaria? In the late peace between England and France, the Engliſh were obliged to give hoſtages for the ſurrender of Cape Breton.

This

When the treaty of Brom Sebrô was concluded the 17th of Auguſt 1645, Sweden was in poſſeſſion of Weiſmar and all Pomerania. The inhabitants of the Swediſh conqueſts, preſerved by the treaty of Oſnabrug, enjoy in the paſſage of the Sound and Belt, all the privileges granted to the Swedes themſelves. Therefore the 34th article of the treaty of Brom Sebrô concerns only the Pomeranians of the Farther Pomerania, ſubjects to Brandenburg. By virtue of the treaty of Odenſee, concluded the 23d of July 1560, their ſhips were to be treated in the Straits of the Sound and Belt as thoſe of the moſt favoured nation. It muſt be obſerved, that from 1660 to 1720, when Denmark promiſes to treat any ſtate as the moſt favoured nation, Sweden muſt always be excepted, which during that ſpace enjoyed particular privileges which were forced to be renounced after the death of Charles XII. In the ſequel of this work will be ſeen the alterations in the north ſince the beginning of the preſent century, and that the treaties of Stockholm and Neuſtadt have derogated from ſeveral articles of the treaties here mentioned.

" The king of Sweden and elector of Brandenburg renounce the treaties made between them the 17th of January 1656, at Koninſberg, the 25th of June 1656, at Marinburg, the 20th of November 1656, at Labiavic. They declare them null, and proteſt that they will never from thence claim any right againſt Poland."

By theſe treaties the elector Frederic William acknowledged the dukedom of Pruſſia to be a fief of the crown of Sweden; Charles Guſtavus diſcharged him from all vaſſalage, and gave him in full ſovereignty the province of Warmia in Royal Pruſſia, and ſome palatinates in Poland.

" Ducal Pruſſia is declared independent; but on failure of heirs male in the family of Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg, that province with all its rights, ſhall return to the republic of Poland.

" Inſtead of the ancient dues of vaſſalage from Pruſſia to Poland, there ſhall be a perpetual alliance between the two powers. Frederic William and his deſcendants, dukes of Pruſſia, ſhall never make alliance with the enemies of Poland, furniſh them with warlike ſtores and proviſions, or grant them a paſſage through their territories. In all the defenſive wars the king of Poland ſhall be obliged to wage, the duke of Pruſſia ſhall lend him 15000 foot and 500 horſe, to be paid by the Poles as ſoon as they have entered their dominions.

" The king of Poland, on his part, engages to defend Ducal Pruſſia againſt all attacks. The Poliſh troops ſhall at all times have free paſſage, and the Pruſſians ſhall freely march through the Poliſh territories."

In an article of the alliance of Velau, Poland had engaged to pay the elector of Brandenburg three hundred thouſand rixdollars, and to leave him Elbing till the whole ſum was paid. By a courſe of extraordinary events, it happened that this laſt clauſe was not executed, and conſequently Poland may be thought not to be too forward in performing it. The elector of Brandenburg, ever watchful of his intereſts, renewed his demands a thouſand times, and tired with receiving no ſatisfactory anſwer, he reſolved at laſt to do himſelf juſtice. He ordered ſome troops to march towards Elbing, and the town, without making the leaſt reſiſtance opened the gates on the 11th of November 1698.

Auguſtus II, king of Poland, complained of this as an enormous breach of the law of nations. He ſought to intimidate the elector, but not ſucceeding, and unwilling to make himſelf a dangerous enemy, at a time when he was filling the north with his intrigues, and meditating a rupture with Sweden, he liſtened to an accommodation, which was ſigned at Warſaw the 12th of December 1699. In this treaty are renewed all the articles of the perpetual alliance of Velau.

" The elector of Brandenburgh engages to reſign to the Poles, the 1ſt of February 1700, the town of Elbing, on condition, that they pay him three hundred thouſand rixdollars, three months after the meeting of the next diet, and that on the eve of the evacuation of Elbing, the crown jewels be put into his hands by way of pledge. In caſe the Poles break their engagement, the elector ſhall re-enter Elbing, and receive the income of its territory till the whole ſum is paid[c].

EMPEROR and SWEDEN.

" The emperor and king of Sweden ſhall reſpectively keep to the diſpoſition of the treaty of Oſnabrug."

HOUSE of HOLSTEIN.

" The king of Denmark ſhall ſatisfy the duke of Reſwic-Holſtein-Gottorp."

Accordingly Frederic III, king of Denmark, and the duke of Holſtein, ſigned at Copenhagen, the 22d of May 1658, a treaty, by which the king reſigned to the duke, for himſelf and his heirs male, the duchy of Sleſwic and the iſle Fehmeren, in full ſovereignty; transferred to him the chapter of Sleſwic, except four prebends, and gave him the bailiwic of Schwabſtadt. The ancient unions of 1533 and 1623 were alſo renewed; that is the community of government was confirmed, which gives an equal power to the two parties over the duchy of Holſtein, both alike receiving the homage and oath of fealty of the ſubjects, who are to obey only the orders which ſhall proceed from the common regency of the two ſovereigns.

A more faulty government can hardly be conceived. If it had been intended that peace ſhould ſubſiſt between the kings of Denmark and the dukes of Holſtein, the dominions, and not the authority, ſhould have been ſhared[d]. This treaty was accompanied with two diplomas of Frederic III, ratified by the Daniſh ſenate.

" The tranſactions paſſed at Copenhagen the 22d of May 1658, between the king of Denmark and the duke of Sleſwic Holſtein Gottorp, ſhall be exactly obſerved."

COURLAND.

" The duke of Courland, who ſhall be reſtored to his dominions, promiſes that no offence or repriſal ſhall be committed againſt Sweden, ſaving all allegiance to Poland.

" The kings of Sweden, as dukes of Livonia, ſhall not exact for the future any ſervice from the dukes of Courland."

POLAND. RUSSIA.

" The duchies of Smolenſko, Severia, Czernigove, and the city of Kiow, and the territory of a mile from its walls, ſhall remain to the czar. The Boriſthenes, from Kiow to Tartaro, ſhall ſerve for a boundary to the two powers.

" The preceding truces ſhall be maintained in their full force, except the articles from which it ſhall be derogated.

" The czar ſhall not take under his protection the Coſſacks, on the right of the Boriſthenes. Nor ſhall Poland protect thoſe on the left of the ſame river.

" The parties ſhall inform the Nogais Tartars of their amity. If theſe people make any irruption into their territories, both powers ſhall repulſe them.

" If they are ſupported by the Turks, war ſhall be declared againſt them."

" The Muſcovites ſhall admit no ſubjects of Poland into their troops, nor the Poles any Muſcovites into theirs."

RELIGION.

" The catholics of Ducal Pruſſia ſhall have the free exerciſe of their religion, and ſhall fill all ſorts of civil employments.

" The catholics of the iſle of Ruynen ſhall not be diſturbed for their faith, but ſhall perform divine ſervice in their own houſes only. The Livonians ſhall enjoy the ſame privileges.

" All the ſubjects of Sweden and Ruſſia trading with one another, ſhall freely profeſs their religion. They ſhall be allowed to aſſemble in their own houſes, but ſhall not build churches. The Ruſſians ſhall keep their church at Revel.

" In the places yielded by Ruſſia to Poland, and by Poland to Ruſſia, there ſhall be liberty of conſcience, but without the public exerciſe of the religion which ſhall not be the ſame as that of the prince. The Roman catholics however in the ſuburbs of Kiow and Smolenſko may have churches."

NAMES of the PRINCES, Parties, and Guarantees of the Peace of the North.

" The emperor Leopold, as head of the houſe of Auſtria, Charles XI, king of Sweden, John Caſimir king of Poland, and Frederic William elector of Brandenburg, do

[c] This knotty affair ſtill remains in ſtatu quo, and will long remain ſo, if ſome expedient is not found againſt the fatal conſequences of unanimity in the votes of the diets.

[d] Accordingly this union or community of authority has cauſed a perpetual diſſention, of which the king of Denmark has availed himſelf, to deprive the duke of part of his dominions, with whom he ought to have governed there in common.

agree to guarantee the treaty of Oliva. If any one of them ſhall be attacked or moleſted, contrary to the diſpoſition of this treaty, good offices ſhall firſt be uſed; but if the injuries are done by arms, the injured party ſhall be aſſiſted with forces within two months after requiring it, and till peace ſhall be firmly eſtabliſhed.

" The ſame princes guaranty in the ſame manner all the articles of the treaty of Copenhagen between Sweden and Denmark; and the treaty concluded there ſhall be deemed part of that of Oliva.

" The king of France guaranties all the articles of the treaties of Oliva and Copenhagen.

" England and the United Provinces are alſo guarantees of the treaty of Copenhagen, and promiſe, whenever required, to avenge the breaches of the ſame."

When theſe treaties were concluded, guarantees or ſureties had not been long uſed in Europe. Some other thing was to ſupply their place; for princes never relied much upon reciprocal promiſes. For a good while the obſervance of treaties was ſworn upon the moſt noted relicks, upon a piece of the real croſs, upon the evangeliſts, and upon the Hoſt, or body of Chriſt. It was promiſed not to procure abſolution from the oath, and in caſe of infraction, to ſubmit to the eccleſiaſtical cenſures. In the famous treaty of Cambray, concluded the 3d of Auguſt 1529, between Francis I, and Charles V, in explanation of the treaty of Madrid, we find a ſtriking inſtance. Theſe princes, " in caſe of contravention, ſubmit themſelves to the eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions, coercions, and cenſures, even to the calling in of the ſecular arm, and do appoint their procurators, in forma cameræ apoſtolicæ, to appear in their names at the court of Rome, before our holy father the pope, or the auditors of the Rota, and voluntarily to undergo the condemnation and fulmination of the ſaid cenſures."

Theſe precautions were not thought ſufficient, the princes never made a treaty without naming conſervators, who were to ſee to the execution of the articles. Theſe were ſometimes only miniſters, whoſe duty it was to confer together from time to time at a place appointed, to repair amicably the breaches of the treaties, to puniſh the tranſgreſſors, and to clear difficulties unforeſeen or ariſing from ambiguous expreſſions. The cuſtom of conſervators, ſtill practiſed at this day between the Ottoman Port and the neighbouring princes, was a wiſe regulation, eſpecially at a time when the princes had no ordinary embaſſadors at each others courts. Sometimes, but more rarely, the conſervation of the peace in their governments, was in a ſpecial manner committed to the provincial governors. They judged ſovereignly of all complaints brought to them on this ſubject, puniſhed the tranſgreſſors, and repaired the injuries.

There was a third kind of conſervators, who (to uſe the antique expreſſion) gave their ſeal to the treaties, and engaged by a particular act, to declare even againſt their ſovereign, in caſe of ſome violation on his part, and to eſpouſe the intereſts of his enemy. Not only the ſeal of the greateſt lords of a ſtate, but moreover the ſeal of the principal cities was required. Thus in the treaty of Senlis, the 23d of May 1493, the cities of Paris, Roan, Lyons, Poitiers, Tours, Angers, Orleans, Amiens, and Tournay, are named for Charles VIII; and the cities of Louvain, Bruſſels, Antwerp, Douay, Bois-le-Duc, Gant, Bruges, Lille, Arras, St. Omers, Mons, Valenciennes, Utrecht, Middleburg, and Namur, for the emperor Maximilian and the archduke Philip his ſon.

The lord of Bevres, one of the conſervators of the peace of Senlis, thus expreſſes himſelf in his ſeal: " Be it known that we, deſiring with all our power to obey my ſaid lords (Maximilian and his ſon) conſidering the great benefits which, from the ſaid peace and obſervance thereof, ſhall accrue to my ſaid lords the king of the Romans and archduke, have promiſed and ſworn, and do promiſe and ſwear by theſe preſents, to keep and cauſe to be kept the ſaid treaty in all and every of its points and articles. And that if it is tranſgreſſed by my ſaid lords the king of the Romans and the archduke his ſon, or by any other for them, (which God of his goodneſs forbid) and reſtitution or reparation for the tranſgreſſion be not made within ſix weeks after, we in that caſe ſhall be obliged to abandon my ſaid lords, king of the Romans and archduke, and each of them, and ſhall give in that caſe favour, aid, and aſſiſtance, to the moſt chriſtian king,"

It is in the treaty of Blois, the 12th of October 1505, that foreign princes are firſt named for conſervators. It is ſaid there, that Lewis XII, king of France, and Ferdinand king of Arragon, ſhall pray the king of England to be conſervator of their treaty [e], This example was followed in the treaty which was concluded three months after at Cambray, between Lewis XII. and the emperor Maximilian. " It is agreed (ſay theſe princes) that the pope, the kings of England and Arragon, and the princes of the empire, ſhall be conſervators of this treaty, that they ſhall ſee all the articles executed, and in caſe of contravention, they ſhall aſſiſt the injured party with all their forces [f]."

The treaties of Blois and Cambray are to be looked upon as the firſt model of the guarantees ſo common now-a-days. This method gained ground the more eaſily, as the princes had found by experience, that the moſt ſacred, the moſt ſolemn oaths, were but weak fences againſt intereſt, which had always broke through them without ſcruple. Beſides, by ſubmitting themſelves, in caſe of infraction, to excommunication and the cenſures of the church (as Charles VII. of France, and Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, ſay in the famous treaty of Arras) they degraded themſelves, and furniſhed pretences to the eccleſiaſtical power, to intermeddle in the temporal concerns of the kings, and to confound rights which, for the welfare of nations, cannot be ſeparated by bounds too ſettled or fixed.

The cuſtom of conſervators would have produced many diſorders, if it had been any thing but a matter of form. The lords and burghers of cities would have been judges of war and peace, and, under the pretence of fulfilling their engagements, might have got the habit of never obeying their prince. All theſe cuſtoms diſappeared according as the kings aggrandized their authority over their ſubjects, and policy tied them together with a ſtricter band [g].

CHAP. III.

Particular Treaties concluded between the ſeveral Powers of Europe, from the Treaty of Munſter to the Year 1701.

THE treaties collected under this head are all thoſe which have no relation to the grand pacifications, and are not conſiderable enough to deſerve ſingly a chapter apart.

The SWISS [h]. Their ALLIES.

The article that will be enlarged upon moſt, concerns the Helvetic Body. As the peace of Baden is to be ſpoken of,

[e] Rogabunt dicti Chriſtianiſſimus et Catholicus reges ſereniſſimum Angliæ regem, quod hujus pacis, fraternitatis et ligæ conſervator exiſtat.

[f] Conventum eſt quod ſanctiſſimus dominus noſter, ſereniſſimique regis Angliæ et Arragoniæ ac etiam ſacri Romani imperii principes ſint hujus pacis, unionis et concordiæ et ſingulorum in eis contentorum, conſervatores et fide-juſſores et totis viribus aſſiſtent ei qui prædicta obſervaverit contra alium non obſervaturum.

[g] It may rather be ſaid, that, according as the kings aggrandized their power over their ſubjects, and policy bound them together with a ſtricter band, they forfeited honour and conſcience; becauſe they perceived themſelves out of the reach of reproaches for the violation of a treaty or breach of their words. Often ſuch a reproach has been the motive alledged for a declaration of war. In fine, things are come to that paſs, that treaties are no longer to be relied on, than whilſt circumſtances remain in the ſame ſtate as when they were concluded. Neither oaths on the higher altar, nor dread of the juſt vengeance of heaven, nor the point of honour, have ſeldom any influence on royal conſciences. Conveniency has uſurped the place of honour and honeſty. Recourſe had been had to powerful guarantees; but to no purpoſe. The guarantee is a treaty, ſo is violated with the ſame eaſe as the treaty: it ought to eſtabliſh Good-Faith, but is the firſt to deſtroy it. This is one of the pernicious effects which ambition has ſpread through the world, and which has encreaſed in proportion as conſcience has loſt its power. The worſt is, it is an evil which at preſent ſeems incurable.

[h] Or Switzers, ſo called from the canton of Switz, which does not give name which ended the 7th of May 1656, the war between the cantons of Zurich and Bern, and thoſe of Lucern, Ury, Schwitz, Underwald, and Zug, it will be proper to give an account of the peace of Arau, the wiſe regulations whereof are capable of giving its full force to the antient union of the Swiſs.

There would have been no mention of their particular wars, nor of the treaties of peace by which they were ended, if the thirteen cantons by their union formed but one common-wealth, or if each, by virtue of the Helvetic conſtitutions and laws, was ſubject to a general diet, as the princes of the Germanic body are to the diet of the empire. But it is well known that the Helveric body ought rather to be called the League than the Republic of the Swiſs, and that the thirteen cantons form ſo many independent common-wealths. They are governed by very different principles; each has all the rights of Sovereignty, and treats at pleaſure with foreign ſtates[i]; their general diet has no power to make regulations, or impoſe laws[k].

"So far (ſays the author of the ſtate of Switzerland) are the thirteen cantons from making one body, that there are but the three moſt ancient cantons that are directly allied with each of the other twelve. Indeed there is ſuch a connexion eſtabliſhed among them, that if one canton was attacked, the other twelve would be obliged to march to its aſſiſtance; but it would be by the relation that two cantons may have with a third, and not by a direct alliance which each of the thirteen cantons has with all the reſt. For example, among the eight ancient cantons, Lucern can call only five to its aſſiſtance, in caſe of an attack; but then ſome of the five have a right to call in others with which they are allied, though Lucern be not; ſo that, in fine, they are all obliged to march by virtue of their particular alliances, and not by virtue of a general alliance between all the cantons."

Till the beginning of the thirteenth century, nothing was capable of breaking the union of the Switzers. Zuinglius in 1516 preached his new doctrines; they prevailed; and what could not be effected by ambition, jealouſy, difference of intereſts, or a government founded on impolitic principles, was brought about by religious diſputes. Animoſity, mixing with theſe diſputes, kindled a war, carried on with warmth, ſupported by obſtinacy, and which ended not till 1531, leaving to each canton liberty to profeſs what religion they pleaſed.

"Before the change of religion (ſays the forementioned author) which happened in Switzerland about the ſame time as in Germany, there were none but general diets, and the common intereſt of their country was managed with great zeal and unanimity. But ſince ſome of the cantons have embraced the proteſtant, and the reſt adhered to the catholic religion, their ſtate has been divided as well as their church. From that time their mutual confidence was loſt; the zeal of each party for their religion bred enmity, they became jealous of one another's deſigns, and the reformation may be ſaid to ſplit in two the Helvetic body. For as the intereſt of religion enters more or leſs into all their public actions, the general diets aſſemble now only to ſettle the affairs of their common bailiwicks, and to preſerve the external appearances of an union which no longer exiſts: whereas in effect all the public affairs of any importance are tranſacted in the particular diets of the two religions, the proteſtant diets meeting at Arau, and the catholic at Lucern. This canton being the moſt powerful among them, acts at the head of the catholics, as Zurich does of the proteſtants."

About the end of the year 1655, ſome inhabitants of the canton of Schwitz having embraced the proteſtant faith, had a mind to retire with their effects into the canton of Zurich. They were ſeized, and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the proteſtants, and the protection they granted theſe fugitives, they were condemned and executed as anabaptiſts. This was ſufficient to kindle a war. The cantons of Zurich and Bern reſolved to be revenged of the canton of Schwitz, which was ſupported by thoſe of Lucern, Ury, Underwald, and Zug. France and the cantons of Baſil, Friburg, Soleure, and Schafhauſen, interpoſed their mediation; an accommodation was made and ſigned at Baden the 7th or 8th of March 1656.

It was agreed that each canton ſhould enjoy its religion, independence, and rights of ſovereignty; that the deciſion of all diſputes, which ſhould ariſe about any matter whatever, between the members of the Helvetic League, ſhould be referred to arbitration. That there ſhould be liberty of conſcience in the provinces ſubject to the thirteen cantons; and as for what relates to the change of religion, and the liberty of going with their effects from one canton to another, each country ſhould conform to its ancient uſages and cuſtoms.

This was only to be a patched-up peace, ſince nothing in particular was ſettled concerning the cauſe of the diſputes by which the union was broke. However, ſtipulations ſo indeterminate and improper to cure the troubles wherewith the Helvetic body was threatened, ſerved to maintain the peace till 1712, when the cantons of Zurich and Bern took up arms in favour of the Toggenburgers.

The abbot of St. Gall, relying on the cantons of Lucern, Ury, Schwitz, Underwald, and Zug, who warmly eſpouſed his intereſts, had oppreſſed for ſome time the county of Toggenburg. This prelate daily formed new pretenſions on ſubjects who thought themſelves almoſt independent. He proceeded at laſt to moleſt them in the exerciſe of their religion, and, in a moment, the wiſdom and moderation for which the Helvetic body was ſo famous in Europe, was ſeen to vaniſh. All Switzerland was in arms; the forces aſſembled and marched; the catholics were defeated at Bremgarten, and the firſt treaty of Arau was concluded the 18th of July 1712.

The public tranquillity would from thence forward have been reſtored, if one defeat had been capable to diſcourage the Switzers. The cantons of Underwald, Schwitz, and Zug, refuſed to ratify the late peace. The war continued, and a ſecond battle was fought at Wilmergue the 25th of July. The catholics, entirely routed, had no other reſource but to ſign, the 9th of Auguſt, 1712, the ſecond treaty of Arau, by which the firſt was confirmed, and the conquerors gained ſtill more advantageous terms. But it was not till the 15th of June 1718, that the differences between the abbot of St. Gall and the count of Toggenburg were finally decided by the treaty of Baden.

Before the articles of this pacification are related, which is as famous in the Helvetic League, as the treaty of Munſter is in Germany, it muſt be remarked, that the Switzers, unwilling to ſacrifice their liberty to a deſire of aggrandizing themſelves, never interpoſe in the conteſts which ariſe between foreign powers. They obſerve an exact neutrality; are never guarantees of a treaty, and take no other advantage of the wars, by which Europe is often laid waſte, than to lend indifferently ſoldiers to their allies, and to the princes who apply for them. The Switzers deſire no more than the preſervation of their laws. They inhabit a country which cannot raiſe the ambition of any of their neighbours; and it may be ſaid, that they are ſtrong enough to defend it againſt the joint forces of all Europe. Invincible when they are united, and when they are only defending the entrance into their country, the nature of their government will not allow them to make any progreſs abroad. Why then ſhould they concern themſelves with the quarrels of their neighbours? If they are tied by treaties of friendſhip with the Griſons, the Valais, Neufchatel, St. Gall, Geneva, Mulhauſen, &c. and conſequently obliged to protect and defend them againſt the attacks of their enemies; it is becauſe theſe ſmall ſtates cannot draw them into any troubles; becauſe they have no ambition, becauſe they reſpect their neighbours; and forming for the moſt part a barrier to cover them, it would be the intereſt of the Helvetic body to aſſiſt them, though they were not bound to it by treaties.

The Swiſs have alliances with the pope, the empire, the court of Turin, the houſe of Auſtria, the grand duke of Tuſcany, &c. But theſe alliances are only for a certain term, and generally they are to laſt no longer than the reign of a prince, and the four or five firſt years of his ſucceſſor. They are confined to capitulations about the levy of troops in the cantons, about their pay, their diſcipline, their privileges, and in general contain nothing intereſting enough to find a place in this collection. It is not the ſame with the treaty of Bern, concluded in 1712 with the United Provinces, nor with the engagements entered into by Lewis XIV, the laſt year of his reign, with the catholic cantons, and the republic of Valais; and therefore they ſhall be mentioned after the treaties of Arau.

name to the reſt by way of eminence, but becauſe it was the firſt that aſſerted its liberty. The names of the thirteen cantons are, Zurich, Bern, Baſil, Schauf hauſen, (proteſtants) Ury, Schwitz, Underwald, Lucern, Zug, Friberg, Soleure or Solothurn, (catholics) Glars, and Appenzel, (proteſtants and catholics).

[i] Herein they differ from the United Provinces; but agree exactly with the princes and ſtates of the empire, according to the fourth article of the capitulation of the preſent emperor, and the 6th of that of the emperor Charles VI.

[k] Nor have the States-general of the United Provinces any ſuch power, becauſe each province preſerves its rights of ſovereignty.

The PEACE of ARAU.

" The cantons of Zurich and Bern ſhall poſſeſs the county of Baden, with its dependencies, including the city of Bremgarten."

Hitherto that county had belonged to the eight ancient cantons who conquered it in 1415, upon the houſe of Auſtria.

" All that part of the free bailiwic, commonly called Frey-Amter, which extends in a ſtrait line from Lunckhoſen to Farwangen, ſhall be reſigned to the ſaid two cantons, ſaving however to Glaris all its rights, as not taking part in the late quarrel. The other part of the free bailiwics ſhall remain with their old maſters. The canton of Bern ſhall be aſſociated to the co-ſovereignty of the ſeven ancient cantons, and its turn of regency ſhall be next to that of Zurich."

Frey-Amter had been conquered by the ſeven ancient cantons upon the houſe of Auſtria, at the ſame time with the county of Baden.

" Zurich and Bern ſhall poſſeſs the city of Rappenſuil, with its dependencies. Bern ſhall be admitted to the co-ſovereignty over Turgovia, Rheintal, and the county of Sargans, and ſhall exerciſe its regency next after Zurich."

Turgovia and Rheintal had been conquered by the ſeven ancient cantons upon the houſe of Auſtria. Appenzel, when made a canton, was admitted into the co-ſovereignty of Rheintal. The ſeven cantons had purchaſed the county of Sargans of the laſt count of that name.

" Stein ſhall no longer be included in the ſovereignty of Turgovia. The regency of that city ſhall belong to the Burghers, ſaving however the rights of the cantons of Bern, Friburg, and Soleure.

" The treaty of peace of 1531 is annulled, as if it had never been. The treaty of Arau ſhall for the future be a law to the cantons.

" The cantons of Zurich and Bern promiſe to leave entire liberty of conſcience to the inhabitants of the countries reſigned to them; to nominate to the eccleſiaſtical dignities ſubjects taken by turns in the catholic cantons who ſhare the ſovereignty, and to impoſe no new taxes. Thoſe who ſhall remove into ſome other part of Switzerland, or into a foreign country, ſhall pay no duty of exportation or importation for two years.

" In the provinces ſubject to cantons of different religions, the proteſtants ſhall enjoy the ſame privileges as the catholics; there ſhall be a perfect equality between them. Secret accuſations and informations ſhall be aboliſhed. Orphans ſhall have guardians of their own religion. One ſhall be called the catholic, and the other the evangelical religion; and it is equally forbid to the profeſſors to uſe any injurious or ludicrous terms, when ſpeaking of their reſpective religions. A malefactor condemned to die, ſhall be aſſiſted by a miniſter of the religion he requires.

" The catholics and proteſtants ſhall have their ſeparate baptiſmal fonts and burying-grounds in the places where the church is common to both religions; the firſt who ſhall officiate, ſhall be obliged to leave the church at eight o'clock in the morning during the ſpring and the ſummer, and in the other ſeaſons at nine, unleſs it be otherwiſe agreed. If either party deſire to build a church for their uſe, they may do it at their expence. From that time they ſhall loſe their right to the church they have left; it is allowed however to treat about the renunciation; that is to ſay the proteſtants, who, for example, intend to build a church, may impart their deſign to the catholics, and ſee what the others are willing to contribute towards it, that they may have a church to themſelves.

" The offices and magiſtracies ſhall be ſhared between perſons of both religions. The greffier of Turgovia ſhall be catholic, and the poſt of land-ammon in the ſame country ſhall be poſſeſſed by an evangelic. The firſt magiſtracy of Rheintal and Sargans ſhall be held by a catholic, and the ſecond by a proteſtant. The other officers, civil and military, as bailiffs, judges, ſummoners, procurators, advocates, &c. ſhall be half of one and half of the other religion. All affairs concerning the regale and general ordinances of the government, of the police and military, ſhall be brought to the general aſſembly of the cantons, who ſhall appoint an equal number of commiſſaries of both religions to give a definitive ſentence. In the general diets, there ſhall be two ſecretaries, one a catholic, the other a proteſtant; their regiſters ſhall be read in full aſſembly, and ſhall be rendered alike.

" No fortreſs ſhall be raiſed in the common lordſhips; and if the cantons come to wage war between them, neither of the contending parties ſhall ſolicit or compel the common ſubjects to take up arms in their favour."

PEACE of BADEN. ABBY of St. GALL. COUNTY of TOGGENBURG.

" The county of Toggenburg ſhall be ſubject to the abby of St. Gall, but ſhall preſerve all its ancient privileges. The council of Toggenburg ſhall conſiſt of thirty catholics and thirty proteſtants, choſen by the inhabitants themſelves. They ſhall take care of the rights and intereſts of the county. In caſe the abby and chapter of St. Gall ſhall refuſe them juſtice, they ſhall be allowed to apply to their allies, and demand their protection. The Toggenburgers ſhall freely profeſs the catholic or reformed religion, as they pleaſe. Each of the religions ſhall have an equal number of magiſtrates of their communion. The annual revenues of the county ſhall be divided in two parts, of which one ſhall belong to St. Gall, the other to the county."

CANTON of LUCERN. PRINCIPALITY of NEUFCHATEL.

" The canton of Lucern receives into its co-citizenſhip the duke of Longueville, count of Neufchatel and valengin, and alſo the country and inhabitants of theſe two counties, and promiſes to defend them againſt all violence whatſoever [a].

CANTON of BERN. UNITED-PROVINCES.

" The States-general of the United Provinces, and the canton of Bern, mutually promiſe a ſtrict and perpetual friendſhip.

" The republic of Bern ſhall defend the United Provinces, when their territories, or the barrier aſſigned them by the peace, ſhall be attacked. The States-general ſhall be allowed to employ the troops of this canton that they have in their pay, for the defence of all the Britiſh dominions in Europe.

" The canton of Bern ſhall leave to the States-general the twenty-four companies which are in their ſervice; but if any foreign power attacks the ſaid canton directly or indirectly, they may be recalled. If Bern is in war with ſome other canton, the States-general ſhall not be obliged to ſend back the ſaid companies, but ſhall pay in that caſe a ſubſidy equivalent to the pay of thoſe troops. They ſhall alſo pay the ſame ſubſidy, if Bern, when engaged in a foreign war, does not recall the twenty-four companies. In caſe they are recalled, the canton of Bern promiſes to ſend them back as ſoon as it ſhall be convenient. During peace, the United Provinces may reduce each company to 150 men.

" Whenever the United Provinces ſhall maintain a defenſive war, the republic of Bern ſhall promiſe to levy four thouſand men, and furniſh recruits to keep them compleat, unleſs the canton is at war itſelf, or have juſt cauſe to dread hoſtilities from ſome of its neighbours.

" The States-general engage to defend the canton of Bern, the city of Geneva, the counties of Neufchatel and Valengin, Bienne and Munſterthal, whenever they ſhall be attacked by any foreign power [b].

" The twenty-four companies in pay of the States-general ſhall be given only to the burghers of the city of Bern, or the ſubjects of that canton. When the States-general ſhall make new levies in Bern, the canton ſhall name the captains.

" Theſe companies ſhall not be employed in prejudice to the treaties between the Helvetic Body and France and Auſtria. But as theſe treaties are purely defenſive, Bern will not permit France or the houſe of Auſtria to uſe its ſubjects beyond the terms preſcribed, or to employ them againſt the United Provinces or their barrier.

[a] The general articles propoſed by the ſtates of Neufchatel and Valengin to the king of Pruſſia, when, after the death of the ducheſs of Nemours, his majeſty took poſſeſſion of that ſtate, and which his majeſty accepted and ratified the 10th of Auguſt 1707, made not the leaſt mention of this citizenſhip. Rouſſet.

[b] That is to ſay, in the ſaid ſtates, for it cannot be ſuppoſed that the king of Pruſſia, for example, attacked in Cleves, can, as count of Neufchatel, demand the aſſiſtance of the States-general.

The

" Theſe troops in the pay of the States-general ſhall ſerve only by land. They ſhall not be tranſported beyond ſea, except to Great-Britain when that kingdom is attacked."

This laſt article belongs to the convention of the 5th of January 1714, ſigned at the Hague by the States-general and the canton of Bern. The reſt of the articles concerning the diſcipline of the Swiſs are not worth mentioning.

GRISONS[c]. UNITED PROVINCES.

" There ſhall be for ever a defenſive league of friendſhip between the United Provinces and the Griſons.

" The Grey Leagues engage to defend the poſſeſſions and barrier of the States-general, and agree that the Griſons in their pay ſhall be employed in defence of all the dominions of Great Britain in Europe.

" The States-general ſhall always keep in their ſervice ſix companies of Griſons, whoſe officers ſhall be permitted to raiſe the neceſſary recruits to complete them in the territories of the Grey Leagues. If the Griſons are obliged to maintain a defenſive war, the United Provinces ſhall pay them a ſubſidy equivalent to the pay of the ſix companies. In this caſe, the Leagues may recall two thirds of the officers, if the States-general are in peace, and one third if in war. The ſix companies ſhall not be recalled at any time nor on any account.

" If the States-general are attacked, they ſhall raiſe two thouſand men and recruits in the territories of the Griſons, unleſs they themſelves are in war, or have reaſon to fear being attacked.

" The States-general promiſe to defend, on all occaſions, the three Griſon Leagues, their country and their ſovereignty. They accede to the treaty which the Leagues made with England the 13th of March 1707, and engage to uſe their good offices for the entire execution thereof."

The treaty mentioned here was concluded at Coir by the emperor Joſeph and queen Anne, with the Griſons. The Leagues had granted the imperial troops free paſſage through their lands, on certain conditions which the courts of Vienna and London were not very forward to perform.

" The ſix companies of Griſons in the pay of the United Provinces, ſhall be conferred on ſubjects of the Leagues, and the States-general, in time of peace, may reduce them to 150 men each."

CATHOLIC CANTONS. REPUBLIC of the VALAIS. FRANCE.

" All the treaties of alliance concluded between France and the Helvetic Body ſhall be faithfully obſerved."

The treaty of Soleure, of which this is the firſt article, was concluded by Lewis XIV. with the catholic cantons and the republic of Valais, the 9th of March 1715.

" The alliance of Soleure is contracted in the name of all the kings of France, ſucceſſors of Lewis XIV. They ſhall ratify it at their acceſſion to the crown, and promiſe punctually to perform all the articles. The catholic cantons and republic of the Valais, ſhall at the ſame time renew their promiſes. Then thoſe things ſhall be provided for which ſhall not have been foreſeen in this treaty; and the abuſes redreſſed which the difference of times and circumſtances may have produced in the obſervation of any article.

" If the kingdom of France is attacked at home or from abroad, the catholic cantons ſhall promiſe, ſix days after notice, to make a levy not exceeding ſixteen thouſand men. It ſhall be made at the expence of the moſt Chriſtian king, who ſhall appoint the officers. Theſe troops ſhall be employed only at land. As ſoon as the war ſhall be ended, France ſhall ſend them back, paying them to the day of their arrival at their own homes.

" If the Helvetic Body, or any particular canton, is attacked by a foreign power, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhall ſend proper ſuccours. If troubled with inteſtine diſturbances, he ſhall uſe his good offices to bring the parties to a juſt accommodation. But in caſe that method does not ſucceed, he ſhall employ all his forces without any ſubſidy, to compel the aggreſſor to obſerve the regulations preſcribed by the alliances which the cantons have made.

" The king of France ſhall not permit his ſubjects to ſerve any power whatever againſt the Helvetic Body. On their part, the cantons or their ſubjects ſhall never act hoſtilely againſt the king of France, either by attacking his armies or invading his dominions.

" If a ſucceſſor of Lewis XIV. ſhall endeavour to retake the lands and demeans ſpecified in the alliance concluded by Francis I. in 1521 with the Helvetic Body, the cantons ſhall refuſe all aſſiſtance."

The demeans mentioned here are the ſtates of Italy, to which the kings of France had pretenſions, and which they have in vain tried to conquer by obſtinate wars. Theſe wars employed the reigns of Charles VIII, and his ſucceſſors, to Henry II. Lewis XIV, after the example of his predeceſſors who have treated with the Swiſs, ſtiles himſelf, in the alliance of Soleure, duke of Milan, count of Aſté, lord of Genoa, &c. The ſame titles had been aſſumed by him in the renewal of the alliance of the 1ſt of June 1658, and the 4th of September 1663.

It may be aſked whether the cuſtom of aſſuming the titles of certain provinces which a prince does not poſſeſs, but to which he has pretenſions, be equivalent to a proteſtation, and ſufficient to hinder preſcription. To this it may be anſwered; if a prince, who continues to take the title of a province of which he has been deprived, does nothing from whence it may be inferred that he authoriſes the uſurpation of his enemy, there is no doubt that his title anſwers to a continual proteſtation. But if he contradicts himſelf by his conduct, the titles he aſſumes, can be of no force, and are conſidered as the effect of his vanity. Theſe titles ſignify nothing at preſent in Europe. It is ſaid, Charles II. had a mind to ſell his title of " King of France" to Lewis XIV. but the French miniſter, to whom the offer was made, jocoſely replied, the king his maſter had alſo the title of " King of Navarre," which he would ſell a good bargain. It is cuſtomary in a treaty where one of the parties bears a title which the other cannot acknowledge, to inſert a particular clauſe, by which it is agreed, that the titles aſſumed by one party ſhall not prejudice the other.

" If the Swiſs league with France to make war againſt a common enemy, the parties ſhall agree upon the military operations, and conclude in concert, treaties of truce, ceſſation of arms, and of peace.

" Neither of the parties ſhall ſuffer the enemies of the other to remain in his dominions, or grant them paſſage or aid.

" If France ſhall attack the holy ſee, the empire, the houſe of Auſtria, the lordſhip of Florence, or any other ally of the Helvetic Body, the cantons and republic of the Valais ſhall not be obliged to aſſiſt. But in caſe the moſt Chriſtian king is attacked by any of theſe powers, they ſhall furniſh him with ſuccours.

" Both ſides are obliged to give free paſſage to the troops that ſhall march for the defence of one of the parties, or for the aſſiſtance of any of their allies. Exact diſcipline ſhall be obſerved on the road, and the ſoldiers ſhall pay ready money for what they ſhall want.

" The alliance of the kings of France, as the moſt ancient of the Helvetic Body, ſhall be preferred to that of all other ſtates."

PEACE of the HAGUE.

PORTUGAL, UNITED PROVINCES.

" The United Provinces renounce all their pretenſions to the Braſils, on condition, they ſhall be allowed to carry on there all ſorts of commerce, except of Braſil wood, and to navigate and trade in all the ports, roads, harbours and places which belong to the Portugueſe on the coaſt of Africa.

" The parties ſhall remain in poſſeſſion of the towns, places, caſtles, &c. which they hold in the Eaſt Indies or elſewhere, when the peace ſhall be publiſhed, each party renouncing all his pretenſions."

This treaty of alliance between Portugal and the United Provinces, was concluded at the Hague, the 6th of Auguſt 1661.

The United Provinces had made the themſelves maſters of Braſil and the Eaſt Indies whilſt Portugal was under the dominion of Spain. After the Portugueſe had recovered their independence, they ſought the friendſhip of the Dutch, who, in ſpite of treaties, continued the war underhand. The Portugueſe ſeriouſly thought of a defence, and by their

[c] The Griſons juſt entered into a league with one another in 1471, and with the Switzers in 1491. They are divided into three Leagues: 1. The Grey-League. 2. The League of the Houſe of God. 3. The League of the Ten Juriſdictions. Their name is derived from their wearing Grey Scarfs when they firſt leagued together.

wiſe conduct entirely drove the Dutch out of their ſettlements in Braſil in 1657. The States-general then declared war againſt Portugal, and refuſed the mediation of France and of Cromwell in 1658. This war was ended by the abovementioned treaty, which will be ſpoken of more largely in the chapter of commerce. In the mean time, it muſt be obſerved, that it is ſaid in the fourth article of this treaty "that if the king of Portugal breaks any of the conditions of the peace, the United Provinces ſhall be poſſeſſed again of all the rights they renounce. Thoſe of his Portugueſe majeſty ſhall alſo revive in caſe the States-general ſhall infringe any article of the treaty.

PEACE of BREDA.

England, United Provinces, France, Denmark, Biſhop of Munster.

Nothing very conſiderable paſſed in the war which was ended at Breda the 31ſt of July, 1667, between England on one part, and France, Denmark, and the United Provinces on the other. The hoſtilities had commenced two years before, on account of ſome forts which the Engliſh had taken on the coaſt of Guinea, and from which they were driven by the Dutch. The United Provinces, faintly ſupported by allies, who had unwillingly engaged in their quarrel, and eſpecially by the king of France who wiſhed to ſee an end of the war, very readily conſented to an accommodation. This peace altered not the ſituation of the parties. All was reſtored that they had taken from each other during the war, and after the uſual articles in all the treaties of peace, or ſuch which relate only to the circumſtances of the times, there were hardly any ſtipulations but what concerned commerce.

After the death of Charles I. Cromwell, who, under the title of Protector, was become abſolute king of England, never failed to inſert in all his treaties with foreign ſtates, that they ſhould not harbour within their dominions any rebel or public enemy of his government. At his acceſſion to his father's throne, Charles II. followed Cromwell's example, and in a treaty of Breda, the States-general engaged not to receive into their dominions any ſuch perſons as ſhould be declared his enemies.

"All ſhips and veſſels of the United Provinces, as well men of war as merchant ſhips, ſhall ſtrike the flag and lower the ſail when they meet any Engliſh men of war in the Britiſh ſeas".

Thirteen years before, Cromwell had obliged the Dutch to this ſalute by the treaty of Weſtminſter of the 15th of April 1654.

The accommodation concluded between Charles II. and Frederic III. king of Denmark, contains two important articles. In the firſt, "it is agreed, that the debt of 120,000 rixdollars contracted by the Daniſh king with the Engliſh company of merchants at Hamburgh, ſhall be remitted." By the other "Frederic preſerves his claims to the Orcades and the iſle of Hitland, which the kings of Norway had formerly mortgaged to Scotland, on condition of redeeming them at pleaſure." Theſe articles are in the act ſigned by the embaſſadors of Sweden and France at the congreſs of Breda.

The biſhop of Munſter took part in the quarrel between England and Holland. The prelate who then held that biſhopric, was the famous Van-Galen, ſo noted for his military genius and qualities. Ever reſtleſs, always in action, peace was to him an unnatural ſtate, and he was by turns enemy or ally of all the powers he could attack, or who enabled him to make war.

This biſhop, to whom Charles II. had promiſed conſiderable ſubſidies, invaded the province of Over-Yſſel, and, as if the very name of the United Provinces had been to be extirpated, he began hoſtilities with ravages worthy of an Attila. He had made ſeveral conqueſts, when the Dutch took from him Lokon. This check, the ſlowneſs of England to ſend him ſuccours, and the good offices of France, determined him to hearken to an agremeent. His treaty of peace with Holland was concluded at Cleves the 18th of April, 1666. The emperor, Lewis XIV. the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Brandenburg, the dukes of Newburg, Brunſwic and Lunenburg, and the biſhop of Paderborn, were guarantees.

"Saving all the rights of the empire, the biſhop of Munſter renounces all pretenſion of ſuperiority over the city and caſtle of Borculoe."

PEACE of LISBON.

Spain, Portugal.

This treaty ended the war between theſe two powers, which began in 1640, at the time of the famous revolution in Portugal, the hiſtory of which is univerſally known. The Spaniards ceaſed not to treat the Portugueſe as rebels, till they deſpaired of reducing them. France had in vain laboured a reconciliation between them at the congreſs of Munſter and the Pyrenees.

"Spain reſigns to the houſe of Bragança, the kingdom of Portugal, acknowledges it independent, and reſerves only the town of Ceuta."

The treaty, of which this is the ſecond article, was ſigned at Liſbon, the 13th of February, 1668.

PEACE of AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

France, Spain.

At the death of Philip IV. king of Spain, the 17th of September, 1665, Lewis XIV. pretended that his queen had a right to Brabant, the Cambreſis, the duchies of Luxemburg, Namur, &c. by virtue of the laws in theſe countries with regard to ſucceſſions. The king of France ſent his demands to his catholic majeſty, who rejected them with diſdain. During the year and half that he refuſed to liſten to a negociation, he imprudently neglected to put the Netherlands in a ſtate of defence. Lewis XIV. invaded them about the end of May 1667. His conqueſts were rapid; Tournay and Oudenarde held out but two days, Douay three, Liſle nine. Holland was alarmed, and, with England and Sweden, concluded, the 23d of January 1668, an alliance, commonly called the Triple League. They offered their mediation, and, "in caſe the king of France ſhall refuſe to accept of the peace concerted by this treaty, England and Holland ſhall be obliged to make war againſt France till things be reduced to the condition they were in at the Pyrenean treaty."

As the Triple League did not anſwer the intended purpoſe, the reſult of it was another treaty, concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle the 2d of May following, which, inſtead of retrieving what was loſt, confirmed Lewis in the greateſt part of his conqueſts.

"Spain yields to France the cities and places of Binck, Charleroy, Aeth, Douay, fort Scarpe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Liſle, Armentiers, Courtray, Bergues, and Furnes, with all their dependencies.

PEACE of VERSAILLES.

France, Genoa.

The republic of Genoa, about the end of the year 1683, incurred the diſpleaſure of France. The Genoeſe were accuſed of hurting ſeveral branches of the French trade in Italy, of declaring indecently and on all occaſions in favour of the Spaniards, and of plotting with them to burn the gallies and ſhips in the ports of Marſeilles and Toulon. The marquis of Seignelay, charged with requiring ſatisfaction for theſe grievances, appeared before Genoa the 17th of May, 1684, with a large ſquadron. He offered peace to the Genoeſe, and threatened to bombard them in caſe of refuſal. The ſenate was obſtinate, and endured a ſevere bombardment. The ducal palace was burnt, with many other of the nobleſt in the city. They would not have attempted to reſiſt France, had not the large poſſeſſions of their nobles in the kingdom of Naples induced them to keep fair with Spain. The peace was concluded between France and Genoa at Verſailles, the 12th of February 1685, the doge and four ſenators having been obliged to come to the French court and make their ſubmiſſion.

"The lordſhip of Genoa renounces the treaties of league and aſſociation made ſince the beginning of 1683, and ſhall diſarm their gallies."

It is needleſs to mention what relates to the houſe of Fieſque; but the ſecond article of this treaty muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence. It is of importance, as it derogates from the fundamental laws of the republic of Genoa.

"The doge and the four ſenators which ſhall repair to the court of France, ſhall be reſtored at their return to Genoa to the exerciſe of their poſts and dignities, and none ſhall be put into their places during their abſence or after their return, unleſs the uſual time of their office be expired."

In

In 1672, there arose some differences between Genoa and the duke of Savoy, about their respective limits. The mediation of the king of France suspended the first hostilities, and the peace was signed at Turin the 8th of March 1675. Nothing more is said of this treaty, as it caused no alteration in the affairs of the parties.

ACCOMMODATION of PISA.

HOLY SEE, FRANCE, House of FARNESE, MODENA, CORSICA.

"The Corsicans shall be declared incapable to serve in Rome, and in all the ecclesiastical state.

The treaty of Pisa, signed the 17th of February 1664, ended the quarrels between the court of France and the pope, on account of an insult on the duke de Crequy by the Corsican guard [d].

When this unhappy affair fell out, the two powers incensed against one another had not forgot their disputes about the immunities. France required a satisfaction the more authentic, as the pope seemed to countenance the insult of the guard, and to submit rather through fear than through justice. The 13th article of the treaty of Pisa, concerns the famous pyramid which Lewis XIV. suffered to be demolished in 1667, under the pontificate of Clement IX.

"The pope shall revoke the incameration of the duchies of Castro and Ronciglione. The duke of Parma shall take possession of them, paying to the apostolical chamber the sum he owes it, of a million three hundred twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and fifty crowns. This sum shall be delivered by two equal payments, and within the space of eight years. On the first payment the duke of Parma shall take possession of one half of these states [e].

This article was never executed. The court of Rome having been reconciled to France, constantly refused to resign these duchies, and the house of Farnese, too weak to compel the pope to perform his engagements, was satisfied with protesting against the injustice done them. This affair might have had a different issue, had not don Carlos, who inherited all the rights of the house of Farnese, given up by the treaty of Vicara in 1738, the duchy of Parma to the emperor Charles VI, who engaged not to prosecute the disincameration of Castro and Ronciglione.

"The pope shall indemnify the duke of Modena for his pretensions to the place and the vallies of Comachio.

This convention has been no better executed than the foregoing; but the rights of the house of Este have not been weakened by any after-act.

RENUNCIATIONS.

HOUSE of ORLEANS. HOUSE of SAVOY.

In the contract of marriage of Anne of Orleans with Victor Amadeus duke of Savoy, is the following article:

"Anne of Orleans, daughter of Philip of France, duke of Orleans, and of Henrietta of England, renounces all rights which may belong or fall to her on her father's side.

HOUSE of SAVOY. HOUSE of BAVARIA.

In the contract of marriage of Adelaid of Savoy with Ferninand elector of Bavaria, the 4th of December 1650, is this article:

"Adelaid of Savoy, marrying Ferdinand of Bavaria, renounces all her rights, saving a portion of two hundred thousand gold crowns; but if the posterity of her brother Charles-Emanuel II, duke of Savoy, comes to fail, this renunciation shall be null, and Adelaid or her descendants shall be restored to all her rights."

HOUSE of BAVARIA. FRANCE.

In the contract of marriage of the princess of Bavaria with the Dauphin of France, signed at Munich the 30th of December 1679, is the following renunciation:

"Maria-Anna-Christina, electoral princess of Bavaria, and wife of Lewis Dauphin of France, son of Lewis XIV. makes a full and general renunciation in favour of the princes of her house, of all rights that may belong to her by her birth."

ACQUISITIONS. CONCESSIONS.

FRANCE. HOUSE of BOUILLON.

In a contract passed at Paris the 20th of March 1651, is the following article:

"In exchange of the sovereignties of Sedan, Rancourt, and part of the duchy of Bouillon, which the duke of that name possesses, the king of France gives him the duchies of Albert and Chateau-Thierry, the counties of Auvergne and Evreux, &c.".

UNITED-PROVINCES. TEUTONIC-ORDER.

In the treaty of the Hague the 14th of June 1662, between the archduke Leopold, as grand master of the Teutonic order, and the States-general, is this article:

"The States-general of the United Provinces resign to the Teutonic Order the sovereignty of the place and territory of Gemert, for forty thousand Florins, and on condition that the civil jurisdiction of that place shall remain to the city of Bois-le-Duc."

FRANCE. ENGLAND.

By a treaty concluded at London the 27th of October 1662, it was agreed:

"The town of Dunkirk, with all its fortifications and dependencies, the fort of Mardyke, the wooden fort, and the great and small fort between Dunkirk and Berg St. Vinox shall be delivered to the most Christian king, upon his paying five millions of livres Tournois to Charles II. king of England."

Cardinal Mazarin having formed the project of conquering the Spanish Netherlands, made a treaty with Cromwell, by an article of which Dunkirk was to remain in the hands of the English, when taken from the Spaniards. The cardinal's politics were greatly blamed, and very justly. It is visible, how detrimental it was to the French for England to be possessed, on their frontiers, of a place of such importance. Mazarin alledged in his justification, that Cromwell was to be gained, which nothing could effect but the cession of Dunkirk. Possibly he was in the wrong; it was the protector's interest to declare against Spain; if he seemed not to know it, 'twas only an artifice to sell the dearer his alliance and succours to the enemies of the court of Madrid. The cardinal was here over-reached, who was always inclined to believe what he feared [f].

SWEDEN. UNITED-PROVINCES.

"The king of Sweden and the Swedish African company renounce all their pretensions to Cabo-Corso, and tranfer to the Dutch East-India company all their rights to that place, and to their other establishments on the coast of Guinea."

[d] The French in foreign countries relying on the power of their monarch are often very insolent: This occasioned the insult of the Corsicans on the servants of the duke and duchess of Crequy, Aug. 20, 1622. As it is known that don Mario Chigi, brother of pope Alexander VII. and general of the ecclesiastical state, had exasperated the Corsicans by threatning to break those who suffered themselves to be insulted by any Frenchman; it is not doubted that his holiness was concerned in the affair, and as the duke of Crequy could not obtain satisfaction, he left Rome with all the great men adherents to France. The king, who was before displeased with the pope, who had refused to agree with the dukes of Parma and Modena, took Avignon, and declared war against the pope, whom he treated much in the same manner as he afterwards did the Genoese in 1684; for his holiness was obliged to send his nephew with the character of Legate into France, where he pronounced, at the foot of the throne, a speech the most submissive and mortifying, such as the pride of that monarch had dictated, and which may be seen in the treaty itself in Part III. Tom. VI. of the diplomatic body p. 2. Of the 15 Articles, only those directly relating to his most Christian majesty were performed.

[e] The history of this incameration or re-union to the ecclesiastical state of which these duchies were fiefs, is very curious, but too long to be inserted here. The ambition of the Barberinis, nephews of Urban VIII. was the rise of it in 1626, and the incameration was made in 1646, under Innocent X. on pretence that duke Ranuco, son and successor of Odoardo, who had these disputes with the Barberinis, had not paid to the mounts of piety that sum which his father and he owed them.

[f] If the cardinal was condemned for giving up Dunkirk to the English, what must we say of king Charles II, who wantonly sold so important a place to the French for a little ready money?

It

This treaty was concluded at the Hague the 28th of July 1667, to put a ſtop to the hoſtilities which the trading companies of Sweden and Holland began to commit againſt one another. The Swedes demanded ſome arrears of ſubſidies, which they pretended were due from the United Provinces. The Dutch, on their ſide, complained that Sweden had not furniſhed all the ſuccours agreed upon by former treaties.

HOUSE of BRANDENBURG. UNITED-PROVINCES.

'Frederic-William, elector of Brandenburg, reſigns in full property to the States-general the fort of Schenk [b].'

This is the ſecond article of the treaty between theſe two powers, concluded at Cologne on the Spree the 8th of March 1678.

FRANCE. STRASBURG.

'The pretor, conſuls and magiſtrates of Straſburg, and the city, acknowledge the king of France for their ſovereign lord and protector.'

This act of 1681, between Lewis XIV. and the magiſtrates of Straſburg, of itſelf invalid, has ſince been ratified at the peace of Ryſwic by the general diet of the empire.

FRANCE. SPAIN.

'The ſubjects of France and Spain ſhall freely navigate and fiſh in the river Bidaſſon and in the road of Figuier. The French ſhall be allowed to come near Fontarabia, and the Spaniards near Andaye, provided they are not armed or have obtained leave to be ſo of the governors of theſe places.'

This convention was ſigned at Madrid the 19th of October 1683.

HOUSE of SAVOY. UNITED-PROVINCES.

'Victor-Amadeus, duke of Savoy, re-eſtabliſhes the Vaudois, of the pretended reformed religion, in the poſſeſſion of all their goods, and grants them the free exerciſe of their worſhip, and alſo to all other his ſubjects who ſhall retire and ſettle in the valleys of the Vaudois.'

By this treaty made at the Hague the 20th of October 1690, the duke of Savoy acceded to the treaty which was concluded at Vienna the 12th of May 1689, between the emperor and the United Provinces, and which was afterwards called the Grand Alliance, becauſe all the enemies of France came into it.

ALLIANCES. GUARANTEES. POLAND. DENMARK.

'The kings of Denmark and Poland form a perpetual alliance, and promiſe to aſſiſt each other with all their forces, when either ſhall be attacked by Sweden. They promiſe, when they have once taken up arms, not to make a ſeparate peace.'

In conſequence of this treaty of Aſtmen, the 28th of July 1657, Denmark aſſiſted Poland during the war with Guſtavus-Adolphus, which was ended by the peace of Oliva.

Some politicians blame theſe kinds of alliances which are made for no limited time. They juſtly obſerve that from thence, there ariſes an engagement which may be detrimental to one of the parties when his circumſtances are altered, or hinder him often from taking advantages which the ever fluctuating courſe of affairs offer him [c]. If the great ſtates ſhould not make perpetual alliances, it is not the ſame with leſſer ſtates, whoſe true intereſt it is to conſult their own preſervation, by putting themſelves under the protection of a powerful neighbour.

The clauſe by which two allies promiſe not to make peace but in concert, has its limitations. 'It would not be juſt (ſays the author upon the principles of law and morality) that the tranquillity of all the confederate ſtates ſhould abſolutely depend upon a ſingle ally who ſhould obſtinately refuſe reaſonable overtures of peace. Let us try to fix theſe limitations as the law of nations requires.'

'A prince who is willing to negociate a peace, ought not to conclude any thing with the common enemy, without the knowledge of his allies, and without having himſelf declared that he will not leave them, unleſs they reject propoſals reaſonable on the whole. He ought to act ſincerely according to this declaration; ſo that as long as his allies do not perverſely reject ſuch propoſitions, the execution whereof ought to be conſidered as a juſt reſult of the war, he ſhould not make his ſeparate peace.'

Theſe reflections are very juſt, and ought to regulate the conduct of princes, who, joining in a league, are not agreed on the objects they propoſe by the war. But when they covenant not to lay down their arms till ſuch or ſuch ſatisfaction is obtained; the theſis is changed, and the articles agreed on being then conſidered as the juſt reſult of the war, ought to be performed before any of the allies can make his ſeparate peace; unleſs he is certain that his confederates will be beforehand with him, or is threatened with ruin by continuing the war. Every confederate prince, who, except in theſe two caſes, liſtens to any ſeparate agreement, his contract is invalid [d]. He may conſequently break his engagements, provided he returns to the ſame ſituation he was in when his contract was made. To conclude, every ally that treats ſeparately, ſhould have the prudence to ſtipulate that his private conventions ſhould be included in the final treaties of the general peace.

FRANCE. NEUFCHATEL.

'There ſhall be perpetual alliance and friendſhip between the crown of France and the ſovereignty of Neufchatel and Valengin [e]. The moſt Chriſtian king ſhall at pleaſure raiſe levies of men in thoſe two countries, after notice given to the ſovereign. All thoſe that are willing to enter into the ſervice of France, ſhall be free to do it. Their prince ſhall not recal them till he is attacked; and in that caſe his ſubjects ſhall not withdraw without leave, which ſhall always be granted. They ſhall have the ſame pay as the Swiſs; and throughout the kingdom they ſhall enjoy the privileges granted, or to be granted, to the cantons of the Helvetic body.

'The inhabitants of Neufchatel and Valengin ſhall not ſerve directly or indirectly againſt the king of France. Their courts ſhall refuſe paſſage to his enemies, and grant it to all the troops in the pay of France. Two companies of the Swiſs guards of the moſt Chriſtian king ſhall be commanded by officers natives of theſe two counties or derived from thence.'

This treaty was concluded at Paris the 12th of December 1657, between Lewis XIV. and the duke of Longueville, prince and ſovereign of Neufchatel and Valengin.

ENGLAND. UNITED PROVINCES.

"If any prince or ſtate whatever ſhall invade the dominions of the king of Great Britain, or commit any hoſti-

[b] It ſhould have been added, 'with the ſovereignty of the territory where the fort was built in 1586, at the time when the dukes of Gueldres and Cleves were diſputing about the bounds of their dominions, of which the territory where Schenk was built, was part."

[c] This reaſoning, extremely juſt in itſelf, held good in thoſe happy times when ſincerity was not yet baniſhed, when the French diſtinction of the ſpirit and letter of a treaty was unknown, or when the diabolical political theſis was not yet maintained, that "a prince is a fool who keeps his word when it is no longer his intereſt:" And that "he ought to break the treaty when the circumſtances which occaſioned it are changed."

[d] This is what may juſtly be ſaid of queen Anne's ſeparate peace with Lewis XIV. in 1712. Since the end of the war, which was not to leave Spain and the Indies in the houſe of Bourbon, was not accompliſhed. The emperor Charles VI, ſaid the miniſters who made the peace, would be too powerful if he poſſeſſed all the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria with the empire. They might be in the right; but was there no medium? could not the crown of Spain be placed on the head of a prince who could give no umbrage to the two houſes, as the prince of Bavaria? The ſame may be ſaid of the ſeparate peace which Charles VI. made with the Turks at Belgrade, without including the Ruſſians, who were forced to renounce the advantages they could reap from the great conqueſts they had made to the mouth of the Boriſthenes, and from thence beyond the Nieſter into Moldavia. But the king of France, who had kindled the war to weaken both the emperor and the Ruſſians, omitted nothing to engage the emperor to make his peace when fortune had turned againſt him, before the rapid progreſs of count Munich had drawn him out of his ill ſituation, ſo that he purchaſed peace with the ceſſion of Belgrade and the kingdom of Servia. Rouſſet.

[e] Rouſſet obſerves this alliance was not perpetual, and remarks, that theſe ſovereignties have their ſtates like Holland, Languedoc, Bretagne, and that there is a difference between contracting with theſe ſovereignties or with their ſovereign.

This

lities againſt him, the States-general ſhall aſſiſt him, within ſix months after they are demanded, with forty men of war, fourteen of them to carry from 60 to 80 guns and 400 men each; fourteen more from 50 to 60 guns and at leaſt 300 men each; and none of the remaining twelve leſs than 36 guns and 150 men; and, beſides, with 6000 foot and 400 horſe.

"Three years after the expiration of the war, during which the States-general ſhall furniſh theſe aids, the charges ſhall be refunded by England. To prevent diſputes on this head, the charges of the firſt fourteen ſhips are fixed at 18,866l. ſterling; the other fourteen at 14,000l. ſterling; and the reſt are valued at 6000l. The charge of the 6000 foot ſhall be 7500l. and of the 400 horſe, 1040l. for every month; but for the firſt month there ſhall be 6000l. paid over and above, for the foot, that being neceſſary for their levying and arming.

"The king obliges himſelf in the ſame manner and in the ſame proportions, to aſſiſt the Dutch againſt any enemy.

"The auxiliary troops and ſhips on either ſide ſhall be under the command of the party attacked or injured."

This treaty made at the Hague the 23d of January 1668, deſerved mention, though it was never executed, and was even ſuperſeded by the alliance between Charles II. and the States-general, concluded the 3d of March 1678, of which an account will be given in the next chapter.

It is cuſtomary to agree in the treaties of alliance, that one of the parties ſhall aſſiſt the other when attacked in any of his dominions. Many condemn this manner of ſtipulation, and think it wrong, in that it may engage a ſtate in an unjuſt quarrel, and change a defenſive into an offenſive league; for it daily happens, that a prince who is attacked the firſt by way of arms, is however the aggreſſor; either becauſe he has refuſed a reaſonable ſatisfaction for ſome injury, or becauſe he will not reſign what he unjuſtly detains.

It is eaſy to anſwer theſe objections. So far is a prince from being bound to aſſiſt an ally who has made himſelf enemies by his ill conduct, that he is not to ſide with him. Hence it is plain, the other objection falls of itſelf, and it is not to be feared that a defenſive alliance will be changed into an offenſive. Indeed, in doubtful caſes, where both parties ſeem to have right on their ſide, the intereſts of an ally are to be defended; and it muſt be confeſſed, morality cannot diſapprove of ſuch a conduct.

It appears reaſonable to ſtipulate as is uſually done; for when a defenſive league is formed, the queſtion being to ſet forth preciſely and clearly the caſe of the alliance, a fixed, certain, and indiſputable point muſt be determined. And what other point can be choſen but an act of hoſtility? Any other grievance whatſoever, that ſhall be taken for the caſe of the alliance, may form an inexhauſtible fountain of complaints, diſputes, and contentions. Treaties of defenſive alliance, which are ſo advantageous to nations, would become uſeleſs, becauſe their force would be eaſily eluded.

In following the uſual method of treating, the public tranquility is ſecured. A prince who knows that the beginning hoſtilities will draw upon him the forces of the allies of his enemy, will not be ſo apt to come to an open rupture. He curbs his paſſions, tries all amicable ways, and forgets nothing to ſhew the juſtice of his own, and the injuſtice of his adverſary's cauſe. Any cuſtom proper to enlarge the empire of reaſon and good-faith among men, ought to be readily adopted, though in certain caſes it may be liable to ſome inconveniencies.

Formerly they were very careful to covenant in defenſive alliances, that the promiſed aid ſhould not be given till two, three, or even four months after its being demanded; and this interval was to be employed in reconciling the contending parties. Our modern plenipotentiaries have neglected theſe important clauſes; there is ſcarce any mention of the interpoſition of good offices and mediation, which muſt be prejudicial to the tranquility of Europe.

ENGLAND. DENMARK.

"There ſhall be perpetual alliance and friendſhip between the kings of England and Denmark, and each king promiſes not to ſupply the enemies of the other with military ſtores, &c. If the king of Denmark's dominions are invaded, the king of England will aſſiſt him with all his forces."

In this treaty of Weſtminſter 1669, between England and Denmark, it is not ſaid that Denmark ſhall aſſiſt England in caſe of an invaſion.

DENMARK. UNITED PROVINCES.

"If any power attacks the dominions of his Daniſh majeſty in Europe, the United Provinces ſhall ſend him, at their expence, and within two months after demand, ſuch ſuccours as ſhall be judged neceſſary for his defence. If the firſt aid be not ſufficient, the United Provinces ſhall act with all their forces and declare war againſt the aggreſſor, without requiring any thing of the king of Denmark for the charge of the war.

"If the States-general are in the ſame caſe, the king of Denmark ſhall ſend them, within two months after demand, an aid of forty ſhips of war, and ten thouſand land forces.

"The United provinces ſhall pay a ſubſidy of 600,000 rix-dollars for equipping and maintaining the ſhips; 100,000 rixdollars for the levy of the land forces, and 40,245 rix-dollars every month for their ſubſiſtence. If they ſhall want any farther aſſiſtance, the king of Denmark ſhall provide twenty thouſand land forces, and the States-general ſhall double their ſubſidies. In fine, the king of Denmark ſhall be obliged, if circumſtances require it, to act with all his forces and declare war.

"The operations of the war ſhall be concerted by the generals of both parties, and neither of them ſhall be free to enter into treaty, to conclude truce or peace without the conſent of the other."

This treaty of alliance between Chriſtian V. and the United Provinces, was concluded at Copenhagen the 20th of May 1673[f].

FRANCE. SWEDEN.

"There ſhall be a perpetual[g] alliance between the kings of France and Sweden, for the maintenance of the treaties of Weſtphalia. If one of the parties is attacked contrary to the regulations of that peace, the other ſhall aſſiſt with all his forces."

This treaty of Verſailles the 25th of April 1675, between Lewis XIV. and Charles XI. is but a ſequel of that of 1672, concluded, in appearance, for the maintenance of the treaties of Weſtphalia, but in reality the king of France had ſollicited it only to engage the king of Sweden to renounce his alliance with the king of Spain, for whoſe ſervice his Swediſh majeſty was to hold in readineſs an army, in caſe France attacked any of the Spaniſh dominions. Beſides that, the chief aim of the king of France was to draw the king of Sweden to his ſide in the war he was then meditating to chaſtiſe the Hollanders for being unwilling to have him for a neighbour. And therefore to the defenſive treaty of 1672, were added thirteen ſeparate articles, which run upon the meaſures to be taken againſt the United Provinces. This treaty of Verſailles was concluded by meſſieurs Pompone and Spar, to confirm the ſeparate articles of that of 1672, in order to engage the king of Sweden to ſend an army into the empire againſt the princes who had declared in favour of the Dutch, particularly againſt the elector of Brandenburg. The Swediſh arms were unſucceſsful, and Charles XI. loſt all his German dominions; but Lewis XIV. was ſo generous to ſacrifice the greateſt part of his conqueſts, to recover, for his ally, at Nimeguen, the provinces which his ſubjects could not defend. Theſe treaties of 1672 and 1675 are the foundation of the friendſhip and good intelligence that has ſince ſubſiſted between the two crowns.

POLAND. HOUSE of AUSTRIA.

"Of what nature ſoever may be the differences that ſhall ariſe between the houſe of Auſtria and the republic of Poland, they ſhall always be amicably decided. Each of the parties ſhall be allowed to raiſe levies of men in the other's dominions, upon previous notice, if the other is not in war."

This treaty was made at Vienna the 24th of April 1677,

[f] This treaty was made when the United Provinces were invaded by France, and it was ſtipulated in the 12th article, that his Daniſh majeſty ſhould not interpoſe in that war. In 1674 the king of Denmark made another defenſive alliance with the emperor Leopold, the king of Spain, and the States-general, which took the place of this, and which, purſuant to a ſeparate article, was to laſt 14 years. It is in the ſame ſtyle with this of 1673.

[g] It is perpetual only in what concerns the peace of Weſtphalia, in the other articles not."

between Leopold as head of the houſe of Auſtria, and John III. king of Poland.

The grand ſeignor making preparations which threatened Chriſtendom, the ſame princes ſigned at Warſaw, the 31ſt of March 1683, a treaty of perpetual alliance, offenſive and defenſive, againſt the Turk. They defired the guarantee of the Holy See, and promiſed to ſwear, by the cardinals Pio and Barberini, before the pope, the full obſervance of all the articles therein agreed on.

"The emperor Leopold renounces whatever is due to him from the king of Poland for the money lent to Charles-Guſtavus during the war. In a word, the two parties annul all pretenſions which they may have upon one another by virtue of any former compact or agreement."

HOUSE of AUSTRIA. STATES of TRANSYLVANIA.

The emperor Leopold, and the ſtates of the principality of Tranſylvania, concluded at Vienna, the 28th of June 1686, a treaty which deſerves notice, and which, four months after, on the 27th of October, in the ſame year, was confirmed by another act paſſed in the imperial camp near Balasfalva. In theſe two treaties are the following articles:

"Leopold engages to defend Tranſylvania and the territories of Hungary thereunto annexed, whenever he ſhall be required. The prince of Tranſylvania ſhall command in chief the ſuccours that ſhall be ſent from the court of Vienna.

"The emperor declares that he pretends to no right to Tranſylvania nor its territories, that he will never take the titles or marks of honour, or concern himſelf in any manner with its civil or eccleſiaſtical government.

"The ſtates of Tranſylvania ſhall enjoy the liberty of electing a ſovereign, according to their ancient cuſtoms and privileges. Their prince ſhall at his pleaſure make alliances and form leagues, provided they no way prejudice the treaty of Vienna, which is to be perpetual.

"The princes of Tranſylvania ſhall not harbour the enemies of the houſe of Auſtria, nor ſhall the houſe of Auſtria give an aſylum to the enemies of the princes and ſtates of Tranſylvania."

CHAP. IV.

The Peace of Nimeguen, with the Treaties relating thereto.

BEFORE we proceed to the treaty of Nimeguen, it will not be improper briefly to take a view of the ſituation of the moſt conſiderable powers from the peace of Munſter in 1648 to the war of 1672, and to ſhew what were their political principles before and after that famous war.

Never was France more powerful than from the treaty of Weſtphalia to the war with Holland. Her forces were ſuperior to thoſe of any of her neighbours, and circumſtances did not ſuffer them to unite againſt her. By the reſtoration of the ancient laws of the empire, Ferdinand III. had been deprived of great part of his authority. The diets were free; the German princes had thrown off the yoke; and conceiving a balance of power between the head and members of the Germanic body, was the baſis of their liberty, they contracted alliances with the neighbouring princes, who could aſſiſt them with forces, and make them reſpected by the emperor.

The liberty of the empire was a rampart for France; and Ferdinand, bound by all the treaties which preceded the concluſion of the league of the Rhine, durſt not give any aſſiſtance to the Spaniard in his war with France, after the peace of Weſtphalia. Every thing declared the weakneſs of the Spaniſh monarch; he had been obliged to acknowledge the independency of the United Provinces; his fruitleſs attempts to ſubdue Portugal, plainly ſhewed he would, in the end, be forced to relinquiſh that kingdom to the houſe of Bragança, and with it loſe all its poſſeſſions in the Indies and America. Whether the ancient reputation of Spain prevented its decay from being ſeen, or whether there remained in mens minds the impreſſion of the dangers wherewith the houſe of Auſtria had threatened their neighbours, Philip IV. found no ally, and Europe beheld, without emotion, the advantages of the French.

The United Provinces, ſince ſo juſtly alarmed about the fate of the Netherlands, thought then of little elſe but improving the advantages of peace, by enlarging their commerce. The magiſtrates had not yet reſolved on their courſe with reſpect to the neighbouring powers. Some adhered to the famous treaty of Paris, the 8th of February 1635, which left them all the Low Countries, except Flanders, Artois, Luxemburg, Namur, and Hainault, which France was to enjoy; and they beheld with concern the Spaniards ſo near them. Others were ſatisfied with condemning the ſeparate peace at Munſter, and believed that, after their deſerting of France, there was no protection to be expected from thence. Theſe dreaded the French, and were for entering into leagues and confederacies againſt them. The others exhorted the United Provinces to keep within themſelves and defend their poſſeſſions. Amidſt this diverſity of ſentiments ſo uſual to commonwealths and new ſtates, it was next to impoſſible that a deciſive reſolution ſhould be taken.

On the other hand the Engliſh, who ſince the reign of queen Elizabeth had not concerned themſelves with the affairs of Europe, began, it is true, to look abroad after the death of Charles I. but in ſuch a manner, as gave the French no uneaſineſs. Cromwell, who in ſome meaſure effaced, by the prudence of his government, the infamy of his uſurpation, knew not the political maxims afterwards eſpouſed by king William and his ſucceſſors. He did not care which was the moſt powerful, France or the houſe of Auſtria. He only ſought to enrich the nation he had enſlaved. He looked with an ill eye upon the Dutch, whoſe trade was then very flouriſhing; and, far from aſſiſting the Spaniards, he could not but take advantage of their diſtreſs to extend the commerce of England. Purſuant to theſe views, Cromwell made it his buſineſs to diſturb the States-general, and, without loving France, declared againſt the Spaniards, and took from them Jamaica and Dunkirk.

It was ſo much the more difficult that any other leagues ſhould be be formed, as the war, kindled in the north in 1655, divided the attention of all Europe. The treaties of Oliva and Copenhagen, by which it was ended, gained Sweden the ſame reputation as France acquired after the peace of the Pyrenees. Ruſſia acted no part. Poland, which may be compared to a giant in chains, was not yet ruled by a Sobieſki, who, in ſpite of the faults in the conſtitution, could perform great things. The Danes, in a ſtate of humiliation, had a quick ſenſe of their loſſes; they had rouſed their old antipathy to Sweden, but without reſource at home, and without alliance abroad, they were forced to conceal their reſentment. In a word, the emperor having tried in vain to avenge himſelf of the treaty of Oſnabrug, had the vexation and ſhame to ſee all its regulations confirmed by the treaty of Oliva.

The king of France reſolved to avail himſelf of the happy circumſtances his kingdom was in, to revenge the injuries done him by the Spaniards, and the evils cauſed by their intrigues ever ſince the reign of Charles V. Lewis XIV. carried his arms into the Netherlands in 1667, on pretence of aſſerting the rights of his queen after the death of Philip IV. The ſucceſs of his arms was rapid; Charleroi, Bergues, Furnes, Aeth, Tournay, Douai, fort Scarpe, Oudenard, and Liſle, ſurrendered without reſiſtance. The United Provinces were in the utmoſt conſternation, and the Triple Alliance between England, Sweden, and the Dutch, was ſigned the 28th of January 1668. Theſe three powers mutually promiſed to unite their forces to compel France to make peace.

Lewis was diſcouraged by this riſing ſtorm, and a peace was ſoon concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. But it is a queſtion worthy the diſcuſſion of the politicians, whether Lewis, in ſpite of the Triple League, ſhould not have continued the war. He would probably have conquered the Netherlands before the allies could take the field. The United Provinces were in no better a ſituation than they were a few years after in 1672. The Dutch, as Sir William Temple obſerves, had totally neglected the military part of their government, nay, had had degraded it, in breaking, by a miſtaken policy, the veteran troops to whom they were indebted for their fortune. Their land forces were then in a ſtate ſo much the worſe, as during their war with England, which was juſt concluded at Breda, they had given their whole attention to their fleets.

England, it is true, was a more formidable enemy; but Cromwell no longer ruled there. Charles II. had mounted the throne of his anceſtors; with many valuable qualities, this prince had none of a great king. Fond of pleaſure and quiet, he was induced to ſign the Triple Alliance, from a perſuaſion that it would give law to France; and probably he did not conſent to it, but from the ſame motive of indolence which would have hindered him from performing the conditions, if it had not produced the deſired effect. King Charles was neither a good friend nor a dangerous enemy, and conſequently was hardly worth courting. He was always ſure to be gained by means of ſome intriguing miniſter, or greedy miſtreſs, or ambitious favourite. Beſides, the Engliſh and Dutch were but juſt reconciled; and inſtead of thinking themſelves mutually neceſſary, they ſtill entertained againſt one another the hatred of rivals. Their commerce was alike flouriſhing; the Engliſh would not ſuffer equals in the empire of the ſea, and the Dutch refuſed to acknowledge a ſuperior.

As to the Swedes, it is ſtill more difficult to think that their alliance with England and Holland was ſincere. What intereſt could they have in arming againſt France? They are too diſtant to fear her grandeur, and her friendſhip is too advantageous for them to think of weakening her power. After all, it was eaſy to render abortive their ill intentions, by ſtirring up Denmark and the princes of Lower Saxony againſt them; for though the French and Swedes ſhared the honour of being protectors of the Germanic body, they were looked upon in the empire in a very different light. The French, who had always behaved with moderation during the war, and in the courſe of the Weſtphalian negotiations, by which it was ended, inſpired the princes of the Rhine with no ſuſpicions. Their hatred of the Spaniards, their views of increaſing their dominions turned towards the Netherlands, policy which prompted them not to multiply enemies, all warranted their friendſhip to them. The empire, and eſpecially the princes of the Lower Saxony, thought otherwiſe of Sweden. It was remembered that the Swedes had treated Germany like a conquered province. Having taken from Poland and Denmark what ſuited their convenience, it was only by aggrandizing themſelves on the ſide of Pomerania, that they could eſtabliſh their credit in the north.

In fine, the league which Lewis XIV. made ſome years after with Charles II. to declare war againſt Holland, and the eaſe wherewith he engaged the Swedes to make a diverſion in the dominions of Brandenburg, prove that the bands of the Triple Alliance were not ſo hard to be untied. Though the three allies had guarantied to the king of Spain the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, there was no ſincere union between them. In ſpite of the treaty of Breda, the Dutch ſtill affected to diſpute the ſovereignty of the ſea with the Engliſh, and, on account of their trade, were more attached to the Danes, maſters of the Sound, than to the Swedes.

The war of 1667, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, introduced no change in the political ſituation of Europe. If ſome ſtates entered into alliances, they were of no value, as not proceeding from neceſſity. The whole ſcene was changed, when the French, in conjunction with the king of England, the elector of Cologn and biſhop of Munſter, declared war againſt the United Provinces. The rapid progreſs of Lewis XIV. during the campaign of 1672, raiſe a dread of the entire deſtruction of Holland. The Engliſh thought themſelves ſtruck with the blow that threatened the Dutch, and, ceaſing to be jealous of their commerce, became the protectors of it, in order to hinder its falling into the hands of the French. The nation was unanimous, murmurings, complaints heard all over England: and Charles II, who was not yet come to the point of venturing to lay aſide parliaments, and govern without them, diſpatched the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Arlington to the Hague to encourage the States-general, who were ready to ſubmit to the conqueror. This is perhaps the firſt time that a prince was ſeen to make an excuſe to his enemies for the progreſs of his arms, and to exhort them to a defence; and none but a king of England, led by his own private intereſt, and obliged to comply with the deſires of his nation, can be guilty of ſuch contrariety in his conduct [h].

During theſe tranſactions, the famous John de Wit was, with his brother, torn in pieces by the populace, who conſidered them as the authors of all the calamities with which the republic was threatened. John de Wit was one of the greateſt politicians of his time, and had been penſioner of Holland eighteen years. He was always averſe to the office of ſtadtholder, and a great oppoſer of the houſe of Orange. His fall therefore was the riſe of the young prince of Orange; all eyes were turned upon him; the merit of his anceſtors, and John de Wit's efforts to keep him at a diſtance from affairs, ſpoke in his behalf. In a word, he was appointed without oppoſition admiral and captain general of Holland. This prince, who was ſoon to be the ſoul of Europe, and to manage it as he pleaſed, began to employ his rare talents in rendering himſelf maſter of the United provinces. To inſpire them with his courage, it ſufficed to repreſent England as ready to abandon the alliance of France, whilſt the emperor and the king of Spain offered their aid and protection to the States general.

The peril of the United Provinces threw them into a ſtrict alliance with the branches of the houſe of Auſtria. The ambition of France began now to be talked of as more dangerous to Europe than that of the ſucceſſion of Charles V. Theſe inſinuations, which have ſince proved too true, were ſpread by the prince of Orange and his friends, and ſupported by the courts of Vienna and Madrid. As France had humbled them, by repreſenting them as aiming at univerſal monarchy, they hoped by the ſame method to regain their former ſuperiority.

The peace of Nimeguen is generally conſidered as the period of the aſcendant France has aſſumed over her neighbours; but ſome, on the contrary, think that ſhe began then to be leſs powerful. Leagues were formed againſt her, and her acquiſitions diminiſhed her ſtrength, as it increaſed her enemies, and bred ſuſpicions and fears in her allies.

It ſeems that the miniſtry of France ſhould, out of policy, have tempered the luſtre of a glory which raiſed jealouſies; ſhould have laboured to remove the fears of her neighbours; renewed her alliances, and countermined the politics of the prince of Orange, who dreading her ambition, was exciting all Europe againſt her. Inſtead of theſe ſalutary meaſures, re-unions were thought of; and it muſt be owned, nothing could be more favourable to the deſigns of the prince of Orange and the houſe of Auſtria, than the well known decrees of the parliament of Beſançon and the royal chambers of Metz and Briſac. The capitulation of Straſburg gave the finiſhing ſtroke, and put the empire in arms againſt France. The German princes ſaw they thought them wholly employed againſt the Spaniards and Dutch. They believed themſelves injured, and the preſent danger made them forget the peril they had been in from the emperors of the houſe of Auſtria. The ſyſtem eſtabliſhed in the empire by the treaties of Weſtphalia was deſtroyed. The princes recurred to the protection of Leopold; their fear gave that emperor more power than Ferdinand III. had loſt, and from that time the empire was enemy of France.

Theſe ſentiments appeared by the league ſigned at Auſburg the 9th of July 1686, between the emperor, the king of Spain, as duke of Burgundy, the king of Sweden, for the fiefs he poſſeſſed in the empire, the elector of Bavaria, the circles of Bavaria and Franconia, and the duke of Saxony; and to which the princes and ſtates of the Upper Rhine and Weſterwald, the duke of Holſtein-Gottorp, and the elector Palatine, acceded ſoon after.

The ſole point now was to ſet bounds to the power of France; England, her old enemy, thought the ſame; but James II. ruled there, and his perſonal intereſt attached him to France. He had no other ally to depend on to promote his deſigns. He would very probably have been ſupported, if he had not protected with more warmth than prudence the religion he profeſſed. His zeal carried him too far, aud he ſunk in the attempt. The prince of Orange landed in England in 1688, and upon king James's abdication, was crowned king by the name of William III.

This prince brought to London the ſame ſentiments as he had at the Hague. He had long ſince publicly declared, that the ſafety of his country was his only care, and that the liberty of his allies was in danger, if the French

[h] The king was the ſole cauſe of it, becauſe he ſuffered himſelf to be led by the ducheſs of Portſmouth his miſtreſs, who was ſent to him by Lewis, and who had the ſame influence over him as madam Monteſpan had over the French monarch. But Charles II. ſhould have known the difference between the two governments, and that a king of England ought not and cannot have other intereſt than that of the nation.

monarchy was not firſt reduced, and afterwards kept within the bounds preſcribed by the Pyrenean treaty. Theſe declarations gave birth to the ſyſtem of a Balance of Power between the houſes of Auſtria and Bourbon; and the foundations of it were laid in the treaty concluded at Vienna the 12th of May 1689, between the emperor and the States-general. This alliance, called afterwards the Grand Alliance, becauſe all the enemies of France came into it, ran, that after the concluſion of a general peace, the parties ſhould remain united for ever. They promiſed to aid one another with all their forces by ſea and land, in caſe either was attacked by the common enemy; and engaged to liſten to no accommodation till entire ſatisfaction was received. It was ſtipulated, that if Charles II. king of Spain died without iſſue, endeavours ſhould be uſed to place the emperor or his heirs on that throne, and prevent the ſucceſſion from coming to the dauphin. The allies alſo agreed to engage the electors to give the empire to Joſeph king of Hungary, the emperor's ſon. Theſe are the principles which were conſtantly purſued in Europe till the treaty of Utrecht, when the ſcene was entirely changed, and very different principles were eſpouſed.

There is no occaſion to relate the events of the war of 1672. It ſuffices to remark, that it was ended by fourteen treaties. England firſt agreed with the United Provinces the 19th of February, 1674. This peace, concluded at London, was owing to the diſcontents of the Engliſh; to their hatred of France; to their fear of loſing their trade in the Mediterranean, in caſe of a Spaniſh war; to the weakneſs of Charles II. to his deſire of money which he laviſhed away; and to the liberality of the United Provinces. The biſhop of Munſter made his peace the 22d of April, 1674; and the elector of Cologne the 11th of May the ſame year.

The aſſemblies for a general peace did not begin at Nimeguen till the middle of the year 1676; and it was viſible by the firſt conferences, that the negotiation would go on very ſlowly. By the bold demands of the Spaniards, one would have thought they had been in condition to give law to France. Perſuaded as they were, that it was the intereſt of England and Holland not to ſuffer the French to enlarge their power in the Netherlands, they even required the reſtitution of the places they had reſigned by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The emperors miniſters were more reaſonable; they made no demands, becauſe his arms had not been ſucceſsful; but they ſought to keep the allies united, and to prolong the war. The Swedes ſincerely wiſhed for peace; nay, would have conſented to purchaſe it, if Denmark and Brandenburg had been willing to ſell it, on any other condition but the taking from them their dominions in Germany.

Lewis XIV. was too wiſe to hope to eſcape with ſucceſs out of the labyrinth into which the reconciliation of ſo many oppoſite intereſts had thrown him. Whilſt he carried on the war with vigour, he projected to deſtroy the league of his enemies by corrupting ſome of their allies. He caſt his eyes on the United Provinces. By a ſeries of events known to all the world, from principals the Dutch were become but auxiliaries in the war. The French armies had abandoned the center of their provinces, to march into the Spaniſh Netherlands. The States-general had ſeen themſelves too near a total deſtruction, to be much concerned at the progreſs of the French in the Netherlands. They could propoſe to themſelves nothing more than the reſtitution of Namur, which Lewis could not keep. In a word, ingratitude to their allies, in leaving them, ſhould not have appeared to them ſo hateful as a war, which both required immenſe ſums, and drained the ſource of their riches by the ruin of their trade.

The French plenipotentiaries opened their negotiation with a wrong ſtep; as if they knew not how much the intereſts of the prince of Orange differed from thoſe of the republic, or had a compenſation ready to offer him for what he ſhould loſe by the peace, they attempted to gain him. Marſhal d'Eſtrades was quickly ſenſible of his error; and, perceiving that all the miniſters at Nimeguen were devoted to the party of the ſtadtholder, he entered into a ſecret correſpondence with ſome of the principal members of the ſtates-general. Nothing was tranſacted in the congreſs but trifling formalities; all the affairs of France and Holland were managed at the Hague; but the negotiation proceeded very ſlowly, becauſe it was ſubordinate to the operations of London, where it was not known what reſolution to take; and becauſe the Dutch, courageous or fearful, according as they hoped or deſpaired to induce England to declare againſt France, remained in a perpetual ſtate of uncertainty.

Matters were otherwiſe managed at London. The moſt refined court arts and intrigues were uſed by the French to keep Charles II. in a ſtate of inaction, and by their enemies to draw him to their ſide. The United Provinces were at length weary of hoping; and though Charles II. had entered into the ſtrongeſt engagements with them, the 29th of July, 1678, yet a fortnight after they ſigned a ſeparate peace with France. This conduct ſeemed ſtrange, but was wiſe. Could the States-general confide much in the treaties of an irreſolute, indolent prince, who was managed by his miniſters according to their particular views? Beſides, it was well known, that the affairs of England were then at a criſis. The animoſity of the ſeveral parties was at the higheſt degree; and if a foreign war was not capable to allay their heats, and ſtifle the ſeeds of diſcord, what advantages could the States-general expect from the alliance of Charles II?

The Spaniards made their peace with France the 17th of September, 1678. They did not treat with the Swedes. Theſe two powers, who had no affairs to decide, only publiſhed a declaration, by which, agreeing that they were tacitly included in the treaty of the 17th, they reſtored liberty of commerce between their reſpective ſubjects, and forbad them to commit any hoſtilities at ſea againſt one another.

The emperor, unable to continue the war, agreed with France and Sweden the 5th of February, 1679. The engaging the king of Denmark and the elector of Brandenburg to lay down their arms, was no longer in queſtion. Thoſe princes, elated at their ſucceſs over the Swedes, refuſed to make the treaties of Oſnabrug and Copenhagen the foundation of their agreement. They were however forced to conſent to it. The emperor had promiſed his good offices to induce them to a peace; and, in caſe of refuſal on their part, to give a free paſſage to the troops of France to penetrate into their dominions [a]. On the other hand, the dukes of Brunſwic-Lunenburg, Zell, and Wolfenbuttle, had ſigned at Zell their accommodation, the ſame day the emperor had ſigned his at Nimeguen; and the biſhop of Munſter, who, after having left the alliance of France, had leagued with her enemies, agreed by two treaties of the 29th of March, to recall his troops who had joined the enemies of Sweden.

Frederic-William, elector of Brandenburg, had no other reſource, but to haſten his agreement, in order to obtain the more advantageous terms. It was ſigned at St. Germain-en Laye, the 29th of June, 1679; and this treaty was afterwards approved and confirmed by all the contracting parties at the congreſs of Ryſwic. Chriſtian V. king of Denmark, ſaw himſelf then forced to ſeek peace. His miniſters concluded it at Fontainebleau, the 2d of September, 1679; and at London the 20th of the ſame month.

FRANCE. LORRAIN.

"The articles of the treaties of the Pyrenees and Aix-la-Chapelle, from which the treaty of Nimeguen between France and Spain ſhall not derogate, ſhall remain in full force.

"France and the emperor agree on the ſame condition, with reſpect to the treaty of Munſter.

"Lewis XIV. and his ſucceſſors ſhall remain poſſeſſed of Burgundy, commonly called Franche-Comté, including Beſançon."

By an act paſſed at Vienna, the 5th of May, 1651, the emperor and empire had transferred to Philip IV. of Spain all the imperial rights to this city.

"Spain reſigns to France the cities and places of Valenciennes, Bouchain, Cambray, Aire, St. Omer, Ypres, Warwich, Warneton, Poperinghen, Bailleul, Caſſel, Bavay, Maubeuge, with their bailiwics, dependencies, &c. The kings of France ſhall enjoy them in full ſovereignty; and, in yielding Aeth to Spain, they ſhall retain la Verge de Menin and Condé, which belong to its caſtellany.

"The king of Spain promiſes to engage the biſhop and chapter of Liege to reſign Dinant to the French, and to obtain the conſent of the emperor and empire to confirm this ceſſion. If the negotiation does not ſucceed, Charlemont ſhall be given to France."

The ceſſion of Dinant did not take place, and Lewis XIV. had poſſeſſion of Charlemont.

"The emperor gives to France the city of Friburg, with the villages of Lehen, Metzhauſen, and Kirchzart, in full ſovereignty, and with liberty to ſend thither garriſons, and all warlike ſtores and proviſions, without moleſtation, or paying any toll in paſſing through the territories of the empire.

the

" The city of Nantz, with its juriſdiction, ſhall be united to the crown of France. Four roads ſhall be made from that city to St. Diſier, to Alſatia, to Metz, and to Franche-Comté. They ſhall be half a league wide, and ſhall belong in full ſovereignty to the king of France.

" France ſhall poſſeſs in full ſovereignty the city and provoſtſhip of Longwic. In exchange, France ſhall give the city of Toul, with its juriſdiction, to the duke of Lorraine, who ſhall enjoy there all the rights belonging to the crown of France.

The Imperial and French miniſters agreed by ſeparate writings, which are joined to the treaty they had ſigned, that, if the duke of Lorraine refuſe to ſubſcribe to the articles that were agreed for him, he ſhould be free to demand other terms, and France to grant them; and the emperor ſhould not deem theſe alterations a breach of the preſent treaty. The miniſters of Vienna promiſed likewiſe, that their maſter ſhould not take up arms in proſecution of the duke of Lorraine's pretenſions, or under pretext of ending his differences. The ſame clauſe had been formerly inſerted in the treaties of Munſter and the Pyrenees. So far was the duke of Lorraine from ratifying the terms that were ſtipulated for him, that his miniſters proteſted againſt them, the 21ſt of April, 1679; and the duke did not get again his dominions.

HOUSE of AUSTRIA.

" France ſhall reſign to Spain Charleroy, Binch, Aeth, Oudenard, and Courtray, with her bailiwics, dependencies, &c.

Theſe places had been given to France by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

" It is agreed, that the eaſtern and weſtern ſluices of Newport, and the forts built there, do not belong to the caſtellany of Furnes, and ſhall for the future be inſeparably joined to Newport.

" The king of France reſigns to the emperor all the rights of Philipſburg given him by the treaty of Munſter."

ENGLAND. UNITED PROVINCES.

" The exerciſe of the catholic religion ſhall be reſtored and maintained in the city of Maeſtricht, and its dependencies, according to the capitulation of this place in 1632.

" The treaty of Breda, and all the former alliances between England and the United Provinces, ſhall be maintained in their full force.

" In all the ſeas between Cape Finiſterre and Vandaſten in Norway, the ſhips of war or merchantmen of the United Provinces, whether alone or in ſquadrons, ſhall ſtrike the flag, and lower the top-ſail, to every ſhip bearing the Engliſh colours, called the Jack."

The following articles are taken from the two treaties of Weſtminſter, between the Engliſh and Dutch; the firſt ſigned the 3d of March, 1678; and the ſecond the 24th of Auguſt, 1689.

" There ſhall be perpetual friendſhip, both by ſea and land, as well in as out of Europe, between England and Holland. This confederacy ſhall have for its principal object the maintenance of the parties in the poſſeſſion of the rights and liberties they enjoy in Europe only, and which they have acquired by former conventions, or ſhall acquire hereafter."

The ſecond treaty of Weſtminſter is in ſome meaſure only a copy of the firſt, as are alſo the treaties of peace and commerce ſigned at Breda and London in 1674.

" The parties ſhall mutually guaranty the poſſeſſion of all countries, cities, places, ports, &c. they hold in Europe, and the full and exact obſervance of all the treaties they have made or ſhall make in concert with any other power whatſoever.

" If either is diſturbed in the poſſeſſion of their countries, lands, rights, privileges, and liberties of trade and navigation, the other ſhall firſt interpoſe his good offices; but, if an open rupture enſues, ſhall forthwith ſend aſſiſtance. In this caſe England ſhall furniſh 10,000 men to Holland, and the Dutch 6000 men and 20 ſhips of war to England. Theſe ſuccours ſhall be maintained at the charge of the party that furniſhes them, and ſhall be entirely ſubject to the orders of the party they are ſent to. If the ſituation of affairs require a larger aid, the parties ſhall ſettle it. The party injured in his rights ſhall require his ally to declare himſelf openly within two months after information, and ſhall be obliged to act with all his forces by ſea and land.

" In this laſt caſe, neither of the parties ſhall make a ſeparate peace with the common enemy, nor even begin, unknown to the other, any negotiation of truce or ſuſpenſion of arms.

" Either of the allies which ſhall be attacked, may make levies of ſoldiers within the territories of the other, provided the ſame be done according to ſuch regulations as the parties ſhall agree upon."

It is ſtrange that negotiators of credit, and who cannot be charged with being ignorant of their buſineſs, ſhould clog treaties with ſuch uſeleſs conditions. It would have been better barely to ſay, that the Engliſh and the Dutch may treat in time of war for permiſſion to raiſe levies in each other's dominions. Who can doubt their having this liberty? It was not worth while to agree upon it. Every article of a treaty ſhould confer or take away a right: form an engagement: decide an equivocal queſtion: or name arbiters to determine it within a certain time. Perſons a little verſed in the knowledge of negotiations will perceive this to be no needleſs remark. But to ſay ſomething more: in the treaties of alliance, ſuch as the foregoing, and thoſe by which two powers promiſe mutual aſſiſtance, the expreſſions cannot be too preciſe, or the nature of the engagements too decifively fixed. Whatever is vague and indeterminate may leave room for conteſts and difficulties, and conſequently render the alliance uſeleſs when the engagements come to be performed. How often has it happened that two allies have waſted, in fruitleſs diſputes, the time that ſhould have been employed in action? Of this hiſtories afford us numberleſs inſtances.

SWEDEN. HOUSE of BRANDENBURG. HOUSE of BRUNSWIC.

" The treaties of Weſtphalia ſhall be the baſis of the accommodation between Sweden and the emperor, the electors of Brandenburg, the houſe of Brunſwic, and the biſhops of Munſter and Paderborn. All the articles that ſhall not be derogated from by this pacification ſhall remain in force." See T. Nim. Emp. Swed. Art. 3. T. Zell. Art. 4. T. Nim. Swed. Mun. Art. 3. T. St. Germain-en-Laye, Art. 4.

" The treaties of Roſchild, Copenhagen, and Weſtphalia, ſhall be executed in all their articles; and alſo, the acts that are annexed to, and make part of them." T. Fontainebleau, Art. 4. T. Lunden, Art. 4.

" Except Dam, Golnau, and their dependencies, Sweden gives, to the elector of Brandenburg, all his poſſeſſions on the right ſide of the Oder. However Golnau and its territory ſhall be left as a pledge in the hands of the elector, who ſhall be obliged to reſtore them upon the payment of 50 thouſand crowns. The elector, derogating from the treaty of Stetin in 1653, renounces his ſhare of the rights of toll, which Brandenburg levies in the ports and harbours of the further Pomerania.

" Sweden ſhall continue to enjoy all the rights of ſovereignty upon the river Oder, and the elector of Brandenburg ſhall not erect any fortreſs, or fortify any place within the territories that are reſigned to him.

" The houſe of Brunſwic to whom France is bound to pay 300 thouſand crowns, ſhall be put in poſſeſſion of the provoſtſhip of Dorwern, and the portion of land between the Weſer, the Alier, and his ancient demeans; but no fortreſs ſhall be built there, nor any new tolls eſtabliſhed. Sweden reſigns alſo to the ſaid houſe the bailiwic of Tedinghauſen, with all its dependencies, and guarantees the peaceable poſſeſſion of all theſe new acquiſitions."

ARCHBISHOPRIC of COLOGNE. BISHOPRIC of MUNSTER.

" The United Provinces renounce all pretenſions to Rhinberg and its territory, which ſhall be reſtored to the elector of Cologne, biſhop of Liege.

" In reſtoring the city and fortreſs of Weerth to count Waldeck, the biſhop of Munſter reſerves the aſſerting, in an amicable way, his rights to that place.

" France ſhall pay him 100 thouſand crowns, and the king of Sweden ſhall leave him in poſſeſſion of the bailiwic of Wildhauſen, till he pays him two thouſand rixdollars."

HOUSE of SAVOY.

The conditions ſtipulated in the treaty of Munſter, concerning the duke of Savoy, are ſpecified and renewed in the treaty of Nimeguen between France and the emperor.

HOUSE of BOUILLON.

" The duke of Bouillon ſhall remain in poſſeſſion of the caſtle and that part of the duchy of Bouillon he now holds. His differences on this ſubject with the biſhop of Liege ſhall be amicably decided."

The biſhop and chapter of Liege proteſted the 28th of February, 1679, againſt this article. They renewed their complaints and proteſtations the 31ſt of October, 1697, againſt the artiele of the peace of Ryſwic which confirms the treaty of Nimeguen.

DENMARK. HOUSE of HOLSTEIN-GOTTORP.

" The king of Denmark having pretenſions and a mortgage upon Cruyſand, it is agreed that the king of Sweden ſhall pay at Hamburg the principal and intereſt according to the cuſtom of Germany; and that his Daniſh majeſty ſhall remain in poſſeſſion till full payment. Then he ſhall reſtore Cruyſand to Sweden without any farther pretenſions; and in the mean time the king of Denmark ſhall not build any fort."

" The emperor ſhall grant his protection to the duke of Sleſwic-Holſtein-Gottorp, to ſecure to him the enjoyment of all his rights in the empire.

" The duke ſhall be reſtored to all poſſeſſions, privileges, and liberties, he ought to enjoy by the treaties of Roſchild and Copenhagen."

It was neceſſary to ſtipulate in the ſtrongeſt manner in favour of the duke of Holſtein-Gottorp. The king of Denmark, declaring in 1675 againſt Sweden, had ſeized the greateſt part of that prince's demeans, and compelled him in the caſtle of Renſburg, where he was kept priſoner, to give up, by a treaty, the rights he had acquired at Roſchild and Copenhagen. It was very difficult to deſtroy the ſeeds of diſſenſion between theſe two princes, who were always ready to arm againſt each other; treaties were but a weak fence between them; accordingly the duke of Holſtein did not long enjoy in peace the fortune he owed to the protection of Sweden.

The firſt differences that aroſe between them after the pacification of Nimeguen were decided the 20th of June, 1689, at Altena, by the mediation and under the guarantee of the emperor Leopold, and the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg. This treaty maintained in full force thoſe of Roſchild, Copenhagen, Fontainebleau, and Lunden.

" The king of Denmark renounces the mortgage and rights he pretends to have in the bailiwic of Trittau. Prince George, whom the mediators take upon them to indemnify without any charge to Denmark, renounces alſo all his pretenſions to the iſle of Fehmeren, and the bailiwics of Trembſbuttel and Heinhorſt.' T. of Altena, Art. 2. 3. 5. and Act of Prince George of Denmark, at Hampton-Court, the 19th of July, 1689.

If attention be given to what has been ſaid of the ſtrange government of the duchies of Sleſwic and Holſtein, the ſovereignty of which is held in common by the king of Denmark and the duke that bears this name, it will be thought no wonder that the moſt ſolemn engagements could not bind them to peace. How clear ſoever was the treaty of Altena, each party explained it in his own ſenſe, and both took up arms. Charles XII, king of Sweden, came to the aſſiſtance of his brother-in-law the duke of Holſtein, and invaded Zeland. This hero, at the gates of Copenhagen, forced the Danes to a peace, which was concluded at Travendal the 18th of Auguſt, 1700.

Though theſe differences made in ſome meaſure part of the famous war which in this century has altered the ſtate and intereſts of the north, the treaty of Travendal ſeems rather to belong to the pacification of Nimeguen, than to thoſe of Stockholm and Newſtadt, the principles whereof are very different.

" The treaties of Roſchild, Copenhagen, Fontainebleau, Lunden, and Altena, ſhall be punctually executed according to their tenor.

" The kings of Denmark, as dukes-regents of the duchies of Sleſwic and Holſtein, ſhall not appropriate to themſelves any right, prerogative, or pre-eminence, over the dukes of Holſtein-Gottorp, as dukes-regents of the ſame duchies. There ſhall be a perfect equality between them. All orders given, all regulations made, without the unanimous and mutual conſent of the two regents, ſhall be void and of no effect. Each of them, however, ſhall exerciſe at his pleaſure the rights of ſovereignty in the cities and bailiwics which belong to him as his own.

" In caſe Sleſwic and Holſtein are attacked or threatened by any foreign power, the two princes ſhall be obliged to join their forces. But, under pretence of defending, one ſhall not be bound to meddle in affairs which do not concern him, or wherein the other ſhall be engaged without his conſent, or againſt his advice. The duke of Holſtein-Gottorp and his ſucceſſors ſhall have the full and free right of arms, armaments, fortreſſes, and alliances. He ſhall not however be allowed to erect fortreſſes nearer than two leagues from thoſe that belong to the king of Denmark, and than one league from his territory, and from the road leading from Flemſburg to Renſburg, and from thence to Itochoe, Glukſtad, and Hamburg. The king of Denmark is bound in the ſame engagements with regard to the duke of Holſtein. Neither ſhall keep in the common duchies above 6000 ſoldiers without a viſible neceſſity. The duke of Holſtein ſhall make uſe of foreign troops, provided he hires them of different princes, and not above 3300 of the ſame prince.

" The ſubjects of the duke of Holſtein and the merchandizes that ſhall be brought from any ſea-port in the bailiwic of Tundiren, or ſhall go out of that territory for embarkation, ſhall pay no toll at the Cuſtom-houſe at Lyſt.

" The agreement made at Glukſtad in 1657, between the king of Denmark and the duke of Holſtein, about the biſhopric of Lubec, ſhall remain in full force."

By that agreement the king of Denmark renounces his pretenſion to the alternate poſſeſſion of the biſhopric of Lubec with the houſe of Holſtein.

PROTESTATIONS.

The nuncio Bevilaqua, patriarch of Alexandria, proteſted, in the name of Innocent XI, againſt the treaties of Nimeguen, as founded upon the treaties of Weſtphalia, the 7th of February, 1679. This is the laſt time the court of Rome proteſted in form againſt the peace of Weſtphalia. It would have been expoſing his authority to try to weaken treaties which, in the empire, ſtand upon an equal foot with the golden bull itſelf.

CHAP. V.

PACIFICATION of RYSWIC.

BY the remarks prefixed to the laſt chapter may be ſeen what was the conduct of the French miniſtry after the peace of Nimeguen, and what were the diſpoſitions of their neighbours. Lewis XIV. was acquainted with their motions, their intrigues, and the leage at Auſburg, which was the reſult. He knew his enemies were preparing to attack him on every ſide; and knew the neceſſity of preventing them, in order to diſconcert their projects, or at leaſt not to fear them. The ſtorm that threatened France was of a nature not to be allayed by negotiation. Theſe were the true cauſes of the war of 1688 [b]. The right of the ducheſs of Orleans to the ſucceſſion of her brother by the elector Palatine, and [b] It is true, the confederacy againſt him was the motive of the French king's beginning the war; but the cauſe of this motive was the haughty and unjuſt conduct of the French miniſtry, who had agreed to the peace of Nimeguen, with a view only to recover themſelves a little, and fall the more powerfully upon the Netherlands and the United Provinces, as well as upon the emperor and empire. The diſcovery of theſe ſchemes induced the elector Palatine to labour ſo ſtrenuouſly the league of Auſburg, not to attack the king of France, but to oppoſe his ambitious deſigns of attacking others.

The

thoſe of the cardinal of Furſtenburg to the archbiſhopric of Cologne, were only pretences: How important ſoever theſe affairs were, they ceaſed to appear ſo, as ſoon as the war was kindled. At the peace, it was only ſettled, that there ſhould be a general amneſty for the cardinal of Furſtenburg, for his relations and adherents: and that they ſhould be reſtored to the rights, effects, fœdal and allodial, benefices, honours, ranks, and prerogatives, of which they had been deprived during the war. As to the conteſts between the ducheſs of Orleans and the houſe of Neuburg, nothing was decided. The empire and France agreed only, by a ſeparate article of their treaty, that arbitrators ſhould be appointed, within a certain time, to judge of the ducheſs's demands, and, if they could not agree, the affair was to be brought before the pope to be finally decided.

The war had now continued ſome years with great warmth on both ſides. The ſucceſs of the French arms, which on any other occaſion would have induced the allies to ſeek peace, ſerved only to exaſperate them in a war, which a jealouſy of the ambitious deſigns of Lewis XIV. had kindled, and by which they propoſed to humble that monarch.

Notwithſtanding his ſucceſſes, Lewis ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to treat. He preſſed the king of Sweden to offer his mediation to his enemies, and even declared upon what terms he was willing to make peace. But unhappily Europe had been uſed both to fear and ſuſpect him; ſo that the more moderate he appeared, the leſs he was believed.

Various were the conjectures about theſe pacific advances; ſome thought Lewis wanted to take breath, and therefore inferred the neceſſity the allies were under to exert their utmoſt efforts. Others believed, that in ſeeming to deſire peace, he only ſought to engage the neutral powers to his ſide, and render his enemies odious. They were perſuaded, in affecting a falſe generoſity, his aim was to corrupt ſome of the confederates, and afterwards to take advantage of the weakneſs of the allies, and to cruſh them by pretending to be offended at their ſlighting his advances.

The moſt reaſonable imagined, that Lewis, having an eye to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, thought only of breaking the alliance againſt Spain. They believed he wanted only to repair his finances, and have time to prepare for war. This belief ſeemed the more probable, as the king of France, in departing, in favour of the houſe of Bavaria, from his pretenſions to the Netherlands, reſerved his right to the ſucceſſion of Charles II, in caſe he died without iſſue. And yet theſe ſame perſons ſaw ſomething inconceivable in Lewis's advantageous offers. They did not think the breach of the alliance was equivalent to them. The confederates had already ſettled the affair of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion; they were uſed to treat and aſſiſt one another; and the fight of the leaſt danger would unite them again, their intereſt being always the ſame. Beſides, though this diſſolution of the grand alliance ſhould have been more beneficial to Lewis, ought he to purchaſe it ſo dearly? For the allies, on their part, in order not to be exhauſted at the death of the king of Spain, would have accepted, on leſs advantageous terms, a peace which they conſidered only as a truce neceſſary for their affairs.

According to the memoirs lately publiſhed under the name of the marquis de Torcy, juſtice was not done to the views of Lewis XIV. It is there ſaid, Lewis deſired peace, becauſe he was touched with the calamities of the war, and, in renouncing the advantages gained by his arms, he had no other aim but to ſecure the peace, and remove the fears and ſuſpicions of Europe. It is added, the king of Spain of his own accord, and without the knowledge of France, called the duke of Anjou to this ſucceſſion; and, inſtead of expending immenſe ſums in bribing the Spaniſh miniſter, it was debated in council at Paris, whether the will of Charles II. ſhould be rejected, and the Partition-treaty adhered to.

In ſupport of this account, it is alledged, that it would have been moſt ſtrange to negotiate at the Hague, and at London, a partition, at the ſame time that it was hoped the duke of Anjou would be called to the ſucceſſion of the whole monarchy. What would have been the fruit of ſo fraudulent a conduct? To weaken at once the will of Charles II. and the Partition-treaty, to incenſe the enemies of France, and increaſe the obſtacles to the advancement of the duke of Anjou. It is farther obſerved, that the faint manner in which Lewis undertook the war of 1701 clearly proves that he did not conclude the peace of Ryſwic, with deſign to prepare for the conqueſt of Spain.

Be theſe things as they will, the advantageous offers of Lewis XIV. in 1693 were ineffectual. The war was carried on with vigour, and it was ſeen that France was not exhauſted; but the peace ſigned at Turin the 29th of Auguſt, 1696, between Savoy and France, and confirmed afterwards by all the parties of Ryſwic, was in ſome ſort a ſignal of the general peace[c]. Purſuant to the firſt article of the treaty, the duke of Savoy forced the allies, whom he abandoned, to conſent to a ceſſation of arms in Italy. Whereupon the French joined all their forces upon the Rhine and in the Netherlands, which was a conſiderable advantage; the conqueſts they made there were not uſeleſs, like thoſe of Italy, which the French could not keep, and which therefore were capable to oblige the enemies to ſpeak peace.

The negotiations of Ryſwic were not difficult. The 20th of September, 1697, the French plenipotentiaries ſigned the peace with Spain, England, and Holland; and the 30th of the next month with the emperor and empire.

FRANCE. LORRAINE.

"The treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen are to be the foundation and baſis of the treaty of Ryſwic between France on one part, and the emperor and empire on the other. All the articles that ſhall not be derogated from, ſhall remain in force.

"The treaties of the Pyrenees, Aix-la-Chapelle, and that of Nimeguen, between France and Spain, are confirmed in all the articles which are not altered by the treaty of Ryſwic.

"The emperor and empire give to the king of France Landau and its territory, conſiſting of the villages of Nuſdorf, Arnheim, and Quiecheim. They likewiſe reſign to him Shaſburg, and what belongs to it on the left ſide of the Rhine, with all the juriſdiction, property, and rights of ſovereignty, which they have over that imperial city."

Lewis XIV. had been poſſeſſed of this place ſince the 30th of September, 1681, by virtue of two acts: the firſt was the treaty between him and the pretor and conſuls of Straſburg, who acknowledged him for ſovereign lord and protector*. The ſecond was the truce concluded at Ratiſbon the 16th of Auguſt, 1684, between France and the empire. The firſt of theſe acts was null of itſelf, no law obliging an imperial city to ſeparate itſelf from the Germanic body, without their conſent. The ſecond gave the right of ſovereignty to France but for twenty years. The right of ſovereignty granted by the treaty of Munſter over Alſatia, and its ten free cities, met with ſome objections in the congreſs of Nimeguen from the miniſters of the emperor Leopold. The affair was deciſively ſettled by the 4th article of the treaty of Ryſwic, between France and the emperor and empire. It is there ſaid, that all the places and rights, which were ſeized by his moſt chriſtian majeſty out of Alſatia, as well during the war and by way of fact, as under the name of unions or re-unions, ſhall be reſtored to the emperor, empire, and to the ſtates and members thereof. The re-unions, which relate to Alſatia, are therefore valid. It was by the decrees of the 22d of March and the 9th of Auguſt, 1680, that the royal chamber of Briſac put the king of France in poſſeſſion of the rights of ſovereignty over Lower and Upper Alſatia.

The duke of Lorraine ſhall be reſtored to the free and full poſſeſſion of all the places and properties which his uncle duke Charles in 1670 (when they were ſeized by France) did enjoy, except only ſuch alterations as are explained in the treaty.

"The ramparts and baſtions of the new town of Nancy, and the outworks of the old, ſhall be demoliſhed, with the fortifications of Kirſch and Homburg, and ſhall never be rebuilt. The duke may incloſe the new town with a plain wall, without any angles. France ſhall enjoy, in full ſovereignty, the fort of Saar Lewis, with half a league of ground round it, and the city and provoſtſhip of Longwic; giving in exchange to the duke of Lorraine another of the ſame extent and value in one of the three biſhoprics. The troops of the French king ſhall have free paſſage through the duke's territories, upon timely notice, and pay ready money for what they ſhall take. So the roads reſerved to France by the treaty of Nimeguen ſhall return to the duke's obedience."

[c] The peace was made at the expence of the honour and reputation of that prince, which he ſacrificed to the ambition of ſetting one of his daughters on the throne of France. His ſon and ſucceſſor had ſentiments more worthy of a king, and never could the intrigues and promiſes of France induce him to take the leaſt ſtep againſt his own engagements.

* See Chap. III.

EMPIRE,

EMPIRE.

" Reſtitution ſhall be made to the emperor and empire, by the king of France, of all the places out of Alſatia, that have been ſeized by force of arms, or by virtue of the decrees of the parliament of Beſançon, and the chambers of Metz and Briſac; but the catholic religion ſhall continue in the ſame ſtate it is at preſent, in the places to be reſtored."

This laſt clauſe, contrary to the regulations of the treaties of Weſtphalia, has cauſed in the empire quarrels capable to diſturb the public peace. In the juſt and preciſe ſenſe of the words, the clauſe only ordained, that the churches built by the king of France ſhould not be demoliſhed; and that the catholics ſhould continue their aſſemblies therein. The elector Palatine, the archbiſhop of Mentz, and ſome other princes, extended the meaning of the words, and by forced reaſonings pretended to infer, that the proteſtants could not have the free exerciſe of their religion in the places where the catholics had churches. Nay, they diligently ſought after places, towns, villages, and hamlets, where maſs had occaſionally been ſaid once or twice, and there erected chapels.

It may eaſily be conceived with what warmth the proteſtant princes of Germany oppoſed theſe pretenſions, ſince, in concert with the king of Sweden, who had been mediator of the peace, they refuſed to ſign the treaty of Ryſwic. Their complaints and remonſtrances began in 1714, during the congreſs of Baden. They demanded the repeal of the clauſe of Ryſwic; and though they were ſupported by their allies, the maritime powers, and favoured by France, they could obtain no ſatisfaction.

This quarrel ceaſed at length, but it revived in 1735, when the queſtion was to ſettle the preliminaries of the peace concluded at Vienna ſome years after. The king of France declared on that occaſion, that he left the deciſion of the affair to the emperor and the diet of the empire; that, by the clauſe of the 4th article of Ryſwic, he did by no means pretend to weaken the rights, which the proteſtants of Germany enjoyed by virtue of the peace of Weſtphalia; and that he deſired nothing more than that the churches, built by Lewis XIV. in favour of the catholics, ſhould remain. The princes and ſtates of the Augſburg confeſſion were not heard.

Probably they will relinquiſh the proſecution of this affair. They have failed in two attempts; and the ſucceſs would be the more difficult now, that a ſort of proſcription muſt be exerciſed upon the catholics, in depriving them of what they poſſeſs. Beſides, the princes of the Romiſh communion have by degrees drawn, from the clauſe of Ryſwic, all the advantages they could expect; and it is reaſonable to think, that for the future, their moderation will make the proteſtants forget the injury done them by the peace of Ryſwic.

" The king of France ſhall reſtore to the emperor and empire the fort of Kehl built by him, and ſhall demoliſh, at his expence, the fort of Pille, and the other fortifications, in the iſle of the Rhine, except fort Lewis. The fortifications of this fort, and of Huningen, ſhall be deſtroyed, with their bridges of communication. The fortifications added, after the peace of Nimeguen, to the caſtles of Traerbach, Kirn, and Eberenberg, ſhall have the ſame fate; as alſo the fort of the Montroyal on the Moſelle. None of theſe fortifications ſhall ever be rebuilt. The navigation of the Rhine ſhall be free to both powers; the courſe of the river ſhall not be changed, nor new tolls eſtabliſhed, or old ones increaſed."

" The king of France reſigns to the emperor and the houſe of Auſtria the city and caſtle of Friburg, the fort St. Peter, the Star-fort, with all the works newly erected in the Black Foreſt, and the reſt of the Briſgau, the villages of Lehen, Metzhauſen, Kirchzart, the city of Briſac, with its dependencies, on the right ſide of the Rhine. The fort le Mortier ſhall remain to France; but that part of Briſac, on the left ſide of the Rhine, and commonly called the New City, ſhall be demoliſhed, with its bridge and the works, in the iſle of the Rhine. They ſhall never be rebuilt."

" The treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, of the 29th of June, 1679, between France and the elector of Brandenburg, ſhall remain in full force."

" The grand maſter of the Teutonic order ſhall enjoy all his ancient privileges and eſtates that are in the French dominions; and ſo ſhall likewiſe the biſhop of Worms."

" The county of Montbeliard ſhall preſerve its immediate dependence on the empire, without having any regard to the faith and homage paid to the crown of France in 1681. The territory of Baldenheim, with its dependencies, ſhall be held of the county of Montbeliard."

SPAIN.

" France ſhall reſtore to Spain the city and duchy of Luxemburg, the county of Chinoy, with their dependencies."

The French had remained in poſſeſſion of that country, by virtue of the truce of twenty-four years, concluded at Ratiſbon, the 16th of Auguſt, 1684, between France and Spain. It is well known, that, the king of Spain ſeeking to elude, by affected delays, the execution of the articles ſtipulated at Nimeguen, the French began ſome hoſtilities, to which the truce of Ratiſbon put a ſtop. Lewis XIV. could hardly find a fairer opportunity to attack the houſe of Auſtria; as the emperor was then involved in a war with the Turks in the kingdom of Hungary.

" By the peace of Nimeguen, the king of France, reſigning Aeth to the Spaniard, had reſerved la Verge de Menin and Condé. He alſo retained, by the peace of Ryſwic, the town of St. Antony, Vaux, Guarrain, Ramecroix, Bethune, Conſtantin, Paradis, Kain, Havines, Meles, Mourcourt, le Mont de St. Audebert, called de la Trinité, Fontenoy, Maubray, Hernies, Calvelle, and Viers, which are dependencies of Aeth. The generality of the provinces of Flanders, Hainault, and Brabant, ſhall belong to the king of Spain, but without prejudice to what has been reſigned to France by the foregoing treaties."

" All the places, cities, towns, villages, and hamlets, of which the king of France had made re-unions to his crown, ſince the peace of Nimeguen, in the provinces of Namur and Luxemburg, in Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault, ſhall be reſtored to Spain, except 82 towns, villages, or hamlets, which the king of France conſiders as dependencies of Charlemont, Maubuege, and ſome other places reſigned to France by the treaties of Aix-la-Chapelle and Nimeguen."

It is needleſs to mention the names of all the places reſigned and reſtored; they are without number. The reader, if he pleaſes, may conſult the treaty of Liſle, concluded the 3d of December, 1629, between France and Spain, in execution of the treaty of Ryſwic. He may alſo have recourſe to a writing, intitled, " Liſle, and a declaration of the re-unions made by his moſt chriſtian majeſty in the provinces of his catholic majeſty in the Netherlands, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen."

" As to the rents laid upon the generality of ſome provinces in the Netherlands, of which part is poſſeſſed by France, and part by Spain, it is agreed, that each ſhall pay his quota; and commiſſioners ſhall be named to ſettle the proportion each ought to pay. As to the rents due upon ſuch or ſuch a particular place, they ſhall be paid to the creditors of what nation ſoever they be."

ENGLAND.

" France acknowledges king William, and promiſes not to diſturb him in the free poſſeſſion of his three kingdoms, nor afford any aſſiſtance, directly or indirectly, to his enemies."

James II. had foreſeen that his intereſts would be ſacrificed to the peace, and therefore proteſted, fourteen days before the ſigning, againſt all ſtipulations to his prejudice.

" The king of England promiſes to pay punctually to queen Mary of Eſte, wife of James II, an annual penſion of fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, or ſuch other ſum as ſhall be ſettled by parliament, under the great ſeal of England."

This article is in a declaration of the Engliſh embaſſadors made to thoſe of France, and inſerted in the protocol of the miniſter mediator. It was here to be obſerved, that ſuch ſort of acts, which run upon points not to be inſerted in a treaty, have however the ſame validity.

UNITED-PROVINCES.

" France, and the republic of the United-Provinces, renounce all pretenſions whatſoever that they may have upon each other."

HOUSE of SAVOY.

" The articles of the treaties of Queruſque, Munſter, the Pyrenees, and Nimeguen, concerning the houſe of Savoy, are maintained in full force.

" The king of France reſigns to the duke of Savoy, in full ſovereignty, the lands and demeſnes included in the government of Pignerol. All the fortifications ſhall be demoliſhed; the duke of Savoy engages never to rebuild them, and promiſes to erect no new ones in the reſtored country. The city of Pignerol ſhall only have a plain wall about it.

" France ſhall ſtill remain charged with paying to the duke of Mantua, on account of the houſe of Savoy, the ſum of 494,000 gold crowns, purſuant to the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye."

The

The reader may look back to the chapter of the treaty of Weſtphalia, at the article of the houſe of Savoy.

" The embaſſadors and envoys of Savoy ſhall be treated at the court of France as thoſe of crowned heads; and the embaſſadors of France, at Rome and Vienna, ſhall treat the embaſſadors of Savoy as they do thoſe of kings.

" The duke of Savoy engages not to ſuffer the ſubjects of the king of France to ſettle, on any pretence whatſoever, in the valleys of Lucern, or of the Vaudois. He alſo promiſes not to permit the exerciſe of the reformed religion in the government of Pignerol.

" Maria Adelaid of Savoy renounces, in favour of the princes of her houſe,-in the direct or collateral line, all the rights ſhe may have by her birth. The king of France, the dauphin, and the duke of Burgundy, approve and confirm this renunciation."

This is the third article of the marriage-contract of the princeſs of Savoy with Lewis duke of Burgundy.

HOUSE of FARNESE.

" The king of Spain ſhall put the iſland of Ponza in the Mediterranean into the power and poſſeſſion of the duke of Parma."

PROTESTATIONS.

By an act paſſed at Ryſwic, the 7th of October, 1697, the houſe of Egmont proteſts againſt whatever was ſtipulated in the congreſs of Ryſwic, in prejudice to his rights upon the duchy of Guelders, the counties of Egmont, Zutphen, Meurs, Hornes, &c. and the lordſhip of Mechlin, poſſeſſed by the king of Spain, the States-general, or the biſhop of Liege. The ſtates of Guelders and Zutphen anſwered this act by a counter-proteſtation of the 30th of January, 1698, dated at the Hague.

The town of Embden was included by the States-general in the treaty of Ryſwic with France. The prince of Eaſt-Frizeland proteſted at the Hague, the 4th of November, 1627, againſt this incluſion; pretending very juſtly, that ſuch an honour can belong only to a ſovereign power. Embden, ſupported by the protection of the United Provinces, has always affected an entire independence. The diſputes with the prince of Eaſt Frizeland are too well known to be mentioned here. The States-general conſented to withdraw their garriſon, as ſoon as the king of Pruſſia came to be poſſeſſed of the principality of Eaſt Frizeland, by the death of the late ſovereign, whoſe heir he was by right of reverſion.

At the Hague, the 8th of November, 1697; proteſtation of Maria d'Orleans, ducheſs of Nemours, for the preſervation of her rights to the principality and marquiſate of Rotthelin.

Ryſwic, the 28th of September, 1697; proteſtation of the houſe of Tremouille, on account of its rights to the kingdom of Naples.

Ryſwic, the 7th of October, 1697; proteſtation of the houſe of Montmorency Luxemburg, for the preſervation of its rights to the duchy of that name.

The 4th of November, 1697, the duke of Mantua notified to the miniſters aſſembled at Ryſwic an act, whereby he proteſted againſt whatever was done, in the treaties of peace, contrary to his rights and intereſts.

The ſame day the houſe of Brunſwic Wolfenbuttle proteſted at the Hague, for the preſervation of its rights to two prebends in the cathedral of Straſburg. They had been given to him by the treaty of Oſnabrug, and were taken from him by a decree of the chamber of Briſac, and by the 4th article of the treaty of Ryſwic, between France, the emperor, and empire.

The act has been mentioned, whereby James II. of England proteſted, the 6th of September, 1697, againſt whatever ſhould be ſtipulated to his diſadvantage in the treaty of Ryſwic.

The 13th of December, 1697, the miniſters plenipotentiaries of France, at the congreſs of Ryſwic, made a general proteſtation againſt all thoſe that had been preſented to the congreſs.

CHAP. VI.

TREATIES of TRADE and NAVIGATION between the PRINCIPAL POWERS of EUROPE.

WE live in an age which does not want to be told, that a nation cannot be happy and flouriſhing without commerce. It was very late before this truth was known to Europe. The barbarians, who eſtabliſhed themſelves upon the ruins of the Roman empire, were fit only for war, and the nature of their government rendered it neceſſary for ſeveral centuries. Whilſt the moſt powerful nations were trying their ſtrength againſt one another, or were a prey to inteſtine diviſions, ſome republics in Italy built ſmall veſſels, and tranſported from port to port ſuch commodities as they hoped to diſpoſe of. Theſe beginnings were proſperous, and helped to eſtabliſh a rich trade, which the ancients had carried on by the way of Alexandria, and the ports of Syria. From theſe places the Venetians and Genoeſe imported the merchandizes of the Eaſt Indies, which they ſold again at an immenſe profit.

After their example, ſome cities, ſtanding on the Baltic ſea, ſettled a correſpondence between the northern kingdoms and Germany, of which they themſelves were the channel. All the trade of theſe provinces was in their hands: they entered into a confederacy, to render themſelves more conſiderable; their riches enabled them to make themſelves reſpected by their neighbours, and the moſt potent princes ſought their alliance.

Commerce was no longer a ſtranger to Europe: all the cities on the ſea or large rivers, took advantage of their ſituation; they became ſo many ſtaples, where the neighbouring princes brought the overplus of their merchandizes, and provided themſelves with what they wanted. Manufactures were formed on all ſides; and the pilots, by conſtant practice, carried at length navigation to the higheſt perfection. In the fifteenth century, Italy was already very famous for ſilk-ſtuffs, and the Netherlands for woollen manufactures. About the ſame time France had the good fortune to enjoy a Jaques-Cœur, the greateſt merchant perhaps Europe has ever ſeen; and the Portugueſe, by coaſting along the weſtern ſide of Africa, were trying to open a new paſſage to India.

The diſcovery of America, and the ſafe arrival of the Portugueſe to Calicut, by doubling the Cape of Good-Hope, produced a ſurpriſing revolution in all Europe. The trade of Italy ſunk, and Liſbon became the general magazine of the Indian commodities. The Portugueſe, ſold, at a moderate price, what the Venetians and Genoeſe were forced to pay dear for to the Arabs or the Perſian caravans. Luxury ſpread itſelf, and was fed with new objects; induſtry, encouraged by the gold and ſilver of America, brought all the arts to perfection, and created new ones.

The hanſe-towns had now begun to decay. Their ſituation on the ſea and large rivers, which at firſt was the cauſe of their flouriſhing, became afterwards the occaſion of their ruin. For their diſtance, which enabled them to render their commerce more extenſive, hindered them from aſſiſting one another when attacked by their enemies. This aſſociation, conſiſting of 72, and ſome ſay of 80 cities, had been formed at a time when the princes enjoyed but a precarious authority in their dominions; but, in proportion as they increaſed in power, they commanded the hanſe-towns in their territories to withdraw from the union. This immediately ſeparated from them all the cities of England, France, Spain, and Italy. The more the hanſe-towns perceived themſelves weakened, the leſs they were united together: and being deſirous, one at the expence of another, to repair the loſſes cauſed by their decay, they haſtened their ruin. This ſociety almoſt undone by their quarrels, which the Flemiſh and Dutch had wiſely availed themſelves of, loſt all hopes of retrieving their commerce, when they ſaw it carried on by the moſt potent nations themſelves.

There are five branches of commerce in Europe. The home trade of each ſtate in particular, the commerce of the Europeans among themſelves, and the trade to India, to America, and to the coaſts of Africa. It will not be amiſs to make here a few reflections on ſo important a ſubject.

The home trade does not of itſelf enrich a nation, ſince, ſuppoſing no exportation, there is no money imported; it is however the moſt uſeful, and ſerves for foundation to foreign commerce. Without excellent laws on this part of the government, a kingdom languiſhes in the midſt of the riches which ſhould be the fountain of its ſtrength and proſperity. Agriculture and all the other arts which are in the hands of the country people, deſerve the particular attention of the legiſlature; by encouraging them, induſtry, riches, and people are increaſed and abound, and conſequently the ſociety becomes capable of forming the greateſt enterprizes. If, on the contrary, the circulation is not free in the provinces of a ſtate, nature's bounties will be there ſpread in vain; the products will be ſpoiled for want of conſumption, and plenty will be dreaded almoſt as much as a ſcarcity, and men will labour leſs in order to ſell dearer. It is eaſy to ſee how many evils muſt reſult from this capital error, by reflecting on the intimate connexion between all the branches; but this is not the place to enlarge upon this ſubject, how intereſting ſoever it may be, nor upon the means uſed by political ſtates, to promote inland commerce.

Want binds all the nations together. From the north are brought timber to build, pitch and tar, corn, wax, fur, &c. France affords wine, brandy, ſalt, &c. Spain, England, in a word, all the ſtates of Europe have ſome particular products either from nature or induſtry. Properly ſpeaking, the nation in favour of which the balance of trade ſhould incline, is that which inhabits the moſt fertile climate. And yet Holland has immenſe treaſures, the fruit perhaps of the moſt extenſive trade in the world, though the produce of its lands cannot maintain the eighth part of the inhabitants, and, wanting the moſt neceſſary things of life, it has only butter, cheeſe, and a little coarſe wool. What makes well for Holland, is, that, far from improving their advantages, moſt nations live in a profound ignorance of their intereſts, and have their hands tied up by idleneſs, which is the effect of the bad conſtitution of their government.

The Hollanders profit by the fertility of all the countries to which they extend their commerce and navigation. The riches which a nation know not how to uſe become their own. They import and work up at home, ſilk, wool, thread, cotton, hair, and generally all the materials which can be uſed in manufactures. Their towns are rich magazines, where they have the art of collecting all the particular commodities of the ſeveral ſtates of Europe. They gain by the wine and brandy of France, by the corn of Poland and Livonia, by the timber of Norway and Ruſſia, by the copper and iron of Sweden, by the wool of Spain, by the ſilk of Italy and the Levant, &c.

The induſtry of the Dutch would ſoon ceaſe to enrich them, if all the nations, of whom they are the factors or carriers, ſhould follow the prudent example of England. In 1660 the parliament made a regulation, the wiſeſt that can be deviſed to increaſe and extend their commerce. By the act of navigation then paſſed, no goods are to be imported into, or exported out of, any of the Britiſh dominions, in any other ſhips but ſuch as belong to England or Ireland. All the articles of this act tend to one ſingle point, namely, the prohibition of the Britiſh ports, either in or out of Europe, to all foreign ſhips not freighted with the merchandizes wrought or unwrought of the nation.

If France, much richer in itſelf, had taken the ſame courſe, what immenſe riches would ſhe poſſeſs? But at the ſame time that England was combating all obſtacles, and by the encouragement of navigation forcing the Engliſh to carry on their commerce themſelves, the French neglected their moſt judicious maxim, and made foreigners partners in their trade.

In the reign of Lewis XIII. the importation of all merchandizes detrimental to the manufactures of the kingdom was prohibited. The foreign traders could vend their goods only at fairs, or at certain fixed places; precautions were taken to hinder frauds under a borrowed French name, and by an edict of that prince ſome foreign merchants were obliged to freight their ſhips with commodities of the growth of the kingdom to the value of thoſe they had ſold. The exportation of the firſt materials was forbid on ſevere penalties, and the importation of the ſame promoted by leſſening the duties. Above all things, it was not permitted to freight in the ports of France any foreign veſſels for the exporting of merchandizes.

The commerce of France was interrupted during the long wars ended by the Weſtphalian and Pyrenean treaties. Inſtead of reſtoring it at the peace by encouraging navigation, which had likewiſe much ſuffered, the prohibition to foreigners to freight in the ports of France was taken away. The goods and wares wherewith the kingdom was overſtocked, were profuſely exported; and it was thought a very politic thing. But this tranſient advantage produced a miſchief which was long felt. The merchants were uſed to ſee foreign ſhips laden with their goods, and were become only mere factors; deprived of the profits of freight, their fortunes diminiſhed; they purchaſed cheaper the merchandizes and wares of their fellow-ſubjects, and ſold them in leſs quantities. It is eaſy to perceive what a terrible blow this was to the nation: the price of lands fell; manufactures were diſcouraged; ſhipwrights and ſailors becoming uſeleſs, went into the ſervice of foreign powers, and enabled them more ſurely and longer to take advantage of the errors of France.

The permiſſion granted to foreigners to freight in the ports of France ſhould have laſted only till ſhips had been built or purchaſed, but the miniſtry perceiving the merchants had ſettled matters according to their ſituation, and dreading perhaps the impoſſibility of reſtoring navigation without a great expence to the king, they thought not of reviving the old regulations; on the contrary, they confirmed the grievances by ſettling this cuſtom of freight at fifty ſous a ton. The balance of trade, however, was ſtill on the ſide of France; and it was that which deceived a miniſtry, not ſo clear-ſighted as the preſent managers of this important branch of the government. It was concluded from thence that the adminiſtration was judicious, whereas it ſhould only have been inferred that the natural advantages of France over her neighbours, were ſuch as to enable her to commit errors with impunity.

The ſpeedieſt and moſt certain way to increaſe the commerce of a ſtate is to cauſe navigation to flouriſh. In vain are the wiſeſt laws made encouraging manufactures and the cultivation of the lands, if there are not merchants always to export the overplus of the goods and commodities. A nation who ſtays to ſell till purchaſers come, muſt often be overſtocked with wares, and conſequently neglect a manufacture which is not rewarded. If the truth of this is queſtioned, the Memoirs of John de Wit may be conſulted. That great man aſcribes to the Dutch fiſhery, not on account of its profits, but becauſe it is the ſoul of their marine, all their reſources to free themſelves from the dominion of Spain, to conquer the Indies, to form their commerce, and to acquire the regard they enjoy in Europe.

After the mention of the advantages of navigation relating to trade, it will be proper briefly to examine the maxim which ſays, He that is maſter at ſea, will be ſo at land. This ſort of axiom was formed about three thouſand years ago in Greece, during the war againſt Xerxes. Every one knows that under the conduct of Themiſtocles the Athenians equipped a large fleet which defeated that of the Perſians. Xerxes who could not poſſibly make a deſcent on the coaſts of Peloponneſus, whilſt his army was beſieging the Iſthmus of Corinth, deſpaired of ſubduing the Grecians. He was ever afraid that, after they had made themſelves maſters at ſea, they would cut off his retreat by breaking down the bridge over the Boſphorus, and haſtily retired into Aſia. Greece was delivered from the impending danger, and, owing her ſafety entirely to her marine forces, was convinced of their importance.

It was natural for the Grecians to conſider the ſea that parted them from Aſia, as a barrier againſt the Perſian king; but this barrier was of no ſervice, unleſs it was covered with ſhips. Beſides, Greece being compoſed wholly of iſlands and maritime republics, that ſtate whoſe marine was flouriſhing, muſt neceſſarily have exerciſed a kind of dominion. This was enough to give authority to the maxim in queſtion.

It was no leſs true with reſpect to the Romans, when their ambition led them to extend their power beyond Italy. How could theſe proud conquerors have ſubdued the iſles of the Mediterranean, triumphed over Spain, Carthage, Greece, and eſtabliſhed their empire in Aſia, if their fleets had not been ſuperior to thoſe of their enemies? Would it have been poſſible for them to preſerve their conqueſts, if ſome power, by becoming maſter of the Mediterranean, had cut off their communication with their provinces?

The Romans therefore were in the right to adopt the political axiom of the Greeks. But is this maxim alſo true, in regard to the moderns? The reſpective ſituations of the powers of Europe are very different from that of the Grecians, or of the Roman republic with reſpect to the countries out of of Italy. And indeed, during the three centuries in which the marine has been increaſing in Europe, actions at ſea have never decided the fate of wars. The taking of certain places and deciſive battles which have laid open the whole provinces to the conqueror, is what now-a days determines the deſtiny of ſtates, and what will continue to do ſo, as long as by their ſituation ſome powers who have the chief influence in the affairs of Europe, will not concern themſelves about what paſſes out of the continent.

The dominion of the ſea would give univerſal monarchy to a nation, but it muſt be a dominion like that of the Romans over the Mediterranean, and which is impoſſible now when our navigation, as extenſive as their's was confined, requires an infinitely greater expence. What nation can have ſhips and ſailors enough to rule all the ocean, and, like the Romans, oblige other ſtates to keep but ſuch a number of ſhips? On the contrary, in the preſent ſituation of things, the dominion at land muſt lead to that of the ſea; and it may be advanced as an undeniable truth, that it is the fault of the moſt powerful nation at land, if it is not alſo the moſt powerful at ſea.

If the ſuperiority at ſea does not lead to univerſal monarchy, it procures at leaſt great riches, and enables a ſtate to carry on their trade with equal ſucceſs in war and in peace. A nation that equips large fleets, is a neighbour to all other ſtates; they can, at pleaſure, make themſelves feared, loved, and reſpected; and, their alliance being preferred before that of a ſtate more powerful in itſelf, they will often act a more conſiderable part in the affairs of Europe.

Before Columbus had diſcovered America, and the pilots of Liſbon had doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Portugueſe had made rich ſettlements on the coaſts of Africa, which extended from the kingdom of Gualata to the country of Cafraria. In India, they built forts in Soffala and on the coaſts of Zanguebar, and took the iſland of Moſambic. They remain maſters of theſe laſt conqueſts which open to them the rich trade of Monomotapa and Abyſſinia; but they were forced to ſuffer other Europeans to have forts in Guinea and Congo.

Africa, the inland parts of which are not known, is inhabited by moſt barbarous and ignorant nations. The African trade is the more advantageous, as, in exchange for wine, brandy, ſilk, and woollen ſtuffs, linens and iron wares, it produces gums neceſſary for dying, drugs, hides, wax, ivory, ebony, cloves, gold, ſilver, and ſlaves.

What riches ſoever Guinea, Monomotapa, and the kingdoms of Soffala and Zanguebar ſpread among us, Africa is ſtill more advantageous by the traffic of ſlaves, which is carried on from the river Senoga to Banguela-Nova. Without the ſlaves, which the Europeans buy and convey to America, they would be forced to abandon the provinces they poſſeſs in the new world. By the negroes alone it is that the mines are worked, the lands cultivated, the ſugars made, tobacco prepared, and conſequently they are the ſoul of the richeſt commerce of Europe.

One of the greateſt advantages of the negro trade is neglected. Many ſtates want men to cultivate lands, and work manufactures; why, therefore, do not the princes of Europe permit their ſubjects to purchaſe ſlaves in Africa? Whatever the lot of theſe wretches might be, it would not be ſo hard here as in the Weſt Indies. In devoting them to the loweſt and moſt laborious functions of ſociety, they would fare no worſe than our freemen, who are obliged to do that ſervice, and who might be put to better uſes.

The objections that are urged againſt ſlavery, do not deſerve notice. Since it is allowed in the American colonies, there is no reaſon it ſhould not be permitted among us, when policy, which knows its utility, ſhall eſtabliſh the cuſtom. Let it not be thought a degrading of humanity to have ſlaves; the liberty which every European thinks he enjoys, is nothing more than a power to break his chain and chuſe a new maſter. Want makes ſlaves, and they are the more unhappy, as no law has provided for their ſubſiſtence. What really debaſes mankind is beggary, which is neceſſary only to nations where there are none but freemen.

This ſubject ſhall be concluded with ſhewing in part the advantages that would accrue to a kingdom like England or France. It is certain, the merchants, taking ſlaves of Guinea in exchange for the wares of their country, would promote agriculture no leſs than manufactures. In the next place, the ſale of their negroes at their return would open a new way of circulation; it would multiply the contracts of ſale, and conſequently the profits of the ſubjects, becauſe every bargain ſuppoſes an advantage to the buyer and ſeller.

The negro trade would produce new riches in the ſtate. The Africans are known to be robuſt, dexterous, and intelligent; their owners would make an advantage of theſe qualities, and put them to learn profitable trades. From hence would reſult two great benefits; the firſt, that the manufactures would no longer flouriſh at the expence of agriculture, from which they always take the neceſſary hands; the other, that the manufacturers, ſelling their wares at a lower price than at preſent, would eaſe the people and enlarge their ſale.

It is impoſſible to calculate all the advantages which would be produced from the eſtabliſhment of ſlaves. What lands, now lying waſte, would be cultivated? What undertakings, which the expence renders impoſſible, would become eaſy? But no more ſhall be ſaid of a ſcheme which perhaps after all will be deemed a chimera.

In 1498, the Portugueſe, after having ſurmounted all the obſtacles on their way to India, arrived on the coaſts of Malabar. The eſcaping of the dangers of the ſea was nothing, in compariſon of the diſpoſſeſſing of the Mahometans of the commerce of Aſia of which they were maſters; ſettlements were to be conquered and kept; the Indians to be intimidated and flattered; and, to ſay all in a word, confidence was to be inſpired by making of conqueſts. This by the prudence and courage of the Portugueſe was accompliſhed. They built forts in the places moſt convenient for their purpoſes, tamed the inhabitants of ſome countries, intimidated others, and acquired at laſt the dominion of the Indian ocean.

Portugal, perhaps, would enjoy the fruits of their labours, if it had not become a province of Spain after the death of king Henry. Compelled to take part in the obſtinate wars excited by the revolt of the Netherlands, all its ports were ſhut up to the Dutch, and, in their deſpair, theſe growing republicans attempted to go themſelves to India for the merchandizes, they could not purchaſe at Liſbon: an example which was quickly followed by other nations.

The Dutch found the Indians well diſpoſed to receive them, and were looked upon by them as deliverers. The revolution was ſudden. The Hollanders ſubdued the Molucco iſlands; and, without mentioning their other ſettlements, it ſuffices to obſerve that they were become ſo powerful in India, in 1609, that Philip III. who deſpaired to drive them from their conqueſts, permitted them, by treaty, to continue their commerce in all the ſeas, and on all the coaſts where they had, till then, carried it. The war was renewed in 1621, and the Dutch retained their ſuperiority till the year 1640, when the Portugueſe threw off the Spaniſh yoke, and proclaimed the duke of Braganza king.

Not being enemies of the United Provinces, becauſe they had been ſubjects of the king of Spain, they ſpeedily ſought the friendſhip of the Dutch; but, inſtead of a laſting peace, they obtained only a truce of ten years, during which each party was to remain poſſeſſed of what they held in India. It was difficult faithfully to obſerve the articles of the treaty. The Dutch were uſed to conſider Aſia as their demean; they were afraid, their dominion was not ſecure, ſo long as the Portugueſe hoped to ſhare it; and it behoved them to increaſe their forts before the Engliſh and French, whoſe credit daily gained ground in India, were firmly eſtabliſhed. The circumſtances were the moſt favourable to complete this work; the hatred of the Indians to the Portugueſe was not to be ſuffered to cool, and beſides it was not likely, that the Portugueſe, taken up with their liberty and their new king, would mind any other affairs. However, the court of Liſbon exclaimed againſt the treachery of the Dutch, and declared war againſt them. The Portugueſe drove them out of the Braſils; but they loſt almoſt all their ſettlements in India. The Dutch, raiſed upon their ruins, have ever ſince been the moſt conſiderable power in that part of the world.

The commerce carried on by the Europeans in thoſe rich countries is ruinous of itſelf. We go thither to fetch ſilks, cottons, ſpices, china, &c. but as it is not in exchange for ours, that the Indians give us their goods, there ariſe from thence two diſadvantages; we hurt the progreſs of our manufactures, and we loſe every year a great part of our ſilver and gold, which is amaſſed in the Indies, and never returns. Probably, Europe, which is exhauſted at laſt, would learn to live without the ſuperfluities of Aſia; but America, which very fortunately was diſcovered about the ſame time that the Portugueſe doubled the Cape of Good Hope, ſends us more ſilver and gold than we export to the Indies, and enables us to gratify our luxury at a dear rate.

This commerce would ſoon be reduced to nothing, and become become a charge to the ſtates which carry it on now with the greateſt ſucceſs, if all the nations of Europe ſhould trade directly to India, or if thoſe, who cannot ſend their ſhips thither, for want of ſtock, or becauſe they have by ſome treaty renounced that privilege, could prohibit the uſe of the Aſiatic commodities. It appears, at firſt ſight, that they ſhould reſolve at once upon one or the other of theſe two courſes, in order to reap themſelves the profit which is made by retailing to them what they want, or to baniſh a luxury which muſt drain them by degrees. But let it be remembered, it is the intereſt of many nations to make uſe of Indian wares, though they have them not from the firſt hand, becauſe they buy them cheaper than the manufactures of their neighbours, which they cannot be without. In the next place, ſhould every ſtate to whom they are neceſſary, attempt to trade themſelves, they would find themſelves diſappointed of their expectations. The expences would ſwallow up the profits, and the merchandizes of Aſia would come dearer to them than by purchaſing them from the warehouſes of England, Holland, or France.

The ſtates who have ingroſſed the whole traffic of the Eaſt Indies, will conſtantly oppoſe all others from having a ſhare in it. They ſhould not, however, conſider, as a miſfortune, a revolution that ſhould intirely ruin that trade. It is true, one of the fountains of their treaſures would be dried up, but the others would become the more full. The leſs goods the Engliſh, French, and Dutch imported from India, the more of their own would be ſold, and the profits from thence would make them ample amends for the loſs of the Indian commerce.

There is no need to ſpeak of the ſeveral companies which trade to the Indies. It ſhall only be remarked, that the Dutch have in thoſe vaſt countries many advantages over all other Europeans. Independently of the places, they poſſeſs in the moſt convenient ſituations of India, and on the coaſts of China; Japan is open to them alone. They are become ſo powerful in thoſe ſeas that all the trade from port to port is in their hands. They are maſters of all the countries where cinnamon, nutmegs, and cloves grow; and theſe ſpices, much more uſed in Aſia than in Europe, ſerve them inſtead of ſilver and gold, which the Engliſh and French muſt have to make their purchaſes.

What has been ſaid of this commerce of India is applicable to that of Perſia and China. For that purpoſe it may not be amiſs to mention the grand projects of Peter the Great, Czar of Muſcovy. This monarch intended to eſtabliſh by the Caſpian ſea a trade with the northern provinces of Perſia, and to form a general magazine at Aſtrakan, from whence the merchandizes might be conveyed to Peterſburg by the Volga, and by ſome canals which would make a communication between that river and the Volchoiva. Purſuant to ſtill more extenſive views, he thought of ſettling a correſpondence between Peterſburg and Pekin. It muſt be owned, greater or more noble deſigns cannot be deviſed, but is the execution of them poſſible!

If the memoirs, compoſed on this ſubject by perſons of knowledge, are to be credited, the communication is eaſy between Peterſburg and Aſtrakan. All the riches of the provinces bordering on the Caſpian ſea, ſuch as ſilks, colours for dying or painting, medicinal drugs, rhubarb, ſena, all theſe are conveyed from Aſtrakan to the Ruſſian metropolis at an eaſy rate; and the Ruſſians might have the larger vent of theſe commodities, as they would ſell them cheaper than the merchants of Smyrna and Conſtantinople, who vend them for the Armenians. On the other hand, the ſcheme of a traffic by land from Moſcow to Pekin muſt be deemed a chimera. In the way from one of theſe cities to the other immenſe Deſarts or countries inhabited by barbarous nations muſt be croſſed. What commerce is ſo gainful as to furniſh the expences of the caravans to convey to Muſcovy the merchandizes of China?

America is rather the treaſure of the Europeans. Here they find a quick and ſure vent for all their goods and all their commodities; they are paid for in ready money or exchanged for cocoa, indigo, cochineal, or other precious effects. We do not permit the Americans to cultivate our arts and to live without us. The more their country, of which we know little, beſides the coaſts and the ſides of the great rivers, is civilized, the more extenſive will be the European trade: even at this time, it would be much more advantageous, if the nations who have colonies in America, conducted themſelves by wiſe principles.

The Spaniards poſſeſs the richeſt provinces of America, maſters of all the ſilver and gold of the new world, they would have been in condition to give law to Europe, if inſtead of enjoying Mexico, Peru and Chili, as ſo many demeans: they would only have formed ſettlements which would have thrown out of their hands the whole trade of thoſe kingdoms. Spain, very populous before the expeditions of Cortez and Pizaro, has weakened itſelf to conquer and preſerve its American poſſeſſions. The Spaniards flocked in crowds to a country where fortune is laviſh of her favours. The court of Madrid themſelves countenanced theſe tranſmigrations; but they perceived at laſt, that Caſtile and Arragon, when ſtocked with people, were a more precious treaſure than the mines of Peru and Chili.

In truth, the fields in Spain were deſerted, the manufactures decayed, and the arts ceaſed to be cultivated. In this ſituation, of what benefit to the Spaniards are their American poſſeſſions? The Engliſh, the French, and the Dutch carry on the trade in their name, and of all the treaſure that comes to Cadiz there remains to Spain only the ſums levied by the king for his indulto, and given to the natives of the country, who lend their name for the commerce. But it muſt be obſerved that all this money and the ſums which come to Madrid, otherways than by trade can hardly pay for the foreign goods and wares, which the Spaniards conſume and are obliged to purchaſe.

It is commonly ſaid to be a happineſs for Europe that Mexico, Peru and Chili, are poſſeſſed by ſo idle and indolent a nation. This is an undeniable truth. But it is added, that if an active and ſtirring nation like the French, Engliſh, or Dutch, had ſubdued theſe kingdoms, they would make themſelves maſters of all the riches of the old and new world, and eſtabliſhing their grandeur upon that foundation, they would quickly conquer their neighbours. This does not ſo plainly appear. In the firſt place, it would be a ſilly undertaking to deſire the conqueſt of the Spaniſh dominions in America: the late Abbot du Bos has plainly demonſtrated this propoſition. In the next place, ſuppoſe this conqueſt is made, ſuppoſe the Spaniards are driven from all their maritime places, and the conqueror had penetrated into the country and ſubdued the Americans. On this ſuppoſition, they who have any knowledge of the government of the Spaniards in the new world, of the ſtate of their forces and the nature of the country will agree that ſuch an undertaking will coſt the victorious nation prodigiouſly dear. There will be a neceſſity to keep the vanquiſhed under, and not to ſee a revolt in their new empire, as many troops at leaſt muſt be ſent as the Spaniards actually have there. Now it may be aſked, what power would not be drained by ſuch ſucceſſes? The conqueſt of the Spaniſh Indies will therefore ruin the nation that ſhould make it, and would conſequently cauſe no alteration in the affairs of Europe. For it little concerns trading ſtates, that Peru, Mexico, and Chili, are in the hands of the Spaniards or any other nation, provided the poſſeſſors of thoſe kingdoms are ſo weakened, that they cannot of themſelves carry on the trade.

What would produce a great revolution among us is, if America ſhould throw off the Spaniſh yoke and be governed by its own laws; very probably, the rebels to bribe the Europeans not to aſſiſt the Spaniards againſt them, would open all their ports and pour forth their riches; but this would be a tranſient proſperity. The Americans would ſoon have our arts, and manufactures; their lands would produce our fruits, and conſequently having no occaſion for our goods and merchandizes, Europe would ſink again into the ſame ſtate of indigence in which it lay about four centuries ago.

Happily there is not the leaſt appearance of ſuch an event, the dominion of the Spaniards as mild now as it was formerly terrible, is eſtabliſhed over the natives of the country. The ſpirit and manners of the Spaniards have paſſed into America, and the government of Madrid is ſettled in ſuch manner, that a viceroy of the Indies cannot think of making himſelf independent, though nature ſhould have given him the ambition and talents of a Sylla, a Cæſar, or a Cromwel. America was ever attached to its duty during the war of 1701, if there was in thoſe vaſt kingdoms any ſeeds of rebellion, they ſprung up doubtleſs at the time when two princes were contending for the ſucceſſion of Charles II. and when neither of them had an abſolute authority. The inquiſition is likewiſe a ſtrong fence againſt revolutions; it accuſtoms people to think always the ſame way, and unites them by the ſame faith; and in a monarchy like the Spaniſh, where the prince holds in his hands all the forces of the ſtate, diviſions and troubles can ariſe only from difference of opinions in religion, who can ſay, that if the doctrines of Luther or Calvin ſhould creep into Spain, they would not have the ſame conſequences as heretofore in Germany and France.

Spain

Spain ſeems by the form of its government to be ſecured from all revolution. But there ſometimes ariſe in the body politic unforeſeen maladies, the rapid progreſs whereof no remedies can ſtop. Hiſtory affords a thouſand events, perhaps more extraordinary than the revolution in queſtion; we ourſelves were very near being witneſs of a remarkable one, if it is true, that in the diſtreſſes of the war 1701, Philip I. reſolved to abandon Spain to his rival, and go with his court to the Weſt Indies, and eſtabliſh the ſeat of a new empire.

By this ſhort ſketch upon trade, it may be perceived that it forms too conſiderable an object not to be neceſſarily regulated by laws. This is a thing of immenſe extent. Conventions of little importance will not be mentioned, ſuch as can only cauſe proceſſes among private perſons and are cognizable only by the judges of the admiralty. But after a particular account of what concerns the common law of nations at ſea, and the general terms which ſerve for a baſis to all the treaties of trade and navigation, the mutual engagements ſhall be related, which the powers of Europe have entered into.

GENERAL CONVENTIONS, Concerning TRADE and NAVIGATION.

The merchant ſhips forced by a ſtorm or other accident into a port, pay cuſtoms only for the goods they land, and are free not to unload but what they think fit. As to men of war, it is cuſtomary to ſettle the number of thoſe that may enter into a port, which number is generally five. However if a larger ſquadron is forced for ſome weighty reaſons to take ſhelter, the governor is to be informed of the place it intends to come to, the cauſe of its arrival, and the time it deſigns to ſtay.

Maſters of ſhips, pilots, ſailors, are not to be detained nor their ſhips and goods to be ſeized, by virtue of any general or particular order, on any account whatſoever of war or otherwiſe, not even under pretence of being ſerviceable in defence of the country. The ſeizures however and arreſts of juſtice in the uſual forms for debt, bonds, and contracts are excepted.

In caſe of war, it is allowed to trade with the contending powers, with an exception of all contraband goods; by which are meant all things uſed in war, offenſive or defenſive; but not thoſe things which ſerve for the ſuſtenance and ſupport of life. In general all commerce whatſoever is prohibited with a place beſieged or blocked up.

A ſhip is not to go to ſea without teſtimonials, paſſports, and certificates, declaring the name of the ſhip and its port, the habitation of the maſter or captain, the ſorts of its cargo, the country from which it comes, and to which it is bound, that it may be known whether it carries any prohibited goods, and that frauds may be prevented. Generally a form is agreed upon for the teſtimonials, paſſports, and certificates, and who ſhall deliver them.

When one ſhip viſits another, it muſt not come within gunſhot of the other, but ſend a boat with two or three men, to whom the maſter ſhall produce his paſſport, and teſtimonials, to which all manner of credit is to be given. If any prohibited goods are found, they ſhall be forfeited, but not the ſhip or the reſt of the cargo, unleſs the maſter of the ſhip throw his papers over board, or refuſes to lower his ſails.

When the United Provinces were contending with Spain for their liberty, they publiſhed an ordinance declaring that every ſhip which ſhould be met ſailing to any port of Spain, ſhould be good prize. No one complained of this conduct, either, becauſe the moſt conſiderable powers of Chriſtendom were at war againſt Spain, or becauſe the veſſels of the States-general reſpected the ſhips of the nations, who were able to avenge themſelves of any violences committed againſt them. The 22d of Auguſt, 1689, England and Holland ſigned a treaty at Whitehall, by which they agreed to notify to all the ſtates who were at war with France, that they ſhall attack and declare as good prize, all ſhips going or coming from any port of that kingdom. The neutral powers thought this treaty contrary to the uſual cuſtoms. The Swedes and Danes, ſome of whoſe ſhips were taken, complained of it in vain, but making a league the 17th of March, 1693, to obtain a ſpeedy and juſt ſatisfaction, they were going to commit hoſtililities when the reſtitutions demanded were granted them.

It is prohibited to ſeize the contraband goods found in a ſhip, before an inventory is made by the judges of the admiralty, unleſs the maſter conſents to deliver them in order to purſue his voyage.

A nation may confiſcate all the effects of a neutral power found on board an enemy's ſhip, if the lading was not made before the declaration of war, or within a certain term agreed on. Theſe terms are a month for the Baltic and North Sea, from the Naz in Norway to the Channel; and ſix weeks from the Channel to Cape Vincent; from thence to the Mediterranean, and to the Equinoctial Line ten weeks; and eight months beyond the Line. In this manner it is generally agreed by England, France, Holland, Spain, and the Hanſe Towns. The northern powers aſſign other terms in their treaties, and the difference conſiſts in eight, twelve, or fourteen days more or leſs, according to the diſtance of the ſeas.

However if a cargo laden before the declaration of war, or within the preſcribed terms, contains contraband goods, they are ſeizable upon payment of their value, or elſe the maſter of the ſhip ſhall bind himſelf to bring a certificate, to prove that he has not landed them in an enemy's country.

In the treaties of commerce, liberty is always granted to the ſubjects of the parties to carry all the merchandizes to one anothers ports that are not prohibited by law, with a clauſe of forfeiture for the reſt. The merchants are protected, and that they may not be moleſted, there ſhall be at the cuſtom houſe tariffs, or books of rates for all the duties upon imports and exports. They ſhall have liberty of conſcience, and may make uſe of ſuch lawyers, proctors, notaries, and ſolicitors, as they ſhall think fit, and may keep books of trade and correſpondence in what language they pleaſe. If it is neceſſary that theſe books ſhould be produced to decide any proceſs, the judge ſhall take cognizance only of the articles concerning the affair in conteſt, or which ſerve to eſtabliſh the credit of the books.

A prince always engages to forbid, under ſevere penalties, all his ſubjects taking commiſſions or letters of repriſals from any ſtate at enmity with the power he is treating with. He promiſes alſo not to grant letters of repriſals, but in caſe of denial of juſtice; and this denial is not to be held valid, unleſs the petition of him who demands repriſals be communicated to the conſul of the prince, againſt whoſe ſubjects they are to be granted, that he may juſtify or give ſatisfaction within ſuch a time. The injuries or damages committed by private perſons contrary to the tenor of the treaties, ſhall not diminiſh their force; but the offenders ſhall be puniſhed and obliged to make reparation.

If a ſhip is driven by ſtorm or otherwiſe on the coaſts, whatever ſhall be ſaved of the wreck, ſhall be reſtored to the owners provided they pay the charges of ſalvage, and make their claim within a year and a day. Neither party is to receive pyrates or exiles, it is uſual for the maſters or commanders of an armed ſhip for war or cruiſe, to give ſecurity before they ſail, to repair the damage that may be done by them whilſt at ſea contrary to the treaties.

In caſe of a rupture it is alſo agreed, that the ſubjects of the parties ſhall be allowed a certain fixed time after the declaration of war (generally ſix months) to retire and withdraw, or ſell their effects; till the expiration of the term they are to enjoy full liberty.

Without this convention, which is of no long ſtanding, the merchants would never be eaſy; at the leaſt appearance of a war they would haſtily withdraw their effects in order to avoid their ruin; and it is very viſible how detrimental to commerce ſuch interruptions would be.

What protection ſoever the trading powers grant their merchants, it falls very ſhort of the end preſcribed by their intereſt. Why ſhould two contending nations immediately prohibit all mutual commerce? this ſeems to be a relict of Barbariſm, or rather the effect of a cowardly perſuaſion that the reception of the ſubjects of an enemy is dangerous. It is imprudent no doubt, to grant them in time of war, the ſame freedom they enjoyed during peace; but what inconvenience would there be for two nations to allow one or more free ports for the merchants to reſort to? The intention in prohibiting trade is to annoy the enemy, but ſurely the prohibiter does himſelf conſiderable damage; there is no ſtate but what feels this want of circulation. The merchants are over-ſtocked with goods which decay in their warehouſes, manufactures languiſh, and the manufacturers which make the riches of a country, are a charge to it; the products of the land are loſt for want of conſumption. Beſides if the commerce turns upon neceſſary goods, it will continue in contraband, in ſpite of all prohibitions, and the ſtates will find themſelves diſappointed of the fruit of their cuſtoms.

This grievance ſo fatal to merchants, and ſo univerſally felt in its conſequences, cannot be redreſſed, before another ſtill more pernicious and which increaſes without neceſſity the calamities of war, be aboliſhed; namely, the cuſtom of exerciſing of piracy upon the merchantmen, the moment a war is declared. How is it that nations, who conſider trade as the moſt ſolid foundation of their grandeur, and uſe ſo many efforts to extend their correſpondence, have not to this day diſcovered, how advantageous it would be to them, to agree upon ſome articles proper to ſecure the navigation of their merchants in time of war? Aſk the Dutch, and the trading part of the Engliſh, Spaniſh, and French nations; and their anſwer will be the ſame. They behold with horror the privateers, and would with the greateſt ſatisfaction hear, that the contending powers would not for the future permit their ſubjects to exerciſe piracy, nor their ſhips of war to inſult and take the merchantmen.

How advantageous this would be to the Spaniards and the Dutch, is viſible to any one who is the leaſt verſed in theſe matters. And it would not perhaps be very difficult to prove, that it would be alſo the intereſt of the Engliſh and French, to ſuffer trade to be carried on under proper reſtrictions during war. But this would be too long a digreſſion, and therefore to return to our ſubject.

It may be obſerved that the treaties of commerce may be ranked under two claſſes. The firſt claſs, which are not made for any limited time, are laws which cannot be abrogated without the mutual conſent of the contracting parties. The other claſs are particular conventions for a certain term of years, which loſe all their force, if at the expiration of the term preſcribed, they are not renewed by a freſh treaty. Of theſe there will be no farther mention at preſent, but the firſt claſs ſhall be fully handled in the following ſections.

PORTUGAL, relatively to ENGLAND, to the UNITED PROVINCES, to SPAIN, and to FRANCE.

"The ſubjects of England and Portugal ſhall be treated in one another's countries as the natives. They ſhall enjoy all the privileges and franchiſes that ſhall be granted to the moſt favoured nation. The Engliſh ſhall trade with all ſorts of merchandizes in all the dominions, the king of Portugal poſſeſſes in Europe."

This treaty, concluded at London in 1642, between England and Portugal, was made as appears by the date when the Portugueſe had thrown off the Spaniſh yoke. If the union of their crown with that of Caſtile, was the cauſe of the loſs of a great part of their ſettlements in both the Indies and in Africa; it may be ſaid that the revolution which advanced the houſe of Bragança to the throne, completed the ruin of their trade. To gain friends, the king of Portugal made treaties contrary to his intereſt, and his allies afterwards taking advantage of his diſtreſſes, ſcrupled not to ſtretch their privileges far beyond the bounds they had agreed on.

"The papers, accounts, merchandizes, and other effects of the ſubjects of England dying in the dominions of Portugal, ſhall not be ſeized by the judges of the orphans and abſent; but they ſhall be remitted to factors or merchants who ſhall return them to the lawful heirs, or thoſe that have a right to them.

"The Engliſh (by which word is meant, all the ſubjects of the king of England, except thoſe who are ſettled in their colonies) ſhall continue to trade freely in the lands, places, caſtles, ports, and coaſts of Africa, Guinea, Bine, the Iſle of St. Thomas, &c. where it ſhall be proved that they had any traffic in the time of the kings of Caſtile and at preſent, and they ſhall pay no higher duties than the allies of Portugal.

"The Engliſh ſhall be allowed to continue their commerce with the enemies of the Portugueſe, and to carry arms and war-like ſtores, provided they do not take them from any port of Portugal.

"The Engliſh ſhall not be moleſted on account of religion in the territories of his Portugueſe majeſty, but they ſhall behave with prudence and reſerve. In caſe of a breach between the two parties, neither the perſons nor goods of the merchants ſhall be ſeized. Both ſides ſhall be allowed two years to ſell, or withdraw their effects, and to retire where they pleaſe.

"The king of Portugal promiſes in his own, and the name of his ſucceſſors, to admit for ever hereafter, into Portugal, the woollen cloths, and the reſt of the woollen manufactures of Britain, as was accuſtomed till they were prohibited by the laws, nevertheleſs upon this condition, that the wines of the growth of Portugal ſhall be admitted into Britain, ſo that at no time (whether there be peace or war) any thing more ſhall be demanded for theſe wines by the name of cuſtom or duty, than what ſhall be demanded from the like quantity or meaſure of French wine, deducting or abating the third part of the cuſtom or duty."

This ſhort treaty conſiſting of three articles was concluded at Liſbon, the 27th of December, 1703, between Great Britain and Portugal. Notwithſtanding this treaty, it was agreed by queen Anne's miniſtry in their intended treaty of commerce with France, that the duties on French wines ſhould be no higher than thoſe on Portugueſe wines, by which means the trade of England with Portugal would have been entirely ruined. But the treaty was rejected by the parliament.

"The ſubjects of the United Provinces ſhall enjoy all over Portugal, the rights and privileges granted to the Engliſh, or that ſhall be granted hereafter by any treaty or by virtue of any cuſtom whatever."

This treaty of the Hague the 6th of Auguſt, 1661, between Portugal and Holland has been ſpoken of in the third chapter; by it was ended the war which the Dutch declared againſt Portugal, after having been driven out of Braſil.

"The United Provinces ſhall be free to carry on in Braſil all ſort of commerce except Braſil wood."

Braſil wood belongs to the king of Portugal, who alone trades in it and gains by it a large yearly ſum. The commerce of Braſil is carried on by the Portugueſe veſſels. Foreigners are not ſuffered to ſend ſhips thither, and the king cannot even grant them that privilege ſince his treaty with Spain, at Utrecht in 1715. The Europeans that ſend their goods to the Bay of All Saints, to Pernambuco, or to Rio-Janeiro, are obliged to load them in the ports of Liſbon or Oporto, and to borrow the name of ſome Portugueſe merchant.

The Dutch were not much concerned at being deprived of the liberty of trading directly to Braſil without paſſing by Portugal. They reaped no advantage by it, not only becauſe the freight paid at Liſbon and Oporto for the paſſage of the merchandizes to Braſil, is a trifle. The Portugueſe give their ſailors very ſmall wages, and they live at ſea with great ſobriety, which enables them to ſend their goods much cheaper to the colonies than foreigners could do.

"The king of Portugal conſents that the Dutch ſhall trade in all the places of Africa, where the Engliſh have extended their traffic. They ſhall be allowed to ſettle there and have houſes and magazines.

"The Dutch ſhall trade with all ſorts of merchandizes in the kingdom of Portugal; they ſhall be treated as the natives, and ſhall pay no higher duties for exports and imports than what is cuſtomary in May, 1753. The Portugueſe ſhall enjoy all the privileges allowed to the ſubjects themſelves of the States-general.

"The Dutch ſhall not be AUBAINS in the dominions of Portugal, that is to ſay, in caſe of death their effects ſhall not be ſeized by the judges of the orphans and abſent.

"The conditions ſtipulated by the Engliſh and Portugueſe in the 11th, 17th and 18th articles of the treaty of London, ſhall be agreed upon in favour of the Dutch in the 12th, 1ſt and 16th articles of the treaty of the Hague. The Portugueſe ſhall exact no contributions of the Dutch for the maintenance of the chapel of St. George.

"The commerce ſhall be ſettled between Spain and Portugal on the ſame foot it ſtood before the re-union and in the reign of Don Sebaſtian. The Portugueſe ſhall enjoy in the Spaniſh territories in Europe, all the privileges granted to the Engliſh by the treaty of Madrid the 23d of May, 1667. The Spaniards ſhall not be treated leſs favourably in the kingdom of Portugal."

This treaty of Liſbon the 13th of February, 1668, between Spain and Portugal, put an end to the war, which the Portugueſe had waged ſince 1640 for the recovery and defence of the liberty.

"Spain reſigns to the king of Portugal the colony of the Sacrament, ſituated on the north ſide of La Plata, on condition that he will not ſuffer there any foreign commerce. The Portugueſe ſhall not trade in any manner with the Spaniſh America, nor countenance the foreigners who ſhould ſend thither any merchandizes.

"The treaty of Liſbon of the 13th of February 1668, ſhall be maintained in full force.

"The king of Portugal grants to the merchants of Spain, and the king of Spain to the merchants of Portugal, all the advantages and privileges hitherto granted or that ſhall hereafter be granted to the moſt favoured nation. The two kings reſerve to themſelves alone and for their ſubjects, the right of trading in their reſpective dominions both in the Indi-

Indies and in America, excepting the Aſſiento-contract concluded between Spain and Great Britain, the 28th of March, 1713.

" In caſe of a breach between the two crowns, their reſpective ſubjects ſhall be allowed ſix months to withdraw their effects where they pleaſe.

" Trade ſhall be carried on in France and Portugal in the ſame manner as it was before the war of 1701, and the ſame privileges which the French enjoy in Portugal ſhall be granted to the Portugueſe in France."

The 1ſt of June 1641, Lewis XIII. and John IV. king of Portugal, concluded at Paris a treaty of alliance, wherein it was ſtipulated in the 7th and 8th articles, that commerce ſhould be ſettled between the two nations upon the ſame foot, it was in the time of the antient kings of Portugal, and that their ſubjects ſhould export reſpectively from their dominions, all the goods and merchandizes they ſhould want, paying only the ſame duties as were paid by the moſt favoured nation.

" The king of France engages not to ſuffer his ſubjects of La Cayenne, or others to trade in La Maragnan, or in the mouth of the river of the Amazons; he ſhall forbid them to paſs the river of Vincent Pinſon. On the other hand, all commerce in La Cayenne ſhall be prohibited to the Portugueſe.

" For the convenience of their trading ſubjects the parties ſhall ſettle conſuls to one another's kingdom, with the ſame privileges and liberties as thoſe of France uſed to enjoy in Portugal.

" In caſe of a breach between the French and Portugueſe, they ſhall have ſix months to withdraw their effects and retire where they think fit."

SPAIN, relatively to the UNITED PROVINCES, to FRANCE, to ENGLAND, to the COURT of VIENNA, to TUSCANY, to the HANSE-TOWNS.

" The Spaniards ſhall keep their navigation to the Eaſt Indies, in the ſame manner as they hold it at preſent, without the power of extending it farther; and the merchants of the United Provinces ſhall not frequent the places which the Caſtilians have in the Eaſt Indies."

This is part of the 5th article of the treaty of Munſter, in 1648, between Spain and the United Provinces, which deſerves a particular attention. The maritime powers alledged it as an inconteſtable bar to the emperor Charles VI, when he attempted to eſtabliſh in the Tuſtrian Netherlands an Eaſt India Company. The emperor at firſt was ſatisfied with giving leave to ſome Flemiſh and Brabant merchants to go and trade to the Indies at their own peril and fortunes. This made the Engliſh and Dutch very uneaſy; but the loudeſt complaints came forth, when by his letters of grant, the company was going to be firmly eſtabliſhed.

It is certain, the emperor's pretenſions were not well grounded. It had been ſtipulated in the treaties of Utrecht, and in that of the Barrier concluded at Antwerp, in 1715, that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the Spaniſh Netherlands only with ſome rights and privileges, as Charles II. had enjoyed them. Now Charles II. could not in his demeans eſtabliſh an Eaſt India company; how then could his ſucceſſor aſſume ſuch a privilege?

Though Charles VI. could have juſtly defended his Oſtend company, it is probable, ſuch an eſtabliſhment would have kindled a war over all Europe. On this occaſion, the conduct of the Engliſh and Dutch may be remembered, when Denmark attempted in 1728 to form a new Eaſt India company at Altena. The maritime powers forbid his ſubjects to be concerned in the ſcheme, and conſidered it as a rupture on the part of the Daniſh king; they notified to him that 'the eſtabliſhment of an Eaſt India company at Altena was prejudicial to the trade of England and Holland, and very repugnant to the rules of friendſhip, and to the regard which princes and ſtates are wont to have for each other.' It was added, that 'the king of Great Britain and the States-general would not diſpenſe with oppoſing this eſtabliſhment by all the juſt means conſiſtent with the law of nations. But they hope that his Daniſh majeſty, according to his great wiſdom and equity, will reflect on the inconveniencies which reſult from his undertaking, and which might create fatal miſunderſtandings.'

" The Dutch ſhall forbear ſailing to or trading in the demeans of the king of Spain out of Europe, whether the places are fortified or not. All commerce is equally prohibited to the Spaniards on the coaſts, or in the harbours, ports and places poſſeſſed by the Dutch in the Indies and in America. The Spaniards conſent likewiſe not to traffic in the places of Braſil, which the Portugueſe (in 1641) took from the Dutch, and which they now hold, ſo long as they ſhall continue in the hands of the Portugueſe.

" The ſubjects of the king and the ſtates trading in the dominions of either, ſhall not pay higher duties than are paid by the natives of the places. The imports eſtabliſhed by the court of Madrid, during the twelve years truce ſhall be eſtabliſhed."

The 3d of July, 1667, the Dutch merchants obtained the privilege of carrying into the dominions of Spain all ſorts of India goods and merchandizes, after proving they came from their conqueſts, factories and colonies. It muſt be obſerved, the treaty of Munſter does not regard only the kingdom of Spain, but alſo all the provinces that were taken from it by the peace of 1713, and which are poſſeſſed by the court of Vienna and the king of the two Sicilies. The following articles relate only to the commerce between Holland and the demeans of the houſe of Auſtria in the Netherlands.

" The king of Spain and the States-general ſhall not levy beyond their reſpective limits any duties or gabels for export or import, on any other account upon goods in their carriage by land or water. Their ſubjects ſhall continue to enjoy the ſame immunity from tolls, they were poſſeſſed of before the beginning of the war.

" The king of Spain ſhall take off all the tolls along the Rhine and the Maeſe, which before the war were under the juriſdiction and within the diſtrict of the United Provinces, and particularly the toll of Zealand; provided however that the proprietors of theſe tolls do pay the annual rents that were mortaged before the year 1572.

" White boiled ſalt imported into the king of Spain's dominions from the United Provinces, ſhall pay no other duty than bay-ſalt; and ſalt carried from the Spaniſh provinces to thoſe of the States-general ſhall pay no more duty than their own.

" The different branches of the Scheld and the canals of Gas and Zwyn and other inlets to them from the ſea belonging to the States ſhall be ſhut up.

" Ships and goods paſſing from the ports of London ſhall continue liable to the ſame duties as thoſe pay which go up and down the Scheld or the forementioned canals.

" The ſubjects of the two parties ſhall behave with prudence and modeſty to one another with reſpect to the public exerciſe of religion. Decent burying places ſhall be appointed by the king of Spain for the ſubjects of the United Provinces, that ſhall die in his dominions.

" An equal number of judges ſhall be appointed on each ſide to reſide in the Netherlands, ſometimes in places under the ſtates and ſometimes in places ſubject to Spain. They ſhall have regard to the trade of the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, and to the duties which on both ſides ſhall be laid upon merchandizes. This tribunal ſhall examine into the breaches of this treaty in the Netherlands and the reſt of Europe; and ſummarily and fully determine therein; and their ſentences and determinations ſhall be ſpeedily executed by the ordinary judges where the breaches are committed.

" The Hanſe-Towns with all their inhabitants ſhall enjoy as to trade and navigation in the dominions of Spain all the privileges that are now granted or ſhall hereafter be granted to the ſubjects of the United Provinces. And the inhabitants of the United Provinces ſhall have the ſame rights as the Hanſe-Towns have obtained for the eſtabliſhing of conſuls in the capital and maritime towns of Spain. They ſhall alſo enjoy all the immunities that the Hanſe-Towns ſhall obtain after the concluſion of this treaty."

The treaty here mentioned was concluded between Spain and the Hanſe-Towns at Munſter the 11th of September, 1647. It would be needleſs to ſay any more of it, as it contains nothing material beſides the ſettling of conſuls in the territories of Spain. The Hanſe-Towns ſigned alſo a treaty at Munſter the 3d of May, 1648. It runs upon objects of little importance.

Philip V, and the States-general confirmed in 1714, the treaty of Munſter, in 1648, as may be ſeen in the 10th article between Spain and the United Provinces.

" The merchants of the United Provinces and their conſuls ſettled in Spain, ſhall enjoy all the privileges granted to the Engliſh, the French, and the moſt favoured nation. The Spaniards ſhall have the ſame favour in the territories of the United Provinces.

" When the ſubjects of the two parties have once paid the duties of import according to the tariffs, they ſhall nor

not be obliged to pay again in exporting their merchandizes from one province to another of Spain or of Holland.

" The king of Spain ſhall preſerve to the ſubjects of Holland the power of having judge conſervators in all the trading towns of his kingdom, where they had them in the time of Charles II. and even where other nations now have them.

" The Dutch dying in Spain ſhall not be Aubains, their effects ſhall be remitted to their heirs. The ſubjects of the two powers ſhall inherit each other by will or birth.

" The king of Spain ſhall not permit any nation of Europe to trade to his American dominions, and upon occaſion the United Provinces promiſe to aid him with all their forces againſt any power that ſhall attempt to trade thither."

It is not to be doubted that it is the intereſt of the king of Spain, that all commerce to the Spaniſh Weſt Indies ſhould be carried on by the way of Cadiz. By permitting foreigners to go directly to Mexico or Peru, he would be deprived of part of his revenue, and perhaps even ſhake the foundations of his empire in America. All the trading powers who treated at Utrecht with Philip, required the ſame ſtipulation as may be ſeen, in the 8th article of the treaty of Great Britain, and the 17th of that of Portugal. It is feared that in time ſome extraordinary circumſtance may happen which might authoriſe the miniſtry of Spain to think it convenient to permit ſome nation to trade to America. This would ſo great a misfortune, that it has been deemed neceſſary to obviate it, however remote, or even chimerical it may ſeem. Indeed, if the liberty of commerce to the Spaniſh Weſt Indies was granted to a nation, it is not to be queſtioned but that nation would in a ſhort time engroſs the whole traffic and riches of Europe.

Spain has faithfully obſerved hitherto her engagements; but the ſame cannot be ſaid of other ſtates: it is known how many interlopers there are in the Pacific ocean and the ſea of Mexico. The Engliſh cannot conceal, that their contraband trade in the Weſt Indies is the richeſt branch of their commerce. They ſtrangely abuſed the permiſſion of the South-ſea ſhip, granted by the Aſſiento contract; and Jamaica is a general warehouſe, from whence they clandeſtinely ſend their goods to the places where they have artfully got correſpondents. The court of Madrid has often complained of this breach of the treaties without obtaining any ſatisfaction. The conteſts of the Spaniſh gard de coſtas and the contraband Engliſh veſſels, became a ſort of open war, wherein exceſſes were committed on both ſides. To ſtop the diſorder, a convention was ſigned at Pardo in 1739, founded on the antient treaties, of which ſome articles were explained and commented upon. This negotiation was fruitleſs, the parliament of England diſapproved of the convention of Pardo, all the nation exclaimed as if they had been robbed of one of their privileges; and the miniſtry, forced to give way to the torrent, declared war againſt Spain, the event of which is well known.

" The commerce of the United Provinces, and of the places held by the States-general in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, ſhall continue upon the ſame foot as at preſent. As to the trade of the Canary iſlands, the laws and cuſtoms eſtabliſhed under Charles II. ſhall be obſerved.

" In caſe of a breach between Spain and Holland, their ſubjects ſhall be free for one year to ſell their effects or withdraw them where they pleaſe.

" The ſubjects of France in all the dominions of Spain, and the ſubjects of Spain in France, ſhall be treated as the moſt favoured nation; paying only the ſame duties as the Engliſh and Dutch.

" The parties ſhall have power to ſettle conſuls in each others dominions.

" The ſubjects of each party ſhall have liberty to ſell, give, change, alienate or otherway diſpoſe of, as well by deed as by will, goods, effects moveable or immoveable, that they ſhall poſſeſs in the dominions of the other party. Every one ſhall be free to purchaſe them, ſubject or not ſubject, without any other permiſſion whatſoever than the preſent treaty.

" In caſe of war between Spain and Holland, ſix months ſhall be allowed to retire with their effects."

It is to be obſerved, that the king of the Two Sicilies is bound by the Pyrenean treaty, as ſucceſſor of Philip IV. The ſame muſt be ſaid of the empreſs queen of Hungary, who poſſeſſes in Italy and the Netherlands ſeveral demeans, for which Spain has ſtipulated in the treaty of the Pyrences.

At the peace in 1714, the plenipotentaries of France ſhould have expreſly confirmed, in the treaties of Radſtad, and Baden the Pyrenean, as the court of Vienna was bound by it. They were contented to do it implicitly, by agreeing that the ſubjects of the emperor and moſt Chriſtian king, ſhould continue to enjoy, in point of commerce, all the privileges they were poſſeſſed of; as appears in the 34th article of theſe treaties. France and Spain ſettled nothing with reſpect to trade in the treaties of Aix-la-Chapelle, Nimeguen and Ryſwic; they only revived the articles of the Pyrenean treaty.

" The Engliſh ſhall pay in the territories of Spain no higher duties of export and import than the Spaniards themſelves, and they ſhall enjoy all the immunities and prerogatives granted to France, the United Provinces, and the Hanſe-Towns.

This is the 5th and 38th articles of the treaty of Madrid, concluded the 23d of May, 1667, between Spain and England, which treaty they confirmed in the peace of Utrecht 1713.

" The Engliſh ſhall be permitted to carry into Spain all ſorts of merchandizes of the growth of their kingdom and of their colonies. They ſhall alſo traffic there with Eaſt-India goods, proving by the teſtimony of their Eaſt-India company that they came from the Engliſh factories. As to America and the other countries out of Europe and ſubject to Spain, the ſame privileges are granted to the Engliſh merchants as were granted to the Dutch by the treaty of Munſter."

That is to ſay, the liberty of trading thither was denied them. This treaty of Madrid of 1667, was ſtill more preciſely expreſſed in a treaty between Spain and England, ſigned at Madrid the 8th of July, 1670, which ended the hoſtilities of their ſubjects againſt one another in America. It is there ſaid that, " each king ſhall forbear to navigate in the ports, havens, roads, &c. which the other poſſeſſes in America. But if a ſhip of one party is forced by a ſtorm, or other accident, to ſeek refuge in the ports of the other, the crew ſhall be well received and provided with what they ſhall want."

This treaty of 1670, is alſo confirmed by the treaty of commerce concluded at Utrecht between Spain and England. " The Spaniſh or Engliſh ſhips in their reſpective dominions, ſhall not be viſited by the judges of contraband, or by any other perſon whatever. No ſoldier or officer ſhall be put on board, till after the maſter of the ſhip ſhall have unloaded the merchandizes or declares he does not intend to land."

This article has been cited as exempting the Engliſh from being liable to the ſearch of the Spaniſh gard de coſta, but it is an evident miſtake. For it is plain that the queſtion here is only about the countries where the trade is allowed.

It is the cuſtom in England, that a foreign merchant pays no duties of export when he reſhips the goods he has imported. He is alſo repaid half the duties of import which he has paid, if his return be within a year after his arrival, ſo every Engliſhman who having unloaded his effects in any place of Spain, ſhall load them again to carry them to any Spaniſh port without paying any duty.

" The conſuls of the two parties ſhall be treated as thoſe of the moſt favoured nations. The Engliſh ſhall not be moleſted on account of religion; they ſhall have a burying ground in the principal cities of Spain, they ſhall not be liable to the law of Aubaine; and the Spaniards ſhall enjoy the ſame privilege in England. In caſe of a declaration of war between Spain and England, their ſubjects ſhall have ſix months to retire with their effects.

" The exerciſe of navigation and trade to the Weſt-Indies ſhall remain upon the ſame foot as in the reign of Charles II. Spain ſhall not ſuffer any ſtate to carry merchandizes to her American dominions, and engages not to reſign, ſell or alienate any part thereof."

The inhabitants of Guipuſcoa ſhall preſerve their right of fiſhing round the iſle of Terra-nova.

The Aſſiento treaty comes under the ſecond claſs of treaties, being only for 30 years, from 1713 to 1743. and therefore will not be enlarged upon here, nor the treaty of commerce concluded at Utrecht between England and Spain, nor that ſigned by the ſame princes at Madrid the 14th of December 1710.

The 13th of June 1721, the differences of Spain with France and England, were entirely ended by a treaty of peace and alliance concluded at Madrid. Philip V. confirms in the 6th article, all the privileges which the Engliſh and French enjoyed in his dominions by virtue of their former treaties. The treaty of Seville of the 9th of November, 1729, in the 4th article makes the ſame diſpoſitions.

The treaty of commerce between the emperor Charles VI. and the king of Spain at Vienna, 1725, ſhall not be mentioned, tioned, as being annulled. The emperor renounced his Oſtend company; the king of Spain on his part declared in the treaty of Seville, that in contracting with the emperor, in 1725, he did not pretend to derogate from his former engagements. Beſides, this treaty is not confirmed in thoſe of Vienna the 22d of July, 1731, and of the 18th of November, 1738. It may perhaps be pretended that the articles relating to the trade of the Weſt-Indies remain in force.

"The merchants of Tuſcany ſhall be maintained in Spain, in the poſſeſſion of the ſame immunities and privileges as thoſe of the moſt favoured nations."

This is the 5th article of the treaty of Florence the 25th of July 1731, between Spain and the Grand Duke.

FRANCE, relatively to ENGLAND, to the UNITED-PROVINCES, to the Cities of LUBEC, BREMEN, HAMBURG, to the EMPIRE, to the Houſe of AUSTRIA, to the Court of TURIN, to the SWISS CANTONS.

"The ſubjects of England may freely bring and ſell in France all ſorts of ſilk and woollen ſtuffs of their own fabrication. The French ſhall be allowed to trade in England, Scotland and Ireland, with their wines and all ſorts of wares of their own growth."

This is the 5th article of the treaty of Weſtminſter, concluded the 3d of November, 1655, between France and Cromwell, who then governed England, in order to end ſome differences between the two nations concerning trade.

"The French merchants ſhall not pay any more in the ports of England the duty called 'head money,' nor ſhall the Engliſh be liable to that called 'l'argent du chef."

The ſame ſtipulation is inſerted in the 8th article of the treaty of trade and navigation ſigned by Lewis XIV. and queen Anne at Utrecht the 11th of April 1713.

"The Engliſh ſailing to Bourdeaux by the Garonne, ſhall not be obliged to take out their guns and arms at the caſtle of Blayne.

"The Engliſh dying in France may diſpoſe of their effects by will, gift or otherwiſe, without being liable to droit d'Aubaine.

"The inhabitants of Jerſey and Guernſey ſhall enjoy the ſame privileges in France as the French do in thoſe iſlands.

"In caſe of a war, the merchants ſhall have ſix months to ſettle their affairs and remove their effects."

By the 4th and 6th articles of the treaty of Breda, concluded the 31ſt of July, 1667, France and England agreed, that the liberty of trade and navigation ſhould be eſtabliſhed upon the ancient foot, and that all the edicts and arreſts, which one of the parties had publiſhed in prejudice of the other, ſhould be annulled. The ſame engagements only were renewed by the treaty of peace, ſigned at Ryſwic the 20th of September, 1697.

"The king of France promiſes that he will not endeavour to obtain any other uſage of trade and navigation to Spain and the Spaniſh Indies, than what was practiſed in the reign of Charles II. or ſhall be granted to other nations."

This article is inſerted not only in the treaty of Utrecht, 1715, between France and England, but alſo in that between France and the United Provinces.

"The French ſhall be excluded from all kind of fiſhing in the ſeas, bays, and other places on the coaſt of Nova Scotia, that is, on thoſe lying towards the eaſt within thirty leagues, beginning from Sable iſland, and thence ſtretching along towards the ſouth-weſt. They are likewiſe prohibited from ſettling in Newfoundland and the adjacent iſles, which ſhall belong to the Engliſh. Only it ſhall be allowed to the French to catch fiſh and dry them on land from Cape Bonaviſta, round northward to point Riche.

"The French of Canada ſhall give no moleſtation to the five nations of Indians ſubject to Britain: and the Engliſh ſhall behave peaceably to the Americans friends of the French; and on both ſides they ſhall enjoy the liberty of going and coming on account of trade."

The Dutch Weſt-India company agree, that the French India company may enjoy the iſle and fort of Arquin as their property. The Dutch renounce all their pretenſions, and reſign to the French company all their rights to the ſaid fort and iſland.

This is the firſt article of the convention ſigned at the Hague the 13th of January, 1727. And in a reſolution of the States-General of the 13th of April, in explanation of that convention, the Dutch declare,

"That by virtue of the ceſſion made to the French company, the French may behave in the iſle of Arquin as they pleaſe, that if they think proper to raze the fort and keep the iſland, it ſhall not be inferred from thence, that the iſland is abandoned by the French."

"The Dutch agree to an excluſive trade of the French company on the coaſt of Africa, which ſtretches along from fort d'Arquin to beyond Porto Darco, that is, to the river Serrelione. The Dutch ſhips ſhall not land unleſs forced by a ſtorm or ſome other unforeſeen accident."

Theſe are the 2d and 5th articles of the Hague convention, by the 4th article of which the French India company bound themſelves to pay the Dutch Weſt India company, the ſum of 130 thouſand guilders.

"In caſe of a war, the ſubjects of France and the States ſhall have nine months to remove their effects."

The treaties between France and the States concluded at Nimeguen, Ryſwic, and Utrecht, contain nothing particular; they always took care to ſign ſeparate articles for the affairs of trade and navigation, which being only temporary are not in force now.

"The navigation of the Rhine ſhall be free for the ſubjects of the Empire and of France, no new tolls ſhall be impoſed nor old ones increaſed; trade ſhall continue to be carried on in the adjacent provinces of this river, in the ſame manner as when Alſatia belonged to the houſe of Auſtria."

"The Imperialiſts and French ſhall have liberty to ſell, exchange, or otherwiſe diſpoſe of the goods and effects moveable and immoveable which they poſſeſs in one another's country; and all perſons, natives or foreigners, may buy them by virtue of this treaty.

"The inhabitants of the Imperial and Hanſe-Towns ſhall enjoy in the dominions of France, the immunities granted them by treaties or eſtabliſhed by antient cuſtom."

This is the 7th article of the treaty of Vienna of 1731, France and the empire agreed to make a treaty of commerce after the ratification of the peace; but that affair was neglected.

"The inhabitants and ſubjects of Lubec, Bremen, and Hamburg, ſhall freely trade in all the European dominions of France, and ſhall not pay higher duties for imports or exports than the French themſelves. The French ſhall enjoy in the ports of the Hanſe-Towns, all the privileges and rights which are granted to their own citizens."

Theſe are the 1ſt and 3d articles of the treaty of Paris the 18th of September, 1716, between France and theſe three Hanſe-Towns, from which treaty the following articles are taken.

"The merchants of the Hanſe-Towns ſhall not pay the import of fifty ſous a tun, laid upon foreign ſhips, except in caſe they load merchandizes from one port of France, to import to another of that kingdom. The French ſhall not pay the duty of freight called Laſt Gheldt, which is raiſed at Hamburg.

"As for the Levant-trade in France, the Hamburghers ſhall not pay the 20 per cent. except in caſes where the French themſelves pay it. They ſhall have all the privileges that the king ſhall grant hereafter to the Dutch and the northern nations; they ſhall not be Aubaines in France, but ſhall diſpoſe by will or otherways of all their goods and effects."

As to the trade which the Hanſe-Towns may carry on in the time of war with the enemies of France, all the general conventions mentioned in the beginning of this chapter were agreed on.

"The French captains and thoſe of the Hanſe-Towns, armed for cruiſe or war, ſhall give, before they leave the port, a ſecurity for 15 thouſand livres Tournois, to repair the damages they may commit contrary to the preſent treaty."

"That a ſhip may be deemed to belong to the Hanſe-Towns, 1ſt, It muſt be of their own or the fabrication of a neutral nation, or purchaſed of an enemy before the declaration of war. 2dly, The captain, maſter, pilot, ſupercargo, muſt be natives of the Hanſe-Towns, or naturalized three months before the declaration of war. 3dly, Two thirds of the crew muſt be natural ſubjects of the Hanſe-Towns, or of ſome neutral power, unleſs they were naturalized before the declaration of war.

"The ſhips of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubec, ſhall ſtrike their colours, and lower their ſails when they meet the banner of France."

" In caſe of a war between the empire and France, the ſubjects of the Hanſe-Towns, ſhall be reputed neutral in regard to France, provided they obtain from the emperor the like neutrality for the French merchants who ſhall load in their ports."

This is the 1ſt ſeparate article of the forementioned treaty of Paris.

" If a breach ſhould ariſe between France and the Hanſe-Towns, their ſubjects of both ſides ſhall have nine months to remove their effects.

" The navigation of the Lys, from the mouth of the Deule, in ſailing up ſhall be free; no new tolls ſhall be eſtabliſhed. The mutual abolition of the right of Aubaine with regard to the ſubjects of France and the Auſtrian Netherlands is confirmed.

" The trade to Italy ſhall be carried on and maintained as it was ſettled before the war of 1688. In the kingdom of France, and in the ſtates of the duke of Savoy, ſhall be obſerved what was practiſed in the reign of Emanuel II, both with regard to the road of Suza as of Savoy, of the bridge of Beauvoiſin and of Villafranca. The French couriers ſhall paſs as heretofore, through the demeans of his royal highneſs, and ſhall pay the uſual duties for the merchandizes they ſhall be charged with."

This is the 6th article of the treaty of Turin, the 29th of Auguſt, 1696, between France and Savoy; and the 10th of the treaty of Utrecht between the ſame powers.

" The Swiſs are reckoned as natives in France, they ſhall not be liable to the cuſtom of Aubaine or of Traieforaine*. The French ſhall enjoy the ſame privileges in the Swiſs Cantons, trade ſhall be free between them, the merchants of both ſides may export the money they have received for their goods, provided however they make their declarations and take out paſſports, in order to avoid frauds."

Theſe are the 24th, 25th, and 26th articles of the treaty of the 9th of May, 1715, between Lewis XIV. and the Swiſs Cantons.

The prohibition of exporting gold and ſilver money, is general all over Europe; and it may be ſaid that there is not a more trifling or ſilly law. A little treatiſe of the famous Mr. Law, and the reflections of Mr. Du Tot upon trade, have exhauſted this ſubject.

ENGLAND.

Relatively to DENMARK, SWEDEN, UNITED PROVINCES, Houſe of AUSTRIA, and the HANSE-TOWNS.

In relating the engagements between England and Denmark, with regard to trade, reference ſhall be had only to their treaties of London the 13th of February 1660, of Breda the 31ſt of July 1667, and of Weſtminſter the 9th of December 1669, from whence are taken the following articles.

" The ſubjects of England and Denmark ſhall be treated in the dominions of both parties as the moſt favoured nation; and the Engliſh ſhall continue to pay, for paſſing of the Sound, the ſame toll as in the year 1650.

" The Engliſh that ſhall go to the Baltic through the Sound, may defer the payment of the tolls till their return, provided they give ſecurity to pay them three months after their paſſage in caſe they do return.

" The Engliſh ſhall not frequent the ports of Denmark and Norway that are prohibited. The parties ſhall each have magazines and conſuls in the others dominions, and ſhall not be liable to the right of Aubaine.

" The Danes ſhall import into England, only goods and merchandizes of their own growth, or thoſe that come from Germany by the Elbe.

" It is agreed, that Gottenburg in Sweden, and Plymouth in England, ſhall be free ports, where the Engliſh and Swediſh merchants ſhall enjoy reſpectively the right of ſtaple, with all the privileges thereof. The Swedes may import to Plymouth all ſorts of merchandizes from the Baltic and the maritime provinces of Sweden. The Engliſh may ſell at Gottenburg all kinds of wares except thoſe of the Baltic and Swediſh provinces."

The 5th article of the treaty of Stockholm the 26th of February 1666, between England and Sweden, is not practiſed now, though it was never annulled. The foreign merchandizes pay ſo high duties in Sweden, that the Engliſh carry thither at preſent little elſe but wines, brandies, Spaniſh ſalts, and money in exchange for what they take there. The Swedes ſeem reſolved to have nothing to do with all other nations. They have prohibited the importation of all ſorts of ſilk and woollen manufactures, and iron wares. This regulation is ſo ſtrictly obſerved, that if a Swede ſhould import any foreign ſtuffs, he would be condemned to be fined. Some ſpeculative perſons think this proceeding very wrong; but others believe it may be defended. It muſt not be thought that Sweden is to be governed by the ſame maxims as England, France, and Holland; what enriches theſe powers, would entirely ruin the Swedes. By the way, it may be remarked, that policy has no method of trading that will agree with all nations. Each ſtate muſt be guided by principles relative to its government, and to its own and the ſituation of its neighbours.

" The ſubjects of England and Holland ſhall trade in each other's European dominions, and ſhall be treated there as the moſt favoured nation. The Dutch ſhall conform to the regulation made by the parliament of England, 1660, and ſhall not import into Britain, goods or merchandizes of Germany, but thoſe they receive by land or by ſome river, and which are ſent to them on purpoſe to be exported.

" All the declarations made during the war, to the prejudice of one of the parties ſhall be annulled. In caſe of attack or inſult from what quarter ſoever, the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips that are at hand ſhall mutually aſſiſt one another.

" On both ſides no ſhip ſhall be allowed to be armed for war or cruiſe, till after ſecurity is given to repair the damage the captain may do, contrary to the articles of the treaty.

" If war ſhould be declared, the ſubjects of each party ſhall have ſix months to remove their effects. The United Provinces engage not to appoint for captain-general, admiral, ſtadtholder, &c. one who does not promiſe upon oath to obſerve the conditions agreed upon."

The treaty of the 15th of April 1655, between Cromwell and the ſtates, and ſeveral other engagements concerning trade between the Engliſh and Dutch are omitted, as containing only general conventions, ſuch as are mentioned in the beginning of this chapter.

" The treaty of Munſter 1648, between Spain and the States-general, is confirmed. All the articles of it concerning the commerce of the Netherlands ſhall be faithfully obſerved. The merchandizes brought from England or Holland, ſhall pay only the duties of import and export according to the tariff ſettled at Bruſſels the 6th of November 1715."

This is the 26th article of the barrier-treaty between the emperor and the United Provinces, concluded at Antwerp 1715.

" The Engliſh merchants ſhall have in the kingdom of Sicily, all the preogatives they enjoyed in the reign of Charles II.

" The ſubjects of the Hanſe-towns have the ſame liberty of trading in all the European dominions of England; they ſhall be treated there as the moſt favoured nation; but they ſhall be bound not to uſe borrowed ſhips, and ſhall make oath that the ſhips are their own property, and that the greateſt part of the crew are natives of the country. They may import into Britain all ſorts of goods and merchandizes of the growth and manufacture of Germany."

By ſuch acts of conceſſion, and not by treaties, the Hanſe-towns have obtained theſe privileges.

UNITED PROVINCES.

Relatively to SWEDEN, to DENMARK, to DANTZICK, to the Houſe of AUSTRIA.

" The treaties of Elbing, of the 11th of September 1656, and of Elſinor, the 9th of December 1659, are annulled by all their parties."

This is the third article of the treaty of the Hague, the 28th of July 1667, between the Swedes and Holland. It had been agreed by the treaty of Elbing, that the Dutch ſhould not pay higher duties in the ports of Sweden than the natives. How plain ſoever this clauſe was, it did not fail to create many difficulties on both ſides. The parties met at Elſinor, to prevent a rupture, and it was agreed that the Dutch merchants ſhould be treated as the Swedes, as to their goods, but ſhould pay one per cent. more on account of their ſhips. This ſubtlety ſatisfied the Dutch and the Swedes. The Dutch agreed alſo, that they would declare the price of the goods which they imported to Sweden, and the king might take them upon his own account, adding a fifth above the ſet price.

* A duty upon certain goods imported or exported.

" The

"The ſubjects of Sweden and of Holland ſhall trade freely, and mutually enjoy the privileges granted to the merchants of other nations."

The Dutch have almoſt engroſſed the whole trade of Sweden, by the large advances they have paid to the farmers of the copper mines, and to the merchants of pitch and tar. They have theſe goods ſo cheap, that they can ſell them at Amſterdam at the ſame price that foreigners buy them at Stockholm.

"The Swedes ſhall forbear to trade to Cabo-Corſo, and along the coaſt of Guinea. They ſhall not land there, unleſs attacked by pirates, or forced in by a ſtorm."

The United provinces having always carried on a very rich trade in the Baltic, carefully ſought the friendſhip of Denmark. Theſe powers have treated together at Chriſtianople the 13th of Auguſt 1645, and at the Hague the 22d of February 1647, the 11th of February 1666, and the 12th of February 1669. Some articles only ſhall be mentioned here of the treaty of 1666, which concern the Daniſh African company, and the Dutch Weſt India company.

"The king of Denmark deſiſts from all his pretenſions to Cabo-Corſo, Tocquoray, and Anamabo, and reſigns them to the States-general.

"At the expiration of the grant of the kings of Denmark to their African company, that is, at the beginning of the year 1630, Fredericſburg, Orfu, otherwiſe called Chriſtianſburg, ſhall be given in full property to the Dutch Weſt India company."

Some diſputes ariſing between the Danes and the Dutch, they concluded the 6th of July 1688, under the mediation of the elector of Brandenburg, a proviſional treaty, by which they confirmed and revived the above-mentioned treaties, till their miniſters, who were to meet at Hamburg or Altena, ſhould have made new regulations. The wars with which Europe was then troubled, hindered the concluſion of this affair, and the proviſional treaty became in ſome meaſure definitive. It was not till the 25th of June 1701, that theſe powers concluded at Copenhagen, for twenty years, a treaty of commerce, wherein that of 1645 was confirmed. Every thing was ſettled relating to the liberty of navigation in the ſeas, ports, and rivers, of the two parties. The duties each ſhould pay, and the immunities each ſhould enjoy, were regulated.

"The ſubjects of the United Provinces ſhall pay to Dantzick no higher duties of import and export than the Dantzickers themſelves. The parties ſhall treat one another as they treat the moſt favoured nations."

This is the 26th article of the barrier treaty concluded at Antwerp in 1715, and the 4th of the act of acceſſion of Holland to the treaty of Vienna the 16th of March 1731.

"The Dutch ſhall continue to have in the kingdom of Sicily all the privileges they enjoyed under Charles II."

The NORTHERN POWERS.

Relatively to their Intereſts, and to the EMPIRE.

"The commerce between Sweden and Poland ſhall be reſtored upon the ſame foot as before the war. Their ſubjects and the Courlanders ſhall freely trade on the Dwina and the Bulderau. No new impoſts ſhall be eſtabliſhed, nor the old ones raiſed higher, in the two rivers or in the ports and cuſtom-houſes of Livonia. The merchants of Great Poland ſhall not pay at Stetin any new duties or gabels that may be levied there. Dantzick, and the other cities of Pruſſia, ſhall enjoy in Sweden the ſame privileges as before the war.

"The Hanſe-towns ſhall trade freely in all the demeans of Sweden and Denmark."

It has been obſerved in the ſecond chapter what privileges the Swediſh ſhips obtained in the paſſage of the Sound: they were confirmed by the treaties of Fontainebleau and Lunden, 1679, and by that of Copenhagen of the 18th of May 1680. Afterwards Sweden was obliged to renounce theſe privileges. The treaty, which was concluded at Stockholm in 1720, between Sweden and Denmark, ſubjected the Swedes, in the paſſage of the Sound, to the ſame tolls as are paid by the Engliſh, Dutch, or moſt favoured nation.

"The ſubjects of the emperor, the empire, and particularly the Hanſe-towns, ſhall be reſtored to all the privileges of commerce, they enjoyed before the war, in the territories of Sweden. The Swedes, the Livonians, &c. ſhall trade alſo in full liberty within the empire.

"There ſhall be an entirely free trade between the ſubjects of Poland, Lithuania, and Ducal Pruſſia. The differences which may ariſe upon this article, ſhall be judged by arbitration. The parties may eſtabliſh, by mutual conſent, new duties or tolls in their territories. Their ports ſhall be reſpectively open to them, and they ſhall be permitted to purchaſe of one another all ſorts of warlike ſtores.

"The commerce between Sweden and the territories of the king of Pruſſia, ſhall be reſtored and favoured.

"There ſhall be no impediment to the navigation of the Pehne, or the inlets of the ſame. The king of Pruſſia ſhall not eſtabliſh new, or raiſe the old tolls. His ſubjects, as well as other foreigners, ſhall have for their ſhips the free uſe of the port of Grunſchwart to retire to and remain there. They ſhall pay no impoſt in that port; and ſhall enjoy the ſame privilege at Rugen, provided they pay at Wolgart the uſual cuſtoms before the war. The ſubjects of Swediſh Pomerania ſhall have the ſame liberties with regard to all the ports, havens, coaſts, rivers, which are ceded to the king of Pruſſia.

"Inſtead of hindering, the king of Pruſſia ſhall favour, the commerce of timber, which the Swedes have heretofore carried on in Pomerania, and his other dominions. They ſhall continue to traffic on the Oder and the Warthe; and care ſhall be taken that the navigation of theſe rivers ſhall be free. In fine, the ſubjects of the two parties ſhall enjoy with one another, in reſpect of trade, all the privileges that ſhall be granted to the moſt favoured nation.

"The ſubjects of Sweden and Ruſſia ſhall freely trade with one another, and ſhall be allowed to have magazines in their reſpective dominions.

"Poland and Ruſſia mutually agree upon a full liberty of commerce."
